EDITOR OF "WOODFALL'S LANDLORD AND TENANT," "CHITTY'S STATUTES," ETC., ETC.

1883.

PREFACE TO THE SEVENTH EDITION.

THE first edition of this well-known work was brought out in 1848, the second in 1860, the third in 1864, the fourth, by the late Mr. Brandt, in 1867, and the fifth and sixth by Mr. Shiress Will in 1872 and 1876. Mr. Will subjected the work to a thorough revision, and added as many as five hundred and fifty articles.

The present editor has endeavoured, in addition to bringing the various articles up to date of publication, to effect further improvements. By expunging matter which appeared to be out of place, such as the medical details which were to be found under the articles 'combustibility,' 'mental alienation,' and 'poisons,' by abstracting statutes, and abridging or omitting Rules of Court which were set out in full, and by cutting down some few articles which ran too much into detail, the bulk of the Lexicon has been reduced by nearly one hundred and fifty pages, notwithstanding the many additions that it has been deemed necessary or desirable to make.

The additions and alterations have not been confined to subjects upon which new legislation has taken place or cases been decided, but have been extended much further :— e.g., the articles on Audit, Intoxicating Liquors, Quiet Enjoyment, Schools, Solicitors, Compensation for Tenants' Improvements, and Stamp Duties, have been newly inserted, amplified, or re-written, the editor's object being to make the book more useful to the practitioner without being any less so to the student.

Articles on the subjects of the Bills of Exchange Act, the Married Women's Property Act, the Settled Land Act, and all the other important statutes of 1882, have been inserted in their proper places.

The editor wishes to acknowledge his obligations to Bouvier's Law Dictionary, to Bell's Law Dictionary, and to Wilson's Indian Glossary, and to many friends and correspondents for various valuable suggestions.

THE TEMPLE, April 1883.

PREFACE TO THE FIRST EDITION.

It is not without very considerable diffidence that this Lexicon is submitted to the indulgence of the Profession and the Public, for no man can be more conscious of the difficulties besetting such a subject—of the many requisites of the task—and above all, of the great discrepancy usually exhibited between what a book ought to be, and what it is—than the author of the present undertaking. Knowing, however, from his own experience, the want of a Dictionary especially adapted to ready reference, which should contain the modern law and alterations, as also the terminology comprehended in our varied and intricate jurisprudence, was the inducement to commence, continue, and complete this work. The aims attempted, throughout its arrangement, have been compression, avoiding obscurity, and yielding information easily and effectually. A word-book, when it obviates tediousness of search by giving a concise answer to one consulting it, possesses a peculiar virtue; for irksome is the process of turning out a word, where, instead of finding its explanation, there is a reference to another part of the book; but should the place referred to again direct the inquirer elsewhere, or perchance, disclose neither notice nor interpretation, nor, in fact, anything concerning it, then patience becomes exhausted, and perseverance indeed hopeless.

Often has disappointment ensued when, after reading up a given point of practice or theory, the Author has referred to the Dictionaries extant, in order to learn the precise force of the words and phrases that he had met with in his researches; for frequently they have not even been noticed, or being noticed, their interpretation has involved more confusion, since for the most part the very imperfect impression which was entertained before concerning them, often became obliterated by the utterly obscure manner in which the lexicographer had treated them. Some of these works handle a subject in a mass; for instance, under the head 'Bills of Exchange,' an unmethodical essay is written, in which are explained, after a fashion, the several characters of acceptor, drawer, indorsee, payee, and the several subjects of acceptance, presentment, notice of dishonour, protest, and so on; for instead of breaking up the whole subject, and distributing the elements under their appropriate heads, the inquirer searching for Acceptor, etc., is referred to Bills of Exchange, where he must wade through the greater part of a long and rambling statement before he comes to the precise point he wants. A Dictionary is not consulted for an essay or treatise on a particular theme, but to answer a sudden doubt or explain a present difficulty, as to the proper meaning of a certain technicality. 'In considering any complex matter,' writes Burk,* 'we ought to examine every distinct ingredient in the composition, one by one, and reduce everything to the utmost simplicity; since the condition of our nature binds us to a strict law and very narrow limits. We ought afterwards to re-examine the principles by the effect of the composition, as well as the composition by that of the principles. We ought to compare our subject with things of a similar nature, and even with things of a contrary nature; for discoveries may be, and often are, made by the contrast, which would escape us on the single view. The greater number of the comparisons we make, the more general and the more certain our knowledge is like to prove, as built upon a more extensive and perfect induction.'

The constituents of the great subjects have been distributed under their proper letters, with a view to prevent as much reference to other parts of the book as possible; and when a phrase or technicality belongs in common to several departments of our laws, an analysis has been made, in order to keep separate the details of the particulars and distinctions. Occasional passages from the Jewish, Greek, and Roman antiquities have been quoted, either to illustrate a doctrine or to indicate an analogy; but of this, sparing use has been made, as their too frequent insertion would have increased bulk, without perhaps augmenting value. The authorities relied upon are referred to for examination, in order that the subject may be more fully studied by those who desire to acquire a fuller knowledge of historical jurisprudence or the polity of the ancients. Method has been attended to, as the main design of a Dictionary is immediate use.

'Thus useful arms in magazines we place,
All rang'd in order, and disposed with grace :
Nor thus alone the curious eye to please,
But to be found, when need requires, with ease.' *

Whether the work is successful or not, in attaining its avowed purpose, cannot here be determined: its real value—its suitableness as a Lexicon—will be tested by experience, which neither a persuasive preface nor an unfavourable review can influence. The Author craves pardon for any trivial error or misprint, as the greater part of the book was written, and the proofs corrected, during his academical studies; and he will be grateful for any suggestions, which, supplying the defects and elucidating the obscurities of this edition, would increase the utility of a second, should a second be called for.

A—ABA

A. This letter is frequently used as an abbreviation or as a mark of reference, for the purpose of identification. It was inscribed upon a ballot, and stood for 'antiquo,' I vote against. It was used by the Romans who voted against a proposed law or candidate for office. See U. R.

A ballot or waxen tablet, similarly inscribed, was also used in their Courts of Judicature, being the initial letter of 'absolvo,' I acquit (not guilty). Cicero calls A, literam salutarem, a comfortable letter, because it denoted Acquittal (absolvo); but C, literam tristem, a sorrowful letter, because it denoted Condemnation (condemno). See Taylor's Civil Law, 191; Jur. Sat. xiii. 3.

A 1. An expression signifying a first-class vessel excellently built.—Shipping term.

Ab [fr. abba, Syr., father], the eleventh month of the Jewish civil year, and the fifth of the sacred.

Ab, at the beginning of English-Saxon names of places, is generally a contraction of Abbot or Abbey; whence it is inferred that those places once had an abbey, or belonged to one elsewhere, as Abingdon in Berkshire.—Blount's Law Gloss.

Abacist, or Abacista, a caster of accounts, an arithmetician.—Blount; Cowel's Interp.

Abacot, the name of the ancient cap of state worn by the kings of England. It was made in the shape of two crowns.—Chron. Angl. 1463; Spelm.

Abactor [fr. abigo, Lat.], a stealer and driver away of cattle or beasts by herds or in great numbers at once, as distinguished from fur, a person who steals a single beast only.—Encyc. Lond.

Abacus [fr. ἄβαξ, Gr., a board], arithmetic, from the Abacus, an ancient instrument for facilitating calculations by means of counters. Its form is various, but that chiefly used in Europe is made by drawing parallel lines distant from each other at least twice the diameter of a counter, which, placed on the lowest line, signifies 1; on the second, 10; on the third, 100; on the fourth, 1000; and so on. In the intermediate spaces the same counters are estimated at one half of the value of the line immediately superior.—Dyche's Dict.; Encyc. Lond.

Abalienate (V.A.), to make over to another.—Civil Law.

Abalienation [fr. abalieno, Lat.], a making over of realty, goods, or chattels, to another, by due course of Law.—Ib.

Aballaba, the ancient name of Appleby in Westmoreland.

Abandonee, one to whom anything is relinquished.

Abandonment [fr. Abandonner, Fr.], the relinquishment of an interest or claim.

(2) The relinquishment by an assured person to the assurers of his right to what is saved out of a wreck, when the thing insured has, by some of the usual perils of the sea, become practically valueless. Upon abandonment, the assured is entitled to call upon the assurers to pay the full amount of the insurance, as in the case of a total loss. The loss is in such case called a constructive total loss.—See Maude and Poll. on Shipping.

Also the surrender of his property by a debtor for the benefit of his creditors.

The Civil Law permitted a master who was sued for his slave's tort, or the owner of an animal who was sued for an injury done by it, to abandon the slave or animal to the person injured, and thus relieve himself from further liability.

Abandonment of Railways. See 13 & 14 Vict. c. 83, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 127, ss. 31—35, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 114, by which enactments railways authorized by special act passed before the session of 1867 may be abandoned under warrant of the Board of Trade, and the companies wound up under the Companies Acts 1862 and 1867.

Abandon, or Abandum, anything sequestered, proscribed, or abandoned. Abandon, i.e., in bannum res missa, a thing banned or denounced as forfeited or lost, whence to abandon, desert, or forsake, as lost and gone.—Cowel. Pasquier thinks it a coalition of ā ban donner, to give up to a proscription, in sense it signifies the ban of the empire.

Ban, in the old dialect, signifies a curse; and to abandon, if considered as compounded of French and Saxon, is exactly equivalent to divis devovere.

Ab antiquo, of an ancient date.

Abarnare [fr. abarnan, Ang.-Sax., denudo, detego, Lat.], to lay bare, discover, detect. Hence cebere theof, a detected or convicted thief; cebere morth, a detected homicide. Also to detect and discover any secret crime to a magistrate.—Ancient Laws and Institutes of England; Leg. Canuti, c. 104.

Ab assuetis non fit injuria. Jenk. Cent. Rep. (From things to which we are accustomed, no legal wrong results).

If a person neglect to insist on his right, he is deemed to have abandoned it. 'A Court of equity,' said Lord Camden, 'which is never active in relief against conscience or public convenience, has always refused its aid to stale demands, where a party has slept upon his right, and acquiesced for a great length of time.—Smith v. Clay, Ambl. 645; 3 Bro. C.C. 639. Compare the maxim 'Vigilantibus, non dormientibus jura subveniunt.'

Abatementum, Abatement, an entry by interposition.—1 Inst. 277.

Abate [fr. abbattere, Fr.], to prostrate, break down, remove, or destroy; also, to let down or cheapen the price in buying or selling.—Encyc. Lond. See ABATEMENT.

Abatement, a making less, used in seven senses:—

(1) Abatement of Freehold.—This takes place where a person dies seised of an inheritance, and, before the heir or devisee enters, a stranger, having no right, makes a wrongful entry, and gets possession of it. Such an entry is technically called an abatement, and the stranger an abater. It is, in fact, a figurative expression, denoting that the rightful possession or freehold of the heir or devisee is overthrown by the unlawful intervention of a stranger. Abatement differs from intrusion, in that it is always to the prejudice of the heir or immediate devisee, whereas the latter is to the prejudice of the reversioner or remainder-man: and disseisin differs from them both, for to disseise, is to put forcibly or fraudulently a person seised of the freehold out of possession.—1 Inst. 277 a; 3 Bl. Com. 166. See OUSTER.

(2) Abatement or removal of Nuisances.—A remedy allowed by law to the party injured by a nuisance to abate, destroy, remove, or put an end to the same by his own act. Nuisances are either public or private. Public nuisances may be abated, that is, taken away or removed, by urban sanitary authorities and other public bodies under various public acts (see e.g., Public Health Act, 1875, s. 98).

and also by private individuals, where the abatement does not involve a breach of the peace. Private nuisances may also be abated by the individuals aggrieved. The law allows this, because injuries of this kind require an immediate remedy, and cannot wait for the slow progress of the ordinary forms of justice.

(3) Plea in abatement.—A defence by which a defendant showed cause to the Court why he should not be sued, or, if sued, not in the form adopted by the plaintiff, and praying that the action might abate, i.e., cease.

A plea in abatement at Common Law (which by 4 Anne c. 16, s. 11, had to be substantiated by affidavit) was one which stated some fact which gave a reason for quashing or abating the original writ in a real, or the declaration in a personal, action, on account of an informality, or offered an exception to the personal competency of the parties suing or sued; e.g., that the plaintiff was an alien enemy, or that the defendant was a married woman. But now, by the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XIX., Rule 13, it is provided that 'no plea or defence shall be pleaded in abatement.' See STATEMENT OF DEFENCE.

In equity declinatory pleas to the jurisdiction and dilatory to the persons were (prior to the Judicature Act) sometimes, by analogy to common law, termed pleas in abatement.

In Criminal proceedings, a plea in abatement might have been given in writing by a prisoner or defendant on account of misnomer, wrongful or no addition, annexing thereto an affidavit of its truth. But this plea is now obsolete, since, by 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 19, in case of misnomer the judge may amend the indictment or information, and call upon the prisoner or defendant to plead in bar to the merits; and by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 1, no indictment or information is to be held insufficient for want of or imperfection in the addition of any defendant.

(4) Abatement of Debts and Legacies.—In Equity, when equitable assets are insufficient to satisfy fully all the creditors, their debts must abate in proportion, and they must be content with a dividend; for æquitas est quasi æqualitas.

So in the case of legacies, upon a deficiency of assets after payment of the debts they abate proportionably, unless a priority is specially given to any particular legacy. A testator is always presumed to intend that the legacies shall be equally paid, unless he express in his will a contrary intention. But a widow's legacy in lieu of dower has the priority, and very properly so, since she gives up a legal right for it.

When there are specific and pecuniary legacies, and the assets are not sufficient to pay both, the specific have the preference, and only abate proportionately amongst themselves, unless one of them is payable out of a particular fund, and others out of other funds, for then each must bear the loss arising from any deficiency of the particular fund.

(5) Abatement of Litigation.—By the Supreme Court of Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. L., it is provided that an action shall not become abated by reason of the marriage, death, or bankruptcy of any of the parties, if the cause of action survive or continue, and shall not become defective by the assignment, creation, or devolution of any estate or title pendente lite (r. 1). Further rules of the same order provide for making the husband, or other successor in interest, party to the action by order of the Court.

The order is modelled upon the former rules with regard to abatement of litigation at common law; see C. L. P. Act, 1852, ss. 135—142, 161—3, 164—7, 190—9.

As to the former rules in equity, see Daniell's Chanc. Prac., 5th ed., 1390 et seq.

Bankruptcy proceedings abate altogether where the bankrupt dies before adjudication. By the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 80, when a debtor who has been adjudicated a bankrupt dies, the Court may order that the proceedings in the matter be continued as if he were alive.

As to abatements of informations in the Exchequer, see 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104, s. 23.

(6) Abatement or rebate in commerce, an allowance or discount made for prompt payment.—Lex. Merc. It is sometimes used to express the deduction that is occasionally made at the Custom-House from the duties chargeable upon such goods as are damaged, and for a loss in warehouses.

(7) A badge in coat-armour, indicating dishonour of some kind. It is called also rebatement.

Abator, or Abater, one who abates a nuisance or enters into a house or land vacant by the death of the former possessor, and not yet taken possession of by his heir or devisee.—Cowel. Also an agent or cause by which an abatement is procured.

Abatuda, or Abatude, anything diminished. Moneta abatuda is money clipped or diminished in value.—Du Fresne's Glos. Used in old records.

Abavia, a great grandmother's mother.

Abavus [fr. avus avus, avavus, Lat.], a great grandfather's father.

Abbacy [fr. abbatia, or abbathia, Lat.], the government of a religious house and the revenues thereof, subject to an abbot, as a bishopric is to a bishop.—Cowel. The rights and privileges of an abbot.

Abbandunum, Abbedoma, Abbendon, Abingdon in Berkshire, which took its present name soon after Cissa, King of the West Saxons, had founded the abbey there; also, as some say, called Sewsham and Cloveshoe.

Abbas [fr. cestuarium, Lat.], Humber in Yorkshire.

Abbatis, an avener or steward of the stables, an ostler.—Spelm.

Abbe, the old Norman-French word for Abbot.—Vide Bro. Abr. 'Abbe.'

Abbey, or Abby [fr. abbatia, Lat.], a place or house for religious retirement, governed by an abbess where nuns are, and by an abbot where monks reside. Formerly in England great privileges were granted to them, such as being exempted from the bishop's visitation, and as a sanctuary for persons escaping from the penalties of an infringed law, even although they were murderers. No less than 190 abbeys were dissolved by Henry VIII., the yearly revenue of which amounted to 2,853,000*l.* per annum (an almost incredible sum, considering the value of money in those days), a great part of which went to Rome, the governors and governesses of several of the richest among them being foreigners resident in Italy. Certain abbots and priors in England, in right of their monasteries, held lands of the crown, for which they owed military service, and on that account obtained the title of Lords, and were summoned as barons to parliament. For a like reason the bishops of the present day have the same honour, and are denominated spiritual peers.—1 Hall. Const. Hist. c. ii., p. 74; and see 27 Hen. VIII. c. 28, and other acts for the suppression of religious houses collected in the Supplement to the Revised Statutes, vol. 15.

Abbot, or Abbat [fr. abbas, Lat.; abbé Fr.; abbud, Sax.: others derive it from abba, Syr., father], a spiritual lord or governor, who had the rule of a religious house. An abbot, with the monks of the same house, were called the convent, and made a corporation.—Termes de la Ley. Henry VIII. dissolved the monasteries (see ABBEY). See Du Cange, and Carpenter's Supp.

Abbreviatio Placitorum, is an abstract of ancient pleadings prior to the year-books. See Stephen on Pleading, 7th ed., 410.

Abbreviate of Adjudication, an abstract of the decree of adjudication, and of the lands adjudged, with the amount of the debt. Adjudication is that diligence (execution) of the law by which the real estate of a debtor is adjudged to belong to his creditor in payment of a debt; and the abbreviate must be recorded in the register of adjudications.—Scotch Law; see Bell's Dictionary.

Abbreviation, an abridging or contraction.

The 4 Geo. II. c. 26, which provides that all law proceedings should be in the English language, written legibly, prescribed also that they should be in words at length, and not abbreviated; but the 6 Geo. II. c. 14, permits numbers to be expressed in figures, and such abbreviations as are commonly used. Order XIX., Rule 3, prescribes that 'dates, sums, and numbers' shall, in pleading, 'be expressed in figures, and not in words.' In 9 Co. 48, is this maxim, Abbreviationum ille numerus et sensus accipendus est, ut concessio non sit inanis. (In abbreviations, such number and sense is to be taken; that the grant be not made void.)

Abbreviators, officers who assisted in drawing up the Pope's briefs, and reducing petitions into proper form, for their conversion into Papal Bulls.

Abbreviature, a short draft.

Abbroach, to monopolize goods or forestall a market.

Abbroachment, or Abroachment [fr. ab, Lat., and broche, Fr., a spit], the forestalling of a market or fair.—M.S. Antiq. See FORESTALLING.

Abbuttals, or Abuttals [fr. abutter, or aboutir, Fr., to limit or bound; or perhaps fr. butt or strike.—Wedgw.], the buttings and boundings of land, east, west, north, and south, with respect to the places by which they are limited and bounded. The sides of the land are properly said to be adjoining to, and the ends abutting on, the land contiguous.—Termes de la Ley. See Reg. Gen. H.T. 1853, r. 18; and also BOUNDARIES.

Abdicant, giving up, renouncing.

Abdicare [fr. abdico, Lat.], to renounce or refuse anything—Termes de la Ley—to disinherit in the civil law.

Abdication, where a magistrate or person in office voluntarily renounces or gives it up before the time of service has expired. It differs from resignation, in that resignation is made by one who has received his office from another and restores it into his hands; as an inferior into the hands of a superior: abdication is the relinquishment of an office which has devolved by act of law. It is said to be a renunciation, quitting, and relinquishing, so as to have nothing further to do with a thing, or the doing of such actions as are inconsistent with the holding of it.—Chamb. Dict. On King James II.'s leaving this kingdom, and abdication the crown, the Lords would have had the word 'desertion' made use of, but the Commons thought it was not comprehensive enough, for that the king might then have liberty of returning. The Scots called it a forefature (forfeiture) of the crown, from the verb forisfacio. This was fully compassed in the then Parliamentary Debates. Involuntary resignations are also termed abdications, as Napoleon's abdication at Fontainebleau.

Additorium [fr. additus, Lat.], an additory or hiding-place to conceal and preserve goods, plate, or money, or a chest in which reliques are kept, as mentioned in the inventory of the church of York.—Dugdale's Monasticon Anglicanum, p. 173.

Abduction, the forcible or fraudulent taking away of women or children. This criminal offence is of three kinds—viz., (1) Kidnapping; (2) carrying away infant females under sixteen; and (3) stealing heiresses.—See these treated of under their respective heads, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 53, 54, 55. There may also be abduction of a ward or of a wife. See titles GUARDIAN and WIFE.

Abduction of Voters. By the Corrupt Practices Prevention Act, 1854, s. 5, this is made a misdemeanour, and punishable by fine and imprisonment.

Abearance, carriage or behaviour. A recognisance to be of good abearance means to be of good behaviour.—4 Bl. Com. 251, 256.

Aberemurder [fr. abere, apparent, notorious, and mord, murder, Sax.], plain or downright murder, as distinguished from the less heinous crime of manslaughter or chance medley. It was declared a capital offence, without fine or commutation, by the laws of Canute c. 93, and of Henry I. c. 13.—Spelm.

Aberfraw [aber-fraw, Welsh, efflux of the Fraw]. The princely seat of Venedotia (North Wales) was situated where the brook Fraw flows into the sea. Here was elected the Supreme Court of Law for the administration of justice in that part of the principality.—Ancient Laws and Institutes of Wales.

Abessed [fr. abassier, Fr.], humbled, depressed, abased.—Blount.

Abet [fr. abettare, from a (ad vel usque), and bedan or beteren, to stir up or excite, Sax.; or boutli, Fr., impello, excito, Lat.], to maintain or patronise; to encourage or set on. The act is called abetment.

Abettor, or Abettator, an instigator or setter on, one who promotes or procures a crime to be committed.—Old. Nat. Br. 21. Treason is the only crime in which every one concerned is a principal. See ACCESSORY.

Abettors in indictable misdemeanours are punishable as principal offenders by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 8, and abettors in offences punishable on summary conviction by the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 5, and, as to particular offences so punishable, under the 'Larceny Act,' 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 99; and the 'Malicious Injuries to Property Act,' 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 63.

Abeance, or Abbayance [fr. abayer, Fr., to expect, to look at anything with open mouth], in expectation, remembrance, and contemplation of law.—Cowel. The word abeyance has been compared to what the civilians call hereditus jacens; for, as the civilians say lands and goods acent, so the common lawyers say that things in a similar condition are in abeyance, as the logicians term it in posse or in understanding. Thus in the case of a parson, who has an estate for life only, the fee simple of his glebe is in abeyance; and when the parsonage is void, the freehold, until a successor be appointed, is in abeyance.—1 Steph. Bl., 7th ed., 236. Abeyance in gremio legis, or in nubibus, means in consideration of law.—Plowd. Rep. 547. The strict interpretation of this word as to freehold interest has puzzled eminent lawyers, but it is rather a matter of curiosity than practical importance.

Abgetoria, the alphabet.—Matt. Westm. The Irish call the alphabet abghitten.

Abigeat, the crime of stealing cattle by droves or herds. It was severely punished, the delinquent being often condemned to the mines, banishment, or death. Also a mis-carriage produced by art.—Ash.

Abigeus [fr. abigo, Lat.], a stealer of cattle, the same as abactor.—Cowel; Civil Law.

Ab initio [Lat.] (from the beginning). A person who abuses an authority given him by law becomes a trespasser ab initio, i.e., is liable as a trespasser from the beginning. See the Six Carpenters' Case, 8 Rep. 146; 1 Smith's L.C. A party making an irregular distress for rent is not deemed a trespasser ab initio, by virtue of 11 Geo. II., c. 19, s. 19.

Ab intestato, from a person who died without having made a will.

Ab irato [Lat.] (by a man in anger).—Civil Law.

Abishering, or Abishersing, quit of amercements. It originally signified a forfeiture or amercement, and is more properly mishering, hishering, or misiking, according to Spelman. It has since been termed a liberty of freedom, because, wherever this word is used in a grant, the persons to whom the grant is made have the forfeitures and amercements of all others, and are themselves free from the control of any within their fee.—Rastall's Abr.; Termes de la Ley, 7.

Abjuration [fr. abjuro, Lat.], a forswearing or renouncing by oath. In the old law it signified a sworn banishment, or an oath taken by a person who had claimed sanctuary, to forsake the realm for ever, now abolished by 21 Jac. I. c. 28. The oath of abjuration (introduced by 13 Wm. III. c. 16, and altered by 6 Geo. III. c. 53) was to be taken by every person entering upon any public office or trust. By this he renounced the Pretender, and recognized the right of Her Majesty, under the Act of Settlement, engaging to support her, and promising to disclose all treasons and traitorous conspiracies against her.—Staundford's Pl. C. b. 2, c. 40. By the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 48, one form of oath was substituted for the oaths of allegiance, supremacy, and abjuration. For this form another was substituted by the act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 75, s. 5. This has in its turn been superseded by the Promissory Oaths Act, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 72, by which a new form of the oath of allegiance is provided. The numerous obsolete acts in relation to oaths are repealed by the Promissory Oaths Act, 1871, 34 & 35 Vict. c. 48. See QUAKERS and ROMAN CATHOLICS.

Abjure, to retract, to recant, or abnegate a position upon oath.

Abladium, cut corn.—Old Records.

Ab lato-Bulgio, Bulness, or Bolness, in Cumberland.

Ablegate [fr. ablego, Lat.], to send abroad a person on some public business or embassy.

Ablegati, Papal ambassadors of the second rank, who are sent to a country where there is not a nuncio, with a less extensive commission than that of a nuncio.

Ablocation, a letting out to hire for money.

Abnepos, the grandson of a grandson or granddaughter.

Abneptis, the granddaughter of a grandson or granddaughter.

Abo, a carcase of an animal killed by a wolf or other beast of prey.—Ancient Laws and Inst. of Wales.

Abode, habitation or place of residence; stay or continuance. In law it is used in different senses, to denote the place of a man's residence or business, temporary or permanent. For some purposes, in law a man may be deemed to have an 'abode' where he has a place of business, even although he reside elsewhere, or where he has a temporary residence, although his permanent residence is elsewhere or even abroad. But 'abode' or residence is quite distinct from domicil, which means much more than even a place of permanent residence (see that word, post); whereas, it would seem that 'abode' does not even necessarily imply that. 'Abode' seems larger and looser in its import than the word 'residence,' which in strictness means the place where a man lives, i.e., where he sleeps or is at home.

Abolition [fr. abolir, Fr.: fr. aboleo, Lat.], destroying; also the leave given by the sovereign or judges to a criminal accuser to desist from further prosecution.—25 Hen. VIII. c. 21.

Abone [Abonis, Lat.], Avington or Aven-ton, in Gloucestershire.

Aborigines [fr. ab, from, and origo, Lat.], a name given to the original or first inhabitants of any country, but more particularly used for the ancient inhabitants of Latium, who lived there when Æneas and the Trojans arrived in Italy. It is frequently employed in the sense of Autochithones, i.e., people coeval with the land which they inherit.—Class. Dict.; Dion. Halicar.; Livy.

Abortion [fr. ab, which in composition signifies defect, according to Martinius, and orior, Lat., to arise], a miscarriage, or the premature expulsion of the contents of the womb, before the term of gestation is completed.

Our law does not recognize the distinction adopted by some medical commentators on the subject, who consider miscarriages during the first six months as abortions, and those during the last three as premature labours; but applies the term abortion to the throwing off of the fœtus at any period of the pregnancy.—Beck. Med. Jur. 238.

To kill an infant in its mother's womb is not murder in legal contemplation; because to constitute this crime the individual slain must be a reasonable creature, in being, and under the queen's peace, at its perpetration.—Bract. 121; 1 Hawk. P. C. c. 31, s. 16.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 58, the administration of drugs or unlawful use of instruments, by a pregnant woman to herself, or by any person to her, with intent to procure miscarriage, is made felony, punishable by penal servitude or imprisonment, in the discretion of the court.

It is no excuse that the woman consented to, or even solicited, the perpetration of the offence; for this would be to set the law at nought, inasmuch as the crime is seldom attempted but with the woman's approval.

Connected with this subject is this very serious question:—Is it, under any circumstances, morally and legally justifiable for a medical man to induce premature delivery? Seen Guy's For. Med. 117, and Taylor's Med. Jurisp., 2nd ed., ii., 179—205.

Abortion [fr. abortus, Lat.], the fruit of an abortion incapable of life.

Above-cited, or Mentioned quoted before. A figurative expression taken from the ancient manner of writing books on scrolls, where whatever is mentioned or cited before in the same roll must be above.—Encyc. Lond.

Abrevicum, Berwick-upon-Tweed.

Abridge [fr. abreger, Fr., abbreviare, Lat.], to make shorter in words retaining the sense and substance. Also the making a declaration or count shorter by subtracting or severing some of the substance therefrom, i.e., a man was said to abridge his plaint in assize, and a woman her demand in action of dower, where any land was put into the plaint or demand which was not in the tenure of the defendant; for if the defendant pleaded non-tenure, joint-tenancy, or the like, in abatement of the writ as to part of the lands, the plaintiff might leave out those lands, and pray that the tenant might answer to the rest.—Brooke, tit. Abridgment. Now obsolete in consequence of the abolition of real and mixed actions, by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 26.

Abridgment [fr. abreviamentum, Lat.], a large work contracted into a narrow compass; a summary, epitome, or compendium. As to how far this may be done without breach of copyright, see Butterworth v. Robinson, 5 Ves. 709.

Abridgment of Damages, the right of the Court to reduce the damages in certain cases. Vide Brooke, tit. Abridgment.

Abridgments, or Digests of the Law, of ancient authority. See 1 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 51. The principal of these are Brooke's, Fitzherbert's, Rolle's, and Conyn's Digest. Besides these there are Viner's and Bacon's Abridgments, and Harrison's, Chitty's, and Fisher's Digests, of later date.

Abrogate, to annul; to abrogate a law is to repeal it.—Cowel. The maxim is Leges posteriores priores contrarias abrogant. 11 Co. 626. (Subsequent laws repeal prior contrary laws.)

Abrogation, the annulment of a law by constitutional authority. It stands opposed to rogation; and is distinguished from derogation, which implies the taking away only some part of a law; from subrogation, which denotes the adding a clause to it; from dispensation, which only sets it aside in a particular instance; and from antiquation, which is the refusing to pass a law.—Encyc. Lond.

Abscond, to go out of the jurisdiction of the Courts, or to lie concealed in order to avoid any of their processes.

Absconding Debtors' Arrest Act, 1851, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 52. By this act, upon proof by affidavit of the debt, and that the debtor was about to leave England, any commissioner of the Court of Bankruptcy acting for any district in the county, or the judge of any county court (except in Middlesex and Surrey) might issue a writ for the arrest of the absconding debtor until bail be found, or the debt be paid. The power of authorizing the arrest of absconding debtors was, theretofore, confined to the Superior Courts. This act has been repealed by the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 83. But by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 6, there is still a power of arresting absconding debtors; as to which see ARREST on MESNE PROCESS. And now, by 33 & 34 Vict. c. 76, debtors about to abscond after service of a debtor's summons under the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, may be arrested. As to Ireland, see 35 & 36 Vict. c. 58, sections 78 et seq., and 35 & 36 Vict. c. 57.

Absence is of a fivefold kind:—(1) A necessary absence, as in banished or transported persons; this is entirely necessary. (2) Necessary and voluntary, as upon the account of the commonwealth, or in the service of the church. (3) A probable absence, according to the civilians, as that of students on the score of study. (4) Entirely voluntary on account of trade, merchandise, and the like. (5) Absence cum dolo et culpa, as not appearing to a writ, subpena, citation, etc., or to delay or defeat creditors, or avoiding arrest, either on civil or criminal process.—Ayliffe.

Absence of Husband or Wife for Seven Years is, under certain circumstances, a defence in an indictment for bigamy. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57, 'Any person marrying a second time, whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years last past, and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time,' is exempted from the penal consequences of bigamy.

Absentee, a person who is away from his usual place of residence; a non-resident landlord.

Absentees, or des absentees. A parliament so called was held at Dublin, 10th May, 8 Hen. VIII. It is mentioned in letters-patent 29 Hen. VIII.

Absentia ejus qui reipublicæ causâ abest, neque ei, neque alii dammosa esse debet.—(The absence of any person who is abroad in the service of the state ought to be detrimental neither to him nor to another.)

Absionare, to shun or avoid, used by the English-Saxons in the oath of fealty.—Sommer.

Absoluta sententia expositore non indiget, 2 Inst. 533.—(A positive decree is not in need of any interpreter.)

Absolute, complete, unconditional. See Jud. Act, 1875. Ord. LIII. r. 2. See MOTION, NEW TRIAL. A rule or order absolute is a completed judgment of a Court, and is so called in contradistinction to a rule or order nisi which is made on the application of one party only (ex parte), to be made absolute unless the other party succeed in showing cause why it should not be made absolute (discharged).

Absolute Covenant, a covenant, which is unconditional.

Absolute Law, the true and proper law of nature, immutable in the abstract or in principle; in theory, but not in application. For very often the object, the reason, situation, and other circumstances, may vary its exercise and obligation.—See 1 Steph. Com.

Absolute Warrandice, a warranting or assuring of property against all mankind.—Scotch Conveyancing Phrase. It is, in effect, a covenant of title.

Absolution, a dispensation; a remission of sins; an acquittal by sentence of law.—Ayliffe.

Absolve, to acquit of a crime, to pardon or set free from excommunication. See ASSOILE.

Absolvi animam meam. I have done my duty; I have relieved my mind.

Absolvitor (Scotch Law), an acquittal; a decree in favour of the defender in any action.

Absque hoc [Lat.] (without this), technical words of exception which were made use of in a special traverse; as, the defendant pleads that such a thing was done at B., etc., without this (absque hoc), that it was done at, etc.—1 Saund. 22; abolished, C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 65.

Absque impetitione vasti [Lat.] (without impeachment of waste), a reservation frequently made to a tenant for life, that no man shall proceed against him for waste committed. This reservation does not extend to allow manifest injury to the inheritance. See WASTE.

Absque tali causa [Lat.] (without such cause): formal words in the now obsolete replication de injuriâ.—Stephen on Pl. 191.

Abstention, keeping an heir from possession; also, tacit renunciation of a succession by an heir.—French Law.

Abstract (in the abstract), a thing looked at purely by itself and without comparison with any other thing or with any reference to surrounding circumstances.

Abstract [fr. abstrahere, abstractus; fr. trahere, Lat., to draw], an abridgment or epitome; also, a purloining.

Abstract of Pleas. By the C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 81, a plaintiff or defendant was allowed, by leave of the Court or a judge, to plead several matters in answer to the pleading of his opponent. An abstract or epitome of the several pleas was usually attached to the summons for leave. This is now obsolete; as a Statement of Defence is substituted for pleas by the practice under the Judicature Act.

See Rules of Court, Ord. XXII. See STATEMENT OF DEFENCE.

Abstract of Title, an epitome of the evidences of ownership.

Such an abstract should show the soundness of a person's right to a given estate, together with any charges or circumstances in anywise affecting it. A perfect abstract discloses that the owner has both the legal and equitable estates at his own disposal perfectly unincumbered.

Upon a sale or mortgage, the solicitor of the owner usually prepares the abstract at his client's expense (except on sales to a company under the Land Clauses Act, 1845, when it must be borne by the company, unless it be stipulated otherwise, 8 Vict. c. 18, s. 22), and delivers it to the solicitor of the proposed purchaser or mortgagee, who compares it with the original title-deeds, and makes requisitions (when necessary), in order to ascertain any important but undisclosed facts, to remedy any defects, or to dissipate any doubts or ambiguities. He then should lay all the papers before counsel, for his opinion as to the safety of the title.

Should the abstract be long and voluminous, a list of the dates and nature of the deeds and muniments, chronologically arranged, with references to the pages of the abstract in which they are to be found, facilitates perusal.

The object of every abstract is to enable the purchaser or mortgagee, or his counsel, to judge of the evidence deducing, and of the incumbrances affecting, the title.

Every title involves the question of legal and equitable ownership; for as it is in vain that there is a good title at Law, if that title be bad or defective in Equity, so it is not sufficient that there is a good title to the legal estate or to the equitable estate, if it be incumbered with judgments, legacies, debts to the crown, or other charges, because in proportion to the extent of such incumbrances there must be a reduction in the actual value of the vendor's interest.

Every abstract, then, should describe whatever will tend to enable a purchaser or mortgagee, or his counsel, to form an opinion of the precise state of the title at Law and in Equity, together with all chances of eviction or even of adverse claims.

An abstract showing a clear and good root of title for sixty years to a freehold estate has heretofore been generally taken to be sufficient, although the owner have title-deeds relating to a much earlier period; while these, however, need not be abstracted, yet the purchaser or mortgagee has a right to inspect them, in order to see that they do not disclose any defects, or lead to any dangerous consequences, and a vendor would not be justified in withholding them. But now, by the Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78), s. 1, forty years has been substituted for sixty years as the root of a title.

A simple abstract relating to one estate only should set forth chronologically a clear statement of the material parts of the deeds, wills, writings, records, and private acts of parliament, which at all affect or concern the title to be deduced, together with such matters in pais, as births, majorities, marriages, deaths, survivorships, pedigrees, descents, and successions, as connect the several transactions, or in anywise vary the title; and these facts should be authenticated by such legal evidence as would be deemed satisfactory and conclusive in an action to try the title. Judgments, crown-debts, charges, and incumbrances, should be fairly stated.

But a complex or compound abstract is not susceptible of a chronological arrangement; as when the title relates to different parcels of land or different interests, or the property belongs to joint tenants, tenants in common, or coparceners, who have entered into partition, and there is a different title to their shares; it would then be better to arrange the documents relating to one portion under a distinct heading, so as to keep the title to each part in a connected series, and, sometimes, separate abstracts for the different titles would simplify the business and avoid an embarrassing confusion, especially if the several properties be distinct, or the title is compounded of both freehold and copyhold estates. Should the distinct titles to the several parts of the property afterwards become united, then there should be a deduction of the title to each part separately up to the point of junction.

As soon as practicable, after the abstract of title is delivered to the vendee's solicitor, he should himself diligently compare it with the original documents, since he is answerable for the consequences of any negligence. For this purpose they are usually produced at the chambers of the vendor's solicitor, or at the vendor's residence. If they are in town, the solicitor's agent should be instructed to undertake the comparison; but if they are in a distant part of the country, then the journey of the vendee's solicitor occasioned thereby will be at the vendor's expense if there be no stipulation to the contrary.

The points to which the attention of the solicitor should be most particularly directed in comparing the muniments with the abstract, are the stamps upon the deeds, the dates of the different assurances (he should not depend upon the indorsement for this purpose); the names and additions of the parties, and the characters in which they respectively act, as whether trustee, executor, or heir-at-law; that no important recitals are omitted, and that those that are abstracted are faithfully given. The receipt-clause should be attended to, to see that there is no unusual or special matter contained in it relative to the purchase money, which may affect the purchaser. The amount of the consideration, the names of the grantors and grantees, and particularly the identity of the parcels, and that there are no exceptions therein. The words of the different limitations of uses and trusts must be cautiously made to agree, and any deficiency therein must be supplied by the necessary alteration in the abstract; the covenants for quiet enjoyment and freedom from incumbrances should be scrutinized; for if there be any collateral right of enjoyment or lurking incumbrance, it will most probably make its appearance there, so all burdensome covenants in leases must be looked into. The interest which tenants in possession have in the lands must also be inquired after, for the purchaser will be bound thereby; but in nothing is caution more necessary than in attending to the execution and attestation of the different deeds, to see that they are executed by all the parties, or that the abstract notices those who have not done so; and when the execution and attestation are under a power which directs a particular mode of execution, there is still greater necessity to be satisfied that the precise terms of the power have been complied with; and, in the case of wills, that the law requiring two witnesses has been observed, and that the attestation expresses that the testator signed in their presence. In deeds bearing to be for a consideration in money, care should be taken to see that the receipt for the consideration money is indorsed on the deed and witnessed. It is generally witnessed by the same party who attests the execution of the deed. And, lastly, where the deed has been enrolled or registered, or livery of seisin has been requisite, the indorsement of these different acts upon the deed should be noticed.

Whenever the deeds are in the possession of third parties, they should be informed of the negotiation to purchase the estate to which they relate, and an inquiry should be made of them respecting their particular interests therein. Such an inquiry should also be made of tenants or persons in possession, when the leases under which they hold cannot be inspected. If the property be vested in trustees, inquiries should be made of them as to any incumbrances, and they should have notice of the intended purchase, in order to exclude a subsequent purchaser, or incumbrancer, since priority of notice gives priority of equity.

Of course those persons to whom these questions are put will be bound by their answers; but an incumbrancer need not satisfy any inquiry relative to his security in the absence of an offer to satisfy his claim. See TITLE, and see also the 'Vendor and Purchaser Act, 1874' (37 & 38 Vict. c. 78).

Absurdum est affirmare (re judicata) credendum esse non judici, 12 Co. 25.—(It is absurd to say, after judgment, that any one else than the judge should be hearkened to.)

Abundans cautela non nocet, 11 Co. 6.—(Extreme care does no mischief.)

Abuse of process. There is said to be an abuse of process, when an adversary through the malicious and unfounded use of some regular legal proceeding obtains some advantage over his opponent. See Lush's Pr., 3rd. ed., 193. Actions manifestly frivolous or brought against good faith have also not unfrequently been stayed in chambers as an abuse of the process of the Court. See e.g. Edmunds v. Attorney General, 47 L. J. Ch. 345.

Abusing children, having carnal intercourse with young girls. If the girl be under the age of twelve (formerly 10) years, the offence is a felony, punishable with penal servitude for life, or not less than five years, or imprisonment (with or without hard labour), for not more than two years; if the girl be above the age of twelve (formerly 10) and under thirteen (formerly 12), the offence is a misdemeanour, punishable by penal servitude for five years, or imprisonment, with or without hard labour, to the extent of two years.—'Offences against the Person Act, 1875,' 38 & 39 Vict. c. 94, repealing and replacing 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 50, 51, which fixed a lesser age as above. An attempt to have carnal intercourse with a girl under twelve years, even with her consent, is an offence punishable by a like imprisonment, by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 52.

Abut [fr. aboutir, Fr., to touch at the end], to border upon or approach.—Encyc. Lond.

Abutals. See ABBUTALS.

Accipitare, to pay relief to lords of manors. Capitali domino accipitare, i.e., to pay a relief, homage, or obedience to the chief lord on becoming his vassal. Fleta, l. 2, c. 50.

Accapitum, money paid by a vassal upon his admission to a feud; the relief due to the chief lord.—Encyc. Lond.

Accedas ad curiam [Lat.] (that you go to the Court), an original writ to the sheriff, issued out of Chancery, where a man has received false judgment in a Hundred Court or Court Baron, or justice has been delayed. If a plaint in replevin be therein levied, it was removed by this writ, which was in every respect the same as the recordari facias loquelam, excepting that it directed the sheriff to go to the Lord's Court, and there cause the plaint to be recorded, and so to return it to the Court above, being one of the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster.—F. N. B. 18; Termes de la Ley.

Accedas ad vicemitem [Lat.] (that you go to the sheriff). Where the sheriff has a writ called pone delivered, to him, but suppresses it, this writ is sent to the coroner, commanding him to deliver a writ to the sheriff.—Reg. Orig. 83.

Acceleration, the shortening of the time for the vesting in possession of an expectant interest.

Acceptance, the taking and receiving of anything in good part, and as it were a tacit agreement to a preceding act, which might have been defeated or avoided if such acceptance had not been made.—Bro. Abr.

The acceptance of a Bill of Exchange is defined by the 'Bills of Exchange Act,' 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 61, s. 17, as 'the signification by the drawee of his assent to the order of the drawer.' It must be written on the bill, and signed by the drawee, whose mere signature is sufficient to charge him; and it must not express that the drawee will perform his promise by any other means than the payment of money.—Ib.

Acceptilatio, the verbal extinction of a verbal contract, with a declaration that the debt has been paid when it has not, or the acceptance of something merely imaginary in satisfaction of a verbal contract.—Scotch Law; Smith's Dict. of Antiq.; Sand. Just., 5th ed., 386. See STIPULATION.

Acceptor, or Acceptor, a person who accepts a bill of exchange drawn upon him; he is called a drawee before acceptance; he is the first and principal party liable to pay the amount of the bill. See ACCEPTANCE.

Access, approach, or the means of approaching. The presumption of a child's legitimacy is rebutted, if it be shown that the husband had not access to his wife within such a period of time before the birth, as admits of his having been the father. 'If a husband have access, although others, at the same time, are carrying on a criminal intimacy with his wife, a child born under such circumstances is still legitimate.' Per Alderson, J., in Cope v. Cope, 5 C. & P. 604. Neither husband nor wife is admissible as a witness to prove non-access. 'This' (says Lord Mansfield, in Goodright v. Moss, 2 Cowp.

594) 'is a rule founded on decency, morality and policy.'

Accessory, or Accessory [particeps criminis quasi accedens ad culpam, Lat., as though assenting to the offence], he who is not a chief actor at a felony, nor present at its perpetration, but yet is in some way concerned therein, either before or after the fact committed. An accessory before the fact is one, who being absent at the time of the commission of the felony, yet procures, counsels, or commands another to commit a crime. Absence is necessary to make him an accessory, for if he be present, he becomes a principal. An accessory after the fact may be, where a person knowing a felony to have been committed, receives, relieves, comforts, or assists the felon. To make an accessory ex post facto, it is in the first place requisite that he knows that the felony has been committed; in the next place, he must receive, relieve, comfort, or assist the felon, and generally, any assistance whatever given to hinder the apprehension, trial, or punishment of the felon, makes the assister an accessory. In treason and misdemeanours there are no accessories, either before or after the offence, every person implicated being a principal (see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 8). In manslaughter there cannot be an accessory before the fact, for it is by judgment of Law an unpremeditated offence. As to the trial and punishment of accessories:—By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94 (the Accessories and Abettors Act), ss. 1, 2, 3, an accessory before the fact to any felony may be indicted, tried, convicted, and punished in all respects as if he were a principal felon, and any accessory, either before or after the fact, may be indicted and convicted either as such accessory, together with the principal felon, or after his conviction, or may be indicted and convicted of a substantive felony (whether the principal felon shall have been convicted or not, or shall or shall not be amenable to justice) and may thereupon be punished as an accessory before or after the fact (if convicted as an accessory), may respectively be punished. An accessory after the fact is in general punishable with imprisonment for any term not exceeding two years (with or without hard labour), and may also be required to find security to keep the peace, or in default to suffer an additional imprisonment to the extent of one year, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 94, s. 4; but an accessory after the fact to murder is punishable by penal servitude for life, or not less than three (now five, 27 & 28 Vict. c. 47, s. 2) years, or by imprisonment (with or without hard labour) to the extent of two years. (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 67.)

Accession [fr. accedo, Lat.], addition, arriving at, the commencement of a sovereign's reign. Also the absolute or conditional acceptance by a nation of a treaty already concluded between other countries.

Accession, property by. The doctrine of property arising from accession is grounded on the right of occupancy, and derived from the Roman law; thus, if any given corporeal substance receive an accession, either by natural or artificial means, as by the growth of vegetables, the pregnancy of animals, the embroidering of cloth, or the conversion of wood or metal into utensils, the original owner of the thing was entitled by his right of possession to the property of it under its improved state; but if the thing itself, by such operation, was changed into a different species, as by making wine, oil, or bread out of another's grapes, olives, or wheat, it belonged to the new operator, who only made a satisfaction to the former proprietor for the materials so converted. The brood of tame and domestic animals belongs to the owner of the dame or mother, the English law agreeing with the civil, that partus sequitur ventrem (the offspring follows the mother); and in accordance with the Roman law principle, si equam meam equus tuus pregnantem fecerit non est tuum sed meum quod natum est (if your horse gets my mare with foal, the foal is not your property, but mine). Bracton, l. 2, c. 2, s. 3; Puff. De. Jur. Nat. et G. l. 4, c. 7. The rule of the Roman law was expressed thus: Accessio cedit principali. Commentators have used the word accessio not only for the increase itself, but also for the mode in which the increase becomes one's property.—Sand. Justin., 5th ed., 98; Dig. 34, l. 2, c. 19, s. 13.

Accessorium non ducit, sed sequitur suum principale, C. o. Litt. 152.—(That which is the accessory or incident does not lead but follows its principal.)

Accessorius sequitur naturam sui principalis, 3 Inst. 139.—(An accessory follows the nature of his [or its] principal.)

Accessory.—See ACCESSARY.

Accessory to Adultery, a phrase used in the law of divorce, and derived from the criminal law. It implies more than connivance, which is merely knowledge with consent. A conniver abstains from interference, an accessory directly commands, advises, or procures the adultery. A husband or wife who has been accessory to the adultery of the other party to the marriage cannot obtain a divorce on the ground of such adultery.—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, ss. 29, 31. See Browne on Divorce.

Accident, an extraordinary incident; something not expected. It is also a head of equitable jurisdiction, which was concurrent with that of the Courts of Law.

The meaning to be attached to the word 'accident,' in relation to equitable relief, is any unforeseen and undesigned event, productive of disadvantage.

Where title-deeds are lost, the defect occasioned by such an accident will be supplied; thus a mortgage-deed being stolen, the mortgagor or purchaser of the property will be compelled to pay the loan or consideration-money upon the mortgagee's reconveyance, and indemnity against such loss. If after a contract for sale of an estate, and before the title is accepted, the title-deeds are destroyed by fire, Equity will compel the specific performance of the contract, provided the vendor can furnish the purchaser with the means of showing what were the contents of the destroyed deeds, and of proving that such deeds were duly executed and delivered.

A purchaser being deemed the equitable owner of the purchased estate from the signing the contract for sale, he will be compelled to complete the purchase, although the property be destroyed during the negotiation, but a bidder at a sale under the authority of the High Court of Justice, not being deemed the purchaser until the certificate that he is the highest bidder has been confirmed, he is not liable to any loss by fire or otherwise which may happen to the property in the meantime; he would, however, have to pay the purchase-money if the estate were merely a life interest, and the cestui que vie should die immediately after the acceptance of his bid.

It is upon the principle of relieving against the prejudicial consequences of accident by loss of deeds, that grants are often presumed; thus the payment of rent for twenty years, raises the presumption that there has been a grant; and the enclosure of a common for thirty years raises the presumption that the enclosure was properly made.

Although it is a delicate function to restrain the exercise of a legal right, yet Equity relieves against penalties and forfeitures on the ground of accident, provided an adequate compensation can be given, or the thing can be done afterwards without damaging the interests of other parties. Thus, in the case of a bond for the payment of money at a given time under a penalty, if the money is not paid, Equity will relieve against the penalty on the ground that it would be unjust for the obligee to avail himself of the penalty when an offer of full indemnity, by the payment of the sum due with interest, is offered. When an estate is sold by auction, and there is a condition that the deposit shall be forfeited on the non-completion of the contract by a certain day, Equity invariably relieves against the lapse of time. The Court also allows a redemption of a mortgage (although the estate is forfeited at Law), because the contract is simply a security, and time is not of its essence; therefore to insist upon taking the land for the money would be unconscionable. Again, in the administration of assets, if an executor or administrator pay the legacies and certain debts, upon the reliance of the sufficiency of the assets, and it afterwards turns out that from subsequently discovered liabilities or unforeseen occurrences the assets become insufficient, Equity will relieve, provided the executor or administrator have acted faithfully and cautiously, and this on the ground that otherwise he would be innocently subjected to an unjust loss arising from pure accident. If the master of an apprentice die before the term has expired, a return of part of the premium will be ordered, on account of the failure of the contract from accident. If a penalty be inserted in a bond or instrument to secure the enjoyment of a given thing, this is deemed the main intent, and the penalty is treated as accessional and as a mere security and collateral guard for the damage really incurred; if then the penalty were sued for at Law, Equity would stay the proceedings and direct an issue quantum damnificatus, in order to ascertain the actual damage sustained. If, instead of a penalty, specific compensation is provided for the breach of a contract, then Equity will not interfere; for the specific compensation is not a penalty, but a liquidated, stipulated, or ascertained damage. Where the condition of a bond or deed is to pay a higher rate of interest, if it be not satisfied by a given day, it is in the nature of a penalty, and will be relieved against.

The construction of covenants must be the same in Equity as at Law, that is to say, every covenant is to be expounded with regard to its context; the exposition must be ex antecedentibus et consequentibus, and according to the reasonable sense and construction of the words; but their performance materially differed at Law and in Equity; for in the former Courts they must have been strictly and literally performed; but in the latter substantially, according to the true and practical intent of the covenanters; and if, by unavoidable accident, fraud or ignorance, not wilful, a literal execution be prevented, Equity will relieve upon compensation.

equitable jurisdiction in cases of accident,’ observes Story (Eq. Jur. c 4. ad. fin.), ‘it will be found that they resolve themselves into the following results:—that the party seeking relief has a clear right, which cannot otherwise be enforced in a suitable manner; or that he will be subjected to an unjustifiable loss, without any blame or misconduct on his own part; or that he has a superior equity to the party from whom he seeks the relief.’

Accident (in logic), something in any subject, person, or thing not belonging to the essence. See ESSENCE.

Accident occasioned by negligence. See NEGLECTANCE.

Accidental Death. By the act known as ‘Lord Campbell’s Act’ (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93), upon the death of any person through the wrongful act, neglect, or default of another, an action may be maintained for the benefit of the wife, husband, parent, and child of the deceased. In case there is no executor or of his unwillingness to sue, the action may be brought by the persons beneficially interested (27 & 28 Vict. c. 95).

Accidental Fire. By 14 Geo. III. c. 78, s. 86, no action shall be prosecuted against any person in whose house, chamber, stable, barn, or other building, or on whose estate any fire shall accidentally begin; but nothing therein contained shall defeat any contract or agreement made between landlord and tenant. The statute will not protect tenants from the consequences of fires caused by their negligence.—Woodf. Land. and Ten., ch. xvii.

Accite, to summon.—Obs.

Accola, a husbandman who comes from some other country to till the land, and is thus distinguished from incola, viz., accola non propriam; propriam colit incola terram (Accola is one who does not till his own land, Incola one who does).—Du Fresne.

Accolade [fr. accoler, Fr., collum amplexi, Lat.], a ceremony anciently used in knight-hood, by the king putting his hand upon the knight’s neck.—Cowel. Greg. de Tours writes, that the kings of France, in conferring the gilt shoulder belt, kissed the knight on the left cheek. The accollé, or blow, John of Salisbury assures us, was in use among the Normans; by this William the Conqueror conferred the honour of knighthood upon his son Henry. It was first given with the naked fist, but afterwards with the flat of a sword.

Accomenda, a contract whereby a person entrusts property to the master of a vessel, to be sold for their joint profit.—Italy, Mar. Law.

Accommodation, a friendly agreement; an amicable composition between persons at variance. An accommodation Bill of Exchange is one to which the accommodating party, be he acceptor, drawer, or indorser, has put his name, without consideration, for the purpose of benefiting or accommodating some other party who desires to raise money on it, and is to provide for the bill when due. The person accommodated engages either himself to take up the bill when due, or to provide the accommodating party with the funds for that purpose, or to indemnify him against the consequences of non-payment. See Byles and Chitty on Bills.

Accommodation Lands, land bought by a builder or speculator who erects houses thereon, and then leases portions thereof, upon an improved ground-rent.—Builder's Term.

Accommodation Works, works which a railway company is required to make and maintain for the accommodation of the owners or occupiers of land adjoining the railway, e.g., gates, bridges, culverts, fences, etc.—8 Vict. c. 20, s. 68.

Accomplice [fr. complice, Fr., complex, Lat., bound up with one in a project, but always in a bad sense], one concerned with another or others in the commission of a crime.—Hawk. P.C. 87.

Accord.—ACCORD AND SATISFACTION [fr. accorder, Fr., to agree], an agreement between two persons, one of whom has a right of action against the other, that the latter should do or give, and the former accept, something in satisfaction of the right of action. When the agreement is executed, and satisfaction has been made, it is called accord and satisfaction. Accord and satisfaction bars the right of action; accord without satisfaction does not. In the case of an ascertained debt, the acceptance of a smaller sum is no satisfaction, e.g., payment of 50*l.* is no answer to an action for a debt of 100*l.*; though if anything other than money, e.g., a negotiable instrument for a smaller amount or a pepper-corn, had been accepted in satisfaction, the action would have been barred.—Fitch v. Sutton, 5 East, 230; and see 1 Smith's L. C., 6th ed., 301. A substituted agreement may be accepted in accord and satisfaction of an existing cause of action, the new promise only and not the performance of it being taken in satisfaction and discharge.—Hall v. Flockton, 14 Q. B. 380.

Account or Accompt [fr. compte, Fr., computo, Lat.], a registry of debts, credits, and charges, or a detailed statement of a series of receipts (credits) and disbursements (debits) of money, which have taken place between two or more persons. Accounts are either —(1) open, where the balance is not struck, or it is not accepted by all the parties; (2) stated, where it has been expressly or impliedly acknowledged to be correct by all the parties; and (3) settled, where it has been accepted and discharged.

There was at the Common Law a very ancient, but now obsolete, action of account, to compel parties to render a true statement of monetary transactions which had arisen between them; but for many years recourse has usually been had to Courts of Equity, as those Courts extended their remedy to many cases of implied and constructive trusts, as well as to matters of fraudulent contrivance and tortious misconduct, which the action at Common Law could never have reached. See as to the action of Account, 3 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 433, and Bac. Ab. Account.

Prior to the passing of the Judicature Act, 1873, Equity entertained suits for accounts when they were mutual, i.e., where there existed a series of expenditures on one side, and of payments on the other, and not merely one payment and one receipt, and also where the account was on one side only, but was of so complicated and intricate a nature that it could not be satisfactorily disposed of at Law, and a discovery was wanted which was material to the right of relief. But for a mere matter of set-off at Law, a suit in Equity would not be the remedy.

The usual cases of accounts arising from contracts or quasi contracts, which are investigated in Equity, are the following:—Agency, Apportionment, General Average and Contribution, Waste, and Winding-up of Companies.

In suits for accounts, both parties are deemed plaintiffs (actores) when the cause is before the Court upon its merits; a defendant may, therefore, have an order for a ne exeat regno even against a co-defendant, and if a balance is ultimately found for the defendant, he is entitled to a decree against the plaintiff for its amount, since it is implied, if not expressed in the decree to account, that the balance shall be paid to the party entitled thereto. If the plaintiff die after an interlocutory decree to account, the defendant can continue the suit against his personal representatives, and if the defendant die, his personal representatives can continue the suit against those of the plaintiff.

By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 34 (3) all causes and matters for the taking of partnership or other accounts are assigned (subject to a power of transfer) to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice. If the plaintiff in the first instance desires to have an account taken, the writ of summons must be endorsed with a claim that such account be taken (Jud. Act, 1875, Sched. I., Ord. III. r. 8), and in such cases the order made must include the directions which were usual in the Court of Chancery. (Ib. Ord. XV. rr. 1, 2.)

The Statute of Limitations cannot be pleaded in bar to an open account, unless all accounts have ceased above six years. See 'The Mercantile Law Amendment Act, 1856,' 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 9.

These are the general principles which govern Equity in decreeing an account when such is the main object of the suit; but, it must be recollected, that in very many proceedings instituted for other kinds of redress, an account is frequently incident to the relief sought; and it may be laid down as a broad rule, that whenever the relationship of trustee and cestui qui trust is established between the parties, the cestui qui trust has always the right to an account from his trustee.—Story, Eq. Jurisp.

By the Jud. Act, 1873, s. 66, the Court or a judge may refer accounts to a district registrar; or (s. 57) if any cause or matter require a prolonged examination of accounts it may be referred by the Court or a judge to an official or special referee. See ARBITRATION AND REFEREE.

Accounts, falsification of. For any clerk, officer, or servant, or person acting in such capacity, to destroy, alter, substitute, or falsify any book, paper, writing, valuable security or account belonging to or received for his employer, with intent to defraud, is a misdemeanour, punishable with penal servitude, for not more than seven years or not less than two years' imprisonment. See 38 & 39 Vict. c. 24.

Account current, a running or open account between two or more persons or firms.

Account duties. Duties payable by the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881, 44 Vict. c. 12, s. 38, on a donatio mortis causa (see Donatio Mortis Causa), or on any gift the donor of which dies within three months after making it, or on joint property voluntarily so created and taken by survivorship, or on property taken under a voluntary settlement in which the settlor had a life interest.

Account stated. This was a common count in a declaration upon a contract under which the plaintiff might prove an absolute acknowledgment, by the defendant, of a liquidated demand of a fixed amount, which implies a promise to pay on request. It might be joined with any other count for a money demand. The acknowledgment or admission must have been made to the plaintiff or his agent. It may be of one only out of several items. The account must have been stated before action brought. See STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

Accountable Receipt, a written acknowledgment of the receipt of money or goods to be accounted for by the receiver. It differs from an ordinary receipt, or acquittance, in this, that the latter imports merely that money has been paid. See Clark v. Newsam, 1 Ecceq. 131. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 23, the forgery of an accountable receipt, or any endorsement on, or assignment of, it, with intent to defraud, is a felony punishable by penal servitude or imprisonment.—Greave's Criminal Law Consolidation Acts, 233.

Accountant, or Accomptant, one whose business it is to compute, adjust, and range in due order accounts.

Accountant in Bankruptcy, an officer who had the control and management of the proceeds of bankrupts' estates. The Bankruptcy Act, 1861, s. 12, provided that upon the first vacancy the office should be abolished, and its duties discharged by the Chief Registrar. The funds in the Bank of England standing in his name were transferred (upon certain conditions) to the National Debt Commissioners, by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 91 (which see). See also BANKRUPTCY.

Accountant-General, or Accomptant-General, an officer of the Court of Chancery, appointed by act of parliament to receive all money lodged in Court, and to place the same in the Bank of England for security. (12 Geo. I., c. 32; 1 Geo. IV. c. 35; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, ss. 18—22 & 39. See Daniell's Ch. Pr., 4th ed., 1607 et seq.) The office, however, has been abolished by 35 & 36 Vict. c. 44, and the duties transferred to Her Majesty's Paymaster General.

Accouple, to marry.

Accredit, to countenance or procure honour or credit to any person.—Johns. To accredit a diplomatic agent is to furnish him with such authority and credentials as are calculated to ensure his being received with the credit and rank due to his public character.

Accreditare, to purge an offence by an oath.—Blount.

Accrescendi, jus. See JUS ACCRESCENDI.

Accretion [fr. accresco, or adresco, Lat.], the act of growing to a thing; usually applied to the gradual and imperceptible accumulation of land out of the sea or a river. Accretion of land is of two kinds: by alluvion, i.e., by the washing up of sand or soil, so as to form firm ground; or by dereliction, as when the sea shrinks below the usual water mark. If this accretion of land be by small and imperceptible degrees, it belongs to the owner of the land immediately adjacent to it, in accordance with the maxim De minimis non curat Lex (the Law cares not about trifles), but if it be sudden and considerable it belongs to the Crown.—4 Hale, De Jure Maris, 14 ; 2 Br. and Had. Com. 415.

Accrimination, Accusation.—Obs.

Accroaching, attempting to exercise royal power.—4 Br. and Had. Com. 83.

Accroche [fr. accrocher, Fr.], to hook or grapple unto, to encroach. The French use it for delay, as accrocher un procès, to stay proceedings in a suit.—Cowel.

Accrue [fr. accroître, accru, Fr., fr. crescere, Lat., to grow], to grow to, or to arise.

Accruing Costs, expenses incurred after judgment.

Accumulation, a gathering together, heaping up, or amassing. The dominion over property, and its rents, issues, and profits, is restrained by our law as regards perpetuity and accumulation. The rules against perpetuities and accumulations bound the propriety right on every side, and limit that species of vanity, which, in the language of Lord Nottingham, 'fights against God, by affecting a stability which human providence can never attain to.'—2 Swanst. 460. See PERPETUITY.

The prospective accumulation of income of real or personal estate is restrained by 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 98. This statute is sometimes quoted as Lord Loughborough's Act, but it is more commonly called 'The Thellusson Act,' because the case of Thellusson v. Woodford (4 Ves. 227—343, 1798 ; and 11 Ves. 112—151, 1805) was the occasion of its enactment. It declares that no person shall by deed, will, or otherwise howsoever, dispose of any real or personal property, in such manner that the rents, or produce thereof shall be accumulated for any longer term than—

(1) The life of the grantor ; or

(2) The term of twenty-one years from the death of the grantor ; or

(3) During the minority of any person who shall be living or en ventre sa mère at the time of the death of the grantor ; or be directed to be accumulated contrary to the provisions of this act, go to and be received by such person or persons as would have been entitled thereto if such accumulation had not been directed' (s. 1).

The act, however, does not extend—

(1) To any provision for payment of debts of the grantor, or other persons ; or

(2) To any provision for raising portions for any child of the grantor, or any child of any person taking any interest under the grant ; or

(3) To any direction touching the produce of timber or wood upon any lands or tenements (s. 2).

(4) To any disposition respecting heritable property in Scotland.

The statute operates as a restraint upon those trusts for accumulation which aim at a duration beyond the statutory limits, simply by causing them to cease and become of no effect immediately upon the twenty-first anniversary of the death of the settlor or testator, and until that date, leaves them as valid as if the act had not passed Accumulative Judgment. If a person already under sentence for a crime be convicted of another offence, the Court is empowered to pass a second sentence, to commence after the expiration of the first.

Accusare nemo se debet, nisi coram Deo.—

Hard. 139.—(No one is bound to accuse himself, unless in the presence of God.)

Accusation, the formal charging of any person with a crime.

Accusator post rationabile tempus non est audiendus, nisi se bene de omissione excuset. See Sir. A. Ashley's case, Moore, 817.—(An accuser ought not to be heard after the expiration of a reasonable time, unless he can account satisfactorily for the delay.)

Accused, a person charged with an offence.

Ace [fr. as, Lat., and Fr., asso, It., a single one] of Hearts, an unlawful game by 12 Geo. II. c. 28.

Acemannes-ceaster, Bath.

Acephali, the levellers in the reign of Hen. I., who acknowledged no head or superior.—Leges H. 1 ; Cowel. Also certain ancient heretics who appeared about the beginning of the 6th century, and asserted that there was but one substance in Christ, and one nature.

Ac etiam [and also]. The introduction to the statement of the real cause of action in cases where it was necessary to allege a fictitious cause in order to give the Court jurisdiction.—Bouvier. The ac etiam clause appears to have been invented in consequence that the particular cause of action must be expressed in the writ where more than 40*l.* was claimed.—Davison v. Frost, 2 East, 305. See also LATITAT.

Achat [Fr.], a purchase or bargain.—Cowel.

Achators, or Achetors, purveyors, because they frequently bargain; also purchasers.—Chaucer.

Achelanda, Auchelandia, Auklandia, Auckland, in the Bishopric of Durham.

Acheret, a measure of corn, conjectured to have been the same with our quarter or eight bushels.—Cowel.

Achwe [Ach-gwré, near belt], an enclosure of wattles or thorns surrounding a building; at such a distance as to prevent cattle reaching and damaging the thatch.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Acknowledgment-money, a sum paid in some parts of England by copyhold-tenants on the death of their lords, as a recognition of their new lords, in like manner as money is usually paid on the attornment of tenants.—Cowel.

Acknowledgment of a wife's assurance. Numerous and elaborate formalities must be observed in order that a married woman may legally convey her estate, or extinguish her rights or powers in realty, or money directed to be laid out in realty. These are prescribed by the 'Fines and Recoveries Abolition Act' (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74), ss. 77—91, and the rules of Hilary and Trinity Terms, 1834, framed by the Court of Common Pleas.

The county court judges may take these acknowledgments under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, ss. 26 & 73. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 70, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 75.

By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 57, commonly called 'Malins's Act,' married women are enabled to dispose of every future or reversionary interest, whether vested or contingent, 'of such married woman, or her husband in her right,' in personal estate (s. 1). Deeds under this act require acknowledgment in like manner as deeds under the act of Wm. IV., and all the clauses and provisions in the said act are to extend to and be applicable to such interests in personal estate, and to such powers as may be disposed, released, or extinguished by virtue of this act, as fully and effectually as if such interests or powers were interests or powers over land (s. 2).

The statute 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, excepts the case of a married woman being a tenant-in-tail. Where she is such a tenant, and desires to bar the entail, the deed must be enrolled in Chancery, according to the directions of the act: and should such deed operate as a transfer of her beneficial interest, it must also be duly acknowledged by her as just explained. So that enrolment and acknowledgment are both requisite in such a case. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 70; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 75; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 97.

As to acknowledgments by married women under the 'Declaration of Title Act,' see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 67, s. 36; and see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 53, s. 115; LAND TRANSFER ACT.

Acknowledgment of debt or liability. See LIMITATIONS, STATUTE OF.

Aclea [fr. ac, an oak, and leag, place, Sax.], a field where oaks grow.—Cunningham.

Acolyte [fr. ἀκαλόυθος Gk.], one of the minor orders in the Romish Church, whose office it is, next under the sub-deacon, to follow or wait on the priests or deacons in the ministry of the altar, and perform the meaner offices of lighting the candles, carrying the bread and wine, etc. This officer was in our old English called a colet, from which the family of Dean Colet, the founder of St. Paul's School, derived its name.—Cowel.

A communi observantia non est recedendum; et minimè mutanda sunt quæ certam interpretationem habent. Co. Litt. 365.—(From common usage there should not be any departure, and things which have an ascertained meaning are to be the least changed).

Acquest or Acquit, property obtained by purchase or donation.—Encyc. Lond.; Civil Law.

Acquiescence, consent, either express or implied.

Acquietandis Plegiis, an obsolete writ, lying for a surety against the creditor who refuses to acquit him after the debt is satisfied.

Acquietantia de shiris et hundredis, freedom from suits and services in shires and hundreds.—Cowel.

Acquisition, the act of procuring property.

Acquitave [fr. quietum reddere, Lat.], to acquit, absolve.—Blount.

Acquittal [fr. acquitter, Fr.; quietus, Lat., to free, acquit, or discharge], a deliverance and setting free of a person from the suspicion or guilt of an offence; also to be free from entries and molestations by a superior lord, for services issuing out of lands.—Cowel. Acquittal is of two kinds—(1) Acquittal in deed, as when a person is cleared by verdict; and (2) Acquittal in law, as if two be indicted for a felony, the one as principal and the other as accessory, and the jury acquit the principal, by law the accessory is also acquitted.—2 Inst. 384.

Acquittal contracts, a discharge from an obligation, which is either by deed, prescription, or tenure.—Co. Litt. 100 a.

Acquittance, a release or written discharge of a sum of money or debt due: as where a man is bound to pay money on a bond, rent reserved upon a lease, etc., and the party to whom it is due, on receipt thereof, gives a writing under his hand witnessing that he is paid, this will be such a discharge in Law that he cannot demand and recover the sum or duty again, if the acquittance be produced.—Termes de la Ley, 15.

Acre [fr. aypos, Gr.; ager, Lat.; akrs, Goth.; acker, Germ.], a measure of land. The extent of the acre was first defined by statute in the 33 Edw. I., according to which an acre contains 169 square perches, the perch being then $5\frac{1}{2}$ yards. The imperial or standard English acre contains four roods, each rood forty poles or perches, each pole $272\frac{1}{4}$ square feet, and consequently each acre = 43,560 square feet.—See Weights and Measures Act, 1878. The French acre, arpent, contains $1\frac{1}{4}$ English acres, or 54,450 square English feet. The Strasburg acre is about $\frac{1}{2}$ an English acre. The Welsh acre contains commonly two English acres. The Irish acre is equal to 1 acre, 2 roods, and 19 perches $\frac{22}{121}$ English; the Scotch, 6,150 $\frac{2}{3}$ square yards; the Roman, 3,200; and the Egyptian aroura, 3,698 $\frac{7}{9}$.

Act in Pais [Pais, Law Fr., country], a thing done out of court, and not a matter of record.—2 Bl. Com. 294.

Act of Attainder. See BILL OF ATTAINDER.

Act of Bankruptcy, an act, the commission of which by a debtor renders him liable to be adjudged a bankrupt,—under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, one of the following acts:—

1. Having, in England or elsewhere, made an assignment of his property in trust for his creditors generally.
2. Having, in England or elsewhere, made a fraudulent conveyance, gift, delivery, or transfer of his property, or of any part thereof.
3. Having, with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, departed out of England, or being out of England, remained out of England; or being a trader absented himself; or begun to keep house.
4. Having filed, in the Bankruptcy Court, a declaration admitting his inability to pay his debts.
5. Having, if a trader, suffered execution for the purpose of obtaining payment of not less than 50*l*.
6. Having, for 7 days if a trader, and for 3 weeks if not a trader, neglected to pay or compound for a sum due of 50*l*. or more after service of a 'debtor's summons' requiring payment.

See BANKRUPT, DEBTORS' SUMMONS, and the works on Bankruptcy of Baldwin; Roche & Hazlitt; Robson; and Williams.

Act of Curatory, the order by which a curator, or guardian, is appointed by the Court.—Scotch Law.

Act of God. Defined by a Court of Appeal in Nugent v. Smith, 1 C. P. D. 423, as 'a direct, violent, sudden, and irresistible act of nature, which could not, by any reasonable cause, have been foreseen or resisted.'

Act of Grace. The act so termed in Scotland was passed in 1696; it provides for the maintenance of debtors imprisoned by their creditors. It is usually applied in England to insolvent acts, and to general pardons granted at the beginning of a new reign, or on other great occasions.—Encyc. Lond.; Bell's Dict.

Act of Oblivion, 12 Chas. II. c. 11.

Act of Parliament, a statute, law, or edict, made by the Sovereign, with the advice and consent of the lords spiritual and temporal, and the commons, in parliament assembled (Bl.). Acts of parliament form the leges scriptæ, i.e., the written laws of the kingdom.

Acts of parliament cannot be altered, amended, dispensed with, suspended, or repealed, but by the same authority of parliament which created them; the maxim being that it requires the same power to dissolve as to create an obligation.

Statutes are either public or private, general, or special. The distinction between public and private acts was first made in the reign of Richard III. A public or general act is a universal rule applied to the whole community, which the Courts must notice judicially and ex officio, although not formally set forth by a party claiming an advantage under it. But special or private acts are rather exceptions than rules, since they only operate upon particular persons and private concerns, and the Courts were not bound to take notice of them if they were not formally pleaded, unless an express clause were inserted in them, that they should be deemed public acts, and should be judicially taken notice of as such, without being specially pleaded. But, by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, s. 7, every act made after the commencement of the then next session of parliament, is to be taken to be a public one, and judicially noticed as such, unless the contrary be expressly declared.

The principal rules for the interpretation of acts of parliament are the following:—(1) a statute begins to operate from the time when it receives the royal assent, unless otherwise provided (33 Geo. III. c. 13). But where an act expires before a bill continuing it has received the royal assent, the latter act takes effect from the expiration of the former, unless otherwise provided, and except as to any penalty (48 Geo. III. c. 106); (2) it is to be construed according to the intent and object with which it was made, and not according to the mere letter; (3) that these points be considered—the old law, the mischief, and the remedy; (4) remedial statutes are to be more liberally, and penal more strictly, construed; (5) in construing a statute, all other statutes made in pari materia, ought to be taken into consideration; (6) a statute which treats of things and persons of an inferior rank, cannot by any general words be extended to those of a superior; (7) where the provision of a statute is general, everything which is necessary to make such provision effectual is supplied by the Common Law; (8) a subsequent statute may repeal a prior one, not only expressly, but by implication, as when it is contrary thereto, i.e., so clearly repugnant that it necessarily implies a negative, but if the acts can stand together, they shall have a concurrent efficacy; (9) if a statute, repealing another, is itself repealed, the repealed statute does not revive without express words (13 Vict. c. 21, ss. 5 & 6); and (10) acts of parliament derogatory from the power of subsequent parliaments do not bind.

Statutes are variously cited; many of the old statutes are called after the name of the place where the parliament which passed them was held, as the Statute of Merton, or Marlebridge, or Winchester, or Westminster; others are denominated entirely from their subject, as the Fines and Recoveries Act, the Non-arrest Act; some are distinguished from their initial words, as the statute Quia emptores or De donis; some are commonly called after the member of parliament who introduced them, e.g., as Lord Campbell's Act (6 & 7 Vict. c. 96), Russell Gurney's Act. But since the time of Edward II. they are generally cited by naming the years of the sovereign's reign during which the session of parliament was held in which the statute was passed, together with the chapter or particular act, according to its numerical order, e.g., 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, the chapter, if the act be a local and personal one, being printed in Roman figures, e.g., 20 & 21 Vict. c. xciv. About the year 1850 'short titles' began to be introduced, with the date, e.g., the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852; the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, etc.; and this useful nomenclature is now almost universal. All the acts of a session together make properly but one statute, and therefore, when two sessions have been held in one year, it is usual to mention stat. 1 or 2. Thus the Bill of Rights is cited as 1 W. & M. st. 2, c. 2.—Consult Bac. Abr. Statutes; Dwarris on Statutes; Maxwell on Statutes; Hardcastle on Statutes; Wilberforce on Statutes.

Acts of parliament bind all persons within the territory to which they extend, but not the crown, unless it be specially mentioned. By 20 Geo. II. c. 42, s. 3, the term England extends to Wales and Berwick-upon-Tweed; and acts passed since the respective unions of those kingdoms with England, extend to Scotland and Ireland, though not expressly mentioned, unless they are excepted by express words or by necessary implication. Such acts do not extend to the Isle of Man, a distinct territory from England, nor to the Channel Islands, Jersey, Guernsey, Alderney, and Sark, and their appendages, which were originally parcel of the Duchy of Normandy, unless they are expressly mentioned. As to the colonies, if acquired by occupancy, all acts of parliament passed previously to their acquisition, so far as they are suitable to the social state of an infant colony, extend to them upon their acquisition; but it is otherwise if they have been acquired by treaty or conquest; and as to both kinds, they are not affected by acts of parliament passed subsequently to their acquisition unless express mention of them be made. So also an act of parliament does not apply to India unless it be expressly mentioned. See Dwarris, 998; Cowp. 204.

By 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, 'An Act for shortening the language used in Acts of Parliament,' it is provided inter alia that an act may be altered, amended, or repealed in the same session; that words importing the masculine gender shall include females, the singular shall include the plural, the plural the singular, that 'month' shall mean calendar month, 'county' shall mean also county of a town or of a city; 'land' shall include messuages, tenements, and hereditaments, houses, buildings of any tenure, unless in each case the contrary is expressly provided; and 'oath,' 'swear,' and 'affidavit' shall include affirmation, declaration, affirming and declaring, in the case of persons allowed by law to declare or affirm instead of swearing.

Of late years many steps have been taken by the Government with a view to classifying and consolidating the Statute Law. In 1833, a commission was issued to certain barristers to digest the Criminal Law, written and unwritten, and generally to inquire and report how far it might be expedient to consolidate the other branches of the existing Statute

Laws or any of them. This commission (which devoted itself chiefly to Criminal Law) presented one report on consolidation generally in July, 1835. In March, 1853, Lord Cranworth, L.C., constituted 'The Statute Law Board' for the consolidation of the Statute Law. It presented three reports. In 1854 the Statute Law Commission issued, for the purpose of consolidating the Statute Law, or such part as they might find capable of being usefully and conveniently consolidated, combining with that process, if they should think it advisable, the incorporation of any parts of the common or unwritten law in such manner as should seem desirable, and also for the purpose of devising and suggesting such rules, if any, as might in their judgment tend to insure simplicity or uniformity, or any other improvement in the form and style of future statutes. Four reports were presented by that commission, and under it a Register of Public General Statutes from the Union of Great Britain and Ireland was prepared. In October, 1859, the Statute Law Commission having been discontinued, F. S. Reilly and A. J. Wood, Esquires, Barristers-at-Law, were engaged by the Government to make a revision of the Statute Law, with a view, in the first instance, to the preparation of a new edition of the statutes, to contain (as far as possible) solely such enactments as are in force, and thus to show what the existing Statute Law is, and bring together the whole body of it into a manageable shape, for the purposes either of ordinary use or of consolidation and other improvement. Various repealing acts termed 'Statute Law Revision Acts,' have been passed by which a vast number of obsolete and unnecessary acts and portions of acts have been repealed. See 19 & 20 Vict. c. 64; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 101; 26 & 27 Vict. c. 125; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 59; 33 & 34 Vict. c. 69; 34 & 35 Vict. c. 116; 35 & 36 Vict. cc. 63, 97, 98; 36 & 37 Vict. c. 91; 37 & 38 Vict. cc. 35, 96; and 38 & 39 Vict. c. 66. Moreover numerous consolidation acts have been passed since the work of revision was first commenced. Amongst these may be mentioned the National Debt Act, 1870, the Public Health Act, 1875, the Friendly Societies Act, 1875, the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, the Weights and Measures Act, 1878, and the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.

The first volume of the revised edition of the statutes was published in 1870. It contains all the acts or portions of acts remaining unrepealed down to the reign of James II. This has been followed by fourteen later volumes bringing down the Statute Law to the end of the session of 1868, beyond which the edition does not proceed. A Chronological Table and Index to the Statutes is also published annually.

Act of Settlement, 12 & 13 Wm. III. c. 2, limiting the crown to the Princess Sophia of Hanover, and to the heirs of her body being Protestants.

Act of Uniformity, the 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 11, which, by section 4, enacted that the Book of Common Prayer, then recently revised, should be used in every parish church and other places of public worship. An important amendment has been made of this Act by the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 35, which inter alia provides 'a shortened form of Morning and Evening Prayer.' The 34 & 35 Vict. c. 37 amends the law relating to the Tables of Lessons and Psalter contained in the Prayer Book, and introduces a new and revised Table of Lessons. See further PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT.

Actaindre le meffait [Fr.], to fix the charge of a crime upon one, to prove a crime.—Carp. Wedgw.

Actio ad exhibendum, an action for the purpose of compelling a defendant to exhibit a thing or title in his power. It was preparatory to another action, which was always a real action in the sense of the Roman Law, that is, for the recovery of a thing, whether it was moveable or immoveable.—Merl. Quest de Dr. tome i. 84. Civil Law.

Actio bonæ fidei, an action which the judge decided according to Equity, the judex thus acting as arbitrator with a wide discretion.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 321, 421.

Actio commodati contraria, an action by a borrower against a lender, to enforce the execution of a contract.—Poth. Prêt. à Usage, n. 75. Civil Law.

Actio condictio indebiti, an action for the recovery of a sum of money or other thing paid by mistake.—Poth. Promutuum, n. 140. Civil Law.

Actio ex conducto, an action by a bailor of a thing for hire, against a bailee, to compel him to deliver the thing hired.—Poth. Du Contr. de Louage, n. 59. Civil Law.

Actio contra defunctum cepta continuatur in hæredes.—(An action begun against a person who dies is continued against his heirs.) This rule does not apply to actions strictly personal.—See Lansdowne v. Lansdowne, 1 Mad. 16; and see infra, ACTIO PERSONALIS.

Actio depositi contraria, an action which a depositary has against a depositor, to compel him to fulfil his engagement towards him.—Poth. Du Dépôt. n. 60 Civil Law.

Actio depositi directa, an action which is brought by a depositor against a depository, in order to get back the thing deposited.—Poth. Du Dépôt, n. 60. Civil Law.

Actio iudicati, an action instituted after four months had elapsed from the rendition of judgment, in which the judge issued his warrant to seize, first, the moveables, which were sold within eight days afterwards, and then the immoveables, which were delivered in pledge to the creditors, or put under the care of a curator, and, if at the end of two months the debt was not paid, the land was sold.—Dig. 42, t. 1; Code, 8, 34; Civil Law.

Actio non accrevit infra sex annos, the name of the plea of the Statute of Limitations, when the defendant alleges that the plaintiff's action has not accrued within six years. See LIMITATIONS, STATUTE OF.

Actio non datur non damnificato. Jenk. Cent. 69.—(An action is not given to him who is not injured.)

Actio personalis moritur cum personâ.—(A personal action dies with the person)—‘As if battery be done to a man, if he who did the battery or the other die, the action is gone’—Noy, 9th ed., p. 20. This rule of the Common Law has been encroached upon by various statutes: by 4 Edw. III. c. 7, and 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 2, as to trespass; and by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93 (Lord Campbell's Act), as to negligence causing death.

Actio penalâ in hæredem non datur, nisi forte ex damno locupletior hæres factus sit.—A penal action is not given against an heir, unless, indeed, such heir is benefited by the wrong.)

Actio pro socio, an action by which either partner could compel his co-partners to perform their social contract.—Poth. Contr. de Société, n. 134. Civil Law.

Actio quelibet it suâ viâ. Jenk. Cent. 77.—(Every action proceeds in its own way.)

Action, conduct, something done; also the form prescribed by Law for the recovery of one's due, or the lawful demand of one's right. Bracton defines it:—Actio nihil aliud est quam jus prosequendi in iudicio quod alicui debetur. (An action is nothing else than the right of prosecuting to judgment that which is due to any one). Actions are divided into criminal and civil: criminal actions are more properly called prosecutions, and perhaps, actions penal, to recover some penalty under statute, are properly criminal actions. Actions civil are divided into three classes:—(1) real, which concerns real property only, as the action of dower; (2) personal, such as concern contracts, both sealed and unsealed, and offences or trespasses; and (since the Jud. Acts, 1873 and 1875), probates and administrations: the first are called ex contractu—they are debt, promises, covenant, account, detinue, revivor, and scire facias; the second are ex delicto, as case, trover, replevin, and trespass vi et armis; (3) mixed, which lie as well for the recovery of the thing as for damages for the wrong sustained, as ejectment. By 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36, real actions were abolished, except actions of writ of right of dower, dower, quare impedit, and ejectment. By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 26, the first three of these were entirely abolished, and it was provided that where any of them would have lain, an ordinary action might be commenced in the Court of Common Pleas.

The term ‘action’ is now applied to all proceedings in the Supreme Court which would have been commenced by writ in the Superior Courts of Common Law, the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster, and the Court of Pleas at Durham; and all suits formerly commenced by bill or information in the Court of Chancery or by a cause in the Court of Admiralty, or in the Court of Probate (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 100, and Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. I., r. 1).

Also stock in a company, or shares in a corporation.—Fr. Comm. Law.

Action for pointing of the ground, so called to distinguish it from personal pointing, and can therefore be only against the goods belonging to the debtor. Every person who has a debt secured upon land, or as it is commonly expressed a debitum fundi, whether the security be constituted by law or by paction, is entitled to an action for pointing all the goods on the lands burdened, even though the original debtor on the lands burdened should have been divested of the property in favour of third persons.—Scotch Law.

Action of a writ, a phrase used when a defendant pleads some matter by which he shows that the plaintiff had no cause to have the writ sued upon, although it may be that he is entitled to another writ or action for the same matter.—Cowel.

Action of abstracted multures, an action for multures or tolls against those who are thirled to a mill, i.e., bound to grind their corn at a certain mill, and fail to do so.—Bell's Dict.

Action of adherence, an action competent to a husband or wife, to compel either party to adhere in case of desertion.—Scotch Law.

It is analogous to the English suit for restitution of conjugal rights.

Action on the case. See CASE.

Action prejudicial, otherwise called preparatory or principal, an action arising from a preliminary doubt, as in case a man sue his younger brother for lands descended from the father, and it is objected against him that he is a bastard, this point of bastardy must be tried before the cause can proceed. It is, therefore, termed prejudicialis.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 431.

Action redhibitory, an action instituted to avoid a sale on account of some vice or defect in the thing sold, which renders it either absolutely useless, or its use so inconvenient and imperfect, that it must be supposed the buyer would not have purchased it had he known of the vice.—Civil Law.

Actionare [i.e., in jus vocare, Lat.], to prosecute a person in a cause at Law.—Thorn's Chron.

Actionary, a foreign commercial term for the proprietor of an action or share of a public company's stock, a stockholder.

Actionem-non or Action-non. Special pleas began with this allegation, 'that the said plaintiff ought not to have or maintain his aforesaid action thereof against him,' actionem non habere debet. Hence technically termed the actio-non.—Steph. Plead. It was abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 66.

Actiones composite sunt, quibus inter se homines disceptant, quas actiones, ne populus prout vellet institueret, certas solennesque esse voluerunt.—(Forms of actions have been framed by which men may dispute among themselves, which forms are made definite and solemn, lest the people proceed as they think proper.)

Actiones in personam, quæ adversus eum intenduntur, quæ ex contractu vel delicto obligatus est aliquid dare vel concedere.—(Personal actions are those which are brought against him who, from a contract or tort, is obliged to give or allow something.)

Actiones nominatæ, writs for which there were precedents. The Statute of Westminster 2, c. 24, gave Chancery authority to form new writs in consimili casu. Hence the action on the case.—Bac. Ab. Court of Chancery, a.

Actions ordinary, all actions not rescissory.—Ersk. Pr. L. Scot. 4, 1, 5.

Actions rescissory, are either (1) actions of proper improbation for declaring a writing false or forged; (2) actions of reduction—improbation for the production of a writing in order to have it set aside or its effect ascertained under the certification that the writing if not produced shall be declared false or forged; and (3) actions of simple reduction, for declaring a writing called for null until produced.—Ersk. Pr. L. Scot. 4, 1, 5.

Actionum genera maxime sunt servanda. Lofft. 460.—(The nature of actions is strictly to be observed.)

Actionum quedam sunt in rem, quedam in personam, et quedam mixtæ. Co. Litt. 284.

—(Some actions are against the thing, some against the person, and some mixed.)

Actitation, a debating of law-suits.

Active debt, a debt whereon interest is paid.

Active trust, a confidence connected with a duty.

Active use, a present legal estate.

Acto [Acton, Aketon, Fr. Hanqueton], a coat of mail.—Du Fresne.

Acton-Burnell, the statute giving the remedy by statute merchant 11 Edw. I. A.D. 1283, so termed from the place where it was made, situated in Shropshire.—Cowel; 2 Reeves, c. ix. 158.

Actor, a doer, generally, a plaintiff or complainant. In a civil or private action the plaintiff was often called by the Romans petitor; in a public action (causa publica) he was called accusator. (Cic. ad Att. l. 16.) The defendant was called Reus, both in private and public causes; this term, however, according to Cicero (De Orat. ii. 43), might signify either party, as indeed we might conclude from the word itself. In a private action, the defendant was often called adversarius, but either party might be called so with respect to the other. Also a proctor or advocate in civil courts or causes. Actor dominicus, a term often used for the lord's bailiff or attorney. Actor ecclesie was sometimes the forensic term for the advocate or pleading patron of a church. Actor villæ was the steward or head bailiff of a town or village.—Cowel.

Actor qui contra regulam quid adduxit, non est audiendus.—(A plaintiff is not to be heard who has advanced anything against authority.)

Actor sequitur forum rei.—(A plaintiff follows the court of the defendant.)—Branch, Max. 4.

Actore non probante reus absolvitur.—(When the plaintiff does not prove his case the defendant is acquitted.)—Hob. 103.

Actori incumbit onus probandi.—(The burthen of proof lies on a plaintiff.)—Hob. 103.

Acts done, distinguished into acts of God, of the Law, and of men. See under Actus, post.

Acts of Court, legal memoranda of the nature of pleas, especially in Admiralty Courts. See ADMIRALTY.

Acts of Sederunt, ordinances or rules of the Court of Session in Scotland, made under authority of the act, 1540, c. 93, by which power is given to make such statutes as may be necessary for the ordering of processes and the expedition of justice. The Court of Session has also under many acts been empowered to make, and has made, Acts of Sederunt; just as the courts in England, have been empowered to make 'General Rules.'

Acts of the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland. The acts of the general assembly, issued under their legislative powers, are binding on all the members and judicatories of the church. The form of their procedure is regulated by an act of the church (1697), termed the Barrier Act.—Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Acts of Union. With Wales, 27 Hen. VIII. c. 26, confirmed by 34 & 35 Hen. VIII. c. 26. With Scotland, 5 Anne c. 8, and see 6 Anne cc. 6 and 23. With Ireland, 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 67.

Actuarius, a notary

Actuary, a registrar of a public body. Also a clerk that registers the acts and constitutions of the Lower House of Convocation; or a registrar in a Court Christian.—Jacob. Also an officer appointed to keep Savings-Banks accounts. The manager of an Insurance Company; also a person killed in calculating the value of life interests, annuities, and insurances.

Actus, a servitude of footway and horseway.—Civ. Law.

Actus contra actum, a mutual consent.

Actus curie neminem gravabit. Jenk. Cent. 118.—(An act of the Court will hurt no person.) See this maxim exemplified, Cumber v. Wane, 1 Str. 126; and 1 Smith L. C.

Actus Dei necnon legis nemini est damnosus, aut facit injuriam. 5 Co. 87.—An act of God and also of Law is hurtful, or operates an injury, to no one.)

Actus Dei nemini nocet.—(The act of God does injury to nobody.)—Lofft. 102.

Actus inceptus cujus perfectio pendet ex voluntate partium, revocari potest; si autem pendet ex voluntate tertie personae, vel ex contingenti, revocari non potest. Bacon.—(An act already begun the completion of which depends on the will of the parties, may be revoked; but if it depend on the consent of a third person, or on a contingency, it cannot be revoked.)

Actus judicarius coram non iudice irritus habetur, de ministeriali autem a quocunque provenit ratum esto.—(A judicial act by a judge without jurisdiction is void; but a ministerial act, from whomsoever proceeding, may be ratified.)—Lofft. 458.

Actus legis nemini facit injuriam.—(An act of the Law does injury to no one.)—Lofft. 103; 5 Co. 116.

Actus legitimi non recipiunt modum. Hob. 153.—(Legal actions do not admit a limitation.)

Actus me invito factus, non est meus actus.

—(An act done by me against my will is not my act.)

Actus non facit reum, nisi mens sit rea. 3 Inst. 307.—(An act does not make a man guilty, unless he be so in intention.)

A. D. [Lat.], contraction for Anno domini (In the year of our Lord).

Adar (the same meaning as Aries, a ram mighty). The twelfth sacred month of the Jewish calendar, and sixth of their civil year, answering to the end of February and beginning of March. As the lunar year which the Jews followed in their calculations is shorter than the solar by about eleven days, which at the end of three years make a month, they then intercalate a thirteenth month every third year, which they call Veadar, or the second Adar.—Brown's Dict. of Bible; Jahn's Bib. Antiq. c. vi. s. 103.

Adawlut, corrupted from Adalat, justice, equity; a court of justice. The terms Dewanny Adawlut, and Foujdarry Adawlut, denote the civil and criminal courts of Justice in India. See DEWANNY and FOUJDARRY and Wilson's Glossary.

Ad comparandum et ad standum juri.—(To appear and to stand to the Law, i.e., abide the judgment of the Court.—Cro. Jac. 67.)

Adcordabilis denarii, money paid by a vassal to his lord upon the selling or exchanging of a feud.—Encyc. Lond.

Adcredulitare, to purge one's self of an offence by oath.

Ad damnum (to the damage). That part of the writ which states the amount of the plaintiff's injury.—See 1 Chitt. Pl. 419.

Addecimate, to take tithes.

Addictio, the giving up to a creditor of his debtor's person by a magistrate. The ordinary means of execution under a law which did not allow execution of a debtor's property.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 15.

Ad diem (at the day).

Addition, the title, or mystery, and place of abode of a person besides his names.—1 Hen. V. c. 5; Termes de la Ley, 20. By 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 24, no indictment shall be held insufficient for want of, or imperfection in, the addition of any defendant.

Aditionales, propositions or terms added to a former agreement or contract.

Address, a petition, also a place of business or residence.

Address for Service. See INDORSEMENT OF ADDRESS.

Adeling, Ethling, or Edling [adelan, Sax.], noble, excellency. A title of honour among the Anglo-Saxons, properly belonging to the king's children.—Spelm. Glos.

Ad ea que frequentius accidunt jura adaptantur. Wing. 216.—(The laws are adapted to those cases which more frequently arise.)

Ademption [fr. adimo, Lat.], revocation; a taking away of a legacy, i.e., if a testator, after having given a legacy by his will, alienate the subject of it during his life, it is an ademption. —Ambl. 402; 2 Wms. Executors, 7th ed., 1320—1339. See SATISFACTION.

Ad feodi firmam. To fee farm.—Fleta, lib. ii. c. 50, s. 30.

Ad filum aquæ. To the thread or centre line of the stream.

Ad filum viæ. To the centre of the way or road.

Ad finem, abbrev. ad. fin. [Lat.] (at, or near to the end).

Adiation, a term used in the laws of Holland for the application of property by an executor. See Knapp's Privy Council Rep., vol. i., p. 107.

Ad idem, tallying in the essential point.

A digniori fieri debet denominatio et resolutio. Wing. 265.—(The title and exposition ought to be made from that which is the more worthy.)

Ad infinitum (without limit).

Ad inquirendum, a judicial writ commanding inquiry to be made of anything relating to a cause in the Superior Courts.—Reg. Judic.

Ad interim (in the meantime).

Adiratus, a price or value set upon things stolen or lost, as a recompense to the owner.—Cowel.

Adjournment [fr. jour, Fr., a day], a putting off to another time or place, a continuation of a meeting from one day to another. The adjournment of a trial in the High Court is in the discretion of the Judge by Order XXXVI., Rule 21.

As to proceeding in either House of Parliament the Lords frequently adjourn 'during pleasure,' which means that the Lord Chancellor or other speaker of the House may, in the exercise of his discretion, take his seat on the woolsack, two other peers being present, and cause business to proceed at any hour within the day on which such adjournment 'during pleasure' takes place, otherwise their Lordships' House will stand adjourned to the usual hour on the following day; but usage has fixed five o'clock p.m. as the time for resuming after an adjournment 'during pleasure.' The Commons, on the contrary, always adjourn to a time specified. The adjournment of one House is no adjournment of the other. In Committee, to move that the Chairman report progress is equivalent to moving that the debate be then adjourned. All unfinished proceedings during an adjournment remain in statu quo. A member who moves the adjournment of a debate, or is addressing the House at the time of adjournment, is said to be in possession of the House, and can speak again when the sittings are resumed. When Committees of the whole House adjourn, however, this rule does not prevail.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Adjournamentum est ad diem dicere, seu diem dare. 4 Inst. 27.—(An adjournment is to appoint a day, or to give a day.) Hence the form 'Eat sine die.'

Adjournment-day, a further day appointed by the judges at the Nisi Prius sittings to try issues in fact which were not then ready for trial. See NOTICE OF TRIAL.

Adjudication, giving or pronouncing a judgment, sentence, or decree. In Bankruptcy Law, adjudication is the act of the Court declaring a person to be bankrupt. In Scotch Law it is used to express the 'diligence' by which land is attached in security and payment of a debt, or by which a feudal title is made up in a person holding an obligation to convey without procuratory or precept. There is thus (1) the adjudication for debt; (2) the adjudication in security; and (3) the adjudication in implement.—Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Adjudication contra Hæreditatem Jacentem. When a debtor's heir apparent renounces the succession, any creditor may obtain a decree cognitionis causâ, the purpose of which is that the amount of the debt may be ascertained so that the real estate may be adjudged.—Scotch Law.

Adjudication in implement. See ADJUDICATION.

Adjudication in debitum fundi. See ACTION FOR POUNDING OF THE GROUND.

Adjunction. When a thing belonging to one is attached or united to that which belongs to another, whether by inclusion, soldering, sewing, construction, writing, or painting, the whole generally becomes the property of the latter.—Civil Law.

Adjuncts, additional judges.

Adjunctum accessorium, an accessory or appurtenance.

Ad jura regis, a writ which was brought by the king's clerk, presented to a living, against those who endeavoured to eject him, to the prejudice of the king's title.—Reg. of Writs, 61.

Adjuration, a swearing or binding upon oath.

Adjustment [fr. adjuster, Fr., to make even] of a loss, the settling and ascertaining the amount of the indemnity which the assured, after all allowances and deductions made, is entitled to receive under the policy, and fixing the proportion which each underwriter is liable to pay.—Marshall, 4th ed., 499, and see Manley Hopkins on Average, 3rd ed.

Adjuvari quippe nos, non decipi beneficium oportet. D. 13, 6, 17, s. 3.—(For we ought to be favoured, not deceived, by a benefit.) In illustration of this maxim, see Blackmore v. The Bristol and Exeter Railway Company, 8 E. & B. 1035, 1050—1.

Adlamwr [ad-lam-gwr, Cym., one returning], a proprietor who, for some cause, entered the service of another proprietor without agreement, and left him after the expiration of a year and a day, was liable to the payment of thirty pence to his patron.—Welch Law.

Ad Lapidem, Stoneham in Hampshire.

Ad largum (at large), used in the following and other expressions: title at large, assize at large, verdict at large, to vouch at large, etc.—Cowel.

Adlegiare [fr. aleier, Fr.], to purge of a crime by oath.—Brompt. Chron. c. 4 & 13.

Ad longum, at length.

Admanuensis, persons who swore by laying their hands on the book.—Old Law Books.

Admeasurement, Writ of. It lay against persons who usurped more than their share, in the two following cases:—admeasurement of dower, where the widow held from the heir more land, etc., as dower, than rightly belonged to her; and admeasurement of pasture, which lay where any one having common of pasture surcharged the common.—Termes de la Ley.

Ad melius inquirendum. A writ directed to a coroner commanding him to hold a second inquest. See Reg. v. Carter, 45 L. J. Q. B. 711.

Adminicle, aid, help, or support, 1 Edw. IV. c. 1. In the Scotch Law, it is a term used in the action of proving the tenor of a lost deed, and applicable to any deed tending to establish the existence or terms of the deed, which is lost. In the Civil Law it means imperfect proof.

Adminicular evidence, explanatory or completing testimony.

Administration, the giving or supplying of something.

The disposing of an intestate's property.

The body of ministers appointed by the Crown to carry on the government of the country.

Administrator, he to whom the goods and effects of a person dying intestate, or without executors appointing, accepting, or surviving, are committed by the Probate Court (now the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty, division of the High Court of Justice, Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34). By the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, 'Administration shall comprehend all letters of administration of the effects of deceased persons, whether with or without the will annexed, and whether granted for general, special, or limited purposes.' The following are limited administrations:—Administration durante minori etate, is granted where an infant is entitled to administration, or is made sole executor. The grant is made to the duly appointed guardian of the infant for his use and benefit until he attain the age of twenty-one years, when it ceases. Administration durante absentia is granted when the next person entitled to the grant is beyond sea, lest the goods perish or the debts be lost. Administration pendente lite is granted where a suit is commenced in the Probate Court concerning the validity of a will or the right to administration, until the suit be determined, in order that there may be somebody to take care of the testator's estate. Administration cum testamento annexo is granted when there is not any executor named in the will, or if a person be named who is incapable, or one who refuses to act. Administration de bonis non is granted when the first administrator dies before he has fully administered. An ancillary administration, so called because it is subordinate to the original administration, is granted for collecting the assets of foreigners. It is taken out in the country where the assets are situated. Consult Williams on Executors and Administrators. As to the administration of the effects of naval persons, see 28 & 29 Vict. c. 111; and as to civil servants of the Crown, see 31 & 32 Vict. c. 90. The act which abolishes forfeiture for treason and felony enables the Crown to appoint administrators of the estate of convicts (33 & 34 Vict. c. 23).

The Registrars of County Courts may receive applications for letters of administration for transmission to the Probate Court in certain cases where the estate does not exceed £100. (36 & 37 Vict. c. 52; 38 & 39 Vict. c. 27.) See DEBTS, EXECUTORS.

Admiral [supposed to be derived from Amir al bahir, Arab. commander of the sea or fleet], an officer having high command in the Royal Navy. An admiral has two subordinate commanders under him, a vice-admiral and rear-admiral, distinguished into three classes by the colour of their flags, white, blue, and red. The admiral carries his flag at the main-topmast head, the vice-admiral at the fore-topmast head, and the rear-admiral at the mizen-topmast head.

Admiralty, the Executive Department of State which presides over the naval forces of the kingdom. The normal head is the Lord High Admiral, but in practice the functions of the Great Office are discharged by several Commissioners, of whom one is the Chief, and is called the First Lord. He is assisted by other Lords and by various Secretaries.

Admiralty. The Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division of the High Court of Justice, was, as far as relates to Admiralty, formerly called the High Court of Admiralty and was held before the Judge of the Admiralty who formerly sat as deputy of the Lord High Admiral of England until that office was put into commission, and afterwards as deputy of the Lords Commissioners. The Judge now holds his appointment of the Crown as a Judge of the High Court of Justice. There are two divisions of the jurisdiction of the Admiralty branch of the High Court—the Prize Court and the Instance Court. In the Prize Court the Judge has jurisdiction, by virtue of a commission issued under the Great Seal, at the beginning of every war, to proceed upon all and all manner of captures, seizures, prizes, and reprisals of ships and goods which are or shall be taken, and to hear and determine according to the course of the Admiralty and the Law of Nations. In the Instance Court, also, the jurisdiction exercised by the Judge is conferred by a commission under the Great Seal. This is a municipal tribunal, it is a court of record, and its decrees and orders for the payment of money have the same effect as other judgments of the Supreme Court. It has jurisdiction in cases of private injuries to private rights arising at sea, or intimately connected with maritime subjects. Its jurisdiction in cases of torts is confined to wrongs committed at sea, or at least on the water within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty. Such are suits for—

(1) Assaults and batteries committed on the high seas.

(2) Collision of ships. (For which there is also remedy in the other divisions of the High Court of Justice (Jud. Act, 1875, Sched. 1, Ord. IV. 2.)

(3) Restitution of possession of a ship where there is no bond fide claim to withhold her; and

(4) Piratical and illegal takings at sea.

In cases of contract, its jurisdiction is confined to those of a maritime nature, as—

(1) Between part owners of a ship. The Chancery division of the High Court of Justice has a concurrent jurisdiction in this case.

(2) Mariners' and officers' wages. (Also recoverable by action in the other divisions of the High Court of Justice, or before a magistrate.)

(3) Pilotage.

(4) Bottomry and respondentia bonds.

(5) Salvage (which is the compensation to be made to persons by whose assistance a ship or her freight, or loading, has been saved from impending peril, or recovered after actual loss), and those relating to wreck. Salvage is also recoverable by action in the other divisions, or by summary hearing before magistrates or the Cinque Port Commissioners.

(6) Whenever any ship is under arrest by process issuing from this Court of Admiralty, or when the proceeds of any ship having been so arrested have been brought into the Registry, the Court has jurisdiction to take cognizance of all claims and causes of action of any person in respect of any mortgage of such ship, and to decide any suit instituted by any such person in respect of any such claims or causes of action respectively. (3 & 4 Vict. c. 65.)

By the Admiralty Court Act, 1861, s. 11, this jurisdiction is extended to the Court in cases where the ship is not under arrest, and a registered mortgagee may now himself institute a suit in the ordinary way, and arrest and detain the ship.

(7) By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, the Court has jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands whatsoever, in the nature of towage, for services rendered to any ship or sea-going vessel, whether within the body of a country or upon the high seas.

(8) The same act, s. 6, gave the Court jurisdiction to decide all claims and demands for necessities supplied to any foreign ship, and to enforce payment.

(9) By the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, ss. 103 & 105, the Court has also jurisdiction to punish for carrying illegal colours.

The proceedings in this Court (which sits at Westminster) are greatly conformable to the civil law, in conjunction with marine customs. The Court of Admiralty was entirely reconstructed, its practice improved, and civil jurisdiction extended by the 3 & 4 Vict. cc. 65, 66, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 10, and 27 & 28 Vict. c. 25. Serjeants, barristers-at-law, attorneys, and solicitors, by the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 6 were admitted to practice there. The practice in this Division of the High Court of Justice is substantially the same as in the other Divisions, the former rules, where not expressly varied, being for the present still in force (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 70). See the various titles relating to procedure and practice.

Proceedings in Admiralty may be in rem or in personam. By the first, the property in relation to which the claim has arisen, or the proceeds thereof, may be made available to meet the claim. The property is arrested on a warrant from the Court, which is issued on filing a præcipe for a warrant, and an affidavit in support of the claim. Upon the arrest of a ship, her apparel, and furniture, bail may be accepted for her value, and intermediate earnings, and for the return of the vessel into the hands of the claimant, if the Court should ultimately adjudge the possession to him, or for the amount of the claim.

The Judge of the former Court of Admiralty entertains questions of Admiralty Law in this Division of the High Court (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 5), with power to refer matters to a divisional Court. (Ib., ss. 40, 42, 44). An appeal lies to the Court of Appeal. (See Jud. Acts, 1873 & 1875.)

This Court formerly had cognizance of all crimes and offences, committed either upon the sea or on the coasts, out of the boundary or extent of any English county, until the 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 35, establishing 'The Central Criminal Court enacted by its 22nd section that with a view to speedy justice, it should be lawful for the judges to be appointed by the commissions to be issued under the authority of the act, or any two or more of them, to inquire of, hear, and determine any offence committed or alleged to have been committed on the high seas and other places within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty of England, etc.

There is a Court of Admiralty in Ireland; but the Scotch Court was abolished by 1 Wm. IV. c. 69. Vice-Admiralty Courts exist in many of our colonies. Consult Williams and Bruce's Admiralty Practice. See PRIZE COURT.

From a Vice-Admiralty Court an appeal lies to the Sovereign in Council.

As to the jurisdiction of the Admiralty in the colonies, see 12 & 13 Vict. c. 96; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 88; and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 10. By the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, Admiralty jurisdiction was conferred on the County Courts. See also 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51. Similar powers may be given by Order in Council to any inferior Court having civil jurisdiction (Jud. Act, 1873, ss. 88—91).

Admiralty Acts Repeal Act (28 & 29 Vict. c. 112). This act repeals a number of enactments relating to the powers of the Admiralty, the protection of the Royal Dockyards, naval and marine pay and pensions, and wills or property of deceased officers, seamen, and marines.

Admiralty, Droits of. See DROITS OF ADMIRALTY.

Admissions in evidence, concessions of certain facts by an opponent.

Admission of a clerk by the bishop, when a patron of a church has presented him to it. It is, in fact, the ordinary's declaration that he approves of the presentee to serve the cure of the church to which he is presented. —Co. Litt. 344 a.

Admittance, giving possession of a copyhold estate. It is of three kinds: (1) Upon a voluntary grant by the lord, where the land has escheated or reverted to him. (2) Upon surrender by the former tenant. (3) Upon descent, where the heir is tenant on his ancestor's death.—Wood, b. 2, c. 1.

Admittendo clerico, a writ of execution upon a right of presentation to a benefice being recovered in quare impedit, addressed to the bishop or his metropolitan, requiring him to admit and institute the clerk or presentee of the plaintiff.—Reg. Orig. 33 a.

Admittendo in socium, a writ for associating certain persons, as knights and other gentlemen of the county, to justices of assize on the circuit.—Reg. Orig. 206.

Admonition, a judicial or ecclesiastical censure or reprimand.

Admortization, the reduction of property of lands or tenements to mortmain, in the feudal customs.—Encyc. Lond.

Ad Murum, Walthow or Walton.

Ad officium justiciariorum spectat, unicuique coram eis placitanti justitiam exhibere. 2 Inst. 451.—It is the duty of justices to administer justice to every one pleading before them.

Adnichiled [fr. nihil, Lat.], annulled, cancelled, made void.—28 Hen. VIII.

Adolescence, the period between 12 in females and 14 in males till 21 years of age.

Adoption, an act by which a person appoints as his heir the child of another. There is not any law of adoption in this country. Sand. Just., 5th ed., 39 et seq.

Adoptive Act of Parliament, an act which comes into operation within a limited area upon being adopted, in manner prescribed therein, by the inhabitants of that area. Amongst the many 'adoptive acts,' the more important are, the Act for the Better Regulation of Vestries, 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 60, the Baths and Washhouses Act, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 74, and the Public Libraries Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 55.

Ad ostium ecclesiæ (Dower). Where a tenant in fee-simple of full age, openly at the church door (where all marriages were formerly celebrated) after affianced and troth plighted between them, endowed his wife with the whole or such quantity of his land as he pleased, specifying and ascertaining the same; on which the wife, after her husband's death, might have entered without further ceremony. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 105, s. 13.

Ad Pontem, Pantown in Lincolnshire.

Adpromissor, an accessory to a promise; in order to give a stipulator greater security, he guaranteed the fulfilment of a promise.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 348.

Ad proximum antecedens fiat relatio nisi impediatur sententiā. Jenk. Cent. 180.—(Let relation be made to the nearest antecedent, unless it be prevented by the context.)

Ad quem [Lat.], to whom. See JUDEX AD QUEM.

Adquieto, payment.—Blount.

Ad questiones facti non respondent iudices; ad questiones legis non respondent juratores. Co. Litt. 295.—Judges do not answer questions of fact; juries do not answer questions of law.

Ad quod damnum, a writ which ought to be issued before the Crown grants further liberties, as a fair, market, etc., which may be prejudicial to others; it is addressed to the sheriff, to inquire what damage it may do to grant a fair, market, etc. It is also used to inquire of lands given in mortmain to any house of religion, etc.—Termes de la Ley, 26.

Adrectare, to do right, satisfy, or make amends.—Gerve Doroberen, anno 1170.

Ad recte docendum oportet primum inquire nomina, quia rerum cognitio a nominibus rerum dependet. Co. Litt. 68.—(In order rightly to teach a thing, inquire first into the names; for a knowledge of things depends upon their names.)

Adrogation, the adoption of an impubes, i.e., a male under 14, and a female under 12 years old.

Adscripti vel adscriptitii glebæ, a kind of slaves, among the Romans, attached to and transferred along with the land which they cultivated.

Adstipulator, an accessory party to a promise, who received the same promise as his principal did, and could equally receive and exact payment; or he only stipulated for a part of that for which the principal stipulated, and then his rights were co-extensive with the amount of his own stipulation.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 348.

Ad terminum qui preterit, a writ of entry, which lay for a lessor or his heirs, where a lease of premises had been made for life or years, and after the term had expired the premises were withheld from the lessor or his heirs, by the tenant or other person in possession of them; but now by the 4 Geo. II. c. 28, if a tenant for life, or years, or person holding under him, shall wilfully hold over after the expiration of a notice in writing, given by the landlord, and after demand of possession, the tenant will be liable to double the yearly value, for so long a time as he detains the premises, to be recovered by an action of debt. And by the 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 21, it is enacted, that if a tenant give notice of his intention to quit the premises (which need not be in writing), and do not deliver up possession at the time mentioned in his notice, he or his executors or administrators will be liable to pay double rent, to be recovered by the landlord, either by distress or action at Law.

Ad tunc et ibidem [Lat.] (then and there).

Adulteration, the corrupt production of any article, especially food; indictable at common law (see R. v. Dixon, 3 M. & S. 11). The adulteration of bread, corn, meal, or flour, is made a statutory offence by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 37. Besides the earlier statutes of 9 Anne c. 12, 56 Geo. III. c. 58, ss. 2, 3, and 1 Wm. IV. c. 64, s. 13, the adulteration of food and drugs was specially restrained and punished by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 84, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 121, s. 24; and (as to Ireland) by 33 & 34 Vict. c. 26, s. 3. These latter have, however, been repealed by the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63).

By this Act the mixing or the sale 'to the prejudice of the purchaser' with knowledge of adulterated food or drugs, is subject for a first offence to a fine, and for a second to imprisonment with hard labour, and a fine is also imposed on the sale in certain cases of food or drugs not of the quality demanded by the purchaser (unless a label is given, showing the article to be mixed with other matters), or the abstracting a part of any article of food so as to injuriously affect it. Provision is made for the appointment and duties of analysts, and the proceedings necessary to obtain an analysis. Proceedings before justices are allowed on the certificate of an analyst, which is to be prima facie evidence; an appeal being given to quarter sessions. Justices in the Court of First Instance or on appeal are allowed to obtain a further analysis. Punishment is imposed for the forgery of certificates or warrants under the Act. There is also a special provision in reference to tea. The act is amended by the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act, 1879, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 30, the principal provision of which, passed in consequence of conflicting decisions in England and Scotland (see Hoyle v. Hitchman, 4 Q. B. D. 236), is that in a prosecution for a sale 'to the prejudice of the purchaser' it is no defence to allege that the purchase was for the purpose of analysis.

As to the adulteration of seeds, see 32 & 33 Vict. c. 112, and 41 Vict. c. 17.

Adulterine, the issue of an adulterous intercourse.

Adulterine guilds, traders acting as a corporation without a charter, and paying a fine annually for permission to exercise their usurped privileges.—Smith's Wealth of Nations, b. i. c. 10.

Adulterium, a fine imposed for the commission of adultery.

Adultery [ad. Lat., and alter, another person], anciently termed Advoltry (quasi ad alterius thorum). The sin of incontinence between two married persons, or it may be where only one of them is married, in which case it may be called single adultery to distinguish it from the other, which has sometimes been called double. This offence is only punishable by ecclesiastical censure and penance, pro salute anime et reformatione morum; the temporal courts do not take any cognizance of it as a public wrong. It is by these courts considered only as a civil injury.

By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, which created a Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, a husband can obtain a dissolution of his marriage upon the ground of his wife's adultery, and a wife can obtain a judicial separation on the ground of her husband's adultery, or a dissolution of marriage on the ground of his adultery, coupled with cruelty or desertion, or bigamy, or of his incestuous adultery, provided there be no collusion or connivance, and that the alleged charges have not been condoned. By s. 33 of the same act, a husband may claim damages from an adulterer (who, in ordinary circumstances must be made a co-respondent, s. 28) to be assessed by a jury, and the Court has power to direct in what manner the damages shall be paid, and that the whole or any part thereof shall be settled for the benefit of the children, or the wife. See further HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Where a man finds another in the act of adultery with his wife, and kills him or her, in the first transport of passion, he is only guilty of manslaughter, and that in the lowest degree; but the killing of an adulterer deliberately and upon revenge, is murder.—Russ. on Crimes, 4th ed., Vol. I., 786.

The husband of an adulteress is relieved from the obligation to support her, though he himself have committed adultery, and was the first offender.

The word is also used by ecclesiastical writers to describe the intrusion of a person into a bishopric during the former bishop's life. The reason of the appellation is, that a bishop is supposed to contract a sort of spiritual marriage with his church.

Adurni portu, de, Etherington, or Ederington.

Ad valorem, a term used in speaking of the duties or customs paid on certain goods; the duties on some articles are paid by the number, weight, measure, tale, etc., and those on others are paid ad valorem—that is, according to their value. The term is used also of stamp duties, which, in many cases, are payable according to the value of the subject matter of the particular instruments or writings.

Advance [fr. avancer, Fr., to push forwards, fr. avant, Fr., avante, It., ab ante, Lat.], money paid before it is due; increase.

Advancement, promotion; additional price. To the doctrine of resulting trusts there is a very important exception, for in Equity, where a purchase is made in the name of a wife or child, or of an illegitimate child, grandchild, or nephew of a wife, to whom the purchaser has placed himself in loco parentis, there will prima facie be no resulting trust for such purchaser, but, on the contrary, a presumption arises that an advancement was intended, pursuant to the obligation to provide for such relations. And a purchase by a parent in the joint names of himself and his child, as well as a purchase in the joint names of his child and a stranger, will be held an advancement for the child to the extent of the interest vested in him; the stranger, however, holding the estate vested in him in trust for the parent. The father's entering into, and keeping possession, and taking the rents and profits of the purchased property, or the son's giving receipts in the name of the father, will not prevent the presumption of advancement from arising, especially where the son is advanced but in part. Where, however, a son is fully advanced, the father's entry into possession, and into the receipt of the rents or profits of property purchased in his son's name, may be considered as evidence of a trust.

The presumption of advancement may be rebutted by evidence of facts, showing the parent's intention, that the son should take property, purchased in his name, as a trustee, and not for his own benefit. Such facts, however, must have taken place antecedently to, or contemporaneously with, the purchase; or immediately after it, so as to form, in fact, part of the same transaction; for subsequent facts will not be admissible in evidence to show an intention against the presumption of advancement.

This presumption may also be rebutted by evidence of parol declarations of the father made contemporaneously with the purchase, but not by any of his declarations made subsequently to it; but these may be used in evidence against him by the son. A fortiori, parol evidence may be given by the son to show the intention of the father to advance him; for such evidence is in support as well of the legal interest of the son as of the equitable presumption.

It is to be remarked, that if the parent and another person pay the money, it will not be deemed an advancement, for the child being a trustee for the latter, he will be held to be trustee for them both.

Advent, a coming to; also the month preceding the anniversary of the nativity of Jesus Christ. It begins on the Sunday that falls either upon St. Andrew's Day, the 30th November, or next to it, and continues till the feast of Christmas Day.—Blount.

Adventitious, that which comes unexpectedly or incidentally.

Ad ventrem inspicendum [to inspect the womb]. See DE VENTRE INSPICIENDO.

Adventure [fr. advenire, Lat., to come to], the sending to sea of a ship or goods at the risk of the sender.—Lex. Merc.

Adventure, bill of, a writing signed by a merchant, stating that the property in goods shipped in his name belongs to another, to the adventure or chance of which the person so named is to stand, with a covenant from the merchant to account to him for the produce.

Adversaria [adversa, things remarked or ready at hand], rough memoranda, commonplace books.

Adversary, a litigant-opponent.

Adverse possession, occupancy, as against the person rightly entitled, of realty without molestation, which may at length ripen into an unimpeachable title. As to adverse possession, see Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, which provides that no person shall make an entry or distress, or bring an action to recover any land or rent, but within twelve years next after the time when the right first accrued. See also Nepean v. Doe, 2 M. & W. 910, and 2 Smith's L. C.

Advertisement [fr. avertissement, Fr.], a public notice or announcement of a thing. The duties payable on advertisements were repealed by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 63, s. 5.

Advertising for stolen or lost property. See STOLEN GOODS.

Advertising an apology for libel. See LIBEL.

Advertising as to betting. See 37 Vict. c. 15, s. 3, whereby penalties are imposed.

Advertising vehicles, prohibition of in metropolitan thoroughfares. 16 & 17 Vict. c. 33, s. 16.

Advice [fr. avis, Fr., avviso, It., avise, Old Eng.], view, opinion, counsel; also, the instruction usually given by one merchant or banker to another by letter, informing him of bills or draughts drawn on him, with particulars of date, or sight, the sum, and the payee. Bills presented for acceptance or payment are frequently dishonoured for want of advice.

Advisement, deliberation.

Ad vitam aut culpam, an office which is to determine only by the death or delinquency of the holder, or which is, in fact, held quamdieu se bene gesserit (so long as he conducts himself properly).—Jacob.

Advocate [Lat. Tyman getyman, Ang. Sax.], to defend, to call to one's aid, also to vouch, to warranty.—Anc. Laws of England.

Advocate [Lat. Advocatus], a patron of a cause assisting his client with advice, and pleading for him.—Spel. Glos. He is defined by Ulpian (Dig. 50, tit. 13) to be any person who aids another in the conduct of a suit or action.

In the English Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts, until 1857, certain persons learned in the civil and canon law, called advocates, had the exclusive right of acting as counsel. They were members of a college situate at Doctors' Commons, incorporated by charter, June 22, 8 Geo. III., under the title of 'The College of Doctors of Law exercent in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts,' and had, previously to their admission to that college, taken the degree of Doctor of Laws at an English university. The jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in matters matrimonial and testamentary was in 1857 transferred to the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes and the Court of Probate respectively. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 15; c. 77, ss. 40—42. By ss. 116 and 117 of the latter act, the College of Doctors of Law, etc., was empowered to sell its real and personal estate, and to surrender its charter. See BARRISTER.

In Scotland all counsel are called advocates.

Advocate, Lord, the principal Crown Lawyer in Scotland, and one of the great Officers of State of Scotland. It is his duty to act as public prosecutor; but private individuals injured may prosecute upon obtaining his concurrence. He is assisted by a Solicitor-General and four junior counsel, termed advocates-depute. He has the power of appearing as public prosecutor in any court in Scotland, where any person can be tried for an offence, or in any action where the Crown is interested but it is not usual for him to act in the inferior courts, which have their respective public prosecutors, called procurators-fiscal, acting under his instructions. He does not, in prosecuting for offences, require the intervention of a grand jury, except in prosecutions for treason, which are conducted according to the English method. The Lord Advocate is virtually Secretary of State for Scotland.

Advocate, Queen's, a member of the College of Advocates, appointed by letters patent, whose office is to advise and act as counsel for the Crown in questions of civil, canon, and international law. His rank is next after the Solicitor-General.

Advocates, Faculty of, the bar of Scotland in Edinburgh. The solicitors practising in Aberdeen also use the name of 'Advocates.' The Faculty of Advocates in Edinburgh is coeval with the institution of the College of Justice in Scotland, in 1532. The Library of the Faculty is one of those entitled to a copy of every printed book (5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, s. 8). The Dean of Faculty is elected from their number to preside at their meetings. Formerly the Dean of Faculty and the two Crown lawyers (the Lord Advocate and Solicitor-General) were the only persons who took precedence at the Scottish bar, independently of seniority; but the practice has lately been introduced of appointing the two ex-Crown lawyers, as well as the Crown lawyers for the time, Queen's Counsel. As to the stamp duty payable upon an advocate being called to the bar of England or Ireland, see 37 & 38 Vict. c. 19. As to the admission of advocates as solicitors in England, see 35 & 36 Vict. c. 81.

Advocati, patrons of churches.—Blount.

Advocatia, the quality, function, privilege, or territorial jurisdiction of an advocate.—Civil Law.

Advocati fisci, advocates of the revenue among the Romans.

Advocation, a process by which an action was carried from an inferior to a superior court in Scotland. By the Court of Session Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 100), s. 64, the process of advocacy is abolished, and appeals are substituted.

Advocatione decimarum, a writ which lay for tithes, demanding the fourth part or upwards, that belonged to any church.—Reg. Orig. 29.

Advocatus est, ad quem pertinet jus advocacy alicujus ecclesie, ut ad ecclesiam, nomine proprio, non alieno possit presentare. Co. Litt. 119.—A patron is he to whom appertains the right of presentation to a church, in such a manner that he may present to such a church in his own name, and not in the name of another.

Advocatus diaboli, the advocate who argues against the canonization of a saint.

Avow, or Avow, or Avouch [under the feudal system, when the right of a tenant was impugned, he had to call upon his lord to come forward and defend his right. This, in the Latin of the time, was called advocare, Fr. voucher à garantir, to vouch or call to warrant. As the calling the lord of the fee to defend the right of the tenant involved the admission of all the duties implied in feudal tenancy, it was an act jealously looked after by the lords, and advocare, or the equivalent, Fr. avouer, to avow, came to signify the admission by a tenant of a certain person as feudal superior. Finally, with some grammatical confusion, the words advocare, and avow or avouch, came to be used in the sense of performing the part of the vouchee, or person called on to defend the right impugned. Wedgw.], to justify or maintain an act, e.g., one distrains for rent, and he that is distrained brings an action of replevin; if the distrainer, in his defence, justify or maintain his act, he is said to advow or avow, and his plea is called avowment or avowry. See AVOWRY.

It also signifies to call upon or produce—thus, anciently, where stolen goods were bought by one and sold to another, it was lawful for the right owner to take them wherever they were found, and he in whose possession they were found was bound to produce the seller to justify the sale, and so on, till they found the thief.—Old Nat. Br. 43.

Advowee, or Avowee, the person or patron who has a right to present to a benefice.—Fleta, lib. v. c. 14.

Advowee paramount, the sovereign, or highest patron.

Advowson [fr. advocare, Lat.], a right of presentation to, or the patronage of, a church or spiritual living; the person possessed of this right or patronage being called the patron or advocate (patronus aut advocatus), on account of his obligation to protect and defend the privileges of the particular benefice. An advowson is in the nature of a temporal property and spiritual trust. For the origin and history of advowsons, consult Mirehouse on Advowsons, pp. 1—6.

There are several kinds of advowsons, viz:—

(i.) Presentative advowsons, subdivided into,

(a) Appendant.

(β) In gross, and

(γ) Partly appendant, and partly in gross.

(ii.) Donative advowsons.

(iii.) Collative advowsons.

A presentative advowson appendant is a right of patronage annexed to the possession of some corporeal hereditament. Thus, where an advowson has immemorially passed to—gether with a real or imputed manor by a simple grant of such manor, without particularly referring to the advowson, it is then said to be appendant, i.e., annexed to the demesnes of such manor, which subsist perpetually.

A presentative advowson in gross is a right of patronage self-subsistent, belonging to the patron as an individual, and not in anywise appendant to a corporeal inheritance.

While a few advowsons were originally in gross, as when the right originated in an agreement that a builder of a certain church and his heirs should be its patrons ratione fundationis, yet the greater number of them was primarily appendant, becoming by subsequent circumstances severed in gross.

The severance may take place in several modes:—(1) when the corporeal inheritance is conveyed away, with a special reservation of the advowson; (2) when the advowson is granted away, and not the corporeal inheritance to which it was incident; (3) when the patron presents to it as though it were already severed. An advowson once completely and unconditionally severed, can never again become appendant. But should an advowson be disappended conditionally, as in the case of a mortgage, it will reunite when the loan is repaid. So, if the advowson be excepted in a lease of the corporeal inheritance, it remains in gross during the lease, but upon its expiration it becomes appendant again. These instances, however, are rather suspensions than severances.

A disappancy created by a wrongful act, may be done away with by defeating such act; and should it be effected by operation of law, the appendancy will be preserved unless otherwise expressly intended.

A presentative advowson may be partly appendant and partly in gross; thus, when the owner grants to another every second presentment, for then the advowson will be appendant for the grantor's turn, and in gross for that of the grantee. And should the advowson appendant, and that in gross be afterwards possessed by the same person, still the advowson will be appendant for one turn, and in gross for the other. So, if three persons be seised of a manor with a presentative advowson appendant, and two of them release their right of the patronage to the third, he then become seised of two-thirds of the advowson as in gross and of the unsevered third as appendant; but upon the death of this third person, the entire advowson will devolve in gross upon his heirs or devisee.—Mirehouse on Advowsons, 20.

A donative advowson is a spiritual preferment, not presentable, conferred by the royal letters-patent upon the founder of a church or chapel, to be visited by the founder and not the bishop or ordinary.

The deed of donation gives to the parson possession without any presentation, institution, or induction.

The donee or person taking a donation must be a priest in holy orders by episcopal ordination; must read the morning and evening prayers according to the Book of Common Prayer within two months after his donation, or in case of an impediment to be allowed of by the ordinary, within one month after its removal, together with the form of giving assent and consent thereto; must before his admission subscribe to the declaration of conformity to the liturgy before the archbishop, bishop, or ordinary, or his vicar-general, chancellor, or commissary; if the donative have a parish church belonging to it, he must take a certificate under the hand and seal of the person before whom he subscribed his assent, and afterwards read the same in the parish church; must subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles before the bishop, if the donative be a benefice with cure; must read the Thirty-nine Articles, and assent thereto within two months, or at the time when he reads the services, as already mentioned, if the benefice be with cure; and, within three months after subscribing to the declaration, he must read the bishop's certificate of his subscription, and again make the same declaration within his parish church.—Mirehouse on Advowsons, 23—25.

It is the better opinion that where this kind of advowson is once presented to, it ceases to be donative.—Id.

A donative advowson never lapses, unless by the terms of the foundation, or by act of parliament, it is subject to lapse (1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 10, ss. 6 and 7); but the bishop may compel the patron to fill the benefice by ecclesiastical censure. The complete dominion over the vacant benefice, and the freehold in it, remain in the patron, together with the right to take the intermediate profits until it is again granted by him to a new incumbent. The right of donation always devolves upon the real representatives of the patron, and never devolves upon the Crown, when the incumbent is promoted to a bishopric. The resignation of a donative must be to the patron.

A collative advowson arises when a bishop has the right of patronage, either originally or by lapse. Collation is the conferring of a benefice by a bishop. It is an immediate institution without any presentation, and is completed by the induction of the collatee. Where a bishop collates and dies before induction, the Crown presents as having in its custody the temporalities of the vacant advowson.

A presentative advowson may be sold and conveyed in fee, fee-tail, for life, for years, for the next presentation, or any number of future presentations. It may be limited in possession, reversion, or remainder, and held in joint-tenancy, tenancy in common, or coparcenary. It is also subject to curtesy and dower, and, being deemed assets for the payment of debts (except during an actual vacancy), may be sold by an order of the Court of Chancery. An advowson in gross cannot be extended under an elegit, because it is not susceptible of being valued, but it is chargeable in Equity under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 13.

The alienation of an advowson may result (1) from some wrongful act, as an usurpation (or, as the civil law calls it, an intrusion), which prevents the patron from presenting for that turn only (7 Anne, c. 18), or a disseisin, the disseisor presenting before the person disseised; (2) from operation of law, as dower, curtesy, and descent-cast; or (3) from the conveyance of the proprietor, either expressly by granting it, or incidentally by a transfer of the corporeal inheritance to which the advowson is appendant, as it passes under the word 'appurtenances,' except in the case of the Crown, when it will not pass without particular words or express mention of it (17 Edw. II. c. 15; 1 Inst. 307 a); for nothing will pass by a royal grant, but that which is clearly and explicitly intended.

So a right to present to a future avoidance may be expressly aliened by the same means. An avoidance is either in deed, upon the incumbent's death, or in law, upon resignation, plurality, deprivation, incapacity, union, or simony. An actual vacancy can never be granted, unless by the Crown, for this would be simony.

All ecclesiastical persons seised of advowsons in right of their churches, all masters and fellows of colleges, and guardians of hospitals, seised in right of their houses, are restrained from making any grants of things incorporeal, such as advowsons, or appropriations, and next avoidances which lie in grant; such grants are void against their successors, although good against the grantors during their own time.—1 Eliz. c. 19; 13 Eliz. c. 10.

The patrons of united churches (1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, s. 15 et seq.; and 4 & 5 Vict. c. 39, s. 23), have several rights, for though there be but one advowson, yet every patron has the whole advowson in his turn, since the patronage remains as before, though by the union the incumbency of one church is extinguished; and though the incumbency of the churches is united, the tithes, boundaries, moduses, and profits continue as before, for there can be no union of parishes, though there be of churches.

The patron of the most valuable church has the first presentment, and a subject-patron of the benefice of the greatest value has his turn before the sovereign patron of a lesser church.—Com. Dig. tit. 'Advowson' F. 2.

As no change is made by union in the rights of patronage, which are reserved to the patrons, the advowsons continue as before, both in their nature and right.—Mirehouse on Advowsons, c. 6.

As to the exchange of advowsons, see 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, s. 73, and 4 & 5 Vict. c. 39, s. 22. As to the sale of advowsons held by or in trust for parishioners and others forming a numerous class, see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 50. By the Lord Chancellor's Augmentation Act, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 120, the Lord Chancellor is authorized to sell the numerous advowsons specified in the schedule to that act, the proceeds to be applied in the augmentation of benefices and otherwise. As to the union of contiguous benefices in cities, towns, and boroughs, see 23 & 24 Vict. c. 142.

Advowson of religious houses. Where persons founded any house of religion, they had thereby the advowson or patronage of them.—Kennett's Paroch. Antiq. 147, 153.

Advowson of the moiety of a church. Where there are two several patrons, and two several incumbents, in one and the same church, the one of the one moiety, and the other of the other; or, where two must join in the presentation, and there is but one incumbent, as where there are two parsonages, and they agree to present by turn, yet each of them has but a moiety of the church.—Co. Litt. 17 b; and see 7 Anne, c. 18.

Æbudæ, the Hebrides or Western Isles of Scotland.

Ædificare in tuo proprio solo non licet quod alteri noceat. 3 Inst. 201.—(It is not permitted to build upon one's own land that which may be injurious to another.)

Ædificatum solo, solo cedit. Co. Litt. 4 a.—(That which is built upon the land goes with the land.)

Æfesn [Pasnagium or Pannagium, Lat.], the remuneration to the proprietor of a domain for the privilege of feeding swine under the oaks and beeches of his woods.

Æglesburgus, Ailesbury in Buckinghamshire.

Ægyld, or Agyld, or Orgyld [inultus, Lat.], uncompensated, unpaid for, unavenged. From the participle of exclusion, a, æ, or ex (Goth.), and Gild, payment, requital.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Egyptians, commonly called Gypsies. See GYPSIES.

Æhlip, transgression of the law.—Ancient Inst. Eng.

Æhte-swan [Servus Porcarius, Lat.], a swine-herd, from 'æht,' possessio pecus, and 'swan' (Old Norse or Icelandic, sveinn), a servant.—Ibid.

Ælmsfeoh, or Ælmsfeoh, Peter pence, which used to be paid to the Pope.

Æquitas est correctio legis generaliter late, quâ parte deficit. Plowd. 375, quoting Aristotle.—(Equity is a correction of law when too general, in the part in which it is defective.)

Æquitas est correctio quedam legi adhibita, quia ab ea abest aliquid propter generalem sine exceptione comprehensionem. Plowd. 467, quoting Aristotle, Nic. Eth. Book 5.—(Equity is a certain correction applied to law, because on account of its general comprehensiveness, without an exception, something is absent from it.)

Æquitas est perfecta quedam ratio quæ jus scriptum interpretatur et emendat: nullâ scripturâ comprehensa, sed solâ ratione consistens. Co. Litt. 24.—(Equity is a sort of perfect reason which interprets and amends the written law; comprehended in no code, but depending on reason alone.)

Æquitas est quasi equalitas. Co. Litt. 24.—(Equity is as it were equality.)

Æquitas nunquam contravenit leges.—(Equity never counteracts the laws.)

Æquitas sequitur legem. Gilb. 186.—(Equity follows law.) See illustrations of this maxim in Haynes' Outlines of Equity, 3rd ed., 26—30.

Æquum et bonum est lex legem. Hob. 224.—(That which is equal and good is the Law of Laws.)

Æra, or Era, a fixed point of chronological time, whence any number of years is counted; thus, the Christian Era began at the birth of Christ, and the Mohammedan Era at the flight of Mohammed from Mecca to Medina. The derivation of the word has been much contested.

The difference between the terms æra and epoch is, that æras are certain points fixed by a people or nation, and epochs are points fixed by chronologists and historians. The idea of an æra comprehends also a succession of years proceeding from a fixed point of time, and the epoch is the point itself.—Koch's History of Europe, Introd; Encyc. Lond.

Ærie [fr. æria accipitum, Lat.], an airy or nest of goshawks.—Spel. Glos. Digitized by Google Æstimatio capitis [pretium hominis [Lat.], fines paid for offences committed against persons according to their degree and quality, by estimation of their heads, ordained by King Athelstane.—Cress. Ch. Hist. 834.

Æstimatio præteriti delicti ex postremo facto nunquam crescit. Bacon.—(The weight of a past offence is never increased by a subsequent fact.)

Ætate probanda, a writ which inquired whether the king's tenant holding in chief by chivalry, was of full age to receive his lands. It was directed to the escheater of the county. Now disused.—Reg. Orig. 294.

Ætheling, a noble, though generally signifying a prince of the blood.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Affairs, a person's concerns in trade or property.

Affectio tua nomen imponit operi tuo. Co. Litt. 177.—(The affection of a person gives a name to his work.)

Affectum, challenge-propter.—See JURY. Affectus puniatur licet non sequatur effectus.—9 Co. 55.—(The intention is punished, although the consequence does not follow.)

Affeerors [fr. afeurer, or afferer, Fr., to tax, fr. forum, Lat., a market], persons who, in court-leets, upon oath, settle and moderate the fines and amercements imposed on those who have committed offences arbitrarily punishable, or that have no express penalty appointed by statute. They are also appointed to moderate fines, etc., in courts-baron.—Cowel.

Affiance [fr. fidem dare, Lat.], the plighting of troth or promise between a man and woman, upon agreement of marriage.—Termes de la Ley, 27; Litt. s. 39.

Affidare, to plight faith, or give or swear fealty, i.e., fidelity.—Blount.

Affidari [seu affidari ad arma, Lat.], to be mustered and enrolled for soldiers upon an oath of fidelity.—MS. Dom de Farendon, 22, 55.

Affidatio dominorum, an oath taken by the lords in parliament.—Ibid.

Affidatus, a tenant by fealty, a retainer.—Blount.

Affidavit [fr. affidare, M. Lat., to pledge one's faith, fr. fides, Lat.], a written statement sworn before a person having authority to administer an oath.

By the practice of the Supreme Court of Judicature, all evidence is, as a rule, to be given viva voce; but this may be altered by agreement of the parties, or the Court or a Judge may order for sufficient reason order that any particular fact or facts may be proved by affidavit or that the affidavit of any witness may be read at the hearing on trial on such conditions as are thought reasonable; provided that no such order be made where a witness can be produced and is bond fide required for cross-examination (Jud. Act, 1875, Sched. I., Ord. XXXVII., Rule 1). Affidavits must be confined to such facts as the witness is able of his own knowledge to prove, except on interlocutory motions, on which statements as to his belief, with the grounds thereof, may be admitted.

As to time for filing affidavits see Ord. XXXVIII., Rule 1).

Any affidavit may be sworn to either in print or in manuscript, or partly in print and partly in manuscript (Jud. Act, 1875, Sched. I., Ord. LVI., Rule 3).

Where the above rules do not state anything to the contrary, the practice previously existing in reference to affidavits is still applicable (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 73). As to the former practice, see Daniell's Cham. Prac., 4th ed., 824—37, and Day's C. L. P. Acts, 3rd ed., 19 et seq.; 385, 485.

By the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 42, provision is made for the appointment of commissioners to take affidavits in Scotland and Ireland. By the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 42, s. 1, affidavits may be made abroad before any British ambassador, envoy, minister, chargé d'affaires, secretary of embassy or of legation, British Consul or consular agent. An affidavit may be sworn abroad in a foreign language provided there be an affidavit verifying a translation of it. See also AFFIRMATION and COMMISSIONER.

Affidavit of Increase. See INCREASE.

Affidavit Office in Chancery, abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, ss. 27 & 29, and its duties transferred to the Clerks of Records and Writs.

Affidavit to hold to bail. By 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 3, it was provided that upon an affidavit of the existence of a debt to the amount of 20*l.* or upwards, and that a defendant was about to quit England, it was made lawful for any plaintiff to apply to a judge to hold such defendant to bail. But now, by the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 6, this power can only be exercised where the debt amounts to 50*l.* or upwards, and where it can be shown that the defendant's absence from England will materially prejudice the plaintiff in the prosecution of his action.

Affiliation, the fixing any one with the paternity of a bastard child, and the obligation to maintain it. The process is regulated by the Bastardy Acts, 1872 and 1873, the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, & 8 Vict.

c. 101, ss. 4—8, and 8 Vict. c. 10. See BASTARD, and Saunders on Affiliation.

Affinage [purgatio metalli, Lat.], refining metal, hence fine and refine.—Blount.

Affinitas affinitatis, the connection which has neither consanguinity nor affinity, as, the connection between a husband's brother and his wife's sister.

Affinitas dicitur, cum duce cognationes, inter se divise, per nuptias copulantur et altera ad alterius fines accedit. Co Litt. 157.—(It is called affinity, when two families, divided from one another, are united through marriage, and either approaches the confines of the other.)

Affinity, relationship by marriage between the husband and the blood relations of the wife, and between the wife and the blood relations of the husband.—1 Bl. Com. 434.

Affinity is distinguished into three kinds.

(1) Direct, or that subsisting between the husband and his wife's relations by blood, or between the wife and the husband's relations by blood. (2) Secondary, or that which subsists between the husband and his wife's relations by marriage. (3) Collateral, or that which subsists between the husband and the relations of his wife's relations.

Affirm, to ratify or confirm a former law or judgment.—Cowel.

Affirmance, the confirmation of a voidable act.

Affirmant, a person who solemnly affirms, instead of taking an oath.

Affirmanti, non neganti, incumbit probatio.—(The proof lies upon him who affirms, not upon him who denies.)

Affirmation, a solemn declaration without oath; an indulgence at first confined to the people called Quakers, and Moravians (9 Geo. IV. c. 32, s. 1; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 49), and afterwards extended to Separatists (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 82), who, in giving evidence either in civil or criminal cases, in lieu of an oath, may make a solemn affirmation that what they say is true. False affirmations are liable to the penalty of perjury. 9 Geo. IV. c. 32; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. cc. 49 & 82; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 77; C. L. P. Act, 1854, s. 20; and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 25 (Scotland). The privilege of affirming without an oath is now extended to all persons who object to take an oath. See 16 & 17 Vict. c. 125, s. 20; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 66; 31 & 32 Vict. c. 72; and particularly the Evidence Amendment Act, 1869, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, s. 4 (extended by 33 & 34 Vict. c. 49, s. 1), under which persons having no religious belief were first allowed to affirm, the former statutes having applied only to persons prevented by religious belief from taking an oath.

The Act of 1869, however, does not apply to promissory oaths, e.g., to the oath directed by the Parliamentary Oaths Act, 1866, as amended by the Promissory Oaths Act, 1868, to be taken by members of parliament (Clarke v. Bradlaugh, 7 Q. B. D. 38).

Affirmative pregnant, an assertion implying a negation.

Affirmativum negativum implicat.—(An affirmation implies a negative.)

Afforare, to set a price or value on a thing. See AFFEEERS.—Blount.

Afforatus, appraised or valued, as things vendible in a fair or market.—Ibid.

Afforciare, Afforce, to add, increase, or make stronger; in case of disagreement of the jury, let the assize be increased, which is an afforcement of the assize.—Ibid.

Afforest, to turn ground into a forest. Chart. de Forest, c. 1.

Affranchise, to make free.

Affray [fr. effrayer, Fr., to affright], a skirmish or fighting between two or more persons; there must be a stroke given or offered, or a weapon drawn, otherwise it is not an affray. It is a public offence, and is so called because it affrights persons. It differs from an assault in that it is a wrong to the public, while an assault is of a private nature.—1 Hawkins, P. C. 154.

Affreightment [fr. fret, Fr.], the freight or lading of a ship.—Cowel. See CHARTER-PARTY.

Affri, or Affra, bullocks, horses, or beasts of the plough.—Ibid.

Aforesaid, already mentioned.—Plowd. 67.

Aforethought, prepense, premeditated.

A fortiori [by so much stronger (reason), Lat.]. It is thus applied:—A private person, and à fortiori, a peace officer (it being his especial duty), who is present at the commission of a felony, is bound by the law to arrest the felon, on pain of fine and imprisonment.—2 Hawk. P. C. 74.

Africa, Coast of. By 6 & 7 Vict. c. 13, amended by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 121, provision is made for the government of British settlements on the coast of Africa.

African Company, a company which, under a charter of Charles II., enjoyed an exclusive trade from the port of Saltee, in South Barbary, to the Cape of Good Hope, both inclusive, with all the islands near to those coasts. Several statutes passed, placing their trade upon a new footing, but the 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 28, abolished the company and annulled all the grants made to them; under it the Crown took possession of their forts and castles, and the trade was thrown open.

Afremath, the second crop of grass or pasture.

Agalma [ἄγαλμα, Gr.], an impression or image of anything on a seal.—Cowel.

Agard, award.

Age, the criminal responsibility of males and females, and their power to do certain acts, depend upon their age. Thus in criminal matters, a person of the age of fourteen may be capitally punished for any capital offence, but under the age of seven he cannot. The period between seven and fourteen is subject to much uncertainty; the rule applicable to it depends upon the infant's capacity to discern good from evil; if he could, then the maxim is, malitia supplet etatem (malice supplies the want of age), and he may be convicted and executed. A male at twelve years old may take the oath of allegiance, at fourteen is at years of discretion, so far at least that he may enter into a binding marriage, or consent or disagree to one contracted before, and at twenty-one he is at his own disposal, and may alien his lands, goods, and chattels. A female at twelve is at years of maturity, and may enter into a binding marriage, or consent or disagree to one contracted before, and at twenty-one may dispose of herself and all her property. Full age in male or female is twenty-one years, which age is completed on the day preceding the twenty-first anniversary of a person's birth. As to marriage settlements by male of twenty or female of seventeen, see MARRIAGE SETTLEMENT.—1 Co. Litt. 78; Bro. Abr. 'Age.'

The Roman Civil Law divides age thus:—

I. Infantia, from birth to seven years.

II. Pueritia. { (a) Ætas infantie proxima, ma, from 7 to 10½.
(b) Ætas pubertati proxima, ma, from 10½ to 14.

III. Pubertas, from 14 upwards. During infantia and ætas infantie proxima, a person was not punishable for any crime. During ætas pubertati proxima, a person was liable, if doli capax. At pubertas, a person became fully responsible.—Tayl. C. L. 254 et seq.

Agency, deed of, a revocable and voluntary trust for payment of debts.—Consult Lewin on Trusts.

Agenfrida, the true lord or owner of anything.—Cowel.

Agenhina, Agenhine, a guest at an inn, who, having stayed there for three nights, was then accounted one of the family.—Ibid.

Agent, a person appointed to transact the business of another.—Dyche.

Agents may be divided into three classes:—

I. Commercial, as—

(a) Auctioneers.

(b) Brokers.

(c) Factors.

- (d) Consignees.
- (e) Supercargoes.
- (f) Ships'-husbands.
- (g) Masters of Ships.
- (h) Partners.

II. For the purpose of litigation, as—

- (a) Attorneys at Law.*
- (b) Solicitors in Equity.*
- (c) Proctors in the Spiritual, Probate, and Divorce Courts.*

III. Social, as—

- (a) Attorneys in fact.
- (b) Servants.

It is a general Common Law rule, that where an authority is given to two or more persons to do an act, the act binds the principal only when all of them concur in doing it; for the authority is construed strictly, and the power is deemed to be joint, unless expressed to be several.

But a more liberal construction in favour of commercial transactions is admitted, for, if a joint consignment be made to two factors (whether partners or not) each possesses the whole power over it, but such joint-factors are co-obligers, and, as such, are jointly accountable and answerable for one another in solido.—Story's Agency, 38. Consult Sm. Merc. Law, 8th ed., 104 et seq. As to the punishment of frauds by agents, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 75 et seq.

Agent and patient, when the same person is the doer of a thing and the party to whom done; thus, when a widow endows herself of the best part of her husband's possessions, this being the act of herself to herself, she is both agent and patient. Again, if one be indebted to another, and afterwards the debtor makes the creditor his executor, the creditor may retain out of the testator's assets as much as will satisfy the debt; by such retainer he is both agent and patient.—8 Rep. 118, 138. Obsolete.

Agentes et consentientes, pari poenâ plectentur. 5 Co. 80.—(Acting and consenting parties are liable to the same punishment.)

Age-prier, or prayer [atatis precatio, Lat.], to pray age; thus, when an action is brought against a minor for the recovery of lands, which he possesses by descent, he petitions or moves the Court to stay the action until he attain his majority, which is generally acceded to.—Termes de la Ley, 30.

Aggravation, the increase of the enormity of a wrong. Matters of mere aggravation, that is, which tend only to increase the amount of damages, and do not constitute the right of action itself, need not be traversed in pleading. In a count, for example, charging a trespass in pulling down a house, it is mere matter of aggravation to state that the plaintiff was in it at the time.

Aggravated Assaults on females and boys under fourteen, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 42—3 (replacing certain sections 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, an act expressly passed 'for the better prevention of aggravated assaults upon women and children'), which allow justices to give a convicted offender six months imprisonment with hard labour (the maximum term for a common assault being two months), and to bind him over to keep the peace.

Aggregate, a collocation of individuals, units, or things, in order to form a whole.

Aggressor, the beginner of a quarrel or dispute.

Agild [sine mulctâ, Lat.], free from penalties, not subject to customary fines or impositions.—Blount.

Agiler [fr. a gilt, Sax., without fault], an observer or informer.—Ibid.

Agillarius, a hey-ward, herd-ward, or keeper of cattle in a common field, solemnly sworn at the lord's court. There were two sorts, one of the town or village, another of the lord of the manor.—Ken. Paroch. Antiq. 534, 576.

Agio [aggio, Ital., an exchange of money for a premium], a term used to express the difference in point of value, between metallic and paper money or between one sort of metallic money and another.—McCull, Com. Dict.

Agiotage, a speculation on the rise and fall of the public debt of states, or the public funds. The speculator is called agioteur.

Agist [fr. gisement, Fr., a bed or resting place], to take in and feed strangers' cattle in the Royal Forest, and to collect the money due for it.—Manw. Forest Laws, cc. 11—80.

Agistatio animalium in foresta, the drift or numbering of cattle in the forest.—Ibid.

Agisters, or Gist Takers (called also Agistators), officers appointed to look after cattle, etc.—Ibid.

Agistment [fr. jacere, Lat., gésir, Fr., to lie, whence giste, lodging], the taking in of other men's cattle into pasture-land, at a certain rate per week; so called, because the cattle are suffered ayiser, i.e., to be levant et couchant there. Also the profit of such feeding. Agistment of sea banks [terre agistata, Lat.], where lands are charged with a tribute to keep out the sea.

Agnates, agnati, or adgnati, relations derived per virilis sexus personas, i.e., relations by the father's side as distinguished from cognati, relations by the mother's. An agnate is related by generation; thus, my son, brother, paternal uncle, and their children, as also my daughter and sister, are agnated to me. See Smith's Dict of Antiq.—Cognate.

Agnation, kinship by the father's side.

Agnomen, a name derived from some notable personal circumstance, as the name Africanus, borne by the two Scipios on account of their victories over the Carthaginians.—Cum. C. L. 170.

Agnomination, a sur-name.

Agnus Dei (Lat.), a piece of white wax, in a flat, oval form, like a small cake, stamped with the figure of a lamb, and consecrated by the Pope.—Cowel.

Agraria lex. The Agrarian law was enacted to distribute among the Roman people all the lands which they had gained by conquest, and to limit the quantity of land possessed by each person to a certain number of acres.—Cicero pro Leg. Agr.; Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

An agrarian law was clearly developed in the regulations of the Jewish lawgiver, who, following the example of the Egyptians, made agriculture the basis of the state. He accordingly apportioned to every citizen a certain quantity of land, and gave him the right of tilling it himself, and of transmitting it to his heirs. The person who had thus come into possession could not alienate the property for any longer period than the year of the coming jubilee—a regulation which prevented the rich from coming into possession of large tracts of land, and then leasing them out in small parcels to the poor. See Graves on the Pentateuch.

Agreed. This word in a deed creates a covenant.

Agreement [fr. gratus, Lat., acceptable; aggregatio mentium, Lat.], a joining together of two or more minds in anything done or to be done. Also, the effect of a joint-consent of two or more parties to a contract or bargain. There are three sorts:—(1) An agreement executed at once, as where money is paid for the matter agreed, or other satisfaction made, at the time it is entered into. (2) An agreement after an act done by another, as where one does a thing and another afterwards agrees to it, this is also called an executed agreement. (3) An agreement executory, or to be performed at some future time.—Termes de la Ley, 31; Plowd. 5. See CONTRACT.

Agri, arable lands in common fields.—Fortescue.

Agri limitati, lands belonging to the state by right of conquest, and granted or sold in plots.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 98.

Agricultural (Children) Act, 1873, 36 & 37 Vict. c. 67. This Act made regulations with respect to the employment of children under ten years of age. It was repealed by the Elementary Education Act, 1876, 39 & 40 Vict. c. 76, but its principal provisions were in effect re-enacted thereby. There is an exemption of children between 8 and 10 from restrictions of the Education Act, in reference to operations of husbandry, under s. 9, sub. 3 of that Act.

Agricultural fixtures, see FIXTURES.

Agricultural Gangs Act, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 130. This act, after reciting that in certain counties in England certain persons known as gangmasters hire children, young persons, and women, with a view to contracting with farmers and others for the execution on their lands of various kinds of agricultural work, enacts certain regulations to be observed by gangmasters, and requires them to obtain licenses. Amended as to children by the Agricultural Children Act, 1873, ante.

Agricultural Holdings (England) Act, 1875. By this Act provision is made for tenants (whose tenancies commenced after the commencement of the Act, i.e., after February 14th, 1876) obtaining, on the determination of their tenancies, compensation from their landlords for improvements to the soil, roads, fences, buildings, etc., and otherwise of the holding, and for the application of manure to the same, the amount of compensation varying according to a certain classification provided by the Act, subject to certain deductions. In case the landlord and tenant cannot agree, the amount is to be settled by a reference, the procedure in which is provided for by the Act. There is an appeal in certain cases to the County Court if the award is for more than 50*l*. The Act also contains provisions giving the tenant a property in fixtures, and substituting one year's notice for half a year's notice, as the notice necessary to determine a tenancy from year to year. The provisions of the Act do not interfere with freedom of contract between the landlord and the tenant, and as a matter of fact, the operation of the Act is very limited.

Agusadura, in ancient customs, a fee, due from the vassals to their lord for sharpening their ploughing tackle. Anciently, the tenants in some manors were not allowed to have their agricultural implements sharpened by any but those whom the lord appointed; for which an acknowledgment was paid, called agusadura or agusage, which some take to be the same with what was otherwise called rullage, from the ancient French reille, a ploughshare.—Encyc. Lond.

Agweddi, [ag-gweed, conjunction], a portion given with a bride.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Aid of the King [auxilium regis, Lat.], the king's tenant prays this, when rent is demanded of him by others. A city or borough, holding a fee-farm from the king, if anything be demanded which belongs to such fee-farm, may pray in 'aid of the king,' and the king's bailiffs, collectors, or accountants, shall have aid of the king. The proceedings are then stayed until the Crown counsel are heard, but this aid will not be granted after issue, because the Crown cannot rely upon the defence made by another.—Jenk. Cent. 64; Termes de la Ley, 35.

Aid Prayer, formerly made use of in pleading for a petition in Court, praying in aid of the tenant for life, etc., from the reversioner or remainder-man, when the title to the inheritance was in question. It was a plea in suspension of the action.—Com. Dig. 'Aide,' B. 5; 3 Bl. Com. 300.

Aiders, advocates, abettors. See ACCESSARY.

Aids [fr. aides, Fr.; auxilia, Lat.], originally mere benevolences granted by a tenant to his lord, in times of distress, but at length the lords claimed them as of right. They were principally three: (1) To ransom the lord's person, if taken prisoner; (2) To make the lord's eldest son and heir apparent a knight; (3) To give a suitable portion to the lord's eldest daughter on her marriage. Abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24. Also, extraordinary grants to the Crown by the House of Commons, and which were the origin of the modern system of taxation.—2 Bl. Com. 63, 64.

Aiel, or Aile [fr. aioul, Fr.; avus, Lat., a grandfather], a writ which lay when a man's grandfather, or great grandfather (called be-saile), died seised of lands in fee-simple, and on the day of his death the heir was dispossessed of his inheritance by a stranger.—F. N. B. 222.

Aillt [aill, other], a villain.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Ainsty, a district on the south-west of the city of York, annexed thereto 27 Hen. VI., and subject to the Lord Mayor and Corporation under the name of the county of the city of York.—Gorton's Topographical Dictionary.

Air. As to the right to the enjoyment of air free and unpolluted, see Gale on Easements, and 2 Br. & Had. Com. 12, 40.

Airway, a passage for the admission of air into a mine. To maliciously fill up, obstruct, or damage, with intent to destroy, obstruct, or render useless the airway to any mine, is a felony punishable by penal servitude or imprisonment at the discretion of the Court. 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 28.

Al, or ald [eald, Sax., age]. This syllable prefixed to the names of places denotes antiquity, as Aldborough, i.e., Old Borough, Aldeburgh, Aldworth, Aldgate, etc.—Blount.

Ala Campi, Wingfield.

Alæ ecclesiæ, the wings or side aisles of a church.—Blount.

Alænus, the river Ax, in Devonshire.

Alanerarius, a manager and keeper of dogs for the sport of hawking; from alanus, a dog known to the ancients. A falconer.—Blount.

Alauna, Alnwick in Northumberland; also Alcester in Warwickshire.

Alba, a surplice or white sacerdotal vest, anciently worn by officiating priests.—Blount.

Alba firma. When quit-rents payable to the Crown by freeholders of manors were reserved in silver or white money, they were called white-rents or blanch-farms, reditus albi, in contradistinction to rents reserved in work, grain, etc., which were called reditus nigri, black-mail.—2 Inst. 19.

Albinatus jus, the droit d'aubaine in France, whereby the king, at an alien's death, was entitled to all his property, unless he had peculiar exemption. Repealed by the French laws in June, 1791.

Albo Monasterio, De, Whitechurch.

Albrea and Albericus, Aubrey.

Albom, white rent paid in silver. See ALBA FIRMA.

Albus Liber, an ancient book containing a compilation of the law and customs of the City of London. It has lately been reprinted by order of the Master of the Rolls.

Alcade, a judicial officer in Spain.

Alder, the first, as alder best is the best of all; alder liefest, the most dear.—Blount.

Alder Carr, land covered with alders.—Norfolk phrase.

Alderman [ealdorman, Ang.-Sax., fr. eald, old, ealdor, a parent]. Originally the word was synonymous with 'elder,' but was also used to designate an earl, and even a king. In the latter days of Anglo-Saxon sovereignty, under Ethelred and his son Edward, the dignity of ealdorman reached its highest point, from which it rapidly descended, their functions being either suppressed or exercised by officials under other denominations, until the once great name remained alone to that civic magistrate, of whom the earliest traces are, perhaps, to be found in the time of Edward the Confessor.—Spel. Glos. The word is now confined to the class of municipal officers in a borough next in order to the mayor. The Municipal Corporation Act, 1835, 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76, which gave aldermen no special duties of any importance, enacted that they should be in number, one-third of the number of the councillors, should remain 6 years in office, and be elected by the councillors, but not necessarily from amongst the councillors; and this enactment is repeated by s. 14 of the Consolidating Act of 1882. See MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.

Alderney, one of the islands in the English Channel, which formed part of the Duchy of Normandy, and was annexed to the English Crown by the first princes of the Norman line. These islands are governed by their own laws, chiefly collected in the book called 'Le Grand Coustumier.' As to Alderney Harbour, see 37 & 38 Vict. c. 92.

Alditheleia, De, Audley.

Ale. See ALE-HOUSE, and see LICENSE.

Alea, the chance of gain or loss in a contract.—Civil Law.

Aleatory contract, an agreement of which the effects, with respect both to the advantages and losses, whether to all parties, or to some of them, depend on an uncertain event.—Ibid.

Alecinarium, a hawk, called also a lanner.

Ale-conner, or Ale-kenner [gustator cerevisie, Lat.], one who kens or knows what good ale is; an officer appointed at a court-leet, who is sworn to look at the assize and goodness of ale and beer within the precincts of the lordship.—Kitch. 46. There were at one time four ale-conners, chosen by the liverymen of the City of London, in Common hall, on Midsummer-day, whose office it was to inspect the measures used in public-houses.—Encyc. Lond.

Ale-founder. SEE ALE-CONNER.

Ale-house, a place where ale is sold to be drunk on the premises where sold. Such a house, commonly called also a public-house, has for a long time, by a series of acts consolidated in 1828, by 9 Geo. IV. c. 61, required a license from justices of the peace as well as an excise license; whereas the houses called beer houses, first established in 1830 by Geo. IV. & Wm. IV. c. 30, required an excise license only until the passing of the Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869. See INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Ale Silver, a rent or tribute paid annually to the Lord Mayor of London, by those who sell ale within the liberty of the city.—Antiq. Purvey, 183.

Ale-stake, a maypole or long stake driven into the ground, with a sign on it for the sale of ale.—Cowel.

Ale-taster. See ALE-CONNER.

Alfet, a cauldron into which boiling water was poured, in which a criminal plunged his arm up to the elbow and there held it for some time, as an ordeal.—Du Cange.

Algarum maris, probably a corruption of Laganum maris, lagan being a right, in the middle ages, like jetsam and flotsam, by which goods thrown from a vessel in distress became the property of the king or the lord on whose shores they were stranded.—Spel. Jacob and Du Cange.

Alia enormia [Lat.] (other wrongs). A declaration in trespass sometimes concluded thus:—'and other wrongs to the plaintiff then did,' etc. This was technically called an allegation of alia enormia.

Aliamenta, a liberty of passage, open way, water-course, etc., for the tenant's accommodation.—Kitch.

Alias (otherwise), a second or further writ, which was issued after a first writ had expired without effect.—Cowel. Abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 10.

Alias (dictus) (otherwise called), a second name applied to a person where it is doubtful which of two names is his real name.—Dyer, 50.

Alibi (elsewhere). It is a defence resorted to where the party accused, in order to prove that he could not have committed the crime with which he is charged, offers evidence that he was in a different place at the time the offence was being committed.—Encyc. Lond. This defence, necessarily, is not confined to criminal trials.

Alien [fr. alienigena, alibi natus, Lat.], a child of a foreign father, born in a foreign country, or in the United Kingdom before the naturalization of his father. At common law aliens were subject to very many disqualifications, the nature of which will appear from the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 66, which greatly relaxed the law in their favour. It provided, inter alia, that every person born of a British mother should be capable of holding real or personal estate; that alien friends might hold every species of personal property, except chattels real; that subjects of a friendly power might hold lands, etc., for the purposes of residence or business for a term of years not exceeding twenty-one years; and it also provided for aliens becoming naturalised. This act has (along with many others) been repealed by The Naturalisation Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 14), which enacts (subject to certain provisos) that real and personal property of every description may be taken, acquired, held, and disposed of by an alien in the same manner in all respects as by a natural-born British subject, and that a title to real and personal property of every description may be derived through, from, or in succession to an alien, in the same manner in all respects as through, from, or in succession to a natural-born British subject. The act also enables naturalized aliens to divest themselves of their status in certain cases, and enables British-born subjects to resign their claim to be regarded as such. The act also, while it enables British subjects to renounce allegiance to Her Majesty, provides for their re-admission to British nationality, and contains enactments with respect to the national status of women and children. An alien is no longer entitled to be tried by a jury de medietate lingue (s. 5). An alien is disqualified both for the parliamentary and municipal franchise, and also, by 12 & 13 Wm. III. c. 2, for being a member of either house of parliament, or of the Privy Council.

Alien Act, 33 Geo. III. c. 4, a temporary act passed in 1793, whereby any particular alien might be ordered by Royal Proclamation to depart the realm, or might be forcibly expelled. A similar, though not so stringent, temporary statute, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 20, was passed in 1848, and revived for a period of 3 years by the Prevention of Crime (Ireland) Act 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 25, s. 15.

Alien ami, or amy, a subject of a nation which is at peace with this country.

Alien enemy, a subject of a nation which is at war with this country.

Alien nee, a man born an alien.

Alienage, the state of an alien.

Alienate, or Aliene, to transfer property.

Alienation, a transferring property to another.—Co. Litt. 118.

Alienigena est alienæ gentis, seu alienæ ligeantie qui etiam dicitur peregrinus, alienus, exoticus, extraneus, etc. 7 Co. 16.—(An alien is of another nation or another allegiance, who is also called a stranger, foreigner, etc.)

Alienatio, i.e., alienum facere; vel, ex nostro dominio in alienum transferre; sive, rem aliquam in dominium alterius transferre. Co. Litt. 118.—(Alienation, that is, to make alien, or to transfer from one ownership to that of another, or to transfer anything into the power of another.)

Alienatio licet prohibeatur, consensu tamen omnium, in quorum favorem prohibita est, potest fieri, et quilibet potest renunciare juri pro se introducto. Co. Litt. 98.—(Although alienation be prohibited, yet, by the consent of all in whose favour it is prohibited, it may take place; for it is in the power of any man to renounce a law made in his own favour.)

Alienatio rei præfertur juri accrescendi. Co. Litt. 185.—(Alienation is favoured by the law rather than accumulation.)—Broom.

Alienation office, a place to which all writs of covenants and entries were carried for the recovery of fines levied thereon.

Alienee, one to whom a transfer of property is made.

Alieni juris, under another's authority.

Alienor, one who transfers property.

Aliment [fr. alimentum, Lat.], a fund for maintenance,—alimony.—Scotch Term.

Alimentorum appellatione venit victus, vestitus, et habitatio. 2 Inst. 17.—(Under the expression of aliments come food, clothes, and lodging.)

Alimony [fr. alimonia, Lat.], the allowance made to a wife out of her husband's estate for her support, either during a matrimonial suit, or at its termination, when she proves herself entitled to a separate maintenance, and the fact of a marriage is established. But she is not entitled to it if she elope with an adulterer, or wilfully leave her husband without any just cause for so doing.

It is of two kinds; (a) In causes between husband and wife. The husband is obliged to allow his wife alimony during the suit, and this whether the suit be commenced by or against him, and whatever its nature may be. It is usually about one-fifth of the husband's net annual income, and will be reduced according to fluctuations of income. The wife may apply for an increase if his means have improved. (b) Permanent alimony, which is allotted to a wife after final decree. Alimony is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. The Court may direct its payment either to the wife herself or to any trustee on her behalf. With regard to permanent provision for a wife, after a decree dissolving the marriage has been pronounced, the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 32, enacts that the Court may, on a decree for dissolving marriage, order the husband to secure to the wife such gross sum of money, or such annual sum of money for any term not exceeding her own life, as, having regard to her fortune, (if any), to the ability of the husband, and to the conduct of the parties, it shall seem reasonable. See Browne on Divorce.

The procedure of the Divorce Court, which is now part of one of the Divisions of the High Court of Justice, remains unaltered by the Judicature Acts. See Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. LXII.

A l'impossible nul n'est tenu.—(There should not be any obligation to the impossible.)

Alio intuitu, with a collateral motive, a motive other than the proper and professed one: e.g., when a man brings an action by way of advertising his goods or his character.

Aliquid conceditur ne injuria remaneat impunita, quod alias non concederetur. Co. Litt. 197.—(Something is conceded, which otherwise would not be conceded, lest an injury should remain unpunished.)

Aliquis non debet esse judex in propria causa, quia non potest esse judex et pars. Co. Litt. 141 a.—(A person ought not to be judge in his own cause, because he cannot act as judge and party.)—3 Bl. Com. 59; and Dimes v. Grand Junction Railway Company, 3 H. L. C. 759, where it was decided that the possession, by a judge, of shares in a joint-stock company, party to a suite in which their interest was involved, was a disqualification.

Aliter (otherwise).

Aliter puniuntur ex isdem factionibus servi, quam liberi; et aliter qui quidem aliquid in dominum, parentemve commiserit, quam in extraneum; in magistrum, quam in privatum. 3 Inst. 220.—(Slaves and freemen are punished differently for the same offences; he who has committed an offence against a master or parent is punished otherwise than if he had committed it against a stranger; against a magistrate than if against a private person.)

Aliud actum aliud simulatum.—(The pretence was different from the reality.)

Aliud est celare, aliud tacere.—(To conceal is one thing, to be silent another.)

Aliud esse possidere, aliud esse in possessione. Hob. 103.—(It is one thing to possess, it is another to be in possession.)

Aliunde, from another place or person.

Alkali works. The acts regulating alkali works, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 120,—a temporary act, made perpetual by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 36,—and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 43, are consolidated and amended by the Alkali, etc., Works Regulation Act, 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 37, s. 29 of which defines 'alkali work' as 'every work for the manufacture of alkali, sulphate of soda, or sulphate of potash, in which muriatic acid gas is evolved.'

Allaunds [fr. alanis, Scythie gente, Lat.], hare-hounds.—Cowel.

Alloy, or Alloy [fr. lex, Lat., lega, It., loi, alloy, Fr., law or rule], the mixture of base metals with silver or gold, to increase the weight, in order to defray the charge of coinage, and to make it more fusile to cast. A pound weight of gold, by the present mint standard, is twenty-two carats fine and two carats alloy. A carat weighs four grains. A pound of silver consists of eleven ounces two pennyweights of fine silver, and eighteen pennyweights of alloy.—Lowndes's Essay on Coins, 19. From signifying the proportion of base metal in the coin, the term alloy was applied to the base metal itself.—Wedg.

Allegans contraria non est audiendus. Jenk. Cent. 16.—(A person making contradictory allegations is not to be heard.)

Allegans suam turpitudinem non est audiendus. 4 Inst. 279.—(A person alleging his own infamy is not to be heard.)

Allegari non debuit quod probatum non relevat. 1 Chan. Ca. 45.—(That which, if proved, would not be relevant, ought not to be alleged.)

Allegata, a word anciently subscribed at the bottom of rescripts and constitutions of the Roman emperors, as signata or testata under other instruments.—Encyc. Lond.

Allegata et probata, assertions and facts.

Allegation [fr. alleguer, Fr., legare, allegare, Lat., to depute], an asserted fact; the adduction of reasons or witnesses in support of an argument.

Allegation of faculties, the statement of a person's means. A term formerly used in the Ecclesiastical Courts in proceedings for alimony.

Allegiance [fr. ligo, Lat.], the natural, lawful, and faithful obedience which every subject owes to the supreme magistrate who oversteps not his prerogatives. It is either natural or perpetual, where one is a subject born, or has been naturalized, or local and temporary, where one is merely a resident in the British dominions.—1 Inst. 129 a. It is also either implied, so soon as the relationship of sovereign and subject is created; or express, which is the formal declaration of it.

Allegiance, Oath of. A new form of this oath was substituted for the older form by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 48. A new form was again provided by the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 75, s. 5, and this has in its turn been superseded by the Promissory Oaths Act (31 & 32 Vict. c. 72), by which a new and shorter form is provided.

Allegiare, to defend or justify by due course of law.—Spel.

Aller, superlatively, as aller good is the greatest good.—Blount.

Aller san jour, to go without day, i.e., to be finally dismissed from the Court, because there is no further day assigned for appearance.—Kitch. 146.

Alleviare, to levy or pay an accustomed fine.—Cowel.

All fours, a case agreeing in all its circumstances with another case is sometimes said to be on all fours with it.

Alliance [fr. alleanga, It., alianca, Sp., alliance, of allier, Fr., of alligo, Lat., to tie or unite together], the state of connection with another by confederacy; a league. In this sense our histories mention the Grand Alliance, the Holy Alliance, and others. Also relation by marriage; relation by any form of kindred. The forms and ceremonies of alliance have been various in different ages and countries.—Consult Encyc. Lond.

Allision, the running of one vessel against another. See COLLISION.

Allocation, an allowance made upon accounts in the Exchequer, or rather a placing or adding to a thing.—Encyc. Lond.

Allocacione facienda, a writ allowing to an accountant such sums of money as he has lawfully expended in his office; it is addressed to the Lord Treasurer and the Barons of the Exchequer.—Reg. Orig. 206.

Allocato comitatu, in proceedings in outlawry, when there were but two County Courts holden between the delivery of the writ of exigi facias to the sheriff and its return, a special exigi facias, with an allocato comitatu issued to the sheriff in order to complete the proceedings. See Bac. Abr. OUTLAWRY.

Allocatur (it is allowed), the certificate of the allowance of costs by the master on taxation.—Jacob.

Allocatur exigent, a writ which is issued when an outlaw has not been exacted five times under the exigi facias, in order to complete the number of exactions.

Allodarii, tenants having as great an estate as subjects can enjoy.

Allodial. See ALODIAL.

Allograph, a document not written by any of the parties thereto; opposed to autograph.

Allonge. If there be not room on the back of a bill of exchange to write all the indorsements, the supernumerary indorsements may be written on a slip of paper annexed to the bill and called an allonge, and are then 'deemed to be written on the bill itself.' Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 32, sub. 1. It requires no additional stamp.

Allotment, partition, the distribution of land under an enclosure act, or shares in a public undertaking. See JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

Allotments. Many acts have been passed authorizing parish officers to let out to poor persons small quantities of parish land or land originally allotted under Inclosure Acts for the benefit of the poor. See especially Poor Allotments Management Act, 1873, 36 & 37 Vict. c. 19.

The Allotments Extension Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 80, imposes on trustees of lands vested in them for the benefit of the poor, 'and whereof the rents are distributed in gifts' of money, fuel, clothing, bread, etc., to take proceedings for letting such lands, 'in allotments, to cottagers, labourers, and others,' with a preference to cottagers, etc., living in the parishes where the lands are situate.

Allottee, a person to whom land under an enclosure act or shares in a public undertaking are allotted. See JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

Allowance [fr. locare, Lat., allocare, allogare, It., alogar, Prov., lower, allower, Fr., to place or a-sign], a deduction, an average payment, a portion.

Also in selling goods, or in paying duties upon them, certain deductions are made from their weights, depending on the nature of the packages in which they are enclosed, and which are regulated in most instances by the custom of merchants, and the rules laid down by public offices. These allowances, as they are termed, are distinguished by the epithets, draft, tare, tret, and cloff.

Draft is a deduction from the original or gross weight of goods, and is subtracted before the tare is taken off.

Tare is an allowance for the weight of the bag, box, cask, or other package, in which goods are weighed.

Real, or open tare, is the actual weight of the package.

Customary tare is, as its name implies, an established allowance for the weight of the package.

Computed tare is an estimated allowance agreed upon at the time.

Average tare is when a few packages only among several are weighed, their mean or average taken, and the rest tared accordingly.

Super-tare is an additional allowance or tare where the commodity or package exceeds a certain weight.

The remainder, after the allowance of tare, is called the suttle weight; but if tret be allowed, the remainder is called the net weight.

Tret is a deduction of 4 lb. from every 104 lb. of suttle weight. This allowance, which is said to be for dust or sand, or for the waste or wear of the commodity, was formerly made on most foreign articles sold by the pound avoirdupois; but it is now nearly discontinued by merchants, or else allowed in the price. It is wholly abolished at the East India warehouses in London, and neither tret nor draft is allowed at the Custom-house.

Cloff, or Clough, is another allowance that is nearly obsolete. It is stated in arithmetical books to be a deduction of 2 lb. from every 3 cwt. of the seconduttle, that is, the remainder after tret is subtracted; but merchants, at present, know cloff only as a small deduction, like draft, from the original weight, and this only in the case of two or three articles. See Kelly's Cambist, art. 'London,' and McCull. Comm. Dict.

Alloy. See ALLAY.

Alltud [all-tud, other land], a person either from foreign parts or from another part of the island, in villenage under the king or freeholder.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Alluminor, one who anciently illuminated, coloured, or painted upon paper or parchment, particularly the initial letters of charters and deeds. The word is used in the 1 Rich. III. c. 9.

Alluvion, or Alluvio [fr. alluo, Lat.], land imperceptibly gained from the sea or the river by the washing up of sand and soil, so as to form terra firma.—2 Bl. Com. 261; Res. Cotidianæ Dig. 40, tit. 1, s. 7. See ACCRETION.

Ally. See ALLIANCE.

Almanack [fr. the Arabic particle al, and manach, to count or reckon], a publication, in which is recounted the days of the week, month, and year, both common and particular, distinguishing the fasts, feasts, terms, etc., from the common days by proper marks, pointing out also the several changes of the moon, tides, eclipses, etc. It is part of the law of England, of which the Courts must take notice in the returns of writs, etc., but the almanack to go by is that annexed to the Book of Common Prayer. It is not evidence of the time of sunrise on a particular day.—Tutton v. Darke, 5 H. & N. 647.

Almaria, the archives or muniments of a church or library.—Blount.

Almner, or Almoner, an officer of the royal household, whose business it is to distribute the royal alms. The lord almoner, who is usually now a bishop, had the disposition of the sovereign's dish of meat, after it came from the table, which he might give to whom he pleased. The Marquis of Exeter is hereditary Grand Almoner.—Fleta, lib. ii. c. 22; Co. Litt. 94 a.

Almoim, a tenure of lands by divine service. See FRANKALMOIGNE.

Almonarium, a kind of safe or cupboard in which broken victuals were laid up to be distributed among the poor.—Old Records.

Almodraii, the lords of free manors, lords paramount.—Old Records.

Almonarius [corruption of elemosynarius], a distributor of alms.

Almsfeoh, or Almesfeoh [Sax.], alms-money. It has been taken for Peter-pence, first given to the Pope by Ina, King of the West Saxons, and anciently paid in England on the first of August. It was likewise called romfeoh, romescot, and heorthpening.—Seldom's Hist. Tithes, 217.

Almutium, a cap made of goats' or lambs' skin, the part covering the head being square, and the other part hanging behind to cover the neck and shoulders; worn by priests.—Monast., tom. iii., 36.

Alnage, or Aulnage [fr. aune, Fr., an ell], a measure, particularly the measuring with an ell.—Cowel.

Alnager, or Aulnager, formerly a public sworn officer of the king, who examined into the assize of cloth, and fixed seals to it, and also collected a subsidiary or aulnage duty on all cloths sold (25 Edw. III. st. 4, c. 1). There were afterwards three officers belonging to the regulation of clothing, viz., searcher, measurer, and aulnager.—4 Inst. 31. Alnage duties were abolished in England by 11 & 12 Wm. III. c. 20, and in Ireland by 57 Geo. III. c. 109.

Alnet, De, D'Auney.

Alnetum, a place where alders grow, or a grove of alder trees.—Domesday Book; Co. Litt. 4 b.

Alodial, or Allodial, or Allodium [perhaps fr. odal, Icel.; odel, Dan. Sw., a patrimonial estate. See Wedgw.], a holding of lands in absolute possession without acknowledging any superior lord, contradistinguished from Feudal lands, which are held of superiors.—Cowel. There are not any alodial lands in England, according to Coke.—Co. Litt. 93 a; 1 Hall. Mid. Ages, ch. 2, pt. i., p. 147.

Alodium. See ALODIAL.

Alody, inheritable land.

Alsatia, formerly a cant name for Whitefriars, a district in London, between the Thames and Fleet Street, and adjoining the Temple, which, possessing certain privileges of sanctuary, became for that reason a nest of those mischievous characters who were generally obnoxious to the law. These privileges were derived from its having been an establishment of the Carmelites, or White Friars, founded in 1241. In the time of the Reformation the place retained its immunities as a sanctuary, and James I. confirmed and added to them by a charter in 1608, but all privileges of sanctuary were shortly afterwards abolished by 21 Jac. I. c. 28.

Alta, De, ripa, Dantry.

Alta prodition, high treason; now simply called treason.

Altarage, offering made upon the altar; the profit arising to the priest by reason of the altar.—Termes de la Ley, 39.

Alteration. An alteration vitiates a deed or other instrument, if made in a material part after execution. In the case of deeds, an unexplained alteration is presumed to have been made at the time of execution; but it is otherwise in the case of wills. See 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 21.

Alterius circumventio alii non prebet actionem.—The deceiving of one person does not afford an action to another.—D. 50, 17, 49.

Alternat, a usage amongst diplomatists, by which the rank and places of different powers, who have the same rights and pretensions to precedence, are changed from time to time, either in a certain regular order, or one determined by lot. In preparing treaties and conventions, it is the usage of certain powers to alternate both in the preamble and the signatures, so that each power occupies, in the copy intended to be delivered to it, the first place.—Wheat. Internat. Law, pt. ii., c. 3, s. 4.

Alternativa petitio non est audienda. 5 Co. 40.—(An alternative petition is not to be heard.)

Alternative, the one or the other of two things:—remedy; where a new remedy is created in addition to an existing one, they are called alternative if only one can be enforced; but, if both, cumulative.

Altius non tollendi, a servitude due by the owner of a house, by which he is restrained from building beyond a certain height.—Dig. 8, 2, 4; Sand. Just., 5th ed., 119.

Altius tollendi, a servitude which consists in the right, to him who is entitled to it, to build his house as high as he may think proper. In general, however, every one enjoys this privilege, unless he is restrained by some contrary title.—Civil Law; Sand. Just., 5th ed., 119.

Alto et basso (high and low), an absolute submission of all differences.—Blount.

Altum mare (the high sea).

Alumnus, a child which one has nursed; a foster-child.—Dig. 40, 2, 14; Civil Law. One educated at a college or seminary is called an alumnus thereof.

Amabyr, or Amvabyr, a custom in the honour of Clun, belonging to the Earls of Arundel.—Pretium virginittatis domino solvendum. Abolished.—Cowel.

Amalphitan Code, a collection of sea-laws, compiled about the end of the eleventh century, by the people of Amalphi. It consists of the laws of maritime subjects which were or had been in force in countries bordering on the Mediterranean, and was for a long time received as authority in those countries.

Amanuensis [a manu, Lat.], one who writes on behalf of another that which he dictates.

Ambactus, a servant or client.—Cowel.

Ambassador [legatus, Lat.], a representative minister sent by one sovereign power to another, with authority conferred on him by letters of credence, to treat on affairs of state.—4 Inst. 153. Ambassadors are either ordinary, who reside in the place whither they are sent; or, extraordinary, who are employed upon special matters. The person of an ambassador is protected from civil arrest and his goods from seizure under distress or execution by 7 Anne c. 12. Consult Bac. Abr. 'Ambassador,' or Com. Dig.—This is the highest rank and designation of diplomatic officials. Sovereigns are represented also by ministers at foreign courts, under the name of envoy, minister, chargé d'affaires, or consuls, and the functions of all these are the same as an ambassador, the only difference being in dignity.

Ambassy, an embassy.

Amber, or Ambra, a measure of four bushels.—Introd. Domesd., Vol. I., 133.

Ambidexter, one who plays on both sides. A juror or embraceror, who takes bribes from both parties to influence his verdict.—Termes de la Ley, 38.

Ambigua responsio contra proferentem est accipienda. 10 Co. 59.—(An ambiguous answer is to be taken against him who offers it.)

Ambiguus casibus semper presumitur pro rege.—(In doubtful cases the presumption is always in favour of the king.)—Lofft. 248.

Ambiguitas verborum latens verificatione suppletur; nam quod ex facto oritur ambiguum verificatione facti tollitur. Bacon.—(A hidden ambiguity of the words may be supplied by evidence; for whatever ambiguity arises from an extrinsic fact may be removed by extrinsic evidence.) See AMBIGUITY.

Ambiguitas verborum patens nulla verificatione excluditur. Lofft. 249.—(A patent ambiguity cannot be cleared up by extrinsic evidence.) See AMBIGUITY.

Ambiguity, doubtfulness, double-meaning, obscurity. There are two species of ambiguity (see the above Maxims), viz., that which is apparent on the face of an instrument, and which cannot be rendered certain by the evidence of collateral facts and surrounding circumstances admissible under the rules of construction; this is called ambiguitas patens; and that which, although apparently certain, and without ambiguity, for anything that appears upon the face of the deed or instrument, is rendered ambiguous by extrinsic and collateral matter out of the deed; this is called ambiguitas latens. The former ambiguity cannot be explained by parol evidence, because the law will not couple and mingle matter of specialty, which is of the higher account, with matter of averment, which is of inferior account in law; but the latter can be explained by the actions of the parties previously to and contemporaneously with the contract. Ambiguity of language is, however, to be distinguished from unintelligibility and inaccuracy, for words cannot be said to be ambiguous, unless their signification seem doubtful and uncertain to persons of competent skill and knowledge to understand them.—Story on Contracts, 272; Taylor or Best on Evidence.

Ambiguum placitum interpretari debet contra proferentem. Co. Litt. 303 b.—(An ambiguous plea ought to be interpreted against the party delivering it).

Ambit [metaph.], the limits or circumference of a power or jurisdiction, the line circumscribing any subject matter.

Amboglanna, Ambleside in Westmoreland, and Burdoswold in Cumberland.

Ambra, a Saxon vessel or measure for salt, butter, meal, or beer. See AMBER.

Ambrosii Burgus, Amesbury in Wilts.

Ambulatoria est voluntas, defuncti usque ad vitæ supremum exitum. Dig. 34, 4, 4.—(The will of a deceased person is ambulatory until the latest moment of life.)

Amubry, Aumbry, Aumber [fr. armoire, Fr.; armario, almario, Sp.; almer, Germ.; armaria, almaria, m. Lat.; a cupboard], a place where the arms, plate, vessels, and everything belonging to housekeeping were kept.—Cowel.

Amenable [fr. amener, Fr., to lead unto], tractable, that may be easily led or governed; formerly applied (see Cowel) to a wife who is governable by her husband.

2. Responsible or subject to answer, etc., in a court of justice.—Cowel.

Amende honorable [Fr.], an adequate reparation, an apology. In French law a species of punishment to which offenders against public decency or morality were anciently condemned.

Amendment, a correction of any errors in the pleadings in actions, suits, or prosecutions. The power of amendment has been much extended by recent statutes, but it is never exercised to the prejudice of a party to the proceeding.

1. Amendment of proceedings in the Supreme Court. Amendments are now allowed at any stage of the proceedings in an action. (Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XXVII.) The Court or a judge may, at any stage of the proceedings, allow either party to alter his statement of claim or defence or reply, or may order to be struck out or amended any matter in such statements respectively which may be scandalous, or which may tend to prejudice, embarrass, or delay the fair trial of the action, and all such amendments shall be made as may be necessary for the purpose of determining the real questions or question in controversy between the parties (r. 1).

A notice of appeal may also be amended by the Court of Appeal (Jud. Act, 1875, Sched. I., Ord. LVIII., r. 3), who have all the powers of amendment of the High Court of Justice (r. 5), and may amend any order made by the Court below (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 19).

As to the former practice with regard to amendment, Dan. Ch. Pr., 4th ed., 366—388, as to proceedings in equity; and C. L. P. Act, 1852, ss. 20, 34—9, and 222, and C. L. P. Act, 1854, s. 96, and C. L. P. Act, 1860, s. 36; and see also JEOPAILS.

3. Of Proceedings in County Courts. Ample powers of amendment, as well in equitable as in all other proceedings, are now possessed by these Courts. See 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 57.

and County Court Rules, 119—128, and (as to the equitable jurisdiction) County Courts Order, No. 13, Rule 1.

4. Of Criminal Proceedings. By 11 & 12 Vict. c. 46, s. 4, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, s. 10, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, ss. 1 & 2, indictments and informations may be amended at the trial where a variance appears between the same and the evidence. Provision is made by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 45, ss. 3, 7, and 9, for amendment in appeals at Quarter Sessions.

Amends, satisfaction.

Amends, Tender of, is by particular statutes made a defence in an action for a wrong. See 11 Geo. II. c. 19, ss. 20, 21, as to distresses; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 44, s. 11, as to Justices of the Peace; 10 Geo. IV. c. 44, s. 41, as to Metropolitan Police Constables; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 138, as to officials of County Courts; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 50, s. 109, as to persons acting in pursuance of the Highway Act; and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 113; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 71; and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, s. 33, as to persons acting in pursuance of the statutes relating to larceny, malicious injuries to property, and offences relating to the coin.

A mensa et thoro (from table and bed). A term used to describe a partial divorce, in cases in which the marriage was just and lawful, but for some supervenient cause, such as the commission of adultery or cruelty by the husband or wife, it became improper or impossible for them to live together. This divorce was effected by sentence of the Ecclesiastical Court. It caused the separation of the husband and wife, but did not dissolve the marriage, so that neither of them could marry during the life of the other.

A decree of Judicial Separation by the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes has been substituted for this kind of divorce by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 7.

Amentia, insanity, idiocy.

Amercement, or Amerciament, a pecuniary punishment or penalty assessed by the peers or equals of the party amerced for an offence, by the commission of which he had placed himself at the mercy of the lord. The difference between ameracements and fines is as follows:—The latter are certain, and are created by some statute; they can only be imposed and assessed by Courts of record; the former are arbitrarily imposed by Courts not of record, as courts-leet.—Termes de la Ley, 40.

Amhiniogau tir (land borderers), witnesses in a Court in suits respecting landed property, whose lands bordered on that in dispute.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Ami. See AMY.

Amicia, a cap, made of goat's or lamb's skin. See ALMUTUM.

Amictus, or Amesse, the uppermost of the six garments worn by priests. It is tied round the neck, and covers the breast and heart. The other five garments are alba, cingulum, stola, manipulus, and planeta.—Cowel.

Amicus curiæ (Lat., friend of the Court), a stander by, who informs the Court when doubtful or mistaken of any fact or decided case.—2 Co. Litt. 178.

Amita, a paternal aunt; the sister of one's father.

Amita magna, a great aunt.

Amittere legem terræ, or liberam legem, to lose the liberty of being sworn in any Court. But by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85, persons who were previously excluded from giving evidence by incapacity arising from crime or interest, are made competent witnesses, their credibility being left to the jury. A person outlawed is said to lose his law; i.e., to be put without its protection, so that he cannot sue, although he may be sued.—Glanvil, lib. ii.

Ammobragium, a service, or poll-money, like chevage.—Spel.

Ammodwr [am-bod-wr], a compactor, one before whom a compact is made, and who is therefore admissible as a witness to prove the terms of it.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Amnery, an almshouse.

Amnesty [fr. ἀμνηστία, Gk., non-remembrance], an act of pardon or 'oblivion,' by which crimes against the government up to a certain date are so obliterated that they can never be brought into charge. All acts of amnesty originate with the Crown.

Amnitum insulæ, isles upon the west coast of Britain.—Blount.

Amobh [fr. am-gobr, fee], the fee paid to a lord on the marriage of a female.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Amortization, or Amortizement, an alienation of lands in mortmain.

Amortize, to alienate lands in mortmain.

Amotion, a putting away, a removing, deprivation or ouster of possession.—Scott. In boroughs, a removal from a corporate office.

Amove, to remove from a post or station.

Amoveas manus, or Ouster le main, a livery of land to be amoved out of the king's hands on a judgment obtained upon a monstrans de droit, to restore the land, its effect being the same as a judgment that the party should have his land again. Abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Ampliation, an enlargement, a deferring of judgment till the cause be further examined.—Cowel.

Amputation of right hand, an ancient punishment for a blow given in a Superior Court; or for assaulting a judge sitting in the Court.

Amrygoll [am-rhy-coll, total loss], loss of property.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Amý, or Ami [fr. amicus, Lat.], usually called prochein amy, the next friend (as distinguished from the guardian), suing on behalf of an infant or orphan. Infants sue by prochein amy or guardian, and defend by guardian.—Cowel.

An, jour, et waste, year, day, and waste. A forfeiture of the lands to the Crown incurred by the felony of the tenant, after which time the land escheats to the lord.—Termes de la Ley, 40.

Anacoenosis [fr. ἀνακωνόσις, Gk.], a rhetorical figure, whereby we seem to deliberate and argue the case with others upon any matter of moment.—Encyc. Lond.

Anacoluthon, or anacoluthus [fr. ἀνακόλουθος, Gk.], a rhetorical figure, when a word that is to answer another is not expressed.—Ibid.

Anacrisis [fr. ἀνάκρισις, Gk.], an investigation of truth, interrogation of witnesses, and inquiry made into any fact, especially by torture.—Ibid; Civ. Law.

Anagraph, a register or inventory.

Analogism, an argument from the cause to the effect.

Analogy: identity or similarity of proportion: where there is no precedent in point, in cases on the same subject, lawyers have recourse to cases in a different subject-matter but governed by the same general principle. This is reasoning by analogy. See COMMON LAW, and remarks of Parke, J., in Mirehouse v. Rennell, 8 Bing, 515.

Analysts, persons skilled in detecting the component parts of things. By the Adulteration Act, 1875 (see ADULTERATION), provision is made for the appointment in every district by the local authorities of one or more persons possessing competent medical, chemical, and microscopical knowledge as analysts of all articles of food and drink.

Anarchy [fr. ἀναρχία, Gk., absence of government], that state of commotion that arises when a government has lost its power.

Anathematize, to pronounce accursed by ecclesiastical authority, to excommunicate.—Encyc. Lond.

Anatocism [fr. ἀνά and τοκος, Gk.], taking compound interest for the loan of money.

Anatomy Act, 2 & 3 Wm. c. 75, by which the practice of dissecting human corpses is regulated, and a license required for it.

Ancestor, one that has gone before in a family; it differs from predecessor, in that it is applied to a natural person, and his progenitors, while the latter is applied also to a corporation, and those who have held offices before those who now fill them.—Co. Litt. 78 b.

Ancestral, or ancestrel, that which has relation to ancestors.—Blount.

Anchor. See ANKER.

Anchorage, a duty taken from the owners of ships for the use of the havens where they cast anchor.

Anchors Proof Act, 27 & 28 Vict. c. 27 ; amended by 37 & 38 Vict. c. 51.

Ancient [fr. ante, Lat. ; antes, Prov. ; anzi, It. ; before ; whence anziano, anuen, belonging to former times] demesne, a tenure existing in certain manors, which, though now granted to private persons, were in the actual possession of the Crown, in the times of Edward the Confessor and William the Conqueror, and appear to have been so by the great survey in the Exchequer called Domesday-Book, and, therefore, whether lands are ancient demesne or not, is to be tried only by this book, called in consequence Liber Judicatorius ; but the question must be tried by a jury whether lands be parcel of a manor, which is ancient demesne, being a question of fact. It is a species of copyhold, which differs, however, from common copyholds in certain privileges, but yet must be conveyed by surrender, according to the custom of the manor. There are three sorts, (1) where the lands are held freely by the king's grant ; (2) customary freeholds, which are held of a manor in ancient demesne, but not at the lord's will, although they are conveyed by surrender, or deed and admittance ; (3) lands held by copy of court-roll at the lord's will, denominated copyholds of base tenure.—Consult Scriven on Copyholds, and 2 Br. & Had. Com. 200.

Ancient lights, the enjoyment of light for twenty years and upwards.—Consult Gale on Easements, and 2 Br. & Had. Com. 40.

Ancient Serjeant, the eldest of the Queen's Serjeants.—See Manning's Serviens ad legem, 19—20.

Ancient Writings, documents upwards of thirty years old. These are presumed to be genuine without express proof, when coming from the proper custody.—Consult Taylor on Evidence.

Ancients, gentlemen of the Inns of Court and Chancery. In Gray's Inn the society consists of benchers, ancients, barristers, and students under the bar ; and here the ancients are of the oldest barristers. In the Middle Temple, those who had passed their readings used to be termed ancients. The Inns of Chancery consists of ancients and students or clerks ; from the ancients a principal or treasurer is chosen yearly.

Ancienty, eldership or seniority.

Ancillary [fr. ancilla, Lat.], that which depends on, or is subordinate to, some other decision.—Encyc. Lond.

Ancwyn, a stated allowance of provision allotted to the officers of the court in their lodgings ; the term appears to be put in opposition to cwynos (cæna) supper, as being a privileged private allowance for that meal ; the cwynos being the public evening meal. Ancwyn is translated cæna in some Latin copies of the ancient Welsh laws.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Andaga, or Andæg, a day or term appointed for hearing a cause ; hence Andagian, to appoint the day.—Anc. Inst. England.

Andena, a swath or line of grass or corn in mowing, or as much ground as a man can stride over at once.—Jacob.

Anderida, Newenden in Kent.

Andreapolis, St. Andrew's in Scotland.

Androgynus [fr. άνήρ, ανδρός, Gk., man, and γυνή, woman], a hermaphrodite.

Androlepsy, the taking by one nation of the citizens or subjects of another, in order to compel the latter to do justice to the former.

Anfeldtyhde, or Anfealtihle, a simple accusation.—Saxon.

Angaria [fr. ἀγγαρεία, Gk.], personal service, which tenants were obliged to pay to their lords. Impressing of ships.—Blount.

Angel, an ancient English coin of the value of ten shillings.—Jacob.

Angelica, vestis, a monkish garment which laymen put on a little before death, in order to have the benefit of the monks' prayers.—Monast., tom. i. 632.

Anghyvarch [fr. an, cyvarch, unquestionable], a term used for the articles which were exclusively the property of a man or woman, and not subject to a division upon a separation ensuing. A fine for committing certain actions without permission.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Angidllarianum monasterium, the city of Ely in Cambridgeshire.

Angild [fr. an, one, and gild, payment, mulct, or fine, Sax.], the single valuation or compensation of a criminal. Twigild was the double, and trigild the treble, mulct or fine.—Laws of Ina, c. 20 ; Spelm.

Anglice jura in omni casu libertatis dant favorem. Fortesc. c. 42.—(The laws of England in every case of liberty are favourable).

Anglo-Indian, an Englishman domiciled in the Indian territory of the Crown.

Anglo-Indian domicile. See last TITLE.

Angylde, the rate fixed by law, at which certain injuries to person or property were to be paid for ; in injuries to the person, it seems to be equivalent to the 'wer,' i.e., the price at which every man was valued. It seems also to have been the fixed price at which cattle and other goods were received as currency, and to have been much higher than the market price, or ceap-gild.—Anc. Hist. England.

Anhlote, a single tribute or tax, paid according to the custom of the country as scot and lot.—Leges Wm. I. c. 64.

Anichiled, annulled, cancelled, or made void.—Blount.

Aniens, or Anient, void, of no force, or effect.—F. N. B. 214.

Animalia fera, si facta sint mansueta et ex consuetudine eunt et redeunt, volant et revolant, ut cervi, cygni, etc., eo usque nostra sunt, et ita intelliguntur quamdiu habuerint animum revertendi. 7 Co. 16.—(Wild animals, if they be made tame, and are accustomed to go out and return, fly away and fly back, as stags, swans, etc., are considered to belong to us so long as they have the intention of returning to us).

Animals may be divided into—

(1) Domestic animals, or animals not naturally mischievous, such as dogs or oxen.

(2) Animals mansuetae naturæ, such as sheep and cows.

(3) Animals that are naturally dangerous and ferocious, such as lions, bears, etc.

(4) Animals feræ naturæ (which are unclaimed), such as hares, pheasants, partridges, etc.—Browne's Actions, 369, and see FERÆ NATURE.

Any man may seize upon and keep for his own use animals feræ naturæ. So long as they remain in his custody he has a right to enjoy them without disturbance; but if once they escape from his custody, though without his voluntary abandonment, they return to the common stock, and any man else has an equal right to seize and enjoy them afterwards.

An action will lie against the owners of a dog, or other animal known by him to be mischievous, for injuries done by it.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 40, the unlawful and malicious killing, maiming, or wounding of cattle is made a felony. And by s. 41, the unlawful and malicious killing or wounding any animal not being cattle, but being the subject of larceny at Common Law, or being ordinarily kept in a state of confinement, or for any domestic purpose, is punishable by imprisonment and fine.

By 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92 (amended by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60), if any person shall cruelly beat, ill-treat, over-drive, abuse, or torture any horse, mare, etc., or any other domestic animal, he shall forfeit 5*l.* for every such offence, recoverable before a justice of the peace in a summary way; and if by such misconduct he injures the animal, or any person or property, a further sum of 10*l.* to the owner or person injured. The act also which repeals 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 59 (Martin's Act), the first act passed for the purpose, imposes penalties for conveying such animals in such manner or position as to subject them to unnecessary pain or suffering, and for bull-baiting and cock-fighting. See also VIVISECTION.

The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 40-1, also provides for the punishment of persons unlawfully and maliciously killing, maiming, or wounding cattle, dogs, birds, beasts, and other animals, See also 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 23. As to birds, see further; title BIRDS.

Animus, an intent.

Animus ad se omne jus ducit.—(Intention attracts all law to itself.)

Animus cancellandi, the intention of destroying or cancelling (applied to wills).

Animus et factum, the intention and the deed.

Animus furandi, the intention of stealing.

Animus homines est anima scripti. 3 Bulst. 67.—(The intent of a man is the soul of his writing.)

Animus manendi, the intention of remaining (applied to domicile).

Animus morandi, the intention of remaining.

Animus quo, the intent with which.

Animus recipiendi, the intention of receiving.

Animus revertendi, the intention of returning.—See Phillimore on Domicile, 112.

Animus revocandi, the intention of revoking (viz., a will).

Animus testandi, the intention of making a will.

Anker, a measure containing ten gallons.—Lex Merc.

Ann, or annat, half a year's stipend, over and above what is owing for the incumbency, due to a minister's relict, child, or nearest of kin, after his decease.—Scotch Law.

Anna, a piece of money, the sixteenth part of a rupee.—Indian.

Annales, yearlings or young cattle from one to two years old.—Cowel.

Annat, or annates [fr. primitiæ, Lat.], first fruits (being one year's whole profits) of a spiritual living.—Termes de la Ley, 40. See BOUNTY OF QUEEN ANNE.

Annealing of tile [fr. onclan, Sax.; acendo, Lat.; or rather fr. niello, It.; nigellum, m. Lat.; a kind of black enamel on gold and silver], burning or hardening tiles, which are made of burnt clay, and are used for covering houses.—17 Edw. IV. c. 4.

Annexation, the union of lands to the Crown, and declaring them inalienable. Also the appropriation of the church-lands by the Crown, and the union of land lying at a distance from the parish church to which they belong, to the church of another parish to which they are contiguous.—Scotch Law.

Anniented, abrogated, frustrated, or brought to nothing.—Litt. c. 3, s. 741.

Anni nubiles, marriageable years of woman, i.e., 12 years.—2 Co. Litt. 434.

Anniversary Days, solemn days appointed to be celebrated yearly in commemoration of the death of a saint or the happening of an event.

The death of Charles I., 30th January, the Restoration of Charles II., 29th May, and the discovery of the Gunpowder Plot, November 5th, gave rise to 'anniversaries' and special church services abolished by 22 Vict. c. 2. The anniversary of the 20th of June (accession of the Queen) is still observed.

Anno Domini (abbreviated A.D.), in the year of the Lord. The Christian computation of time is from the incarnation of our Saviour Jesus Christ. It is called the 'Vulgar Era.'

Annoisance, or annoyance [fr. annoire, It.; ennuyer, Fr.], any hurt done to a place, public or private, by placing anything thereon that may breed infection, or by encroachment, or suchlike means. It is the same as noisance or nuisance.—22 Hen. VIII. c. 5.

Annonæ civiles, rents paid to monasteries.

Annotation, the designation of a place of deportation; the citing of an absentee; the prince's answer on a doubtful point of law.—Civil Law.

Annua pensione, an ancient writ to provide the king's chaplain, if he had no preferment, with a pension.—Reg. Orig. 165, 307.

Annual pension, a yearly profit or rent.—Scotch Law.

Annuale, the yearly rent or income of a prebendary.—Cowel.

Annualia, a yearly stipend assigned to a priest for celebrating an anniversary, or for saying continued masses for the soul of a deceased person.—Blount.

Annuities of tiends, i.e., tithes, are 10s. out of the boll of tiend wheat, 8s. out of the boll of beer, less out of the boll of rye, oats, and peas, allowed to the Crown yearly of the tiends not paid to the bishops, or set apart for other pious uses.—Scotch Law.

Annuity (annual payment), properly so called, is merely personal property, and not at all connected with realty, although it is frequently ranged under incorporeal hereditaments, issuing out of land, and even the legislature treats it sometimes as a rent-charge, from which it materially differs.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 21. The words 'annuity' and 'rent charge' are frequently used as convertible terms.

An annuity is an annual payment of money either bequeathed as a gift, or secured by the personal covenant or bond of the payer. It is mostly charged upon personal property.

Although an annuity may be made a personal hereditament by granting it to the payee and his heirs, upon whom it will descend if not disposed of, though totally unconnected with realty; yet, not being a tenement, it cannot be entailed, nor can there be a remainder of it. If, then, an annuity be granted to A., and the heirs of his body, it is a conditional personal fee, and may be alienated by A. after issue is born to him.—Co. Litt. 20 a. An annuity to A. 'for ever' will pass to A.'s personal, not his real, representatives.—11 Sim. 158.

A perpetual annuity granted in consideration of a sum of money advanced, differs from a loan at interest in this—that the grantee has no right to demand back his principal, which is entirely sunk, but must be content to receive the annuity which he has purchased, as long as it shall please the other party to continue it; but the annuity is in its nature redeemable at the option of the grantor, who is thus at liberty to discharge himself from any further payments by returning the money which he has borrowed. It may, however, be agreed between the parties that the redemption shall not take place for a certain number of years.

An annuity for life or years is not redeemable in the same manner; but it may be agreed by the parties to the contract that it shall be redeemable on certain terms; or it may afterwards be redeemed by consent of both parties. Equity will decree a redemption upon the ground of fraud or gross inadequacy.

An annuity may be bequeathed. It may be either created by, or, if already existing, may be transmitted by, will. A created annuity is a general legacy, and will abate with the other legacies upon a deficiency of assets. A personal annuity of inheritance will pass under a general bequest.—Aubin v. Daly, 4 B. & A. 59.

An annuity is frequently resorted to as a means of borrowing money, where the borrower has not any available security; the borrower undertaking to pay an annuity during his own life, instead of interest and the return of the loan. The borrower is the grantor, and the lender is the grantee, of such annuity.

Again, a person desirous of increasing his income, and having, perhaps no relations for whom he wishes to provide, may sink the capital he possesses, and purchase an annuity for his life. While the Government offers the best and safest security for the due payment of a purchased annuity, joint-stock companies and private speculators hold out higher rates of interest, which, however, are not always preferable, seeing that certainty of payment is a grand desideratum.—See 10 Geo. IV. c. 24, 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 59, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 49, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 45, 27 & 28 Vict. c. 43, and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 44, s. 1, as to annuities granted by the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt; and 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 14, 7 & 8 Vict. c. 83, ss. 8 & 9, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 45, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 87, and 45 & 46 Vict. c. 51, 'the Government Annuities Act, 1882,' as to the purchase of such annuities (not exceeding 100% a year in amount) through Savings Banks.

While the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 90, wholly repealed from the 10th of August, 1854, the 53 Geo. III. c. 141, except so much thereof as repealed the 17 Geo. III. c. 26; the 18 Vict. c. 15, after reciting that by reason of the repeal of this act, purchasers were no longer enabled to ascertain by search what life annuities or rent-charges may have been granted by their vendors or others, enacted by sect. 12 that 'any annuity or rent-charge granted after 26th April, 1856, otherwise than by marriage settlement, for one or more life or lives, or for any term of years or greater estate determinable on one or more life or lives,' should not 'affect any lands, tenements, or hereditaments as to purchasers, mortgagees, or creditors,' unless and until a memorandum of all particulars should be left with the senior master of the Court of Common Pleas at Westminster, to be entered by him in a book in alphabetical order, which book should be open to public search.

The 14th section excepts annuities or rent-charges given by will from the act.

The most expeditious remedy to recover the arrears of a personal annuity is an action of covenant upon the deed.

Annuity-tax, an impost levied annually in Scotland for the maintenance of the ministers of religion. It was abolished in Edinburgh and Montrose by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 50, which introduced a new scheme. By the 33 & 34 Vict. c. 87, this act has been amended and provision made for the more effectual abolition of the tax, and for the payment of the ministers otherwise.

Annulus et baculum, a ring and pastoral staff or crosier, the delivery of which by the prince was the ancient mode of granting investitures to bishoprics.—1 Bl. Com. 377.

Annus deliberandi, the year allowed by Scottish law for the heir to deliberate whether he will enter upon his ancestor's land and represent him. By 21 & 22 Vict. c. 76, s. 27, the period of deliberation was reduced to six months.—Scotch Law.

Annus, dies, et vastum [Lat.] (Year, day, and waste.) See AN, JOUR, ET WASTE.

Annus luctus, the year of mourning, during which the widow, by the ordinances of the civil law, could not marry, to prevent the inconvenience of a widow bearing a child, which, by the period of gestation, might be the child either of her deceased or her present husband.—Cod. 5, 9, 2.

Anomy [fr. ἀνομία, Gk.], lawlessness, breach of law.

A non posse ad non esse sequitur argumentum necessarie negativè licet non affirmativè. Hob. 336.—(An argument follows necessarily in the negative from the not possible to the not being, though not in the affirmative.)

Anon., An., A., abbreviation for anonymous.

Anonymous partnerships in Ireland. See 21 & 22 Geo. III. c. 46 (Irish).

Anrhaith [anrhaith, lawless], spoil.—Anc. Inst. Wales.

Anrhaith-gribddail, pilfering, spoliation. A term for the graver spoliation to be exercised towards a homicide.—Ibid.

Anrhaith-oddev, spoliation, sufferance. A term used when a person's goods were confiscated and seized by the lord.—Ibid.

Ansel, Ansul, or Auncel, an ancient mode of weighing by hanging scales or hooks at either end of a beam or staff, which, being lifted with one's finger or hand by the middle, showed the equality or difference between the weight at one end, and the thing weighed at the other.—Termes de la Ley, 66.

Answer [fr. andswarian, A. S.; andswer, Goth.; antwoord, Belg.], reply, counter-speech.

Answer in Chancery. When a defendant was advised to take the judgment of the Court upon the whole case, or any part of it, as made by the parties on both sides, he used, under the former practice, to file an answer (for further details see Daniell's Chancery Practice) either to the whole bill or such parts of it as were not covered by a demurrer or plea, where a combined defence was resorted to.

As to the mode of drawing and swearing to answers in Chancery, see Daniell's Ch. Pr., 4th ed., 659—673.

By the Judicature Acts a 'Statement of Defence' is substituted for the 'Answer.'—See further STATEMENT OF DEFENCE, and Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XIX., XX., and XXII.

Answer in Divorce. The case of a respondent and co-respondent in the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes.

Answer to Interrogatories. See INTERROGATORY.
Ante, occurring in a report or a text-book, used to refer the reader to a previous part of the book.

Antedate, to date a document before the day of its execution.

Antejuramentum, or Præjuramentum, an oath taken by the accuser and accused before a trial or purgation.—Leg. Athelstan apud ambard, 23.

Ante litem motam [Lat.] (Before litigation commenced).

Antenati, those born before a certain period, e.g., before marriage. See SETTLEMENTS.

Ante-nuptial, before matrimony.

Authorismus, in rhetoric, denotes a contrary description or definition of a thing from that given by the adverse party. Thus, if the plaintiff urge, that to take anything away from another without his knowledge or consent is a theft, this is called ὁπος, or definition. If the defendant reply, that to take a thing away from another without his knowledge or consent, provided it be done with a design to return it to him again, is not theft, this is an ὑποσµπῶς.—Encyc. Lond.

Antichresis [fr. ἀντίχρησις, Gk.], in the civil law, a covenant or convention, whereby a person borrowing money of another engages or makes over his lands or goods to the creditor, with the use and occupation thereof, for the interest of the money lent. This covenant was allowed by the Romans, among whom usury was prohibited; it was afterwards called Mort-gage, to distinguish it from a simple engagement, where the fruits of the ground were not alienated, which was called Viv-gage, i.e., vivum vadium.—Ibid. The obsolete Welsh mortgage bears a resemblance to this kind of pledge.—1 Domat, b. iii. tit. I. s. i. art. 28; Story on Bailments, 310.

Anticipation, doing or taking a thing before the appointed time. Married women may be restrained by the terms of a will or settlement from aliening, by way of anticipation, property settled to their separate use during coverture. See Pike v. Fitzgibbon, 17 Ch. D. 455, and s. 19 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, post., tit. 'Married Women's Property.' But the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, s. 39, gives the Chancery Division of the High Court power to bind the interest of a married woman, notwithstanding that she is so restrained.

Antient demesne. See ANCIENT DEMESNE.

Antigraphy, a copy or counterpart of a deed.

Antigua. See 22 & 23 Vict. c. 13, and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 15, s. 1.

Anti-manifesto, the declaration of a belligerent, as a reply to the manifesto of the other belligerent, showing that the war, as far as he is concerned, is defensive.

Antinomy [fr. ἀντι, against, and νόμος, Gk., law], a contradiction between two laws or two articles of the same law.—Encyc. Lond.

Antipelargia, an ancient and righteous law, whereby children were obliged to furnish necessaries to their aged parents. The ciconia, or stork, is a bird famous for the care it takes of its parents, when grown old. Hence, in some Latin writers, this is rendered lex ciconiaria, or the stork's law.—Ibid.

Antiqua customa, a duty which was collected on wool, wool-felts, and leather.

Antiqua statuta, the acts of parliament from Richard I. to Edward III.

Antistitium, a monastery.—Blount.

Antithetarius, or Anthetarius, the recriminating upon the accuser of the same crime, which he has charged against the accused.—Canutus, c. 47.

Antivestæum, the Land's End.

Antona, the River Avon, in Warwickshire.

Antustrions, among the Franks, who were the personal vassals or dependents of the kings and counts.

Apatisatio, an agreement or compact.—Du Cange.

Apicium, Pap Castle, in Cumberland.

Apices juris non sunt jura. Co. Litt. 304.

—(Fine points of law are not laws.) 'An excellent and profitable law, which disallows curious and nice exceptions tending to the overthrow or delay of justice.' See Broom's Legal Max., 5th ed., 188.

Apograph, a copy, an inventory.

Apology. By the 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, s. 1, a defendant in an action of libel is in some cases allowed to plead the offer of an apology as a defence, or in mitigation of damages. And by s. 2, in any action for damages for a libel contained in a newspaper or other periodical publication, the defendant may plead an apology and pay money into Court. See LIBEL.

Aporiare, to bring to poverty, to shun or avoid. Wals. in Ricardo, 2. See APPORIATUS.

Apostacy, a total renunciation of Christianity, by embracing a false religion, or not any religion at all.—4 Bl. Com. 43.

Apostare, to violate, break, or transgress.—Blount; Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 35.

Apostata capiendo, a writ formerly issued against an apostate, or one who had violated the rules of his religious order. It was addressed to the sheriff to deliver the defendant into the possession of the abbot or prior.—Reg. Orig. 71, 267.

A posteriori. See A PRIORI.

Apostolæ, brief letters of dismissal given to an appellant. They state the case and declare that the record will be transmitted.—Civil Law. See Colquhoun's Roman Civil Law, Vol. III., s. 2370.

Apothecaries [fr. apothicaire, Fr.; fr. αποθήκη, Gk.], persons who prepare medicines according to a physician's prescription. Their practice in England and Wales is regulated by 55 Geo. III. c. 194, amended by 6 Geo. IV. c. 133. See also 15 & 16 Vict. c. 56; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90; 22 Vict. c. 21; 23 Vict. c. 7; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 66; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 91; 31 & 32 Vict. c. 29; and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 34.

Appanage, or Apanage [fr. panis, Lat., bread, whence panar, apanar, Prov., to nourish], the provision of lands or feudal superiorities assigned by the kings of France for the maintenance of their younger sons. 2. The allowance assigned to the prince of a reigning house for a proper maintenance out of the public chest.—1 Hall. Mid. Ages, c. 1, p. ii. 88.

Apparator, or Apparitor, a messenger, who cites and arrests offenders, and executes the decrees of the judges of the Spiritual Courts.—Cowel.

Apparator comitatus, an officer formerly so-called, for whom the sheriffs of Buckinghamshire had a considerable yearly allowance.—Hale's Sher. Acco. 104.

Apparel, excess in. The penal laws against this luxury were repealed by 1 Jac. I. c. 25.

Apparent heir. See HEIR. In the Scotch Law, he is the person to whom the succession has actually opened. He is so called until his regular entry on the lands by service or infeftment on a precept of clare constat.

Apparlement [fr. pareillement, Fr., in like manner], a resemblance or likelihood.—2 Rich. II. st. 1, c. 6.

Apparura, furniture and implements.—Blount.

Appeach, to accuse or bewray.

Appeal [fr. appellatio, Lat.; appeller, Fr.], the removal of a cause from an inferior to a superior Court, for the purpose of testing the soundness of the decision by the inferior Court.

By the Judicature Acts, 1873 and 1875, a court specially called the Court of Appeal, is formed to take the place of the Exchequer Chamber and the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and for other appellate purposes. See APPEAL, COURT OF.

The chief appeals which lie in English Courts are—

From Justices of a Borough or County } to Quarter Sessions of either respectively, in cases of summary jurisdiction; or to Divisional Courts under 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, and Jud. Act, 1873, s. 45, upon a point of law. See infra, as to finality of appeal.

From Quarter Sessions in civil matters, } to Divisional Courts of the High Court of Justice; such appeal to be final unless by leave of the Divisional Court (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 45).

From County Courts or other inferior Courts . }

From Quarter Sessions in criminal cases . } to Court for Crown Cases Reserved, consisting of not less than five judges of the High Court of Justice, of whom the Lord Chief Justice of England must be one (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 47; Jud. Act, 1881, s. 15).

- From any order or judgment of the Court of Appeal } to the House of Lords (App. Jur. Act, 1876, s. 3).
- From Court Martial } to the Queen in person.
- Recourse to the Home Secretary upon a criminal conviction is virtually in the nature of an appeal. See PARDON.
- Recourse to a second Court for writ of Habeas Corpus which has been refused by another partakes in some degree of the nature of an appeal, and according to the practice before the passing of the Judicature Acts this writ might be applied for to any number of Courts in succession. Writs of prohibition from Superior to Inferior Courts are in the nature of appeals on the question of jurisdiction. See PROHIBITION.
- For the procedure in the Court of Appeal, see Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. LVIII.
- A criminal 'appeal' was an accusation by one private subject against another of some heinous crime, demanding punishment on account of the particular injury suffered, rather than for the offence against the public. Criminal appeals were either capital or not capital: capital were subdivided into (1) appeals of death or murder; (2) appeals of larceny or robbery; (3) appeals of rape; (4) appeals of arson, which are all obsolete and superseded by 59 Geo. III. c. 46; not capital were de pace, de plagis, de imprisonmento, and mayhem, superseded by actions of trespass.—Leach's Hawk. P. C. ii. 285. Consult Kendall's Arguments on Trial by Battel.
- Appeal, Court of. This Court, which is constituted under the Judicature Act, 1873, the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, and the Judicature Act, 1881, has transferred to it the appellate jurisdiction and powers of the Lord Chancellor and of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, and of the same Court as the Court of Appeal in Bankruptcy, and from the County Palatine of Lancaster, of the Lord Warden of the Stannaries, of the Exchequer Chamber, and of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in appeals, in Admiralty causes, or in matters of Lunacy. The Court consists of the Lord Chancellor, the Lord Chief Justice of England, and the Master of the Rolls (who by the Judicature Act, 1881, sits as a Judge of the Court of Appeal only), as ex officio judges, and of five ordinary judges.
- The judges may not sit on appeal from judgments to which they themselves were parties.
- Appeal of Death. See supra, and also Ashford v. Thornton, 1 B. & Ald. 405.
- Appeal to Rome, abolished by 24 Hen. VIII. c. 12, and 25 Hen. VIII. cc. 19, 21.

Appearance. When a person is served with a summoning process from a Court he generally comes into such Court to defend himself by entering an appearance with the proper officer.

There are several modes for a defendant to appear:—

- (1) In person.
- (2) By attorney.
- (3) By guardian.
- (4) By committee.

Appearance to actions in the High Court of Justice (which is chiefly regulated by Ord. XII.), must (see Ord. II., r. 3, and Sched. I., App. (A), Part I., No. 1) be entered within eight days from the service of the writ of summons. In the case of a writ for service out of the jurisdiction the time is to be fixed by the Court or a judge ordering such service (Ibid. Ord. XI., r. 4). But in all cases a defendant may appear at any time before judgment (Ibid. Ord. XII., r. 15). Judgment in default of appearance is provided for by Ord. XIII.

A defendant cited in the Ecclesiastical Court may appear either in person or by proctor; but if a defendant intend to object to the Court's jurisdiction, he should appear under protest, to save his contumacy, and then show cause against the citation upon petition and affidavits, upon which the Court either allows the protest and dismisses the defendant, or overrules it, and assigns the defendant to appear absolutely.

In indictments for felony, the accused must always appear and plead in person, and likewise in appeal or on attachment; but in indictments or informations for misdemeanours, the accused may appear by attorney; and in misdemeanours generally, after the accused has once appeared, the trial may proceed in his absence.—2 Hawk P. C. c. 22, s. 1; Cro. Jac. 462; 4 Steph. Comm.

Appearance sec. stat. (i.e., Secundum statutum), which was entered at law by a plaintiff for a defaulting defendant under 12 Geo. I. c. 29, and 2 Wm. IV. c. 39, was abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 26.

Appellant, the party appealing; the party resisting the appeal is called Respondent.—Encyc. Lond.

Appellate jurisdiction, the power of a superior Court to review the decision of an inferior Court. See APPEAL.

Appellatio fundi omne edificium et omnis ager continetur. 4 Co. 87.—(Under the word 'fundus' every building and every field is comprehended.)

Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, 39 & 40 Vict. c. 59. By this act an appeal lies to the House of Lords from any judgment or order of the Court of Appeal in England, and also from certain Courts in Scotland and Ireland. Three members of the house, having held high judicial office, form a quorum. The Crown may appoint two salaried 'Lords of Appeal in ordinary.' Appeals may be heard during a prorogation or dissolution of Parliament.

Appellee, one who is appealed against or accused.—Encyc. Lond.

Appellor, an accuser; a criminal who accuses his accomplices, one who challenges a jury, etc.—Ibid.

Appenage, or apennage, a child's part or portion. It is properly the portion of the king's younger children in France, where, by a fundamental law, called the law of appenages, the king's younger sons formerly had duchies, counties, or baronies granted to them and their heirs, etc., the reversion being reserved to the Crown, as well as all matters of legality as to coinage and levying taxes in such territories.—Spelm.; Cowel. See APPANAGE.

Appendant, a thing of inheritance belonging to another inheritance which is more worthy: as an advowson, common, etc., which may be appendant to a manor, common of fishing to a freehold, a seat in a church to a house, etc. It differs from appurtenance, in that appendant must ever be by prescription, i.e., a personal usage for a considerable time, while an appurtenance may be created at this day, for if a grant be made to a man and his heirs, of common in such a moor for his beasts levant or couchant upon his manor, the commons are appurtenant to the manor and the grant will pass them.—Co. Litt. 121 b. See APPURTENANCES, COMMON.

Appenditia, the appendages or pertinances of an estate.—Blount.

Appensura, the payment of money at the scale or by weight.—Spelm.

Applicatio est vita regula. 2 Buls. 79.—(Application is the life of a rule.)

Application, a request, a motion to a court or judge; the disposal of a thing.

Appodiare, to lean on or prop up anything.—Wals. 1271; Mat. Paris, Chron.

Appointee, a person selected for a particular purpose; also the person in whose favour a power of appointment is executed.

Appointment, direction, designation, the selection of a person for an office. See infra.

Appointment of new trustees. Every assurance which creates a trust and nominates trustees, should contain a power to appoint new trustees, and this power should be comprehensive, and should provide for all the usual contingencies. Such a power must be strictly exercised. A trustee who transfers the trust property to another, without an express power to do so, does not thereby pass the trust, for the office, with all its powers and responsibilities, is still vested in him, and he places himself in this predicament; his liability is retained, whilst he has deprived himself of his control over the property.

In the absence of a power to appoint new trustees, the Chancery division of the High Court of Justice (see Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34) has jurisdiction to nominate other trustees, pursuant to 12 & 13 Vict. c. 60, and 15 & 16 Vict. c. 55.

Appointment in exercise of a power concerning uses, an instrument which alters, abridges, or suspends a use limited by a prior assurance containing or reserving the power which sanctions such appointment. The seisin to serve the appointed use being transferred by the prior assurance, the appointment vests the legal estate in the appointee, who takes as though he were named in such prior assurance.

A deed of appointment should recite or refer to the power, and be expressed to be in exercise of it, as manifesting the intention of the appointor, or person executing the power, and also of every other authority enabling him in that behalf, so as to guard against any misrecital of the assurance creating the power. It should likewise state that the formalities required for the execution of the power are complied with, and the attestation should set forth that such formalities were observed.

The formalities required by the creator of a power should be few and simple, for many an appointment has failed because they have not been precisely attended to. When the consent of any person is required to the exercise of a power, it is generally a condition precedent, and an execution of the power without such consent is not cured by subsequent acquisition. See Preston's Act, 54 Geo. III. c. 168, as to the attestation of appointments made prior to the 30th of July, 1814; and also see 7 Wm. IV. c. 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 10, as to appointments exercisable by will, and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 12, by deed.

By the 37 & 38 Vict. c. 37, it is now provided that no appointment, which from and after the passing of that Act (30th July, 1874), shall be made in exercise of any power to appoint any property, real or personal, amongst several objects, shall be invalid at law or in equity, on the ground that any object of such power has been altogether excluded.

Appointor, a donee of a power after he has executed it; also a person who nominates another for an office.

Apponere, to pledge or pawn.—Neubrig. l. 1, c. 2.

Apporriatus, impoverished.—Annales de Dunstaplin, an. 1269.

Apportionment, a division of a whole into parts (usually unequal) proportioned to the rights of more claimants than one. It is either (1) Apportionment in respect of time, or (2) Apportionment in respect of estate.

At common law there is no apportionment in respect of time. Where a successor in interest succeeds first before a rent or other periodical payment falls due, he takes, at common law, the whole, and the executors of his predecessor take nothing (Chun's Case, 1 Rep. 127). This was remedied by 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 15, which apportioned rent between the representatives of a deceased tenant for life, and the person succeeding in remainder, and 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 22, passed to obviate the doubts which had arisen upon 11 Geo. II. c. 12.

And now the 'Apportionment Act, 1870,' 33 & 34 Vict. c. 35, provides that all rents, annuities, and dividends, and other periodical payments in the nature of income (whether reserved or made payable under an instrument in writing, or otherwise), shall, like interest on money lent, be considered as accruing from day to day, and shall be apportionable in respect of time accordingly (s. 1). As to apportionment in proving in bankruptcy, see 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 35.

As to apportionment in respect of estate, it is provided by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 3, that where the reversion upon a lease is severed, and the rent is legally apportioned, the assignee of each part of the reversion shall, in respect of the apportioned rent allotted to him, be entitled to the benefit of all conditions of re-entry for non-payment of the original rent, and the Conveyancing Act, 1881, s. 12, applies the principle of this enactment to conditions generally. Likewise, the Lands Clauses Act, 1845, s. 119, provides for an apportionment of rent where part only of lands subject to lease is taken under that act.

Apportum, the revenue or profit which a thing brings to the owner. It is commonly applied to a corody or pension.—Blount.

Apposal of sheriffs, charging them with money received upon the account of the Exchequer.—22 & 23 Car. II. c. 22.

Apposer, an officer of the Exchequer.

Apposition. A word is said to be used in apposition to another in contradistinction to being used disjunctively; thus, if two nouns occur with the word 'or' between them, if the word 'or' be taken to mean 'otherwise called,' the second noun is used in apposition.

But if it be taken to show that the two words mean two different things, the words are said to be used disjunctively.

Appostille [Fr.], an addition or annotation to a document.

Appraisers [fr. appréciateurs, Fr.], persons employed to value goods, repairs, labour, etc. By 46 Geo. III. c. 43, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, they are required to take out an annual license. According to an old statute, 11 Edw. I. stat. Acton Burnel, appraisers valuing goods too highly were compelled to take them at their own valuation.

Appraisal [fr. apprécier, prix, Fr., pretium, Lat.], the act of valuing property, goods, furniture, etc.

Apprehending offenders. Persons active in doing so are allowed compensation in certain cases specified in 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 28.

Apprehension [fr. prehendere, Lat., to catch hold of, apprehendere, to seize], the capture of a person upon a criminal charge. As to apprehending offenders in the Colonies escaping into the United Kingdom, and à converso, see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 34. As to the apprehension of offenders generally, see 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 103 et seq. As to the apprehension of seamen deserting, see 44 Geo. III. c. 13, and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 246 et seq., and as to foreign ships, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 26.

Apprendre, a fee or profit taken or received.—Cowel.

Apprendre [Fr.] (to take or seize a thing), such as exercising the right of common.

Apprentice [fr. apprendre, Fr., to learn], a person bound by indentures of apprenticeship to a tradesman or artificer, who covenants to teach him his trade or mystery. The master is bound to instruct his apprentice, and to make him master of the art so far as his capacity to learn will permit. If the master die, or become bankrupt, or abandon the trade, the obligation of the apprentice is at an end. Justices of the peace have jurisdiction in many questions between master and apprentice. For instance, the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86, s. 6, makes it an offence, punishable on summary conviction by fine or imprisonment with or without hard labour, for a master to neglect to provide food, etc., for his apprentice. See Chitty's Statutes, vol. iv., tit. 'Master and Servant.'

Apprenticeships were altogether unknown to the ancients. The Roman Law is perfectly silent with regard to them.—Smith's Wealth of Nations, b. i. c. x. See SERVANT.

Apprenticii ad legem. Apprentices to the law—barristers. See Fleta, lib. ii. c. 37.

Apprentice en la ley. See last title.

Approbate or reprobate. A person is said to approve and reprobate where he takes advantage of one part of a deed and rejects the rest.—Scotch Law. The maxim runs Qui approbat non reprobat. One who approves cannot reprobate.

Appropriation, the annexing of some ecclesiastical benefice to the proper and perpetual use of some religious house, etc., just as impropriation is the annexing a benefice to the use of a lay person or corporation. Appropriation may be severed and the church become disappropriate, if a patron or appropriator present a clerk, who is properly instituted and inducted, for he would then become complete parson; also, if a corporation possessing the benefice is dissolved, the parsonage becomes disappropriate at common law. Phill. Eccl. Law, 263—275.

Appropriation of payments, the application by a creditor to one of several debts of a sum of money paid by a debtor on a general account. In such case the creditor is (in general, provided the debtor has not, on paying, specified what account the payment is to be applied to) justified in applying the payment to which of several accounts he pleases.

Appropriare communiam, to discommon and enclose any parcel of land which was before open common.—Paroch. Antig. 336.

Appropriator, a spiritual corporation entitled to the profits of a benefice.

Approve, to augment a thing to the utmost.—2 Inst. 474.

Improvement, i.e., improvement. Profits of land; also, where there exists a right of common on a lord's waste, and the lord encloses part of such waste, leaving sufficient common, as he is bound to do by the Statute of Merton.—Crompt. Juris. 152, Reg. Jud. 8, 9.

Approver, or prover [fr. approver, Fr., to consent unto], an accomplice in crime who accuses others of the same offence, and is admitted as a witness at the discretion of the Court to give evidence against his companions in guilt. He is vulgarly called 'Queen's evidence,' which see. This testimony must necessarily be of an unsatisfactory nature, and the practice is for Judges to leave it to juries with the direction not to believe it unless corroborated in some material particular by independent untainted testimony.

Approvers, bailiffs of lords in their franchises. Sheriffs were called the king's approvers in 1 Edw. III. st. 1, c. 1.—Termes de la Ley, 49.

Appruare, to take to one's use or profit.—Cowel.

Appurtenances, belonging to another thing, as hamlets to a manor, and common of pasture, turbary, etc.; liberties and services, outhouses, yards, orchards, and gardens are appurtenant to a messuage, but lands cannot properly be said to be appurtenant to a messuage.—Com. Dig., tit. 'Appendant and Appurtenant.'

Appurtenant, pertaining or belonging to.

A principioribus seu dignioribus est inchoandum. Co. Litt. 18.—(We are to begin with the more worthy or principal parts).

A priori. All arguments may be divided, according to the relation of the subject-matter of the premises to that of the conclusion, into (a) à priori (from the antecedent to the consequence), or those of such a nature that the premises would account for the conclusion, were that conclusion granted, which is the Aristotelic method of reasoning; and (β) à posteriori (from the consequence to the antecedent), or those whose premises could not have been used to account for the conclusion, which is the Baconian method of reasoning. The former class is manifestly argument from cause to effect, since to account for anything signifies to assign the cause of it. The latter class comprehends all other arguments.

Apta viro (of a woman), marriageable.

Apt words; words proper to produce the legal effect for which they are intended; sound technical phrases.

Aqua cedit solo. (Water passes with the soil.)

Aqua currit et debet currere. (Water flows and ought to flow.)

Aqua frigida, de, Fresh water.

Aquatic rights, those that are exerciseable in running or still water.

Aqua pontana, Bridgewater, in Somersetshire.

Aquæ calidæ, Aquæ solis, Akeman-cestre, Bath, in Somersetshire.

Aquædon, Eidiure, vulgò Eatoun.

Aquæ ductus, a right to carry a watercourse through another's ground.—Civil Law.

Aquædunensis saltus, Waterdon.

Aquædunum, Aieton.

Aquage or Aquagium, a watercourse, or toll paid for water carriage.—Blount.

Aquæ haustus, a servitude which consists in the right to draw water from the fountain, pool, or spring of another.—Civil Law.

Aquæ immittendæ, a servitude which the owner of a house, surrounded by other buildings, so that it has no outlet for its waters, has, to allow them to run upon and over his neighbour's land.—Civil Law.

Aquædunensis pons, Eiford.

Aquilædunum, Hoxton.

Aquitania, Aquitain, now containing Guienne and Gascony.

A quo [Lat.] (from whom or which). See JUDEX A QUO.

A.R., anno regni, the year of the reign, as A. R. V. R. 22 (Anno Regni Victoriae Reginae vicesimo secundo); in the twenty-second year of the reign of Queen Victoria.

Arabant, applied to those who held by the tenure of ploughing and tilling the lord's lands within the manor.—Cowel.

Arace, to rase or erase.—Blount.

Araho, to make oath in the church or some other holy place. All oaths were made in the church upon the relics of saints, according to the Ripuarian Laws.—Cowel; Spelm.

Aratia, arable grounds.—Blount; Cowel.

Aratrum terræ, as much land as can be tilled by one plough. A term applied to a service rendered by a tenant to his lord.—Cowel.

Arbeia, Ireby, in Cumberland.

Arbiter [Adbiter, fr. the old Latin beto, to go; or perhaps fr. arpa, Fin., a lot, symbol, divining-rod. — Wedgw.], a private extrajudicial judge; an arbitrator, or referee; a witness. See ARBITRATOR.

Arbitrament, the award or decision of arbitrators upon a matter of dispute, which has been submitted to them.—Termes de la Ley, 50.

Arbitrary punishment, such as is left to the discretion of a judge.

Arbitrate, to judge, to make an agreement.

Arbitration, the determination of a matter in dispute by the judgment of one, two, or more persons, called arbitrators.

I. Generally speaking, almost all matters in dispute, not being of a criminal nature, may be referred to arbitration; but at common law there was no mode of making the award binding.

This defect was cured by the important Statute 9 & 10 Wm. III. c. 15, which enabled parties to agree that a submission to arbitration may be made a rule of Court. If it be not so agreed, the submission may be revoked by either party at any time before award (re Rouse and Meier L. R. 8 C. P. 212). But whether it be so agreed or not, the agreement to refer does not oust the jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice, although an action brought in respect of a matter agreed to be referred may be stayed under s. 11 of the C. L. P. Act, 1854; if the agreement has been made a rule of Court (Randell v. Thomson, 1 Q. B. D. 748), and where an agreement to refer makes it a condition precedent to the right to sue, that the amount of damages shall be ascertained by arbitration, an action does not lie until the amount has been so ascertained (Scott v. Avery, 5 H. L. C. 811).

II. The parties who may refer to arbitration are these:—Persons capable of disposing of their rights; husband and wife; partners and parties with joint interests; corporations, churchwardens, and overseers; authorized agents; attorneys and solicitors; counsel (but see Swinfen v. Swinfen, 24 Beav. 549, and 18 C.B. 485); executors and administrators; trustees; committees of lunatics with consent of the Lord Chancellor or the Lords Justices of Appeal; public officers; assignees of bankrupts and insolvents; trustees of savings banks and friendly societies; promoters of public undertakings and railways; ecclesiastical and collegiate corporations concerning their lands; masters and workmen concerning their trade; and counties and boroughs concerning prisoners' expenses.

III. No formal submission, either verbal or written, is necessary. The several modes, of submission are these:—

(1) By parol, which, however, is not advisable, as it is open to dispute and cannot be made a rule of Court. Such a submission is ineffectual so far as it comprehends reality.

(2) By agreement in writing not under seal.

(3) By mutual bonds.

(4) By an indenture containing mutual covenants to stand to the award.

The C. L. P. Act, 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, ss. 3—17, gives power to a judge to refer matters of account compulsorily to arbitration, to stay proceedings in an action brought after an agreement to refer, and to appoint an arbitrator or umpire on failure of parties, etc. The same act allows an arbitrator to state a special case for the opinion of the High Court. By the Jud. Act, 1873, in any cause or matter not criminal, the Court or any Divisional Court or judge before whom the cause or matter is pending may refer it to an official or special referee to report for the assistance of the Court (s. 56), or may direct the trial of the cause or any matter of account in it, to be before an official referee or a special referee agreed on by the parties. This may be done either by consent, or compulsorily where the matter requires a prolonged examination of documents or accounts or any scientific or local examination which cannot conveniently be made before a jury or conducted by the Court through its ordinary officers. (Ibid., s. 57). With respect to such proceedings, the Court or judge referring has the same or like powers as they possessed under the C. L. P. Act, 1854 (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 59). Trials before referees are to be, unless otherwise ordered, proceeded with de die in diem (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XXXVI., r. 30), and, as far as possible, in the same manner, and under the same rules as trials by jury (Ibid., rr. 31-3). And any question may be submitted to the Court by the referee (Ibid., r. 34).

Consult Russell on Arbitration, part i. See also ARBITRATOR and REFEREE. As to arbitration between master and workmen, see 5 Geo. IV. c. 96, and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 105.

The 37 & 38 Vict. c. 40, amends the powers of the Board of Trade with respect to inquiries, arbitrations, etc., under special Railway Acts, and provides for the reference of differences to the Railway Commissioners in lieu of arbitrators. See RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

Arbitration between Masters and Workmen. See 'The Arbitration (Masters and Workmen) Act, 1872,' 35 & 36 Vict. c. 46, which amends and enlarges the scope of 5 Geo. IV. c. 96.

Arbitration of exchange, where a merchant pays his debts in one country by a bill of exchange upon another.—2 Mill's Pol. Econ. 168.

Arbitrator or Arbiter, a disinterested person, to whose judgment and decision matters in dispute are referred.—Termes de la Ley, 50.

The civilians make a difference between arbitor and arbitrator, though both found their power in the compromise of the parties; the former being obliged to judge according to the customs of the law: whereas the latter is at liberty to use his own discretion, and accommodate the difference in that manner which appears most just and equitable.

An arbitrator ought to be an indifferent person between the disputants, and should be incorrupt and impartial.

An arbitrator's powers and duties are conferred and imposed by the submission. He is generally the final judge of law and facts; but he is bound by the rules of law, and cannot award anything contrary thereto.

The submission determines the matters which are within an arbitrator's authority. His authority commences from the time of the agreement to refer being signed by all the parties.

As soon as the award is published, the arbitrator's authority is at an end.

An arbitrator may be called as a witness in an action to enforce his award, to prove what passed before him, but he may not be asked as to what passed in his own mind. Buccluch v. Metropolitan Board of Works, L. R. 5 H. L. 418.

It lies entirely with the arbitrator to regulate the proceedings in the reference, and the mode in which they are to be conducted; he must take care to perform any condition precedent to his entering upon the arbitration. Witnesses are compulsorily summoned by rule or order, and are duly sworn.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, ss. 40 & 41; and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 16; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 7. While an arbitrator can delegate a ministerial act, yet he cannot his judicial authority.

Arbitrators under the Judicature Acts are called 'Referees.' See that title and ARBITRATION.—Consult Russ. on Arbitration.

Arbor consanguinitatis, a tree-shaped table, showing the genealogy of a family.—See the Arbor civilis of the civilians and canonists, Hale's Hist. of Com. Law, 335.

Arbor, dum crescit; lignum, cum crescere nescit. 2 Bul. 82.—(A tree is so called whilst growing; but wood when it ceases to grow.)

Arca cyrographica, a common chest with three locks and keys, kept by certain Christians and Jews, wherein all the contracts, mortgages, and obligations belonging to the Jews were preserved to prevent fraud, by order of Richard I.—Hov. Ann. 705.

Archæionomia, a collection of Saxon laws, published during the reign of Queen Elizabeth, in the Saxon language, with a Latin version by Mr. Lambard.

Archbishop [fr. ertz-bischoff, Teut., arch-vevque, Fr., archiepiscopus, Lat., ἀρχιεπίσκοπος, Gk., fr. ἀρχων, chief, and ἐπίσκοπος, bishop, fr. ἐπισκοπῶ, to take care of], the chief of the clergy in his province; he has supreme power under the Queen, in all ecclesiastical causes, and superintends the conduct of other bishops his suffragans. The archbishops are said to be enthroned, when they are vested in the archbishopric, whereas bishops are said to be installed. England has two archbishops, Canterbury and York. The Archbishop of Canterbury is styled Primate of all England, and the Archbishop of York Primate of England. The Archbishop of Canterbury is styled [John], by Divine Providence, Archbishop of Canterbury. See BISHOP.

Archdeacon [fr. ἀρχων, chief, and διακονέω, Gk., to minister], a substitute for the bishop, having ecclesiastical dignity and jurisdiction over the clergy and laity next after the bishop, either throughout the diocese or in some part of it only. He visits his jurisdiction once every year, and has a Court where he may inflict penance, suspend or excommunicate, and hear ecclesiastical causes, subject to an appeal to the bishop by 24 Henry VIII. c. 12. He examines candidates for holy orders, and inducts clerks, upon receipt of the bishop's mandate.—Wood's Inst. 30. The Law styles him the bishop's vicar or vicegerent.

Archdeacon (The) of Bologna, a writer of great repute on Ecclesiastical Law.

Archdeaconry, a division of a diocese, and the circuit of an archdeacon's jurisdiction. The Act 37 & 38 Vict. c. 63 facilitates the re-arrangement of the boundaries of archdeaconries and rural deaneries.

Archery, a service of keeping a bow for the lord's use in the defence of his castle.—Co Litt. 157.

Arches Court [fr. curia de arcubus, Lat.], a court of appeal belonging to the Archbishop of Canterbury, the judge of which is called the Dean of the Arches, because his court was anciently held in the church of Saint Mary-le-Bow (Sancta Maria de arcubus), so named from the steeple, which is raised upon pillars, built archwise, like so many bent bows. It was until recently held, as also were the other principal Spiritual Courts, in the hall belonging to the College of Civilians, commonly called Doctor's Commons. It is now held in Westminster Hall. Its proper jurisdiction is only over the thirteen peculiar parishes belonging to the archbishop in London, but the office of Dean of the Arches having been for a long time united to that of the archbishop's principal official, the Judge of the Arches, in right of such added office, receives and determines appeals from the sentences of all Inferior Ecclesiastical Courts within the province. There was formerly an appeal to the King in Chancery, or to a Court of Delegates, appointed under the Great Seal by 25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, as supreme head of the English Church, instead of to the Bishop of Rome, who originally exercised the jurisdiction; but the 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 92, and 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 41, provided that the appeal should be to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Consult Phillimore's Ecclesiastical Law. The jurisdiction of the Court in testamentary matters was transferred to the Court of Probate by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77.

By the Public Worship Regulation Act, 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 85), provision was made for the appointment of a new ecclesiastical judge (who was appointed soon after the passing of the act), it being enacted that 'whenever a vacancy shall occur in the office of official principal of the Arches Court of Canterbury, the judge shall become ex officio such official principal, and all proceedings thereafter taken before the judge in relation to matters arising within the province of Canterbury shall be deemed to be taken [see Dale's Case, 6 Q. B. D. 376] in the Arches Court of Canterbury.' See PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT, 1874.

Archetype, the original copy.

Archidiaconal, belonging to an archdeacon.

Archiepiscopal, belonging to an archbishop.

Archigrapher, a chief secretary.

Archimandrite, the chief monk in the Greek Church.

Archives [fr. arca, Lat., a chest, or ἀρχεῖον, Gk., a council-house], a chamber or place where ancient records, charters, and evidences belonging to the Crown, the Courts of Chancery and Exchequer, or to a community, city, or family, etc., are kept. It is sometimes used for the writings themselves—thus we say the archives of a college, a monastery, etc.—Cowel.

Archivist, a keeper of archives.

Are [Fr.], a square measure of surface, the sides of which are of the length of ten metres, equal to 1,076,441 square feet.

Area [Lat., a threshing-floor], an enclosed yard or open place connected with a house. 2, Metaphor, the region of discussion.

A rendre [Fr., to render or yield], such as rents and services.

Arentare, to rent or let out at a certain rent.—Blount.

Areopagite, a lawyer or chief judge of the Areopagus in capital matters in Athens; a tribunal so called after a hill or slight eminence, in a street of that city dedicated to Mars, where the Court was held in which those judges were wont to sit. St. Dionysius, converted to Christianity by St. Paul, was one of those judges.

Arepennis, half an acre. Gallic.

Areriesment, hindrance, surprise, affrightment.—Blount.

A rescriptis valet argumentum. Co. Litt. 11.—(An argument drawn from rescripts is sound.) A rescript is a decision of the Pope or Emperor on a doubtful point of law.

Argadia, or Argathalia, Argyleshire, in Scotland.

Argent, silver, sometimes called Luna in the arms of princes, and Pearl in those of peers. As silver soon becomes tarnished, it is generally represented in painting by white. In engraving it is known by the natural colour of the paper.—Heral. Term.

Argentarius, a money-dealer or banker.

Argentum album, white money, silver coin, or pieces of bullion which anciently passed for money.—Spelm.

Argentum Dei, God's money, i.e., money given in earnest upon the making of any bargain, hence, arles, earnest.—Blount.

Argil, or Argoil [fr. argilla, Lat.], clay, lime, and sometimes gravel, also the lees of wine gathered to a certain hardness.—Law Fr.

Arguendo, in the course of the argument.

Argument, in rhetoric and logic, an inference drawn from premises, the truth of which is indisputable, or at least highly probable. In reasoning, Locke observes that men ordinarily use four sorts of arguments. The first is to allege the opinions of men, whose parts and learning, eminency, power, or some other cause, have gained a name, and settled their reputation in the common esteem, with some kind of authority; this may be called argumentum ad verecundiam. The second is to require the adversary to admit what they allege as a proof, or to require a better; this he calls argumentum ad ignorantiam. The third is to press a man with consequences drawn from his own principles, concessions, or actions; this is known by the name of argumentum ad hominem. The fourth the using proofs drawn from any of the foundations of knowledge or probability; this he calls argumentum ad judicium, and he observes that it is the only one of all the four that brings true instruction with it, and advances us in our way to knowledge.

Argumenta ignota et obscura ad lucem rationis proferunt et reddunt splendida. Co. Litt. 395.—(Arguments bring hidden and obscure facts to the light of reason, and render them clear.)

Argumentative. A pleading in which the statement on which the pleader relies is implied instead of being expressed, is argumentative. 'As if B. be sued for converting goods of A., and B. plead that 'A. never had any goods,' the proper pleading is, that the goods were not the goods of A., and that is to be inferred only from the words used. This vice in pleading is no longer a ground of demurrer; but where pleadings are so framed as to prejudice, embarrass, or delay the fair trial of the action, they might under the former practice be struck out or amended under s. 52 of the C. L. P. Act, 1852; and now under the Jud. Act, 1875, Sched. i., Ord. XXVII., r. 1, statements so framed may in like manner be struck out or amended.

Argumentosus, ingenious. Neub. 1, i. c. 14.

Argumentum à communiter accidentibus in jure frequens est. Broom's Max., 5th ed., 44.—(An argument drawn from things commonly happening is frequent in Law.)

Argumentum à divisione est fortissimum in jure. 6 Co. 60.—(An argument from division is most powerful in Law.)

Argumentum à majori ad minus negativè non valet; valet è converso. Jenk. Cent. 281.—(An argument from the greater to the less is of no force negatively, affirmatively it is.)

Argumentum à simili valet in lege. Co. Litt. 191.—(An argument from a like case avails in Law.)

Argumentum ab auctoritate est fortissimum in lege. Co. Litt. 254.—(An argument from authority is most powerful in Law.)

Argumentum ab impossibili plurimum valet in lege. Co. Litt. 92.—(An argument deduced from an impossibility greatly avails in Law.)

Argumentum ab inconvenienti est validum in lege; quia lex non permittit aliquod inconveniens. Co. Litt. 258.—(An argument from inconvenience is good in Law; because the Law will not permit any inconvenience.)

Ariconium, Kenchester, near Hereford.

Arida Villa de, Drayton, or Dreydon in Shropshire.

Arrierban or Arriere-Ban [according to Casseneuve, ban denotes the convening of the noblesse or vassals, who held fees immediately of the Crown, and arriere, those who only held of the Crown mediately], an edict of the ancient kings of France and Germany, commanding all their vassals, the noblesse, and the vassals' vassals, to enter the army, or forfeit their estates on refusal.—Spelm.

Arietum levatio, an old sportive exercise, supposed to be the same with running at the quintain.—Cowel.

Aristocracy [fr. ἀριστος, greatest, and κράειν, Gk., to govern], a form of government which is lodged in a council composed of select members or nobles, without a monarch, and exclusive of the people; also a privileged class of persons or political party in a state.—Paley's Polit. Phi.; Brougham's Polit. Phi.

Aristo-democracy, a form of government composed of nobles and commonalty.

Arles, earnest.

Arma in armatos sumere jura sinunt. 2 Jus. 574.—(The laws permit the taking up of arms against armed persons).

Arm of the Sea, a bay, road, creek, cove, port, or river, where the water, whether salt or fresh, ebbs and flows.—5 Co. 107.

Arma dare, to dub or make a knight. The word 'arma' is here rendered a sword, although a knight was sometimes made by giving him the whole armour.—Ken. Paroch. Antiq. 288.

Arma libera (free arms). When a servant was set free, a sword and lance were usually given to him.—Leg. Wil. c. 65.

Arma moluta (arma emolita), sharp weapons that cut, in contra-distinction to such as are blunt, which only break or bruise.—Fleta, lib. 1, c. 33, par. 6.

Arma mutare, to change arms, a ceremony observed in confirmation of a league or friendship.—Blount.

Arma reversata, reversed arms, a punishment for a traitor or felon.—Cowel.

Armaria. See ALMARIA.

Arm. fil. Armigeri filius: an esquire's son

Armiger, an esquire. A title of dignity belonging to gentlemen who bear arms.—Ken Paroch. Antiq. 576.

Armiscara, an ancient mode of punishment which was to carry a saddle at the back as a token of subjection.—Spelm.

Armistice, a suspension of hostilities between belligerents.

Armorial bearings, a device depicted on the (now imaginary) shield of one of the nobility, of which gentry is the lowest degree. The criterion of nobility is the bearing of arms, or armorial bearings, received from ancestry. There is nothing, however, to prevent persons assuming arbitrary insignia and armorial bearings; and all persons entitled to bear arms can register their genealogies and families at the Herald's College, Benet's Hill London, on payment of a moderate fee, the heralds being the examiners of these matters and the recorders of genealogies. The 4 Geo. III. c. 161, imposed an assessed tax upon armorial bearings, whether borne on plate carriages, seals, or in any other way. This act is now replaced by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14 s. 19, by which 'armorial bearings' include any armorial bearing, crest, or ensign, by whatever name called, and whether registered in the College of Arms or not. This Act, by s. 18, fixes the tax as follows:—if such armorial bearings shall be painted, marked or affixed on a carriage, 2*l.* 2*s.*; and if not so painted, but otherwise worn or used, 1*l.* 1*s.* See Planché's Pursuivant of Arms.

Armorum appellatione, non solum scuta e gladii, et galeæ, sed et fustes et lapides continentur. Co. Litt. 162.—(Under the name of arms are included, not only shields and swords and helmets, but also clubs and stones).

Armour and Arms, are understood in Law to mean things (see preceding title) which a person wears for defence, or takes in hand, or uses in anger, to strike or cast at another. Arms are also insignia, i.e., ensigns of honour which were formerly assumed by soldiers of fortune, and painted on their shields to distinguish them, since they could not be distinguished by the ancient coat of mail from its covering the whole body. King Richard I., during his crusade, first made arms hereditary. Every subject in this realm has a right to carry arms for defence suitable to his condition and degree, and allowed by law, and this right is embodied in the Bill of Rights, 1 W. & M. c. 2, s. 2. The 2 Edw. III. c. 3, prohibits persons going armed under circumstances which may tend to terrify the people or indicate an intention of disturbing the public peace. The 60 Geo. III. c. 1, prohibits the training of persons without lawful authority to the use of arms, and authorizes any justice of the peace to disperse any assembly of persons that he may find engaged in such occupation, and to arrest any of the persons present. The Act 33 & 34 Vict. c. 57, imposes a penalty on persons using or carrying a gun elsewhere than in a dwelling house or the curtilage thereof, without a license. The duty on such license is 10s.

Army [fr. arme, Fr.], the military force of a country. Prior to A.D. 1879 and since A.D. 1689 the army was regulated by Annual Mutiny Acts usually expiring in April (see, e.g., 41 Vict. c. 10), and by the 'Articles of War' which those Acts empowered the Sovereign to make. In 1879 the Army Discipline Act, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 33, consolidated the provisions of the Mutiny Act with the Articles of War. This Act having been amended by the Army Discipline and Regulation Annual Act, 1881, which substituted 'summary' for corporal punishment, and also by the Regulation of the Forces Act, 1881, a fairly complete military code is now contained in the 'Army Act, 1881,' 44 & 45 Vict. c. 58.

This Act of 1881, in like manner as did the Act of 1879, requires to be renewed by an annual 'commencement' act (see, e.g., 45 Vict. c. 7) to be passed for that purpose. Such annual act follows the precedent of the Mutiny Acts in reciting the illegality of a standing army in time of peace without consent of Parliament (as declared by the Bill of Rights 1 W & M. s. 2, c. 2), and in specifying the exact number of forces to be employed for the current year.

The administration of the estate of officers or soldiers dying on service is regulated by the Regimental Debts Act, 1863, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 57, and Regimental Exchanges by the Regimental Exchange Act, 1875, 38 Vict. c. 16.

Army Brokerage Acts, 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 16; 49 Geo. III. c. 126, acts forbidding the purchase of offices; so called by 38 Vict. c. 16, Regimental Exchanges Act, 1875.

Arnaldia, a disease that makes the hair fall off, otherwise called alopecia, because foxes are subject to it.—Hoved. 693.

Arnalia, arable grounds.—Domesday, tit. 'Essec.'

Aromatarius, a word formerly used for a grocer.—1 Vent. 142.

Arpen or Arpent, an acre or furlong of ground. According to Domesday Book, 100 perches make an arpent.—Blount.

Arpentator, a measurer or surveyor of land.—Cowel.

Arquebuss [fr. haeck-buyse, haeck-busse, Du., properly a gun fired from a rest, from haeck, the hook or forked rest on which it is supported, and busse, Germ., büchse, a fire-arm. From haecke-busse, it became harquebuss, and in It., archibuso or arcobugia, as if from arco, a bow. In Scotch it was called a hagbut of croche; Fr. arquebus à croc., Jamies., Wedgw.], a short hand-gun, a caliver or pistol, mentioned in some of our ancient statutes.—Fr. Law.

Arrack, a spirit procured from distillation of the cocoa-nut tree, rice, or sugar-cane, and imported from India.

Arraiatio peditum, arraying of foot soldiers.—1 Edw. II.

Arraiers, officers who had the care of the soldiers' armour, and whose business it was to see them duly accoutred. Commissioners were afterwards appointed for the same purpose.—Blount.

Arraign [fr. arraisonner, aresner, aregnir, arraigner, old Fr., i.e., ad rationem ponere, Lat., to call one to account], to bring a prisoner to the bar of the Court to answer the matter charged upon him in the indictment. The arraignment of a prisoner consists of calling upon him by name, and reading to him the indictment (in the English tongue), and demanding of him whether he be guilty or not guilty, and entering his plea. The pleas upon arraignment are either the general issue, i.e., not guilty, or a plea in abatement or in bar, or the prisoner may demur to the indictment, or he may confess the fact, upon which the Court proceeds immediately to judgment. But if the prisoner 'shall stand mute of malice, or will not answer directly to the indictment or information, in every such case it is now lawful for the Court, if it shall so think fit, to order the proper officer to enter a plea of "not guilty" on behalf of such person, and the plea so entered shall have the same force and effect as if the person had so pleaded the same' (7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 2). And see 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 94, s. 2, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 50, s. 3; 2 Hale's P. C. 151; 4 Bl. Com. 322; Hawk. P. C. c. 28, s. 1; and Archbold's Criminal Pleading.

Arraigns, Clerk of, an assistant to the clerk of assize.

Arrameur, an ancient port-officer, whose business was to load and unload vessels.

Arrangements between debtors and creditors. See 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 126, and General Rules in Bankruptcy, 252—315.

Arras, a marriage portion.—Spanish.

Array [fr. arredare, It., to get ready], to rank or set forth a jury of men impanelled upon a cause. To challenge the array of the panel is at once to except against all persons arrayed or impanelled, in respect of partiality or some default in the sheriff.—Co. Litt. 156. If the sheriff be of affinity to any of the parties, or if any one or more of the jurors are returned at the nomination of either party, or for any other partiality, the array shall be quashed.—See Archbold's Criminal Pleading, 17th ed., 153—5.

Array, Military commission of. Previous to the reign of Henry VIII., in order to protect the kingdom from domestic insurrections or the prospects of foreign invasions, it was usual from time to time for our princes to issue commissions of array, and send into every county officers in whom they could confide, to muster, array, or set in military order the inhabitants of every district; the form of the commission was settled by 5 Hen. IV., so as to prevent the insertion therein of any new penal clauses.—Rushworth, pt. 3, pp. 662, 667.

Arrears, or Arrearages, money unpaid at the due time : as rent behind ; the remainder due after payment of a part of an account ; money in the hands of an accounting party.—Covel.

Arrectatus, one suspected of a crime.—Offic. Coronat.

Arrected, reckoned, considered.—1 Inst. 173, b & n.

Arrenatus, arraigned, accused.—Rot. Parl. 21 Edw. I.

Arrendare, to let lands yearly.

Arrentation [fr. arrendar, Span.], licensing the owner of lands in a forest, to enclose them with a low hedge and small ditch according to the assize of the forest, under a yearly rent. Saving the arrentations, is reserving a power to give such licenses.—Ordin. Forestar. 34 Edw. I. s. 5.

Arrest [fr. restare, Lat., arrestare, It., arrestar, Fr., to bring one to stand], the restraining of the liberty of a man's person in order to compel obedience to the order of a court of justice, or to prevent the commission of a crime, or to ensure that a person charged or suspected of a crime may be forthcoming to answer it. Arrests are either in civil or criminal cases ; civil arrests must be effected, in order to be legal, by virtue of a precept or writ issued out of some Court, but every person has authority to arrest criminals without warrant or precept.—Termes de la Ley, 52. The law of civil arrest, so far as it still exists, is regulated by the Debtors' Act, 1869, which abolished imprisonment for debt except in cases where a debtor has the means to pay his debt but refuses to do so. The two great statutes for securing the liberty of the subject against unlawful arrests and suits are Magna Charta and Habeas Corpus Act (31 Car. II. c. 2), which is amended and enforced by 56 Geo III. c. 100.

Arrest of inquest, pleading in arrest of taking the inquest upon a former issue, and showing cause why an inquest should not be taken.—Bro. tit. 'Repleader.'

Arrest of judgment. An unsuccessful defendant may move that the judgment for the plaintiff be arrested or withheld, notwithstanding a verdict given, on the ground that there is some substantial error appearing on the face of the record which vitiates the proceedings. Judgment may be arrested for good cause in criminal cases, if the indictment be insufficient.—3 Inst. 210 ; and see Br. and Had. Com. iii. 369, and iv. 468. If the judgment be arrested, each party pays his own costs.

As to motions in arrest of judgment see Rules of the Supreme Court, Ord. LIII.

Arrest on mesne process. This is abolished by the Debtors' Act, 1869, the power of arrest upon mesne process, which was originally very extensive, having been confined by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 1, to the case of a debtor about to quit England, and where the amount of the debt was 20*l.* or upwards. The Debtors' Act, 1869, however, enacts that where a plaintiff has good cause of action against the defendant to the amount of 50*l.* or upwards, and the defendant is about to quit England, and 'the absence of the defendant from England will materially prejudice the plaintiff in the prosecution of his action,' a judge may order the defendant to be arrested unless or until security be found. See MESNE PROCESS.

Arrestandis bonis ne dissipentur, a writ which lay for a person whose cattle or goods were taken by another, who during a contest was likely to make away with them, and who had not the ability to render satisfaction.—Reg. Orig. 126.

Arrestando ipsum qui pecuniam recepit, a writ which issued for apprehending a person who had taken the king's prest money to serve in the wars, and then hid himself in order to avoid going.—Ibid. 24.

Arrestee, the person in whose possession a debt or property has been attached by arrestment.—Scotch Law.

Arrester, the person who procures an arrestment.—Ibid.

Arrestment, a process of attachment prohibiting a person, in whose hands a debtor's goods are, to pay or deliver up the same to such debtor, till a creditor, who has procured an arrestment to be laid on, be satisfied, either by caution, i.e., security, or payment, according to the grounds of arrestment.—Ibid.

Arrestment jurisdictionis fundandæ causâ, a process to bring a foreigner within the jurisdiction of the Courts of Scotland. The warrant attaches a foreigner's goods within the jurisdiction, and these will not be released unless caution or security be given.—Ibid.

Arresto facto super bonis mercatorum alienigenorum, a writ against the goods of aliens found, within this kingdom, in recompense of goods taken from a denizen in a foreign country, after denial of restitution.—Reg. Orig. 129. The ancient civilians called it clarigatio, but by the moderns it is termed reprisalia.

Arret [Fr.], a judgment, decree, or sentence.

Arretted, charged. The convening a person charged with a crime before a judge.—Staudf. Pl. Cr. 45. It is used sometimes for imputed or laid unto: as no folly may be arretted to one under age.—Cowel.

Arrha, short for arrhabo [fr. ἀρράβων, Gk.], earnest, pledge, evidence of a completed bargain.—Jacob.

Arriage and Carriage, indefinite services formerly demandable from tenants; abolished by 20 Geo. II. c. 50, ss. 21, 22.

Arriere fee, or fief, a fee dependent on a superior fee. These fees originated when dukes and counts, rendering their governments hereditary, distributed to their officers parts of the domain, and permitted those officers to gratify the soldiers under them in the same manner.—Encyc. Lond.

Arriere vassal, the vassal of a vassal.

Arrogation, the adoption of a person of full age, while adoption properly so called was of a person under full age.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 42, 306.

Arrura [fr. ἀροῦρα, Gk.], a day's ploughing. Paroch. Antiq. 41.

Arsenals [fr. arzana, darzena, tarzana, It.], dockyards, magazines, and other military stores.

Arsenic, regulating sale of.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 13.

Arser in le main, burning in the hand. The punishment of criminals who had the benefit of clergy, which benefit was abolished by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28.—Termes de la Ley.

Ars est celare artem.—(True art consists in concealing that any art is used.)

Ars quod à teneris primum conjungitur annis. 3 Inst. Epil.—(That becomes an art which is joined to us from our tender years.)

Arson [fr. ardeo, Lat., to burn], the malicious firing of a house or other building. The law upon this subject is to be found in 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 1—8. As to maliciously setting fire to ships, see ss. 42—4; to crops, etc., ss. 16—18; to coal-mines, s. 27; and to railway buildings, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 8.

Arsura, the trial of money by fire, after it was coined.—Blount.

Art, Words of, words used in a technical sense; words scientifically fit to carry the sense assigned them.

Art and Part, a Scotch law term. Signifies the aiding or abetting in the perpetration of a crime.—Bell's Law Dictionary.

Art Unions, 'voluntary associations for the purchase of paintings, drawings, and other works of art to be distributed by chance or otherwise amongst the members.' So defined by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 48, which legalizes the distribution by chance (provided a royal charter incorporating the association shall have been obtained), which would otherwise be illegal under the Lottery Acts.

Art, Exhibition of works of. The Act 29 & 30 Vict. c. 16, enables the owner for the time being of any work of art, without incurring any responsibility for any consequent loss or injury, to lend such work to the Lord President for the time being of the Privy Council for any period not exceeding twelve months, to be exhibited to the public, by him or by his direction, at the exhibitions therein mentioned.

Arthel, Ardhel, or Arddelio, to avouch, as if a man were taken with stolen goods in his possession he was allowed a lawful arthel, i.e., vouchee, to clear him of the felony, but provision was made against it by 28 Hen. VIII. c. 6.—Blount.

Article [articulus, Lat.], a complaint exhibited in the Ecclesiastical Court by way of libel.—3 Bl. Com. 109. 2. The different parts of a libel, responsive allegation, or counter allegation in the Ecclesiastical Courts.

Articled clerk, a pupil of an attorney or solicitor, titles now merged in one,—'Solicitor of the Supreme Court,'—who undertakes, by articles, of clerkship, containing covenants, mutually binding, to instruct him in the principles and practice of the profession. As to the articles of service, their registration and enrolment, the mode of service, examination, admission, and fees, see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 86; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 88; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 73; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 63; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 81; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 39; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127. The 37 & 38 Vict. c. 68, enables articulated clerks to hold offices or engage in employments upon certain conditions, as to which see sections 4 et seq. And see SOLICITOR.

Articles, divisions and paragraphs of a document or agreement. It is a common practice for persons to enter into articles of agreement, preparatory to the execution of a formal deed, whereby it is stipulated that one of the parties shall convey to the other certain lands, or release his right to them, or execute some other disposition of them.

Articles are therefore considered as a memorandum or minute of an agreement to make some future disposition or modification of real property. Such an instrument will create a trust or equitable estate, and a specific performance of it will be decreed in equity.

Articles are usually entered into for the purchase and sale of lands, for the taking and granting of leases, for making mortgages and settlements on marriage, and for forming partnerships. See IMPEACHMENT.

Articles, Lords of, a committee of the Scottish Parliament, which, in the mode of its election, and by the nature of its powers, was calculated to increase the influence of the Crown, and to confer upon it a power equivalent to that of a negative before debate. This system appeared inconsistent with the freedom of Parliament, and at the Revolution, the Convention of Estates declared it a grievance, and accordingly it was suppressed by the act 1690, c. 3.

Articles of the peace, a complaint exhibited either in the Queen's Bench at Westminster, Court of Oyer and Terminer, or Sessions of the Peace, when any one has just cause to fear that some one will burn his house, do him some corporal hurt, or procure a third person to perpetrate it. Upon articles setting forth the fact being sworn to by the complainant, sureties of the peace are taken for such a length of time as the Court shall think necessary, not being confined to a twelve-month. 1 T. R. 696; Bac. Ab. tit. 'Surety of the Peace.'

Articles of religion, commonly called the Thirty-nine Articles, a body of divinity drawn up by the convocation in 1562, and confirmed by James I. Consult Burnet on the 'Articles.' The 17 & 18 Vict. c. 81, ss. 43, 44, has rendered unnecessary subscription to these articles, or any oath, on matriculating or on taking a degree in the University of Oxford: and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 88, ss. 45, 46, contains a similar enactment in regard to the University of Cambridge.

Articles of roup, the conditions under which property is exposed to sale by action. —Scotch Law.

Articles of war, a code of laws for the regulation of the land forces, made prior to 1879, in pursuance of the several annual acts against mutiny and desertion. See ARMY. Formerly there were also Articles of the Navy, embodied in 22 Geo. II. c. 33; but that statute, and others amending it, were repealed by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 123.

Articuli cleri, statutes containing certain articles relating to the church, clergy, and causes ecclesiastical, made at Lincoln.—9 Edw. II. st. 1; 1 Reeves, c. xii. 290.

Articulus cleri. A resolution of convocation.

Articuli super chartas, the 28 Edw. I. st. 3, s. 2; Reeves, c. ix. 103; and c. xi. 233.

Artificers, persons who are masters of their art, and whose employment consists chiefly in manual labour.—5 Geo. IV. c. 97, and 6 Geo. IV. c. 135; Cunningham.

Artificial person, a corporation, a body of men, a company.

Artillery Ranges Act, 1862.—25 & 26 Vict. c. 36.

Artizans' and Labourers' Dwellings.—See LABOURERS' DWELLINGS.

A rubro ad nigrum, to proceed to the sense of the text in a statute by looking at the title; the title was written in red, the text in black.

Arundinetum [fr. arundo, Lat.], a ground or place where reeds grow.—1 Inst. 4.

Arundinis vadum, the ancient name of Redbridge, in Hampshire.

Aruntina vallis, the ancient name of Arundel in Sussex.

Arvil-supper, a feast or entertainment made at a funeral in the north of England; arvil bread is bread delivered to the poor at funeral solemnities, and arvil, arval, or arfal, the burial or funeral rites.—Cowel.

Arvonica, the ancient name of Carnarvonshire.

As, a pound weight, a unit, the whole of an inheritance. For its divisions, see Sand. Just., 5th ed., 190; Cum. C. L. 139 n. (1); and Tayl. C. L. 491.

As against, as between, these words contrast the relative position of two persons with a tacit reference to a different relationship between one of them and a third person. For instance, the temporary bailee of a chattel is entitled to it, as between himself and a stranger, or as against a stranger; reference being made by this form of words to the rights of the bailor.

Ascendants, the progenitors of a family.

Ascesterium, a monastery.—Du Cange.

Ascriptitius, a naturalized foreigner.—Civ. Law.

Ash Wednesday, the first day of Lent. It was formerly called Caput Jejunii, the head of the fast; or Dies Cinerum, the day of ashes. It took its name from an old custom of casting ashes upon penitents, and then thrusting them from the church.—Wheatley on the Com. Prayer, c. v., s. 11.

Asper, a Turkish coin, value five farthings.

Asphyxia [fr. à, not, and σφύξις, Gk., pulse], suspended animation, produced by the non-conversion of the venous blood of the lungs into arterial.—Dunglison.

Asportation, carrying away or removing goods. In all larcenies, there must be both a taking and a carrying away (cepit et asportavit).—4 Bl. Com. 431; Arch. Consolid. Crim. Stat. 153.

Assach, or Assath, a custom of purgation formerly used in Wales, by which an accused party cleared or purged himself of the accusation by the oaths of three hundred men. Abolished by 1 Hen. V. c. 6. Consult 27 Hen. VIII. c. 7.—Spelm.

Assart, or Essart [fr. Assartum in Lat.], an offence committed in the forest, by pulling up the trees by the roots that are thickets and coverts for deer, and making the ground plain as arable land. It differs from waste, in that waste is the cutting down of coverts which may grow again, whereas assart is the plucking them up by the roots and utterly destroying them, so that they can never afterward grow. This is not an offence if done with license to convert forest into tillage ground. Consult Manwood's Forest Laws, Part I., 171.

Assassination [Hashish is the name of an intoxicating drug, prepared from hemp, in use among the natives of the East. Hence Arab 'Haschischin,' a name given to the members of a sect in Syria, who wound themselves up by doses of hashish to perform, at all risks, the orders of their lord, known as the Sheik, or Old Man of the Mountain. As the murder of his enemies would be the most dreaded of these behests, the name of Assassin was given to one commissioned to perform a murder.—Wedgw.], murdering a person by lying in wait for hire.—Jacob.

Assault [fr. salire, Lat., to leap; sailler, assailler, Fr., to assail; insultus, Lat.], an attempt or offer, with force and violence, to do a corporal hurt to another, as by striking at him with or without a weapon. No words, how provoking soever they be, will amount to an assault. Assault does not always necessarily imply a hitting or blow; because in trespass for assault and battery, a person may be found guilty of the assault, but not guilty of the battery. But battery always includes an assault.—1 Hawk. P. C. c. lxii. s. 1. As to aggravated assaults, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 43.

Assay [fr. exigere, Lat., to test], of weights and measures, the examining of weights and measures by clerks of markets, etc.—Blount. Also the testing and proving of coins, metals, etc. By 7 & 8 Vict. c. 22, s. 2, it was made felony to forge or counterfeit any assay mark.

Assayer of the King, an officer of the Mint, who tried the silver; he was indifferently appointed by the Master of the Mint and the merchants, who carried silver thither for exchange.—Ibid.

Assaysaire, to associate or take as fellow judges; used in old charters.—Cowel.

Assecurare, to secure by pledges, a solemn interposition of faith.—Hov. 1174.

Assembly [fr. simul, Lat., together; hence ensemble, assembler, Fr., to draw together], General, the highest ecclesiastical court in Scotland, composed of a representation of the ministers and elders of the church, regulated by the Act 5th, Assembly, 1694.

Assembly, unlawful, a meeting of three or more persons to do an unlawful act.—3 Inst. 9; 1 Hawk. 155. See OFFENCE.

Assent, or Consent, agreeing to, or recognizing a matter, as an executor's assent to a legacy, or the assent of a corporation to by-laws, etc. See ROYAL ASSENT.

Assertory covenant, an affirming promise under seal.

Assess [fr. assessum, Lat., setting a tax], to rate or ascertain.

Assessed taxes, duties charged upon persons in respect of articles in their use or keeping, as servants, carriages, and armorial bearings. They are under the management of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue.—See especially 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, and the 'Taxes Management Act, 1880.' See EXCISE.

Assessors, literally those who sit by the side of another: persons appointed to ascertain and fix the value of taxes, rates, etc. Also persons sometimes associated with judges of courts to advise and direct the decisions of such judges.

By the 56th Section of the Jud. Act, 1873, the High Court or the Court of Appeal may, when it may think it expedient, call in the aid of one or more assessors specially qualified and try and hear the matter in question wholly or partially with the assistance of such assessors, but the powers of this section have not, it is believed, been exercised, except in Admiralty cases. By the County Court Admiralty Jurisdiction Act, 1868, s. 14, provision is made for the appointment of assessors of 'nautical skill and experience' in admiralty actions, and such assessors frequently sit in County Courts under the powers of this act.

Assets [fr. assetz, Nor.-Fr., i.e., satis, Lat.; assetz, Fr., sufficient; in Old English it was commonly written assetts], the property of a deceased person, which is chargeable with, and applicable to the payment of, his debts and legacies.

Assets are either per descent, or real; or enter maines of an executor, or personal.

The following kinds of property, descended from a person seised in fee, are real assets:—freeholds; ancient demesnes; gavelkind; Borough-English; land descended from an ancestor, between whom and the heir there is an intermediate descent; lands descended on the part of the father and of the mother; a trust estate in fee-simple; tithes in the hands of laymen; advowson in fee appendant to a manor; advowson in fee in gross; whether the descent is of a trust estate, or the legal estate, Equity will decree a sale for the payment of judgment and specialty debts; an estate pur autre vie limited to the ancestor and his heirs (1 Vict. c. 26, s. 6); a reversion in fee descended.—Ram on Assets, c. ix. s. 2.

The following kinds of property are personal assets:—an estate pur autre vie in freehold land and limited to the testator merely, or to him, his executors, and administrators; a rent-charge pur autre vie, and limited to the grantee merely, without naming his heirs, executors, or administrators; an estate pur autre vie by a lease limited to A. and his heirs, and in a settlement made by A. converted into a personal estate, and afterwards devised by him; the right of the next presentation to a church, which is full, and which right has been granted to a person, who dies possessed of it; timber growing on the estate of a lunatic, and cut under an order of the Court of Chancery, founded on the report, that it would be for the benefit of the lunatic, and sold, the produce of the sale being paid into Court on account of the lunatic; damages recovered by an executor in an action of trespass or trespass on the case (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 2); all personal property which devolves upon executors.—Ram on Assets, c. ix. s. 1.

Again, assets are distributed into legal and equitable.

The distinction is this—the property of a deceased person, which is in the hands of an executor or administrator virtute officii, and which can be reached for the purpose of satisfying a creditor by an action at Law, is commonly termed legal assets, and will be applied, both at Law and in Equity, in the ordinary course of administration, which gives debts of a certain nature a priority over others; where, however, the assets are such as are recognized only in Equity, they are termed equitable assets, and according to the well-known maxim that equality is equity, will, after satisfying those that have liens on any specific property, be distributed amongst the creditors of all grades equally, i.e., pari passu; or should the funds fall short, then rateably by way of dividend, without any regard to legal priority, all debts being equal when conscientiously considered. Equitable assets are of three kinds:—(1) those created by the acts of the testator, by charging or devising his land for payment of debts; (2) those which, not being recognizable or attainable at Law, are created in Equity—such as an equity of redemption, or the separate estate of a deceased wife; and (3) those so declared by statute. Prior to 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 104, the real estate of a deceased person was not chargeable with his debts by operation of law, and prior to 32 & 33 Vict. c. 46, specialty debts, which are debts created by deed under seal, had a priority over simple contract debts, which are debts created by word of mouth, but 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 104, made the real estate of deceased persons 'assets to be administered in equity for the payment of their just debts, as well debts due on simple contract as on specialty,' and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 46 did away with the priority of specialty debts.

The order in which Equity administers assets, partly legal and partly equitable, is this:—

(1st.) Personalty, not exempted by a testator either by express words or manifest intent, from the payment of debts or not specifically bequeathed.

This being legal assets, is to be applied in a course of administration for the payment of debts and legacies, according to their legal priorities.

After the exhaustion of the unexempted personalty, which is the natural and first fund for the payment of debts, then (2nd.) A real fund created for the exclusive purpose of satisfying debts.

(3rd.) Real estates, devised or ordered to be sold for payment of debts, not merely charged with such payment, and whether the inheritance, or a term carved out of it, be so limited.

These being equitable assets are to be applied in the payment of debts, pari passu. And in case the creditors are paid out of the personal estate, in payment of legatees prout tanto, whether specific or otherwise.

(4th.) Real estates descended, whether freehold or copyhold, and whether in the possession of the deviser at the date of his will, or subsequently acquired.

These being legal assets are to be applied to the payment of debts, and then of legacies pari passu, whether specific or pecuniary.

(5th.) Realty or personalty devised or bequeathed.

queathed, charged with and subject to the payment of debts, and specifically disposed of subject to such debts.

These being equitable assets are to be applied in payment of debts, pari passu, and, should the creditors be paid out of the personal estates, in payment of legatees pro tanto. Personalty given charged with debts seems equally liable with realty given so charged, in favour of general legatees, but as legal assets.

(6th.) General pecuniary legacies pro rata.

(7th.) Real estate specifically devised, and personal estate specifically bequeathed without any charge of debts.

(8th.) Realty and personalty, which testator had power to appoint, and which he has appointed by his will.

(9th.) The testator's widow's paraphernalia.

In commerce the term 'assets' is used to designate the stock in trade and entire property belonging to a merchant, or to a trading association with reference to bankruptcy.

Asseveration [fr. assevero, Lat., to affirm earnestly, fr. severus, serious], positive affirmation or assertion, solemn declaration.

Assewiare, to draw or drain water from marsh grounds.—Cowel.

Assidere, or Assedare, to tax equally. Sometimes used in the sense of assigning an annual rent to be paid out of a particular farm, etc.—Mat. Paris, anno 1232.

Assign, variously applied; generally to set over a right to another, or appoint a deputy; specially, to set forth or point at, as to assign error, false judgment: to new assign was, under the old practice, a pleading by the plaintiff following the defendant's plea, wherein the plaintiff pointed out the exact grievance meant to be complained of in his declaration, and not met by the defendant in his plea. The judges are said to be assigned to take assizes. See ASSISEMENT.

Assignment, assignment.—Scotch Law.

Assignatus utitur jure auctoris.—(The assignee makes use of the right of his assignor.)

Assignee, or Assign, a person appointed by another to do any act or perform any business; also a person who takes some right, title, or interest in things by an assignment from an assignor. They are divided into: (1) assignees by deed, as when a lessee of a term sells or assigns it to another; and, (2) assignees by law, as when property devolves upon an executor, without any specific appointment, the executor is assignee in law to the testator. Assignees in bankruptcy (now called trustees; see BANKRUPTCY) are those persons in whom the property of a bankrupt vests by virtue of their appointment.

Assignment, a transfer of the whole of a particular estate, the operative verbs being 'assign, transfer, and set over.' But other words indicating an intention to make a complete transfer will amount to an assignment. An assignee is liable for the breach of all covenants running with the land broken during the subsistence of the assignment, but he may assign over to a mere beggar to get rid of his continuing liability under such covenants; although he cannot thus escape from liability on his covenant for indemnity.

Assignment of Dower, the ascertaining and setting out of a widow's portion of her deceased husband's realty for her thirds or dower.

Assignment of errors, the formal statement of the objection or error in the record complained of. See ERROR.

Assignor, a person who transfers or makes over property to another.

Assimulate, to connect highways.—Leg. Hen. I. c. 8.

Assisa, a law.—1 Reeves, c. iv. 215.

Assisa cadere, to be nonsuited, as when there is such a plain and legal insufficiency in an action, that the plaintiff cannot successfully proceed any further in it.—Fleta, lib. 4, c. 15; Bracton, lib. 2, c. vii.

Assisa cadit in juratum, to submit a controversy to trial by jury.—Ibid.

Assisa continuanda, an ancient writ addressed to the justices of assize for the continuation of a cause, when certain facts put in issue could not have been proved in time by the party alleging them.—Reg. Orig. 217; and Termes de la Ley, 'Continuance.'

Assisor panis et cerevisiæ, the power or privilege of assizing or adjusting the weight and measure of bread and beer.—51 Hen. III.; Cowell, 2 Reeves, c. viii. 56. Repealed by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 37.

Assisa proroganda, an obsolete writ, which was directed to the judges assigned to take assizes, to stay proceedings, by reason of a party to them being employed in the king's business.—Reg. Orig. 208.

Assisa Utrum. See ASSISE DE UTRUM.

Assise de Utrum, an obsolete writ, which lay for the parson of a Church whose predecessor had alienated the land and rents of it.—F.N.B. 48.

Assise, or Assize [fr. assideo, Lat., to sit together, whence assire, O. Fr., to set, assis, set, seated, sealed], a jury, who sit together for the purpose of trying a cause, or rather a court of jurisdiction which summons a jury by a commission of assize to take the assizes. Hence the judicial assemblies held by the commission in every county as well to take indictments as to try causes at Nisi Prius, are commonly termed the assizes. There are two commissions. (I.) General, which is issued twice a year to the judges of the High Court of Justice; two judges being usually assigned to every circuit. See CIRCUITS. The judges have four several commissions: (1) Of oyer and terminer, directed to them and many other gentlemen of the county, by which they are empowered to try treasons, felonies, etc. This is the largest commission. (2) Of gaol delivery, directed to the judges and the clerk of assize associate, empowering them to try every prisoner in the gaol committed for any offence whatsoever, so as to clear the prisons. (3) Of Nisi Prius, directed to the judges, the clerks of assize and others, by which civil causes, in which issue has been joined in one of the Divisions of the High Court of Justice, are tried on circuit by a jury of twelve men of the county in which the venue is laid. See NISI PRIUS. (4) A commission of the peace, by which all justices are bound to be present at their county assizes, besides the sheriffs, to give attendance to the judges or else suffer a fine. There used to be another Commission—that of assize directed to the judges and clerk of assize, to take assizes and do right upon writs of assize brought before them, by such as were wrongfully thrust out of their possessions. These writs are abolished, and recourse is had to an action of ejectment, tried at Nisi Prius. (II.) The other division of commissions is special, granted to certain judges to try certain causes and crimes.—Bracton, lib. 3; 3 Bl. Com. 60, 269. See now the Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 11, 16, 29, 37, 77, 93, and 99, under which, however, no very material alteration is made in the manner of holding the assizes. A cause or matter not involving any question or issue of fact may be tried and determined with consent at the assizes (s. 29).

The holding of Winter and Spring Assizes is regulated by Orders in Council issued from time to time under the Winter Assizes Acts, 1876 & 1877, and the Spring Assizes Act, 1879 (39 & 40, Vict. c. 57, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 46, and 42 Vict. c. 1).

Assise of arms, 27 Hen II. A.D. 1181.

Assise of bread, the sealed rate for the sale of bread.

Assise of darrein presentment, or last presentation; it lay when a person, or his ancestors, under whom he claims, had presented a clerk to a benefice who was duly instituted, and afterwards, upon the next avoidance, a stranger presents a clerk, thus disturbing the right of the lawful patron; upon this, the patron issued this writ, directed to the sheriff to summon an assize or jury, to inquire who was the last patron that presented to the church now vacant, of which the plaintiff complains that he is deforced by the defendant.—Termes de la Ley, 473. It was, however, abolished, and recourse had to the action of quare impedit (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27). But since the C. L. P. Act, 1860, s. 26, no quare impedit can be brought, but an action may be commenced in the Common Pleas Division of the High Court of Justice.

Assise of mort d'ancestor, a writ which lay where a person's father, mother, brother, sister, uncle, aunt, etc., died, seised of land, and a stranger abated. It is abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Assise of novel disseisin, an action similar in its nature to the one above, although it differed in many points. It is abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Assise of the forest, a statute touching orders to be observed in the king's forests.—Manwood, 35. See Com. Dig., tit. 'Assise.'

Assiser, an officer who has the care and oversight of weights and measures.

Assises de Jerusalem, a monument of feudal jurisprudence, compiled by Gottfried of Bouillon, for the government of the Holy City after its conquest by the Crusaders. It was revised in the 13th and 14th centuries for the use of the Latin Kingdom of Cyprus.—1 Colq. R. C. L. s. 80, p. 86; 1 Hall. Lit. Hist. Eur. 28.

Assistance, Writ of, appears to have been first employed in the reign of James I.; from that time, though in general parlance it is said that the decree of the Court of Chancery acts only in personam, yet, if the possession of lands be decreed or ordered, and the defendant refuse to perform the decree, the Court directs this writ of execution to the sheriff, to enforce its decree.—Consolid. Ord. xxix. r. 5.

Assistant Judge of Middlesex Sessions, appointed by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71; may appoint a deputy.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, s. 14. See 22 & 23 Vict. c. 4.

Assistant overseers, appointed by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 84, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, ss. 61, 62.

Assius, rented or farmed out for such an assize or certain assessed rent in money or provisions.—Blount.

Assithment [fr. ad and sithe, Sax., vice], a weregeld or compensation by a pecuniary mulct.—Cowel.

Assize. See ASSISE. In the practice of the criminal courts of Scotland, the fifteen men who decide on the conviction or acquittal of an accused person are called the assize, though in popular language, and even in statutes, they are called the jury.

Associate, was an Officer in each of the Courts of Common Law, appointed by the chief judge of the Court, and holding his office dum bene se gesserit (15 & 16 Vict. c. 73); his duties being to superintend the entry of causes; to attend the sittings of Nisi Prius, and there receive and enter verdicts; to draw up the *postea*s, and any orders of Nisi Prius. The associates are now officers of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 77), and by the Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, are styled 'Masters of the Supreme Court.'

Association, a writ or patent sent by the Crown to the Justices appointed to take assizes to have others (serjeants-at-law, for instance) associated with them; it is usual where a judge becomes unable to attend to his circuit duties, or dies.—Reg. Orig. 201. Also a public company or partnership.

The association of the people formed by 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 27, s. 3, for the protection of the king and government, was put an end to by 1 Anne, st. 1, c. 22, s. 3.

Associations, Unlawful. See SOCIETIES.

Assoile [fr. absolvere, Lat; absolver, assoiller, O. Fr.], to deliver from excommunication; to acquit or absolve.—Stamdf. Pl. Cr. 72.

Assoilzie, to acquit a defendant, or to find a person not guilty of a crime.—Scotch Law.

As soon as possible. Within a reasonable time, the shortest practicable. Hydraulic Engineering Co. v. McHaffie, 4 Q. B. D. at p. 673.

Assuetude, custom.

Assumpsit [fr. assumo, Lat., to take upon oneself]. The action of assumpsit (which as a technical name, falls into desuetude with the passing of the Judicature Acts, 1873 and 1875) lies for the recovery of damages for loss or injuries sustained by reason of the breach or non-performance of a promise, either expressed or implied, the promise not being under seal, but yet founded on a proper consideration. See PLEADING.

The ordinary division of this action was into (1) common or indebitatus assumpsit, brought for the most part on an implied promise; and (2) special assumpsit, founded on an express promise.—Steph. Plead., 7th ed., 11, 13.

Assumption, the day of the death of a saint, quia ejus anima in cælum assumitur (because his soul is taken into heaven).—Du Cange. Also a usurpation.

Assurance. See INSURANCE.

Assurances, the legal evidence of the transfer of property, called common assurances, by which every man's property is secured to him, and controversies, doubts, and difficulties prevented and removed. See BARGAIN and SALE, LEASE and RELEASE, GRANT, COMMON ASSURANCES, etc., and generally under DEED.—2 Bl. Com. 294.

Assured, a person assured and indemnified against certain events. See INSURANCE.

Assurer, an insurer against certain perils and dangers; an underwriter; an indemnifier. See INSURANCE.

Assythment, damages recoverable by the heirs or representatives of a person killed from the person killing.

Aster, or homo aster, a resident.—Brit. 151.

Astipulation [fr. astipulor, Lat.], a mutual agreement, assent, and consent between parties; also a witness or record.

Astitrarius hæres [fr. astre, Fr., the hearth of a chimney], an heir apparent who has been placed, by conveyance, in possession of his ancestor's estate, during such ancestor's lifetime.—Co. Litt. 8.

Astrictio [fr. astrictio, Lat.] to a mill, a servitude by which grain growing on certain lands or brought within them, must be carried to a certain mill to be ground, a certain culture or price being paid for the same.—Jacob.

Astrihilibet, a forfeiture of double the damage.

Astrum, a house or place of habitation.—Covel.

A summo remedio ad inferiorem actionem, non habetur ingressus, neque auxilium. Fleta, l. vi.—(From the highest remedy to the lower action there is neither ingress nor assistance). This maxim had reference to the law of real and mixed actions [now abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 26, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 26], the rule having been that where a man resorted to the highest remedy, a writ of right, he could not afterwards avail himself of an inferior remedy.—3 Bl. Com. 193.

Asyle, a sanctuary or place of refuge for offenders to fly into.

Asylum [fr. Ἀσυλον, Gk., a place free from violence], a sanctuary of refuge. 2. A place set apart for the treatment and habitation of persons of unsound mind. See 16 & 17 Vict. cc. 96, 97; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 105; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 87; 25 & 26 Vict. cc. 54, 111; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 33; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 80; and 29 & 30 Vict. c. 51. See LUNATIC ASYLUM.

Atavia, a great grandmother's grandmother.

Atavus, the great grandfather's or great grandmother's grandfather; a fourth grandfather. The ascending line of lineal ancestry runs thus:—Pater, Avus, Proavus, Abavus, Atavus, Tritavus, the seventh generation in the ascending scale will be Tritavi-pater, and the next above it Proavi-atavus.—Juv. Sat. iii. 312.

Ategar [fr. aeton, Sax., to throw, and gar, a weapon], a hand-dart.—Spelm.

A tempore cujus contrarii memoria non existet. (From time of which there exists not memory to the contrary.) See 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 71, s. 5.

Athanation, the ancient name of the island of Thanet, in Kent.

Athe, atha, or ath [Sax.], an oath.—Blount.

Athe, or adda, a privilege of administering an oath in cases of right and property.—Ibid.

Atheism, disbelief of a God. See OATHS.

Atheling. See ÆTHELING.

Athesis fluvium, the ancient name of the river Tees, in Cumberland.

Atia, illwill. See DE ODIO ET ATIA.

Atilia, utensils, or country implements.—Blount.

Attonement, an agreement, union, or reconciliation. The word seems to be compounded of at and one, as it were a making at one, and thence to have acquired the meaning of suffering the pains of whatever sacrifice is necessary to bring about a reconciliation.

Atrium, a court before a house, or a churchyard.—Cowel.

Ats, an abbreviation denoting 'at the suit of.' It is used by a defendant in entitling the cause against him; thus C. D. (defendant), ats A. B. (plaintiff).

Attach [fr. attaccare, It., to fasten], to take or apprehend by commandment of a writ or precept. It differs from arrest, because it takes not only the body, but sometimes the goods, whereas an arrest is only against the person; besides, he who attaches keeps the party attached in order to produce him in Court on the day named, but he who arrests lodges the person arrested in the custody of a higher power, to be forthwith disposed of.—Fleta, lib. 5, c. xxiv. See ATTACHMENT.

Attaché, a person associated with a foreign legation.

Attachiamenta bonorum, a distress formerly taken upon goods and chattels, by the legal attachiators or bailiffs, as security to answer an action for personal estate or debt.—Blount.

Attachiamenta de spinis et boscis, a privilege granted to the officers of a forest to take to their own use thorns, brush, and windfalls, within their precincts.—Kenn. Par. Antiq. 209.

Attachment, a process from a Court of Record, awarded by the judges at their discretion on a bare suggestion, or on their own knowledge, against a person guilty of a contempt, who is punishable in a summary manner. Contempts may be thus classed: (1) Disobedience to the Queen's writs; (2) Contempts in the face of a Court; (3) Contemptuous words or writings concerning a Court; (4) Refusing to comply with the rules and awards of a Court; (5) Abuse of the process of a Court; and (6) Forgery of writs, or any other deceit tending to impose on a Court.—Leach's Hawk. P. Cr., c. xxii. s. 33. As to attachment in proceedings in the Supreme Court of Judicature, see Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XLIV. As to the former practice, see (as to Chancery proceedings) Dan. Ch. Pr., 4th ed., 420 et seq., and (as to common law proceedings) 2 Ch. Arch. Pr.

Attachment of Debts. By the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XLV. replacing s. 60 of the C. L. P. Act, 1854, which it follows very closely, a judgment creditor may apply to the court or a judge to have a judgment debtor orally examined as to debts due to him (r. 1), and may either before or after such examination apply ex parte for an order attacking such debts 'owing or accruing' in the hands of the parties owing the same (garnishees), and by the same or any subsequent order the garnishee may be required to appear before the court or a judge or an officer of the court to show cause why he should not pay the judgment creditor the debt due from him, the garnishee, to the judgment debtor, or so much thereof as may be sufficient to satisfy the judgment debt (r. 2).

Attachment, foreign, a process under which the goods of foreigners found in some liberty are taken to satisfy creditors.—Com. Dig. tit. 'Attachment, Foreign.' Also a judicial proceeding, by means of which a creditor may obtain the security of the moneys, goods, or other personal property of his debtor, in the hands of a third person, for the purpose, in the first instance, of enforcing the appearance of the debtor to answer an action; and afterwards, upon his continued default, of obtaining the goods or property in satisfaction of the demand. It is also called garnishment. As to the custom prevailing in the City of London, see FOREIGN ATTACHMENT, and consult Brandon on For. Attach.

Attachment of the forest, one of the three Courts formerly held in forests. The highest Court was called Justice in Eyre's seat; the middle, the Swainmote; and the lowest, the Attachment.—Manwood, 90, 99.

Attachment of privilege. When a person by virtue of his privilege, calls another into that court to which he himself belongs, to answer some action as an attorney, etc. It is also a power to apprehend a person in a privileged place.—Termes de la Ley, 59. The 2 Wm. IV. c. 39 (commonly called the Uniformity of Process Act), virtually abolished this proceeding, and the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, enacted that all personal actions in any of the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster should be commenced by writ of summons.

Attainder [fr. attaindre, Fr. (attainder, O. Fr.—Roquef)], attingo, Lat., which signify the apprehension of the object of a chase], the stain or corruption of the blood of a criminal capitally condemned: it is the immediate inseparable consequence by the Common Law, sentence of death being pronounced, or of outlawry for a capital offence. The criminal then becomes dead in law, technically called civilitur mortuus. It differs from conviction, in that it is after judgment, whereas conviction is upon the verdict of guilty, but before judgment pronounced, and may be quashed upon some point of law reserved, or judgment may be arrested. The consequences of attainder are forfeiture of property and corruption of blood.—4 Bl. Com. 380. Now abolished, see post.

A descendant may now trace through an attained ancestor by virtue of 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, s. 10. The attainder of a trustee or mortgagee does not occasion the lands, etc., to escheat or be forfeited.—13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, s. 46.

By the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 23, it is now provided that no conviction for treason or felony shall cause attainder or forfeiture. See BILL OF ATTAINDER.

Attains du fet [Fr.], convicted of the fact, caught by it, having it brought home to one.—Roquef; Wedgw.

Attaint, writ of, issued to inquire whether a jury of twelve men gave a false verdict, that so the judgment following thereupon might be reversed. This writ was abolished by 4 Geo. IV. c. 50, ss. 60, 61. A corrupt juror is punishable by fine and imprisonment, upon an indictment or information.

Attaint d'une cause [Fr.], the gain of a suit.

Attainture, legal censure.

Attal sarisin [i.e., the leavings of the Sarasins, Sassins, or Saxons], an old deserted mine, so called by the Cornish miners.—Cowel.

Attagea, a little house.—Blount.

Attempt [fr. tentare, Lat.; tenter, temter, tempter, O. Fr., to try], an endeavour to commit a crime or unlawful act. Persons indicted for a felony or misdemeanour, may be found guilty only of an attempt to commit the same.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 9.

Attendant, one who owes a duty or service to another, or depends upon another.—Termes de la Ley, 61.

Attendant term. Terms for years in real property are created for many purposes, e.g., to furnish money for the payment of debts, to secure rent charges or jointures, to raise portions for younger children, daughters, etc. Now, although the purpose for which the term was originally created has been satisfied or has failed, yet, not being surrendered, it continued to exist, the legal interest remaining in the trustees, to whom it was at its creation limited, or, if deceased, in their personal representatives, but the person entitled to the inheritance then became, according to equitable principle, entitled to the beneficial interest in such term, and the termor was held to be such person's trustee. This beneficial interest was subordinate to and merely attendant upon the higher estate possessed by the owner of the inheritance, and yet completely consolidated with it, following the inheritance in all the various modifications and changes to which it might be subjected by act of law or arrangements of the owner. The advantage of preserving these terms and assigning them to trustees (thus preventing the legal presumption of surrender), with an express declaration that they shall attend upon the inheritance, was this: If it had at any time appeared that prior to the purchase or mortgage, but posterior to the creation of the term, there had been an intermediate alienation or incumbrance of the fee in favour of another person, to which the then trustee of the term had not been a party, and of which the purchaser or mortgagee had had no notice when he paid the purchase or mortgage-money, he would be protected against it, through the medium of the term so assigned, which being the elder title would have taken the priority in point of legal effect. Hence the expression 'protecting against mesne (middle) incumbrances.'

For the authorities and arguments upon this subject, consult 3 Sugden's Vendors and Purchasers, tit. 'Assignment of Terms.'

The act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 112, renders the assignment of satisfied attendant terms unnecessary.

Attentates, proceedings in a court of judicature, pending suit, and after an inhibition is decreed and gone out. Those things which are done after an extra-judicial appeal may be styled Attentates.—Ayliffe.

Attenuating, granting time for payment of a debt.—Blount; 27 Edw. I.

Attestation, testimony, evidence, justification, the execution of a deed or will in the presence of witnesses.—2 Bl. Com. 307. The C. L. P. Act, 1854, s. 26 (applicable to civil actions), and the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 18, s. 7 (applicable to criminal cases), render it unnecessary to prove by the attesting witness any instrument to the validity of which attestation is not requisite, and such instrument may now be proved by admission, or otherwise, as if there had been no attesting witness. Wills and codicils (1 Vict. c. 26), warrants of attorney and cognovits (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110), and agreements between master and seaman (Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, s. 150), require attestation. As to the attestation of deeds in execution of certain powers of appointment, see 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 12.

Attestation Clause, the sentence subscribed to a written instrument signed by the witnesses to its execution, stating that they have witnessed it. Such a clause (in very precise terms) is always appended to a will formally prepared; but it is expressly provided by s. 8 of the Wills' Act, 1 Vict. c. 26, that 'no form of attestation shall be necessary.'

Attested Copy, a verified transcript of a document.

Attesting witness, a person who has seen a party execute a deed, or sign a written agreement. He then subscribes his signature for the purpose of identification and proof at any future period. See ATTESTATION.

Attic, Laws of Descent. For a notice of these, see Hale's History, p. 294.

Attile, the rigging or furniture of a ship. —Fleta, lib. 1, c. xxv.

Attinctus, attainted.

Attorn, to make attornment. See ATTORNMENT.

Attornare rem, to turn over money or goods, i.e., to assign or appropriate them to some particular use or service.—Ken. Par. Antiq. 283.

Attornato faciendo vel recipiendo, an obsolete writ, which commanded a sheriff or steward of a county court or hundred court to receive and admit an attorney to appear for the person who owed suit of court.—F. N. B. 156.

Attorney [fr. tourné, Fr.; or fr. attornatus Med. Lat., substituted], one who is appointed by another to do something in his absence, and who has authority to act in the place and turn of him by whom he is delegated. He is of two kinds.

(1) Attorney at Law was a public officer belonging to the Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster, who conducted legal proceedings on behalf of others, called his clients, by whom he was retained: he answered to the Solicitor in the Courts of Chancery, and the Proctor of the Admiralty, Ecclesiastical, Probate, and Divorce Courts. An Attorney was almost invariably also a solicitor. It is now provided by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 87, that solicitors, attorneys, or proctors of, or by law empowered to practise in, any Court the jurisdiction of which is by that Act transferred to the High Court of Justice or the Court of Appeal, shall be called 'Solicitors of the Supreme Court.' See SOLICITORS.

(2) Attorney in Fact, including all agents employed in any business or to do any act in pais for another; also a person acting under a special agency, whose authority must be expressed by deed, commonly called a power of attorney.—1 Bac. Abr., tit. 'Attorney.'

Attorney-General, a great officer of state appointed by letters-patent, and the legal representative of the Crown in the Supreme Court. He exhibits informations, prosecutes for the Crown in criminal matters, files bills in the Exchequer in revenue causes, and informations in Chancery, where the Crown is interested. When the House of Lords sits in a committee of privileges, it is the duty of the Attorney-General to attend at the bar in a judicial capacity and report on the claim. He also allows applications for patents.—See LETTERS PATENT; Termes de la Ley, 63; 4 Reeves, c. xxv. p. 122. The Prince of Wales appoints his own Attorney-General.

Attorney of the Wards and Liveries, was the third officer of the Duchy Court.—1 Bac. Abr., tit. 'Attorney.'

Attorneyship, the office of an agent or attorney.—4 Reeves, c. xxxii. p. 574.

Attornment [fr. tourner, Fr., to turn], the acknowledgment of a new lord on the alienation of land, and the assent or agreement of the tenant to attorn, as 'I become tenant to the purchaser.'—Co. Litt. 309. The 4 Anne, c. 16, ss. 9, 10, enacted that all grants and conveyances of manors, lands, rents, reversions, etc., should be good without the attornment of the tenants, but notice of the grants must be given to the tenants, before which they shall not be prejudiced by the payment of any rent to the grantor, or of breach of the condition for non-payment; and by 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 11, attornments made by tenants to strangers claiming title to the estate of their landlord shall be null and void, and their landlord's possession not affected thereby; but it does not extend to vacate any attornment made pursuant to a judgment at law, or with the consent of the landlord, or to a mortgagee on a forfeited mortgage.—Woodf. Land. and Ten.

Attrappe, taken or seized.—Law. Fr.

Attrebatii, the ancient name of the inhabitants of Berkshire.

Aubaine. See DROIT D'AUBAINE.

Au besoin (in case of need).

Auction signifies generally an increasing, an enhancement, and hence is applied to a public sale of property usually conducted by biddings, which augment the price. A spear used to be raised by the Romans, as the sign of a public auction.—Livy, xxiii. 37; Smith's Dict. of Antiq. See DUTCH AUCTION.

Auctionariae, catalogues of goods for public sale or auction.

Auctionarii, sellers, regraters, retailers, more properly brokers.—Jacob.

Auctioneers, licensed agents appointed to sell property and to conduct sales or auctions. Consult Sug. Vend. and Pur. 34 et seq., for the extent of their power and authority as to real property. They differ from brokers, in that the latter may both buy and sell, whereas auctioneers can only sell; also brokers may sell by private contract only, and auctioneers by public auction only. Auctioneers can only sell goods for ready money, but factors may sell upon credit.

An auctioneer is deemed the agent of both parties; he can bind virtute officii the seller and the purchaser of realty by his memorandum of the sale under the Statute of Frauds; but he is only the agent of the seller at the sale. He may sue the purchaser in his own name.

The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 15, repeals the duties of excise on sales by auction, and imposes a new duty of 10*l.* annually on auctioneers' licenses in the United Kingdom. By 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 42, persons may sell by auction under an order of the Court of Chancery, without being liable to the duty imposed by the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 15. The 6 Geo. IV. c. 81, s. 8, is repealed by s. 6, which substitutes one uniform license. Sect. 7 enacts that every auctioneer, before he commences any sale, shall affix, in some conspicuous part of the auction-room, a ticket or board, containing his full Christian and surname and place of residence, otherwise to forfeit 20*l.* He must produce his license on demand, or make a deposit of 10*l.* on pain of one month's imprisonment.

Auctor, a seller, or vendor.

Auctoritates philosophorum, medicorum, et poetarum, sunt in causis allegandæ et tenendæ. Co. Litt. 264.—(The opinions of philosophers, physicians, and poets, are to be alleged and received in causes).

Aucupia verborum sunt iudice indigna. Hob. 343.—(Catching at words is unworthy of a judge).

Audi alteram partem.—(Hear the other side, i.e., no man should be condemned unheard). See Broom's Max., 5th ed., 113, and In re Pollard, 2 L. R. P. C. 106.

Audience, a hearing; an interview.

Audience Court, belonging to the Archbishop of Canterbury, having the same authority with the Court of Arches, but inferior to it in dignity and antiquity. The Dean of the Arches is the official auditor of the Audience. The Archbishop of York has also his Audience Court.—Termes de la Ley, 63.

Audiendo et terminando, a writ or commission to certain persons to appease and punish any insurrection or great riot.—F. N. B. 110.

Audit, an examining of accounts. Audit may be either detailed or administrative, and is usually both. A detailed audit is a comparison of vouchers with entries of payment in order that the party whose accounts are audited may not debit his employer with payments not in fact made. An administrative audit is a comparison of payments with authorities to pay in order that the party whose accounts are audited may not debit his employer with payments not authorized. If on either branch of audit an improper entry is discovered, the auditor surcharges the party whose accounts are audited, whereby the payment must be made by such party out of his own pocket. Where no fraud is suspected, however, and when there has been no negligence, it is common for the surcharge to be remitted (see, e.g., Poor Law Audit Act, 1848, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 91, s. 4), especially where the party whose accounts are audited has given his services gratuitously.

The public accounts are audited under 29 & 30 Vict. c. 39 (repealing 22 enactments in pari materia), and accounts of local authorities under the Poor Law Audit Act, 1848, and the District Auditors Act, 1879.

Auditâ querelâ defendentis [Lat.] (so called because a plaintiff cannot have it) was an equitable action which lay for a person against whom judgment had been given, and who was therefore in danger of execution, or perhaps actually in execution, when he had matter to show that such execution ought not to have issued, or should not issue against him. It was invented lest, in any case, there should be an oppressive defect of justice, where the party had a good defence, but had not any other means to take advantage of it. By the indulgence of the courts, a summary relief upon motion has in most cases of evident oppression been granted, and this occasioned the remedy by auditâ querelâ to be seldom resorted to.—By Rules H. T. 1853, r. 79, no writ of auditâ querelâ was allowed, unless by rule of Court or order of a judge. By the Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XLII., r. 22, it is provided, no proceeding by auditâ querelâ shall hereafter be used, but an application for the same purpose may be made to a judge.

Auditor [Lat.], one who examines accounts and evidences of expenditure. See AUDIT.

Auditor of the Receipts, an officer of the Exchequer.—4 Inst. 107; 46 Geo. III. c. 1.

Auditores, the catechumens, or those newly instructed in the mysteries of the Christian religion before admission to baptism. Auditorium, now called nave, is the place in the church where they stand to hear and be instructed.—Blount.

Auditores of the Imprest, officers in the Exchequer, who formerly had the charge of auditing the accounts of the customs, naval and military expenses, etc., now performed by the commissioners for auditing public accounts.—Pract. Exc. 83.

Augæa, a cistern for water.—Blount.

Augmentation, the name of a court (now abolished) erected 27 Hen. VIII., to determine suits and controversies relating to monasteries and abbey-lands.—Termes de la Ley, 68.

Augmentation of stipends. In order to secure a better provision for the clergy of the Church of Scotland, the Court of Session has power, under various acts of parliament, to modify or increase stipends to the clergy out of the tithes of the parish in which the minister officiates.—Scotch Law.

Augusta, the ancient name of London.

Augusta legibus soluta non est.—(The wife of the emperor is not exempted from the laws.)

Aula, a Court Baron.—Watkins on Copyholds.

Aula ecclesiæ, a nave or body of a church where temporal courts were anciently held.—Eadm. lib. 6, p. 141.

Aula Regis, or Regia, a court established by William the Conqueror in his own hall; it was composed of the great officers of state, resident in the palace, and followed the king's household in all his expeditions. The trial of common causes in it, was, on this account, very burdensome to the people, and accordingly the 11th chapter of Magna Charta thus enacted:—'communia placita non sequantur curiam nostram sed teneantur in aliquo loco certo.' This certain place was established in Westminster Hall, where until the Judicature Act it continued under the name of the Court of Common Pleas, or Common Bench.—Brac. L. 3, tr. 1, c. 7; 3 Bl. Com. 39. The 26th section of the Judicature Act empowers the High Court and Court of Appeal to sit at any place. See ROYAL COURTS OF JUSTICE.

Aulnager [fr. ulna, Lat., an ell], an ancient officer appointed by the king, whose business it was to measure all woollen-cloth made for sale, that the Crown might not be defrauded of customs and duties.—Termes de la Ley, 37, 2 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 518.

Aumeen, trustee, commissioner; a temporary collector or supervisor, appointed to the charge of a country on the removal of a zemindar, or for any other particular purpose of local investigation or arrangement.—Indian.

Aumil, agent, officer, native collector of revenue; superintendent of a district or division of a country, either on the part of the government zemindar, or renter.—Ibid.

Aumildar, agent, the holder of an office; an intendant and collector of the revenue, uniting civil, military, and financial powers under the Mahomedan government.—Ibid.

Aumone, Service in, where lands are given in alms to some church or religious house, upon condition that a service or prayers shall be offered at certain times for the repose of the donor's soul.—Brit. 164.

Auncel weight, an ancient manner of weighing by the hanging of scales or hooks at either end of a beam or staff. See ANSEL. What are now called stilliards, which show the pounds by certain notches on a beam, are very similar to the auncel weight.—Termes de la Ley, 66.

Aunciatus, antiquated.—Blount.

Auncient Demesn. See ANCIENT DEMESNE.

Aunt [fr. amita, Lat.], the sister of one's father or mother, and a relation in the third degree, correlative to niece or nephew.

Aurenay, Aurney, Aurigny, the ancient name of Alderney.

Aureo Vado, de, the ancient name of Guildford, or Guildford, in Surrey.

Aures, a Saxon punishment by cutting off the ears, inflicted on those who robbed churches, or were guilty of any other theft. Fleta. lib. 1, c. xxxviii. par. 10.

Auricularius, a secretary.—Mon. Ang. 10.

Aurum Reginæ, queen's gold. A royal revenue belonging to every queen consort during her marriage with the king, and due from every person who has made a voluntary offering or fine to the king amounting to ten marks or upwards, for and in consideration of any privileges, grants, licenses, pardons, or other matters of royal favour conferred upon him by the king. It is due in the proportion of one-tenth part over and above the entire offering or fine made to the king, and becomes an actual debt of record to the queen's majesty by the mere recording of the fine.—2 Step. Com., and 1 Br. & Had. Com. 258.

Australia (South), see 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 95; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 60; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 61; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 56.

Australia (Western), see 10 Geo IV. c. 22; and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 35.

Australian Colonies, see 13 & 14 Vict. c. 59; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 54 and c. 56; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 44; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 11; and (as to customs duties) 36 Vict. c. 22.

Australian Colonies, Duties Act, 1873, 36 Vict. c. 22.

Austurcus and Osturcus, a goshawk, whence a falconer keeping such kind of hawks is called ostringer. Unus austurcus used to be reserved as a rent to the lord, as may be seen in some ancient deeds.—Blount.

Auter, or Autre, action pendant [O. Fr.] (another action pending).

Auter, or Autre droit, in right of another, e.g., a trustee holds trust property in right of his cestui que trust. A prochein amy sues in right of an infant.—2 Bl. Com. 176.

Auterfois. See AUTREFOIS.

Authentic, an undoubted original.

Authentic act, that which has been executed before a notary or other public officer, duly authorized, or which is testified by a public seal, or has been rendered public by the authority of a competent magistrate, or which is certified as being a copy of a public register.—Civil Law.

Authentication, an attestation made by a proper officer by which he certifies that a record is in due form of law, and that the person who certifies it is the officer appointed so to do.

Authentics, a collection of the novels of Justinian, made by an anonymous author. So called on account of its authority.—Civil Law.

There is another collection so called, compiled by Imier, of incorrect extracts from the novels and inserted by him in the Code, in the places to which they refer.

Authorities, the citations which are made of laws, acts of the legislation, precedents, and decided cases, and opinions of text writers. See PRECEDENTS.

Authority, a right; an official or judicial command; also a legal power to do an act given by one man to another. Consult Vid. Abr., tit. 'Authority,' and Sugden on Powers.

Autochiria, Autoctonia, Autophonia, suicide.—Dunghlison.

Autocracy, an irresponsible monarchy, such as that of Russia.

Autograph, the handwriting of any one.

Autonomasy [fr. αὐτός, self, and ὄνομα, Gk., name], in rhetoric a word of general signification, used for the name of a particular thing.

Autonomy, political independence of a nation.

Autrefois [Fr.], formerly; at some other time.

Autrefois acquit (formerly acquitted), a plea in criminal cases; when a person is indicted for an offence and acquitted, he cannot be afterwards indicted for the same offence, provided the first indictment were such that he could have been lawfully convicted on it; and if he be thus indicted a second time, he may plead autrefois acquit, which will be a good bar to the indictment. The true test by which the question, whether such a plea is a sufficient bar in any particular case, may be tried, is, whether the evidence necessary to support the second indictment would have been sufficient to procure a legal conviction upon the first.—R. v. Emden, 9 East, 437; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 28, and c. 99, s. 13.

Autrefois attain (formerly attainted), a plea in criminal cases. Before 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 4, if a man were attainted of treason or felony, whilst the attainder remained in force, he could not, with certain exceptions, be indicted for another felony, whether such other felony were committed before or after his attainder; because being already attainted, and, therefore, dead in contemplation of law, and his property forfeited, a prosecution for any other offence was considered useless. But now (7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 4) attainder is no bar, unless for the same offence as that charged in the indictment, and in effect this plea is at an end.—4 Bl. Com. 337.

Autrefois convict (formerly convicted). Before 6 Geo. IV. c. 25, a man convicted of a clergyable felony, and who had prayed the benefit of clergy, might plead such conviction and prayer of clergy in bar of any subsequent indictment, either for the felony of which he was convicted, or for any other clergyable felony committed by him previously to his conviction. This statute restricted the benefit of the allowance of clergy to the charge upon which it was allowed, and now a previous conviction can only be pleaded in bar of any subsequent indictment for the felony of which the defendant has previously been convicted. The 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 6, abolished the benefit of clergy in all cases of felony. As to the form of the plea, see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 28.

Autre vie, tenant pur (tenant for another's life). An estate for the life of another is an estate of freehold, though it is the lowest or least estate of freehold which the law acknowledges. An estate for the life of another is not so great as an estate for one's own life. See 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 12; 14 Geo. II. c. 20, s. 9; 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 26, ss. 3, 6; Wms. Real. Property.

Autumn manœuvres of troops. See MILITARY MANŒUVRES.

Auxesis [fr. αὐξήσις, Gk.], a figure in rhetoric, by which anything is magnified.

Auxilium ad filium militem faciendum et filiam maritandam, an ancient writ which was addressed to the sheriff to levy compulsorily an aid towards the knighting of a son and the marrying of a daughter of the tenants in capite of the crown.—Abolished.

Auxilium curiæ, a precept or order of Court citing and convening a party, at the suit and request of another, to warrant something.—Ken. Paroch. Antiq. 477.

Auxilium facere alicui in curia regis, to become another's friend and solicitor in the Queen's Courts, an office undertaken for and granted by some courtiers to their dependents in the country.—Ibid. 126.

Auxilium regis, the king's aid or money levied for the royal use and the public service, as taxes granted by parliament.—1 Bl. Com. c. viii.

Auxilium vicecomiti, a customary aid or duty anciently payable to sheriffs out of certain manors, for the better support of their offices.—Mon. Angl.

Avage, or Avisage, a rent or payment by tenants of the manor of Writtle, in Essex, upon St. Leonard's day, the 6th of November, for the privilege of pannage in the lord's woods.—Blount.

Avail [fr. valoir, Fr.; valere, Lat., to be worth], profit of land.

Avail of marriage [fr. valor maritagii, Lat.], the right of marriage, which the lord or guardian in chivalry had of disposing of his infant ward in matrimony. A guardian in socage had also the same right, but not attended with the same advantage.—2 Bl. Com. 88.

Avails, profits or proceeds.

Aval [Fr.], surety for payment.

Avalonia, the ancient name of Glastonbury, in Somersetshire.

Avalum, a written guarantee.

Avenage, a certain quantity of oats paid by a tenant to his landlord as rent, or in lieu of some other duties.—Blount.

Avenor, an officer belonging to the royal stables, who provided oats for the horses.—13 Car. II. c. 8.

Aventuræ, adventures or trials of skill at arms; military exercises on horseback.—Brady's Append. Hist. Eng. 250.

Aventure, or Adventure, a mischance causing the death of a man, as where a person is suddenly drowned or killed by any accident, without felony.—Co. Litt. 391.

Aver [fr. avoir, Fr.; habere, Lat., to have; or haber, Sp.], a beast of the plough; money.

Aver (to) [fr. avérer, Fr.; fr. verus, Lat.], to maintain as true.

Avera, a day's work of a ploughman, formerly valued at 8*d.*—Domesday; 4 Inst. 269.

Average, a medium, a mean proportion, used in five senses:—

(1) A service which a tenant owes to his lord by doing work with his avers.

(2) A contribution, which merchants and others make toward their losses, when they have their goods cast into the sea, for the safety of a ship, or of the other goods and lives of persons during a tempest. It is apportioned and allotted after the rate of every man's goods carried. So, if goods insured for a voyage reach their destination, but are in some degree injured by any of the accidents insured against, this is an average loss, and the insurers are bound to compensate the insured in the proportion which the average loss bears to the whole insurance. In this sense average is derived fr. haferei, Germ., sea damage, fr. haf, hav, Scan., the open sea. This in Fr. became avaris, decay of merchandise; avarie, damage suffered by a ship. Avaria, Ital., is the calculation and distribution of the loss arising from goods thrown overboard.—Wedgw. See GENERAL AVERAGE. As to 'particular average,' see Arnould on Marine Insurance, 4th ed., 819 et seq.

(3) Also a small duty paid to masters of ships, when goods are sent in another man's ship, for their care of the goods over and above the freight.

(4) Stubble, or remainder of straw and grass left in cornfields after harvest. In Kent it is called gratten, and in other parts roughings.

(5) Average prices, such as are computed on all the prices of any articles sold within a certain period or district. See, e.g., Corn Returns Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 37, s. 9.

A verbis legis non est recedendum. 5 Co. 118.—(From the words of the law there should not be any departure.) This maxim directs the construction to be put upon acts of parliament, against the express letter of which the Courts will not sanction any interpretation, for the meaning of the Legislature cannot be so well explained as by its own direct words, since index animi sermo (language conveys the intention of the mind), and maledicta expositio que corrumpit textum (an exposition which corrupts the text is bad).—4 Co. 35.

Aver-corn, a reserved rent in corn paid to religious houses.—Blount.

Averia, cattle, which were the principal possession in early times.—Spelman. Also chattels generally.

Averia carrucæ, beast of the plough. 3 Com. 7th ed., 251.

Averia elongata, cattle eloigned, i.e., carried off.

Averiis captis in withernam, a writ granted to one whose cattle were unlawfully distrained by another and driven out of the county in which they were taken, so that they could not be replevied by the sheriff.—Reg. Orig. 82.

Averium, the best live beast due to the lord as a heriot on his tenant's death.—2 Bl. Com. 424.—1 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 630.

Aver-land, that which tenants ploughed and manured for the proper use of a monastery or the lords of the soil.—Mon. Angl.

Averment [fr. verificatio, Lat.], an advancement or affirmation of any new matter in a pleading, and when new matter was introduced the pleading concluded with a verification, except in the anomalous case of the general plea of bankruptcy under 6 Geo. IV. c. 16. Verifications or averments were of two kinds: common and special. Common were applied to ordinary cases, and were in the following form:—‘And this the plaintiff (or defendant) is ready to verify.’ Special were used where the matter pleaded was intended to be tried by record or by some other method than a jury. They were in the following forms:—‘And this the plaintiff (or defendant) is ready to verify, by the said record,’ or, ‘And this the plaintiff (or defendant) is ready to verify, when, where, and in such manner as the Court here shall order, direct, or appoint.’ As to pleading, see now Jud. Act, 1875, Sched. 1, Ord. XIX. See PLEADING.

Aver-penny (or average penny), money paid towards the king's averages or carriages, and so to be freed thereof.—Rastal.

Averrare, a duty required from some customary tenants, to carry goods in a waggon or upon loaded horses.—Blount.

Avers, draught cattle; cart-horses.

Aver-silver, a custom or rent formerly so called.—Cowel.

Avia, a grandmother.

A vinculo matrimonii (from the chain of wedlock). It was a total divorce obtained from the Ecclesiastical Court on some canonical impediment existing before marriage and not arising afterwards, for the marriage was declared void, as having been absolutely unlawful ab initio, and the parties were, therefore, separated, pro salute animarum (for the safety of their souls), the issue (if any) were illegitimate, and the parties might contract another marriage.

Though this divorce could not have been obtained from the Ecclesiastical Court, where the marriage was not void ab initio, it was was frequently granted before the establishment of the ‘Divorce Court’ in 1857 on the ground of adultery by a private act of parliament. See DIVORCE.

Avisamentum, advice or counsel.—Blount.

Avizandum. In the Scotch Courts the judges are said to ‘make avizandum’ with a case when time is taken to consider judgment.

Avocat, a French barrister, or advocate.

Avoidance [fr. void, vide, Fr., empty, wide, free from], when a benefice is void of an incumbent, in which sense it is opposed to plenarty.—Jacob. Also the evitation, by new matter, of an opponent's pleading. See CONFESSION AND AVOIDANCE.

Avoidance of a Deed. The rendering void or of no effect of a deed, either on account of defective execution or otherwise.

Avoir-de-poise, Avoirs-de-pois, or Aver-du-pois [O. Fr.] (to have full weight), a certain method of weighing goods, allowing 16 ounces to the pound, whilst Troy-weight allows but 12.

Avona, the ancient name of Bungay, in Suffolk, and Hampton Court.

Avonæ Vallis, the ancient name of Avondale, or Oundale, in Northamptonshire.

Avoucher, the calling upon a warrantor to fulfil his undertaking.

Avoué, a French attorney.

Avow. See ADVOW.

Avowant, one who makes an avowry.

Avowee. See ADVOWEE.

Avowry, or Advowry, was a pleading in the action of replevin, which stated the nature and merits of the defence, and justified or avowed taking the distress in his (the defendant's) own right, which, if established, would entitle him to a judgment de retorno habendo. An avowry was in the nature of a declaration. See 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 22.

Avowterer, Avouterer, an adulterer. The crime being called Avowtry—Termes de la Ley.

Avulsion [fr. avulsio, Lat.], lands torn off by an inundation or current from property to which they originally belonged, and gained to the estate of another; or where a river changes its course, and instead of continuing to flow between two properties, cuts off part of one and joins it to the other. The property of the part thus separated continues in the original proprietor, in which respect avulsion differs from alluvion, i.e., where an addition is insensibly made to a property by the gradual washing down of the river, for such an addition becomes the property of the owner of the lands to which it is made.

Avunculus, an uncle by the mother's side.

Avunculus magnus, a great uncle.

Avus, a grandfather.

Await [fr. awaiti, Wall., to watch, waiti, to look], waylaying, a lying in wait to execute some mischief.—13 Rich. II. st. 2.

Award [the primitive sense of ward is shown in the It. guardare, Fr. regarder, to look. Hence, Prov. Fr. eswarder (answering in form to award), to inspect goods, and, incidentally, to pronounce them good and marketable; eswardeur, an inspector.—Hecart. An award is, accordingly, in the first place, the taking a matter into consideration and pronouncing judgment upon it; but in later times the designation has been transferred exclusively to the consequent judgment.—Wedgw.], a document containing the determination of commissioner, under an Inclosure Act, or other public statute; also an instrument embodying an arbitrator's decision on a matter submitted to him. It must follow the submission, but need not be necessarily in writing, unless prescribed. Joint arbitrators should execute the award at the same time and in the presence of each other.—4 E. & B. 44. An award is generally considered as published as soon as the arbitrator has done some act whereby he becomes functus officio, and has declared, and can no longer change, his final mind. As soon as the award is executed, notice thereof should be given to all the parties that it is made and ready to be delivered: and if the submission direct that it be delivered to the parties by a certain day, in order to be valid it must be so delivered accordingly. It is usual for an arbitrator to keep the award until his costs are paid. The award must be duly stamped.

Any words expressive of a decision are an award. Recitals are unnecessary. The award must be entire, final, on all the matters referred, or it will be void in toto; unconditional, but it may be alternative: without reservation or delegation, except as to ministerial acts; certain, mutual, possible, and consistent, without palpable mistake; when partly good and partly bad, the good part, if separable from the bad, will be valid.

A valid award is a final and conclusive judgment as between the parties, on all matters referred by the submission, and a Court has not any power to alter or amend it.

Applications to set aside an award must be made before the last day of the term [not sittings; see Christ's College v. Martin, 3 Q. B. D. 28] after its publication, or, if the award be made on a compulsory reference, within the first seven days of such term.

The grounds for setting aside an award are these:—

(1) When the conduct of the arbitrator is corrupt or irregular;

(2) When the award discloses a manifestly mistaken decision in law or fact;

(3) When the award is a nullity;

(4) When it is not final;

(5) When it is uncertain;

(6) When the arbitrator has exceeded his authority;

(7) When a party or a witness is in fault, or new matter has been discovered.

Equity has jurisdiction to set aside an award, on any of the enumerated grounds, when the submission cannot be made a rule of Court.

When an action has been referred, and the reference fails, the action proceeds.—Russell on Arbitration, pt. iii. See ARBITRATION, REFEREE.

Away-going crops, crops sown during the last year of a tenancy, but not ripe until after its expiration. The right which an out-going tenant has to take an away-going crop is sometimes given to him by the express terms of the contract, but, where that is not the case, he is generally entitled to do so by the custom of the county: such custom or usage has been held reasonable and valid, and to apply equally to tenants by parol agreement as well as by deed or written contract of demise, and this for the benefit and encouragement of agriculture.—See Wigglesworth v. Dallison, Doug. 201; and 1 Sm. L. C.

Awm, Aums, or Awame, a measure of Rhenish wine containing forty gallons, mentioned in some old statutes.—Blount.

Awnhinde. See THIRD-NIGHT-AWNHINDE.

Axelodunum, the ancient name of Hexham.

Axiom, an indisputable truth.

Ayant cause, a receiver; also a successor, or one to whom a right has been assigned, either by will, gift, sale, exchange, or the like.—French Law.

Aye, an affirmative particle synonymous with yea or yes.

Ayle [fr. avus, Lat.], a grandfather. See AIEL.

Ayuntamiento, Justicia, Concejo, Cabildo, Regimiento, the names given in Spain to the councils of the town and villages; also a congress of officials.

Azaldus, a poor horse or jade.—Blount.

Azure [fr. azzurro, azzurlo, It.; azul, Sp., Port. Fr.; Pers. lazur, whence lapis lazuli, the sapphire of the ancients.—Dicz.], bright blue, sometimes called Inde, from the sapphire, which is found in the East. Heralds who reason by planets call it Jupiter, and when the names of jewels are employed, it is called Sapphire. Engravers represent it by an indefinite number of horizontal lines.

Heraldic Term.

B.

Baccinium, or Bacina, a basin or vessel to hold water for washing the hands. There was formerly a service of holding the basin, or waiting at the basin, on the day of the king's coronation.

Bachelacanæ Sylvæ, the woods of Bagley.

Bachelor, commonalty or yeomanry, in contradistinction to baronage.—Old Records.

Bachelor [a word of uncertain etymology; the most probable derivation seems to be from bachgen, Wel., a boy.—Wedgw.], a man who takes the degree of apprentice or student of arts (B.A.); preliminary to that of master (M.A.), at the universities. Also, an unmarried man.

Backberinde, Backverinde, or Backberend, bearing upon the back or about a man. Where a thief is apprehended with the things stolen in his possession, also called being taken with the mainour, as having the goods in his hand.—2 Inst. 188. It was one of the four circumstances wherein a forester might have arrested the body of a trespasser in a forest; viz., dog-draw, i.e., drawing after a deer that he has hurt; stable-stand, i.e., at his standing with a knife, gun, bow, or greyhound, ready to shoot or course; back-berend, i.e., carrying away upon his back the deer which he had killed; bloody-hand (redhanded), i.e., when he had shot or coursed, and was imbrued with blood.—4 Inst. 294.

Back-bond, a deed, which, in conjunction with an absolute disposition, constitutes a trust. It expresses the nature of the right actually held by a person to whom the disposition is made. It is equivalent to the English need of trust.—Scotch Term.

Backgammon [fr. batcke, Dan. (also batekebord), a tray, and gammen, a game.—Wedgw.], a lawful game with dice.—13 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 9.

Backing a warrant of a justice of the peace. Where a warrant which has been granted in one jurisdiction is required to be executed in another, as, where a felony has been committed in one county, and the offender is lurking in another county, then, on proof of the hand-writing of the justice who granted the warrant, a justice in such other county endorses or writes his name on the back of it, and then gives authority to execute the warrant in such other county.

See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, ss. 11—15, and cap. 43; and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 107.

Backside, a term formerly used in conveyances and even in pleading; it imports a yard at the back part of or behind a house, and belonging thereto.

Backwardation, a consideration given to keep back the delivery of stock when the price is lower for time than for ready money.

—Stock Exchange.

Baco, a bacon hog, used in old charters.

Bactile, a candlestick.

Bad (in substance). The technical word for unsoundness in pleading.

Badge, a mark or cognizance worn to show the relation of the wearer to any person or thing; the token of anything; a distinctive mark of office or service.—Encyc. Lond.

Badger [fr. baggage, Fr., a bundle, whence bagagier, a carrier of goods; or fr. bladier, Fr., a corn-dealer.—Wedgw.], a person who buys corn or victuals in one place, and carries them to another to sell and make profit by them. The 5 Eliz. c. 12, empowered magistrates to license badgers for one year, upon their entering into certain recognizances. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24, abolished the offence of badgering, and repealed the statutes passed in relation to it, as being pernicious and in restraint of trade.

Badiza, an ancient name of Bath, in Somersetshire.

Badonicus mons, an ancient name of Barnes Down, near Bath.

Bag [fr. balg, bolg, bag, Gael., a wattle], a certain and customary quantity of goods and merchandise in a sack.—Lex Merc.

Baga, a bag or purse. Thus there is the Petty-Bag-Office in the Common Law Jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, because all original writs relating to the business of the Crown were formerly kept in a little sack or bag, in parva baga.—1 Mudd. Prin. Chan. 4.

Bagatelle. A billiard license is required for a public bagatelle board, by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 11. See BILLIARDS.

Bagavel. Edward I. granted to the citizens of Exeter, by charter, the collection of a certain tribute or toll upon all manner of wares brought to that city to be sold, to be applied towards the paving of the streets, repairing the walls, and maintaining the city, which was commonly called in old English, begavel, bethrugavel, and chipping-gavel.—Antiq. of Exeter.

Bahadum, a chest or coffer.—Fleta, lib. 2, c. cxi.

Bail [fr. bailler, Fr., to hand over; fr. baillare, in the sense of making one a bail or keeper of the thing handed over, giving it to him to have or control], to set at liberty a person arrested or imprisoned, on security being taken for his appearance on a day and a place certain, which security is called bail, because the party arrested or imprisoned is delivered into the hands of those who bind themselves for his forthcoming (that is, become bail for his due appearance when required), in order that he may be safely protected from prison. Bail and mainpernors are often confounded, but there is this marked distinction between them:—mainpernors are merely a person's sureties who cannot imprison him themselves to secure his appearance, but bail may, for they are regarded as his gaolers, to whose custody he is committed, and therefore, they may take him upon a Sunday and confine him until the next day, and then render him to the proper prison. The word 'bail' is never used with a plural termination.

Bail is either in civil or criminal cases.

In civil cases, there was, before the abolition of mesne process by the Debtors' Act, 1869:—

(1) Common bail, or bail below, given to the sheriff, after arresting a person, on a bail bond, entered into by two sureties, on condition that the defendant appear at the day and in such place as the arresting process commands. (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 4.)

(2) Special bail, or bail above, or bail to the action. This was bail given by persons who undertook generally, after appearance of a defendant, that if he should be condemned in the action, he should satisfy the debt, costs, and damages, or render himself to prison, or that they would do it for him.

In civil cases, there appear still to survive—

(3) Bail on an attachment. When a defendant is arrested upon a writ of attachment, he is brought before a Court or a judge and sworn to answer interrogatories, and then committed, unless, by leave of a Court or a judge he enter into a recognizance with sureties, for his appearance in Court from day to day, to answer interrogatories concerning such matters as may be objected against him. An attachment for non-payment of money or non-performance of an award is not bailable.

(4) Bail in actions of ejectment brought by landlords, see 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, ss. 213, 215, and 216.

As to the former practice with reference to bail in error, see 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 151, and 22 Vict. c. 16, s. 5.

By 32 & 33 Vict. c. 38, s. 1, it was provided that persons authorized to take affidavits in Common Law Courts might also take bail.

In the Chancery Division of the High Court, equitable bail can be given by a defendant upon his being arrested on a writ of ne exeat regno, and the sheriff may take bail in cases of attachment for not appearing or answering.

Bail in criminal cases is given for the appearance of the party bailed to take his trial, or to attend a further examination of a charge against him.

In all cases of felony, and in certain misdemeanours, the magistrates may take bail at the time of the examination; and in all cases where a person charged with an indictable offence is committed to prison to take his trial for the same, it is lawful at any time afterwards, and before the first day of the sessions or assizes at which he is to be tried, for the magistrate who signed the warrant for his commitment to admit him to bail. The justices, however, have no power to admit any person to bail for treason, nor may bail in that case be allowed, except by order of a secretary of state or by the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, or a judge thereof in vacation, while, on the other hand, they are bound to admit to bail in all cases of misdemeanour, except such as the Act of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42, s. 23, particularly enumerates; and as to all felonies, as well as to the misdemeanours so enumerated, they have a discretionary power either to admit to bail, or to commit to prison.

The Bill of Rights, 1 W. & M. sess. 2, c. 2, expressly enacts that excessive bail ought not to be required.

By 22 Vict. c. 33, coroners are authorized to admit to bail persons charged with manslaughter, and by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, s. 227, a borough constable may admit to bail persons charged with petty misdemeanours and brought into his custody, if a justice of the peace be not sitting.

The Queen's Bench Division of the High Court, or any judge in time of vacation, may admit to bail for any crime whatever.

Bailable. An arresting process is said to be bailable when bail can be given, and the person arrested may obtain his liberty in consequence. See BAIL.

Bail-bond, an instrument prepared in the sheriff's office after an arrest, executed by two sufficient sureties and the person arrested and conditioned for his causing special bail to be put in for him in the court out of which the arresting process issued.—Bayley's Prac. 357.

Bail Court, sometimes called the Practice Court, was an auxiliary of the Court of Queen's Bench. It heard and determined ordinary matters, and disposed of common motions.—Consult Chit. Arch. Prac.

Bailee, a person to whom goods are entrusted for a specific purpose.

Bailee, Larceny by, punishable in the same manner as larceny, although the bailee 'shall not break bulk, or otherwise determine the bailment,' by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 3, replacing the repealed 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54, s. 4; and as to special punishment of fraudulent bailees, being bankers, etc., see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 75 et. seq.

Bailies, magistrates of burghs in Scotland.

Bailiff, a keeper or protector, an officer who puts in force an arresting process. 2. A land-steward. There are several kinds of bailiffs, whose offices and employments greatly differ from one another, yet they agree in that the keeping or protection of something belongs to them all.—Encyc. Lond.

Bailiff-errant, a bailiff's deputy. See OUTFRIDER.

Bailiwick [fr. baillie, Fr., and wic, Sax.], the jurisdiction of a bailiff. A county. A liberty exempted from a sheriff, over which a bailiff is appointed by the lord of the liberty or franchise, with such powers within his precinct as an under-sheriff exercises under a sheriff.—Wood's Inst. 206.

Bailment [fr. bailler, Fr., to deliver], a compendious expression to signify a contract resulting from delivery; perhaps best defined as 'a delivery of a thing in trust for some special object or purpose, and upon a contract express or implied, to conform to the object or purpose of the trust.'

In the celebrated case of Coggs v. Bernard (Ld. Raym. 909; 1 Sm. L. C.), Lord Holt divided bailments thus:—

(1) Depositum, or a naked bailment of goods, to be kept for the use of the bailor.

(2) Commodatum. Where goods or chattels that are useful are lent to the bailee gratis, to be used by him.

(3) Locatio rei. Where goods are lent to the bailee to be used by him for hire.

(4) Vadium. Pawn or pledge.

(5) Locatio operis faciendi. Where goods are delivered to be carried, or something is to be done about them, for a reward to be paid to the bailee.

(6) Mandatum. A delivery of goods to somebody, who is to carry them, or do something about them, gratis.

Bailments are also divisible into three kinds:—(1) Those in which the trust is exclusively for the benefit of the bailor, or of a third person, when the bailee is liable for gross negligence only. (2) Those in which the trust is exclusively for the benefit of the bailee, who is then bound to the bailor by diligence; and (3) Those in which the trust is for the benefit of both parties, or of both or one of them and a third party; when the bailee must exercise an ordinary and average degree of diligence. The first embraces deposits and mandates; the second, gratuitous loans for use, and the third, pledges or pawns, and hiring and letting to hire.—Story on Bailments.

Bailor, or Bailer, a person who commits goods to another person (the bailee) in trust for a specific purpose.

Bail-piece, a piece of parchment containing the names of special bail, with other particulars, which, being signed by a judge, was filed in the Court in which the action was pending, and notice of the bail having justified was then given to the opposite party.—Bayley's Prac. 361.

Bair-man, a poor insolvent debtor, left bare and naked, who was obliged to swear in Court that he was not worth more than five shillings and fivepence.—Obsolete.

Bairns' part, a third part of a deceased's free moveables, debt deducted, if his wife survive, and a half if she do not, due to his children.—Scotch Law.

Baiting Animals. Procuring them to be worried by dogs.—Punishable on summary conviction, under 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 3.

Bajardour, a bearer of any weight or burden.—Old Records.

Bakehouse Regulations Act, 1863, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 40, repealed and replaced by the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. See FACTORY.

Balance, that which expresses the difference between the debtor and creditor sides of an account; also used commercially to express the difference between the value of the exports from, and imports into a country. The balance is said to be favourable, when the value of the exports exceeds that of the imports, and unfavourable when the value of the imports exceeds that of the exports.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Balance-sheet, a statement of account or business between merchants, partners, or others.

Balance of trade, the difference between the value of the exports from and imports into a country.—McCull. Comm. Dict.

Balkanifer, or Baldakinifer [fr. baldanum, low Lat.], the standard-bearer of the Knights Templars.

Balconies [fr. bāla khaneh, Pers., an upper chamber], small galleries of wood or stone on the outside of houses. The erection of them is regulated in London by the Building Acts.—Woolrych's Met. Bldg. Act.

Bal [fr. bal, Sw.; balla, Ital.; balle, bal,

Fr.], a pack or certain quantity of goods or merchandise, wrapped or packed up in cloth and corded round very tightly, marked and numbered with figures corresponding to those in the bills of lading for the purpose of identification.

Balenger, a barge or water-vessel, a man-of-war.

Baleuga, a territory or precinct.

Balk [fr. valicare, Ital., to pass over.—Skinner], a ridge of land left unploughed between the furrows, or at the end of a field.—Encyc. Lond.

Ballare, to dance.—Spelm. ; Fl. l. 2, c. 87.

Ballastage, a toll paid for the privilege of taking up ballast from the bottom of a port or harbour.

Balliers (inutilis sarcina), or bail-load (bagles, Prov. Dan.), persons who, standing on a bulk or ridge of ground, give notice of something to others.

Balliva, a bailiwick or jurisdiction.—Old Records. See BAILLICK.

Ballivo Amovendo, an ancient writ to remove a bailiff from his office for want of sufficient land in the bailiwick.—Reg. Orig. 78.

Ballot [fr. balla, It. ; bala, Sp. ; balle, Fr.], a little ball or ticket used in giving votes.

Ballot, to vote for or choose a person into an office by means of little balls of several colours, which are put into a box privately, according to the inclination of the chooser or voter, or by writing the name or names of the candidates upon small pieces of paper and rolling them up, so that they cannot be read, which are put into a box, and, when the time limited for the voting is over, are taken out one by one by an impartial person. The names are then read over, and the number of votes taken, and the candidate who has the majority of votes in his favour is declared duly elected. As to ballots for the militia (now suspended), see MILITIA.

By the Ballot Act, 1872, 35 & 36 Vict. c. 33, voting by ballot was introduced into Parliamentary and Municipal Elections, the form of voting being by making a cross opposite the name of that one of the candidates, whose names are printed on a 'ballot paper,' whom the voter votes for. See Woodward v. Sarsons, L. R. 10 C. P. 733. The act was originally limited to expire in 1880, but has since been continued annually by 'Expiring Laws Continuance Acts.'

The ballot rule of building societies provides that when there is a balance at the banker's beyond a certain amount, which is not wanted for advances or other claims, the directors may require the investing members of the society to withdraw, by ballot, the value of as many shares as will be sufficient to exhaust such portion of the money in hand as they shall think proper. The investing members on whom the ballot falls, will receive the value of their shares, including compound interest at the rate on which the society has been formed.

Ballot-box, a case made of wood for receiving ballots.

Balnearii, stealers of the clothes of persons bathing in the public baths.—Civil Law.

Ban, or Bann [Teut.], a proclamation or public notice, or summons or edict, whereby a thing is commanded or forbidden. It is most especially used to signify the publication of intended marriages. By 4 Geo. IV. c. 76, s. 2, all banns of matrimony shall be published in an audible manner in the parish church or in some public chapel, in which chapel banns of matrimony may now or may hereafter be lawfully published (see 6 Geo. IV. c. 92, and 11 Geo. IV. & 1 Wm. IV. c. 18), of or belonging to such parish or chapelry wherein the persons to be married shall dwell, according to the form of words prescribed by the rubric prefixed to the office of matrimony in the Book of Common Prayer, upon three Sundays preceding the solemnization of marriage, during the time of morning service or of evening service (if there shall be no morning service in such church or chapel upon the Sunday upon which such banns shall be so published) immediately after the second lesson. But the spiritual judge, by a license, may dispense with the formality of publication. If any persons be married without either publication of banns or license, the marriage will be void, and the officiating minister is liable to penal servitude.—26 Geo. II. c. 33.

Banc (or Banco), Sittings in [fr. bancus, Lat., a seat or bench of justice. Thus Bancus Regine or Bank la Reine, is the Queen's Bench. Bancus communium Placitorum, or Bench le Common Pleas, is the Court of Common Pleas, or the Common Bench], the sittings of a Superior Court of Common Law as a full Court as distinguished from the sittings of the Judges at Nisi Prius or on Circuit. Such sittings might be held out of term as well as in term (1 & 2 Vict. c. 32. s. 2, and C. L. P. Act, 1854, s. 95). The business of the Courts in banco is transferred to Divisional Courts of the High Court of Justice (Jud. Act, 1873, ss. 40, 41). [See DIVISIONAL COURT].

Bancale, a covering of ease or ornament for the bench or other seat.

Banco [Ital.]. See BANC. A seat or bench of justice; also, in commerce, a word of Italian origin signifying a bank.

[Lat.], the Upper Bench ; the King's Bench was so called during the Protectorate.

Bandit, a man outlawed, put under the ban of the law.

'I will be the bane of such a person' is a popular saying. When a person receives a mortal injury by anything, such thing is his bane. He who is the cause of another's death, is le bane, i.e., malefactor.

Baneret, or Banneret [Fr.], a knight made in the field, by the ceremony of cutting off the point of his standard, and making it, as it were, a banner. Knights so made are accounted so honourable that they are allowed to display their arms in the royal army, as barons do, and may bear arms with supporters. They rank next to barons ; and were sometimes called vexillarii.

Bani, deodands.

Banishment [fr. bannire, bandire, M. Lat., to proclaim, denounce, which formed the O. Fr. compound, fer-bannir (bannire foras), to publicly order one out of the realm, and the simple bannir was used in the same sense.—Wedg.], a forsaking or quitting the realm ; a kind of civil death inflicted on an offender. It is of two kinds :—one, voluntary and upon oath, called abjuration, the other upon compulsion for some offence. For the Greek and Roman Laws on this subject, consult Smith's Dict. of Antiq. tit. 'Banishment.'

Bank. Commercially it is a place where money is deposited for the purpose of being let out to interest, returned by exchange, disposed of to profit, or to be drawn out again as the owner shall call for it. See 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 28, s. 15 ; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 32, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, s. 5 ; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 32 ; and also Joint-Stock Banks and Limited Liability, and consult Grant on Banking.

The three great national banks are (1) the Bank of England, regulated by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 98 ; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 32 ; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 20 ; and see 21 Vict. c. 1 ; 24 Vict. c. 3 ; and 35 & 36 Vict. c. 34. The Bank of England conducts the whole banking business of the British Government, acting not only as an ordinary bank, but as a great engine of state. As to its origin see 3 Hall. Const. Hist. 135. (2) The Bank of Scotland, established by Wm. III. Parl. 1, s. 5 ; 44 Geo. III. c. 23 ; 9 Geo. IV. c. 65. (3) The Bank of Ireland, as to which, see the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 5.—McCull Comm. Dict.

Bank-book, a book kept by a customer of a bank, showing the state of his account with it.

Bank-credits, accommodations allowed to a person on security given to a bank, to draw money on it to a certain extent agreed upon.

Banker, one who receives money in trust to be drawn again as the owner has occasion for it. As to embezzlement and frauds by bankers, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 75, 76, replacing the repealed 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54.

Bankers' Books Evidence Act, 1879, 42 Vict. c. 11, an act whereby a copy of an entry in a banker's book is made prima facie evidence of such entry, upon proof that the copy has been checked by comparison with the entry.

Bankers' cash notes, formerly called goldsmiths' notes, because bankers were originally goldsmiths. Written promises given by bankers to their customers as acknowledgments of having received money for their use. They are payable to bearer on demand and considered as money, and transferable from one person to another by delivery. They are now seldom made except by country bankers, their use having been superseded by the introduction of cheques.

Bank of England. See BANK.

Bank-notes, or Bank-bills, written or printed promises for money, to be paid by a banking company. They are uniformly made payable on demand. They are not like bills of exchange, mere securities or documents for debt, nor are they so esteemed, but are treated as money in the ordinary course and transactions of business by the general consent of mankind, and, on payment of them, whenever a receipt is required, it is always given as for money, not as for securities or notes. Per Lord Mansfield, Miller v. Race, 1 Burr. 457. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 83, s. 11. Bank of England notes were made a legal tender by the 5th sect. of 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 98, everywhere, except at the Bank and its branches, for all sums above five pounds.

Bankrupt [fr. bancus, or banque, the table or counter of a tradesman, and ruptus, Lat., broken, denoting thereby one whose shop or place of trade is broken or gone]. A debtor who does certain acts, tending to defeat or delay his creditors, may be adjudged bankrupt, and so made liable to the bankruptcy laws. Before the 'Bankruptcy Act, 1861' (24 & 25 Vict. c. 134), traders only were liable to be made bankrupts. The law of bankruptcy was consolidated, and the procedure materially altered by the 'Bankruptcy Act, 1869' (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71).

By the act of 1869, s. 6, any creditor whose debt amounts to 50*l.*, or any two or more creditors, the aggregate amount of whose claims shall be of that amount, may petition the Court of Bankruptcy, praying that the debtor be adjudged a bankrupt, alleging as the ground for such adjudication one or more of the 'Acts of Bankruptcy' therein defined, as to which see ACTS OF BANKRUPTCY. After adjudication, the act provides for the appointment of a 'trustee' of the property of the bankrupt, and a 'committee of inspection for the purpose of superintending the administration by the trustee of the bankrupt's property' (s. 14), and ultimately for the discharge of the bankrupt after the realisation and distribution of the assets (ss. 47, 48). As to the payment of unclaimed dividends and undivided surpluses of estates, see 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 116; and c. 83, s. 19, amended by Jud. Act, 1875, s. 32.

The Bankrupt Law is distinguished from the ordinary law between debtor and creditor, as involving these three general principles:—

(1) a summary and immediate seizure of all the debtor's property; (2) a distribution of it among the creditors in general, instead of merely applying a portion of it to the payment of the individual complainant; and (3) the discharge of the debtor from future liability for the debts then existing.

Bankruptcy, the state or condition of a bankrupt.

Bankruptcy, Court of. The act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, gives jurisdiction in Bankruptcy to the London Bankruptcy Court and the County Courts having jurisdiction in Bankruptcy (see ss. 59—72). Consult the works on Bankruptcy of Roche and Hazlitt; Williams; Lee; Robson; and see APPEAL.

Bankruptcy (Ireland) Act. See 35 & 36 Vict. c. 58, which repeals divers previous enactments; and the 'Debtors' Act (Ireland), 1872' (35 & 36 Vict. c. 57).

Bank-stock, shares in the property of a bank.

Banneret. See BANERET.

Bannimus, the form of an expulsion of a member from the University of Oxford, by affixing the sentence in some public place, as a denunciation or promulgation of it.

Banning, an exclamation against, or cursing of another.

Bannire ad placita, ad molendinum, to summon tenants to serve at the lord's courts, to bring corn to be ground at his mill.

Bannitus, or Banniatius, an outlaw; a banished man.

Bannock, a thick cake of oatmeal, being a perquisite of a mill-servant in thirlage.

Bannum, or Banleuga, the utmost bounds of a manor or town.—Seld. Hist. of Tithes, 75.

Banns of marriage. See MARRIAGE.

Banyan, a Hindoo merchant or shopkeeper. The word is used in Bengal to denote the native who manages the money concerns of a European, and sometimes serves him as an interpreter.

Baptism [fr. Βάπτισμα, Gk.]. See BIRTH.

By the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 36 it is rendered unlawful to demand any fee for the celebration or registration of baptism.

Bar, a partition running across the courts of law, behind which all outer-barristers and every member of the public must stand. Solicitors, being officers of the Court, are admitted within it: as are also queen's counsel, barristers with patents of precedence, and serjeants, in virtue of their ranks. Parties who appear in person also are placed within the bar on the floor of the Court. See FLOOR.

Bar-fee, a payment taken by a sheriff from an acquitted prisoner.

Bar, Plea in, a pleading showing some ground for barring or defeating an action at Common Law. A plea in bar was therefore distinguished from all pleas of the dilatory class, as impugning the right of action altogether, instead of merely tending to divert the proceedings to another jurisdiction, or suspend them, or abate the particular writ or declaration. It was, in short, a substantial and conclusive answer to the action. It followed from this property, that in general, it must either deny all, or some essential part of the averments of fact in the declaration, or admitting them to be true, allege new facts which obviated or repelled their legal effect. In the first case the defendant was said, in the language of pleading, to traverse the matter of the declaration; in the latter, to confess and avoid it. Pleas in bar were consequently divided into (1) pleas by way of traverse, and (2) pleas by confession and avoidance.—Step. Plead. 57.

In Equity, a plea in bar was a defence, resorted to when there was no defect apparent on the face of the plaintiff's bill, alleging affirmative matter, and reducing the case to a particular point, seeking to displace the plaintiff's equity.

Pleas in bar are now abolished as forms of pleading, and a statement of defence is substituted in all the Divisions of the High Court (except in Divorce), both in matters of Common Law and of Equity (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XIX., r. 2). See DEFENCE.

Bar, Trial at, the trial of a cause or prisoner before the Court itself instead of at Nisi Prius. It is entirely discretionary with the Court to grant it at all, unless the Crown be actually and immediately interested, when the Attorney-General may demand it as of right. It is moved for after issue joined, and ten days' notice of trial must be given to the parties after notice to the masters of the Court. A special jury of the county in which the venue is laid, is impanelled, unless the Court imposes the terms of trying by a Middlesex or Surrey jury, or the parties consent to the contrary. The last trial at bar—of one Arthur Orton for perjury, in swearing that he was Sir Roger Tichborne—took place in the year 1873. In civil matters such trials may be held before Divisional Courts, if the Court think them unsuited for trial by a single judge (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 40); and in criminal cases before a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court. (See Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. LXII.)

Barber-chirurgeons, a corporation of London, instituted by Edw. IV. The barbers were separated from the surgeons by 18 Geo. II. c. 15, and the latter were erected into a Royal College of Surgeons at the commencement of the present century.—Dunglison.

Barbican [fr. barbacana, M. Lat.], a watch-tower or bulwark.

Barbicanage, money given towards the maintenance of a barbican; a tribute for repairing or building a bulwark.

Barcarium, a sheep cote; a sheep walk.

Bargain and sale [the word bargain is from barguigner, O. Fr., to chaffer, bargain, or more properly to wrangle or haggle, in the making of a bargain. The proper meaning of the word is contest, debate, and it was frequently used in O. E. and Sc. in the sense of fight, skirmish], a species of conveyance.

It is of two kinds:—

(1) Improper. This is a Common Law conveyance, and is resorted to in order to execute a Common Law power or authority to sell or mortgage realty, given to an executor by a will, or to carry out a power to dispose of property conferred by statute. The operative words are 'bargain and sell.' The estate passes by force of the will or statute, the bargain and sale merely nominating the transferee, and thus ascertaining a purchaser. It does not require enrolment, unless specially directed. See 2 Hayes's Com. 80, n. (64), and 5 Eliz. c. 26, as to bargains and sales of lands in Lancashire, Chester, and Durham; 25 Geo. III. c. 35, as to extended lands of Crown-debtors; and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, ss. 208, 209, and 210, as to a bankrupt's entails and copyholds.

(2) Proper. This is an equitable conveyance by which the bargainee, who is entitled to the use, becomes immediately seised of the possession or legal estate pursuant to the Statute of Uses, without any other ceremony than the delivery of the deed. There must be a pecuniary, although it may be but a nominal, consideration to raise a use upon this assurance. The appropriate operative words are, 'bargain and sell.' A bargain and sale of freeholds must be enrolled within six lunar months from its date, in one of the Courts of Record at Westminster, or with the custos rotulorum of the county, under the 27 Hen. VIII. c. 16, which does not, however, extend to any hereditaments lying within any city, borough, or town corporate, wherein the mayors, recorders, or other officers have authority to enrol deeds. An examined copy of the enrolment of the bargain and sale is admissible in evidence, notwithstanding the existence of the original (10 Anne c. 18, s. 3). A bargain and sale of chattel interests does not require enrolment, and when a bargain and sale is adopted as a disentailing assurance (which, by the way, is not advisable, since it does not transmute the seisin), such assurance, although not enrolled within the time prescribed by 27 Hen. VIII. c. 16, will, if enrolled in Chancery within six calendar months of its execution, be good and valid (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 41). A chief difference between a proper and an improper bargain and sale is, that in the former a use cannot be limited upon the legal estate in the bargainee, so as to be executed and become a legal estate by the statute, for it must be a trust; but in the latter a seisin is raised, on which uses, which the statute will execute, may be limited.—2 Sand. Uses, 53; 2 Br. & Had. Com. 538.

Bargainee, a person to whom a bargain and sale is made.

Bargainer, or Bargainor, a person who makes a bargain and sale.

Barkary, a tan-house, or a place to keep bark in for the use of tanners.

Barleycorn, the third of an inch.

Barmote, or Barghmote, a court, not of record, within the Hundred of the Peak in Derbyshire, for the regulation of groves, possessions, and trade of the miners, and lead.

Barnard's Inn, an Inn of Chancery. See INNS OF CHANCERY.

Baron [fr. beorn, Sax., noble], the fifth and lowest degree of nobility, next to a viscount, and above that of a knight or baronet. In the Salic Law it signifies free-born. The present barons are—(1) By prescription; for that they and their ancestors have immemorially sat in the Upper House. (2) Barons by patent, having obtained a patent of this dignity to them and their heirs male, or otherwise. (3) Barons by tenure, holding the title as annexed to land; it is said that it is the possession of their ancient landed territories which imparts the barony to the bishops, thereby giving them a place in the Upper House, although they hold by succession, not by inheritance; but it is rather thought that they sit in the Upper House by immemorial usage.

Baron Court. See COURT BARON.

Baron and feme [Fr.], husband and wife. A wife being under the protection and influence of her Baron, lord, or husband, is styled a feme-covert (femina viro cooperta), and her state of marriage is called her coverture. See HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Baronet [fr. Baron, Fr., and et, diminutive termination], the holder of a dignity of inheritance created by letters-patent, and descendible to the issue male. He has precedence before all knights, except Knights of the Garter; and would even take precedence of them, were it not that Knights of the Garter are always privy counsellors. The order was instituted in 1611, by James I., who conferred the dignity in consideration of the payment of 1000*l.* to the Crown, the money so raised being applied to pay the troops sent to quell an insurrection in the province of Ulster in Ireland. The number was at first 200, but has since much increased. Baronets are allowed to charge their coat with the arms of Ulster, which are a sinister hand, erect, open, and couped at the wrist, gules (red) in a field argent (white). The title 'Sir' is prefixed to their name. The first baronet ever created was Sir Nicholas Bacon, of Redgrave, in Suffolk, whose successor is therefore styled Primus Baronetorum Angliæ.—1 Bl. Com. 403; 1 Br. & Had. Com. 486. See BANERET.

The feudal tenants next below the degree of a baron were called baronetti, baronuli, baronculli, baroncelli, but as the same class of tenants were also termed bannerets, the two names, from their resemblance, were sometimes confounded, and in several instances, where baronetti is written in the printed copies, Spelman found bannereti in the M.S. rolls of parliament. Still he shows, by early examples, that baronettus is not a mere corruption of banneretus, but was used in the sense of a lesser baron.—Wedg.

Barons of the Exchequer, the judges of the Court of 'The Exchequer of Pleas' at Westminster. See EXCHEQUER, COURT OF.

Barons of the Cinque Ports, members of the House of Commons, elected by those ports. See May's Parl. Pr., 6th ed., 27*n.*

Barony, or Baronage, the honour and territory of a baron; also the body of barons and peers.

Barony of land, a quantity of land amounting to 15 acres. In Ireland, a subdivision of a county.

Barrator, or Barretor [fr. barrateur, Fr., a deceiver], a common mover of suits and quarrels in disturbance of the peace, either in courts or elsewhere; one who is himself never quiet, but is at variance with others, taking or detaining possession of houses and lands or goods by false invention, etc. He is the most dangerous oppressor in the law, for he oppresses the innocent by colour of law, which was made to protect them from oppression. The punishment is fine and imprisonment; and if the offender belonged to the profession of the law he was disabled from practising for the future, by 12 Geo. I. c. 29; 21 Geo. II. c. 3.—4 Bl. Com. 134.

Barratry, or Barrettry [fr. barratrare, Ital., to cheat, or baret, Aug.-Nor., a quarrel], a quarrel or contention; the act of a barrator.

In marine insurance, it is the commission of any fraud upon the owners or insurers of a ship by the master or crew, as deserting her, sinking her, or doing any act which may subject her to arrest, detention, loss, or forfeiture, etc. It is the practice in most countries to insure against barratry. Many foreign jurists hold, that it comprehends every fault which the master and crew can commit, whether it arise from fraud, negligence, unskilfulness, or mere imprudence. But in this country it is ruled, that no act of the master or crew shall be deemed barratry, unless it proceed from a criminal or fraudulent motive.—Arnould on Marine Insurance, 4th ed., 705 et seq.

In Scotland, it is the crime of a judge who is induced, by bribery, to pronounce a judgment; and it is also applied to the simony of clergymen, going abroad to purchase benefices from the see of Rome.—Jamieson.

Barrel, a measure of 36 gallons.

Barren money, money not put out at interest.

Barr-fee, a fee of 20*l.* payable by every prisoner acquitted of felony to the sheriff or gaoler.—Termes de la Ley.

Barrister, or Barrastor, a counsellor or advocate learned in the law, admitted to plead to the bar, and there to take upon himself the protection and defence of clients. He is termed jurisconsultus and licentiatus in jure. As to his fees in the 15th century, see 3 Hall, M. A. 371. As to the mode and qualification for obtaining the degree of a barrister, see INNS OF COURTS; and consult Warren's Law Studies, and Forsyth's Hortensius, or, The Advocate.

A counsel can maintain no action for his fees, which are given not as a salary or hire, but as a mere honorarium or gratuity, and even an express promise by a client to pay money to counsel for his advocacy is not binding. See Kennedy v. Brown, 13 C. B. N. S. 677, 9 Jurist. N. S. 119, where the whole law on the subject of counsels' fees is elaborately discussed. Moreover, the payment of a fee does not depend upon the event of a cause; and for the purpose of promoting the honour and integrity of the bar, it is expected that all their fees should be paid when their briefs are delivered.—1 Chitty R. 551. On the other hand, he is not liable to an action for negligence or unskilfulness.

A counsel is not answerable for any matter by him spoken relative to the cause in hand and suggested in his client's instructions, although it should reflect upon the reputation of another, and even prove absolutely groundless. See Hodgson v. Scarlett, 1 B. & A. 232.

It is a rule of etiquette, but not a rule of law, that a barrister should not take instructions except through the intervention of a solicitor. See Doe & Bennett v. Hale, 15 Q. B. 171, where it was said that the rule of etiquette was beneficial, and ought to be maintained.

Barristers have exclusive audience in the Supreme Court, as representatives of suitors. In the County Courts and in the Bankruptcy Court they are heard along with solicitors.

Barristers are either utter or outer barristers, who plead without the bar; or queen's counsel and serjeants-at-law, who plead within the bar. See BAR.

Domat remarks (2 Dom. b. 2, tit. 6, c. ii.), that the duties of advocates may be comprehended in two maxims: (1) Never to defend a cause which is unjust. (2) Never to defend just causes, but by the dictates of truth and justice. See Hutchinson v. Stephens, 1 Kay 668.

Barrow [fr. beorg, Sax., a heap of earth], a large hillock or mound used as a sepulchre, found in many parts of England.

Barter [fr. baratar, Sp., to overreach or circumvent], to exchange one commodity for another, or truck wares for wares.

Barton, Berton, or Burton [fr. beretum, berteum, bere wic, A. S., a court-yard, corn-farm; fr. bere, barley, and tun, inclosure, or wic, dwelling. A. S.—Bosw.], demesne lands of a manor, a great farm, a manor-house, out-houses, fold-yards, a court-yard.

In the 2 & 3 Edw. VI. c. 82, barton lands and demesne lands are used as synonyms. Blount says it always signified a farm distinct from a mansion; and bertonarii were farmers or husbandmen who held bartons at the will of the lord. In the west of England they call a great farm a barton, and a small farm a living.—Encyc. Lond.

Bas-Chevaliers, low or inferior knights, holding inferior fees by a base tenure, as distinguished from bannerets, chief or superior knights. Simple knights are called knights bachelor, bas-chevaliers.

Bascinet, or Bassinet, a light helmet worn by the infantry in the reigns of Edward II. and III. and Richard II.

Base-Court, an inferior court, not of record, as a court-baron, court leet, etc.

Base-estate, lands held by base tenants, who performed villeinous services to their lords; but there is a difference between a base estate and villenage, for to hold in pure villenage is to do all that the lord commands; and if a copyholder have but a base estate, he not holding by the performance of every commandment of his lord, cannot be said to hold in villenage.—Kitch. 41.

Base-fee, this species of inheritable freehold is marked, as to its duration or time of continuance, by an event beyond which it is not to endure. The event is the qualification which gives a name to this estate, and ascertains its determination. A fee qualified is frequently called a fee-base, i.e., impure, defective, and circumscribed. There is hardly any event, provided it be lawful, and do not violate the rule against perpetuity, which may not be made the cause of the determination of this fee.

The following events are specimens of qualifications, which may be expressly annexed to this estate.

A limitation to A. and his heirs;

(1) Peers of the realm;

(2) Lords of the manor of Blackacre;

(3) Tenants of the manor of Dale;

(4) During the time whilst a particular tree shall stand;

(5) Till the marriage of a certain person takes place;

(6) Till certain debts be paid;

(7) Till default be made in payment of a given debt, at a certain time;

(8) Until a minor shall attain his majority.

When these events terminate, or the acts are done or omitted to be done, according to the meaning of the given restrictions, the fee-qualified will cease; but it may possibly, as is obvious, continue for ever, in those instances especially where the qualification is not certain to take place. The estates will then continue precisely in the same manner, as if no collateral event, giving to the estate a determinate character, had been annexed to it. A base-fee may arise in the absence of any express qualification when it is made determinable by construction of law, on a certain event. As where a tenant-in-tail, with remainder to a stranger, conveys the fee-simple to another in the property entailed upon him, such other takes a qualified fee by legal construction, determinable on the death of the tenant-in-tail, and failure of the issue under the entail. Another example of such an estate, is when a tenant-in-tail, not being himself entitled to the immediate remainder or reversion in fee, conveys without the consent of the protector of the settlement, he then transfers a base-fee, determinable on the failure of his issue in tail (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 34). A qualified fee is confined in its extent, and confers a limited power of alienation, entitling the owner to give an interest of the same extent and continuance only to another person which he has in himself. So that the estate will, notwithstanding the transfer, be determinable, and, into whose hands soever it may come, will cease on the happening of the event upon which such qualified fee depends.

Base-infeftment, a disposition of lands by a vassal, to be held of himself.—Scotch Law.

Baselard, or Basillard, a weapon, a poignard.—Speight's Chaucer; 12 Rich. II. c. 6.

Basels, coins abolished by Hen. II., A.D. 1158.

Base-rights, those by which a granter creates a subinfeudation in favour of a vassal, to be held of himself.—Scotch Law.

Basileus [Gk.], a king.—Monasticon.

Basilica, a new body of law, framed A.D. 880 by the Emperor Basilius, and published by his successor Leo, surnamed the Philosopher under the title of Βασιλικά, either in honour of his father, or as containing the imperial law.—1 Colquhoun's Roman Civil Law, s. 77.

Basket-tenure, lands held by the service of making the king's baskets.

Bassa tenura, a base tenure, was a holding by villenage, or other customary service, opposed to alta tenura, the highest tenure in capite, or military by service.

Basset, an unlawful game.

Bassinet, a skin used by soldiers for coverings. See BASCINET.

Bassnetum, a helmet.

Bastard [fr. βαρβαρὸς, Gk., a concubine; or basetaerd, Brit., nothus, spurius; or bastard, fr. bas, low, and start (steort, A.S.), risen, upstart, or fr. baos, Gael., fornication]. A bastard, according to Blackstone (I. 454), is one that is not only begotten but born out of lawful marriage. The civil and canon laws did not allow a child to remain a bastard if the parents afterwards intermarried, but when it was proposed by the bishops to assimilate the law of England to the canon laws in this respect all the earls and barons with one voice answered that they would not change the laws of the realm (nolumus leges Anglice mutare).—Statute of Merton, 28 Hen. III. c. 9. 2. A person born in wedlock, who has been declared a bastard by legal sentence.

A bastard has neither duties towards his natural parents nor claims upon them, save as regulated by the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, 35 & 36 Vict. c. 65, and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 9.—by which the mother, either before the birth, or twelve months after it, or any time after it upon proof that the father has paid money for its maintenance, may obtain from justices an 'affiliation order,' i.e., an order upon the person proved to be the father to pay not more than 5s. a week,—nor any claim to succession to their goods, nor any right to any name save such as he acquires. But a bastard may not marry any person whom he could not have married if his parents had been married before his birth, and is punishable for incest if he carnally knows any such. And although he (or she) cannot obtain the consent of any parent, when wishing to marry during minority, yet is he or she bound to obtain the consent of a guardian, as upon the death of parents. (See ADVANCEMENT.) In the case of persons born in wedlock, pater est quem nuptiæ demonstrant, and all the legal rights and privileges of a child attach, however conspicuous and notorious may be the origin of the person, until his status has been legally destroyed. (See ACCESS, NON-ACCESS.)—Consult 1 Br. & Had. Com. 559, 563 et seq.

Bastard-eigné, an elder son born before marriage; thus, if a man have a natural son, and afterwards marry the mother, and by her have a legitimate son, the latter is called mulier pūsnē, and the elder son bastard eigné.—Watk. Descent, c. v.; 2 Br. & Had. Com. 399; 1 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 439.

Bastardize, to declare one a bastard, as a court does. 2. To give evidence to prove one a bastard. A mother (married) cannot bastardize her child. See ACCESS.

Bastardy, the state of a person not born in lawful wedlock.

Bastardy-bonds, to indemnify parishes as to natural children likely to be born, are made void by 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 76, s. 70.

Bastart, one born in concubinage, a bastard.

Bas-ville, suburbs of a town.—Fr.

Batable-ground, land that is in controversy, or about the possession of which there is a dispute, as the lands which were situated between England and Scotland before the Union.—Skene.

Bath, Knights of the, a military order of knighthood, instituted by Richard II. The order was newly regulated by notifications in the London Gazette of 25th May, 1847, and 16th Aug., 1850.

Baths and Washhouses. The Acts 9 & 10 Vict. c. 74 (slightly extended by 45 & 46 Vict. c. 30), and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 61, for encouraging the establishment of public baths and washhouses, may be adopted in any incorporated borough, town, etc. See also SWIMMING BATHS.

Batta, discount. 'In revenue matters,' says Mr. Wilson in the Indian Glossary, 'the amount added to, or deducted from, any judgment according to the currency in which it is paid as compared with a fixed standard coin.'—Indian.

Battel, Wager of, a form of trial formerly used in military cases, arising in the court of chivalry and honour, in appeals of felony, in criminal cases, and in the obsolete real action called a writ of action. The question at issue was decided by the result of a personal combat between the parties, or, in the case of a writ of right, between their champions. See Ashford v. Thornton, 1 B. & Ald. 405, which led to the practice, which had long been disused, being formally abolished by 59 Geo. III. c. 46.

Battersea Park. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 77.

Battersega, the ancient name of Battersea, in Surrey.

Battery [batterie, Fr., fr. batte, to beat], beating and wounding. To beat, also, in the legal acceptance of the term, means not merely to strike forcibly with the hand, or a stick, or the like, but includes every touching or laying hold, however trifling, of another's person or clothes, in an angry, revengeful, rude, insolent, or hostile manner. It is a good defence to prove that the alleged battery happened by misadventure, or that it was merely an amicable contest, or that it was the correcting of a child by its parent, or the punishment of a criminal by the proper officer, or that the prosecutor assaulted or beat the defendant first, and that the defendant committed the alleged battery merely in his own defence. So a husband may justify a battery in defence of his wife, a wife in defence of her husband, a parent in defence of his child, a child in defence of his parent, a master in defence of his servant, and a servant in defence of his master, or that it was committed in defence of possession, or that the defendant, as an officer of justice, arrested the prosecutor by virtue of a certain writ or process, which is the alleged battery complained of; or that the complaint has been disposed of by two justices either by conviction or dismissal of the case, provided, in the former case, the defendant has paid the penalty, and suffered the imprisonment awarded; and, in the latter, the magistrates have dismissed the case, because it was justified, or so trifling as not to merit punishment, and this be forthwith certified under their hands. As to the criminal proceedings for battery, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, ss. 42, 43. See ASSAULT.

Battlings [fr. battellus, Lat., a small measure, fr. batus, measure of allowance], an allowance of money, as 'battles,' or 'battels,' is an allowance of provisions, and 'to battle,' to take that allowance.—Encyc. Lond.

Bawdy-house (lupanar, formix, Lat., fr. bawd, dirt). See BROTHEL.

Bay, or pen, a pond-head made of a great height to keep in water for the supply of a mill, etc., so that the wheel of the mill may be turned by the water rushing thence, through a passage or flood-gate.—27 Eliz. c. 19. Also an arm of the sea surrounded by land except at the entrance.

Bazar, daily market or market-place.

Beacon [fr. beacen, A. S., a sign, whence beckon, to nod], a light-house, or sea-mark, formerly used to alarm the country, in case of the approach of an enemy, but now used for the guidance of ships at sea, by night as well as by day. The Trinity House is empowered to set up any beacons or seamarks wherever they shall be deemed necessary.—8 Eliz. c. 13. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 2 and 389—416; 17 and 18 Vict. c. 120, sch.; and 1 Br. & Had. Com. 317.

Beaconage, money paid towards the maintenance of beacons.

Beadle [fr. beodan, A. S., to bid], a church-servant who is chosen by the vestry, and whose business is to attend the vestry, to give notice of its meetings, to execute its orders, to attend upon inquests, and to assist the constables.

Beam [fr. beam, Sax., tree], the part of a stag's head, whence the horns spring, like branches out of a tree. A common balance of weight in cities and towns.

Beams, and Balance, instruments for weighing goods and merchandise, mostly used in the city of London.

Bear, one who speculates for a fall in the market.—Stock Exchange.

Bearer, a person who carries anything.

Bearers, persons who oppress others, usually called maintainers; justices have power to inquire into their actions, etc.—4 Edw. III. c. 11.

Beaurocsira, the ancient name of Berkshire.

Beasts of chase [ferce campestris, Lat.]; there are five, viz., the buck, doe, fox, marten, and roe.—Co. Litt. 233; of the forest are the hart, hind, hare, boar, and wolf. They are also called beasts of venary.—Ibid.; of the warren are the hare and coney.—Co. Litt. 283.

Beau-pleader (to plead fairly), an obsolete writ upon the Statute of Marlbridge (52 Hen. III. c. 11), which enacts that neither in the circuits of the justices, nor in counties, hundreds, or courts-baron, any fines shall be taken for fair-pleading, i.e., for not pleading fairly or aptly to the purpose; upon this statute, then, this writ was ordained, addressed to the sheriff, bailiff, or him who shall demand such fine, prohibiting him to demand it; an alias, pluries, and attachment followed.—Nat. Br. 596. It used to be had as well in respect of vicious as fair pleading by way of amendment.—2 Inst. 122.

Bebba, the ancient name of Bamburg, in Northamptonshire.

Beck [fr. becc, Sax.], a small brook.

Bed of justice [lit de justice, Fr.], the seat or throne upon which the King of France sat when personally present in parliament; hence it signified the parliament itself.

Bedel, or Beadle [fr. bydel, Sax.], a crier or messenger of a court, who cites men to appear and answer; an inferior officer of a parish or liberty. Many other kinds of subordinate officers are so called. See BEADLE.

Bedelary, the jurisdiction of a bedel.

Bederepe, or Biderepe, a service which certain tenants were anciently bound to perform, as to reap their landlord's corn at harvest.

Bede-role, or Bead-roll, a long list.

Bedeweri, banditti, profligate and excommunicated persons.—Mat. Paris.

Bedford Level, a tract of fenny land in the counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Cambridge, Huntingdon, Northampton, and Lincoln, drained by the Earl of Bedford, in 1649. By the Bedford Level Act, 15 Car. II. c. 17, all conveyances and charges, except leases for seven years, are required to be registered. The practice is to register the instrument at length. The registry does not include wills; but conveyances omitted to be registered are valid for all purposes, except for entitling the grantees to the privileges conferred by the act on the owners of lands within the level. See 11 Geo. III. c. 78; 36 Geo. III. c. 73; 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 64; and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 30, 31.

Beer [fr. the root pi, drink, extant in piti, Bohem., to drink, imper. pi, whence piero, beer.—Wedgw.], a liquor compounded of malt and hops. The selling of it by retail is regulated by various acts. The Licensing Act of 1828, which did not allow the sale of beer by retail except in 'ale-houses,' etc., requiring a license from justices of the peace—which license the justices might grant or refuse at their discretion—not being considered to afford sufficient facilities for supplying the public with beer, the Beer Act of 1830, 11 Geo. IV. & 1 Wm. IV. c. 64, was passed to allow any person to retail beer upon taking out an excise license only.

This act was amended in 1834 by 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 85, which drew a distinction between houses for the retail of beer to be drunk on the premises where sold—commonly called beerhouses—and houses for the retail of beer not to be drunk on the premises where sold—commonly called beershops, by requiring that the keeper of a beerhouse should obtain as a condition precedent to his excise license a certificate of good character, signed by six ratepayers not engaged in the trade.

The Wine and Beerhouse Act, 1869, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 29, by requiring a justices' license,—with a saving for vested interests,—placed beerhouses, beershops, and alehouses much on the same footing, and the Licensing Acts of 1873 and 1874 have continued this mode of treatment. The 'Beer Dealers' Retail Licenses (Amendment) Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 34, confers on the justices of the peace an absolute discretion to refuse licenses for the sale of beer to be drunk off the premises where sold, repealing pro tanto the Act of 1869, which limited the power to refuse such licenses to cases where the applicant or his house had been proved to bear a bad character or the house to be below a certain rateable value. See also INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Beerhouse. A house where beer is sold to be drunk either on or off the premises.

Beershop. A house where beer is sold to be drunk off the premises only.

Bega, a land measure used in the East Indies. In Bengal it is equal to about a third part of an acre.

Beggars [fr. bag, Span.], persons who solicit alms. See 5 Geo. IV. c. 83; 11 Geo. IV. & 1 Wm. IV. c. 5; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 38. See VAGRANTS.

Begging the question. See PETITIO PRINCIPII.

Begin, Right to. This right rests with the party on whom is the onus of proving the affirmative. See 1 Ch. Arch. Pr.

Begum, a lady, princess, woman of high rank.—Indian.

Behoof [fr. behofian, A. S., to be fit, beheve, advantage], use, service, profit, advantage, or behalf.

Belgæ, the ancient name of the inhabitants of Somersetshire, Wiltshire, and Hampshire; also of the city of Wells, in Somersetshire.

Belisama, the ancient name of Rhibelmouth, in Somersetshire.

Belles lettres, polite literature.

Bellinus sinus, the ancient name of Billingsgate, in the city of London.

Bello campo, de, the ancient name of Beauchamp.

Bello clivum, Bello desertum, Bellus locus, the ancient names of Beaudesert, in Staffordshire.

Bello loco, de, the ancient name of Beaulieu, in Hampshire.

Bellomariscus, the ancient name of Beaumaris, the county town of Anglesey.

Bello Prato, de, ancient name of Beaupré.

Bench [fr. bance, A.S.], or Banc [Fr.], a tribunal of justice. The aggregate body of judges; (2) of the judges of any given court; (3) The aggregate body of bishops. In the time of the Commonwealth, the King's Bench was called the Upper Bench. See QUEEN'S BENCH, COMMON BENCH.

Benchers, seniors in the Inns of Court, usually but not necessarily Queen's Counsel, elected by co-optation, and having the entire management of the property of their respective inns. The benchers have also the power of punishing a barrister guilty of misconduct, by either admonishing or rebuking him, by prohibiting him from dining in the hall or using the library, or even by expelling him from the bar, called disbarring. They may also refuse admission to a student, or reject his call to the bar. There is an appeal from them to the judges. See R. v. Gray's Inn, 1 Dougl. 353.

Bench warrant, an attachment issued by order of a criminal court against an individual, either for contempt, or for the purpose of arresting a person accused, when a true bill has been found against him by a grand jury; a warrant signed by a judge, or two justices of the peace, to apprehend a prisoner charged with an offence.

Benedicta est expositio quando res redimatur à destructione. 4 Co. 26.—(Blessed is the exposition when anything is saved from destruction.)

Benefice [fr. beneficium, M. Lat., a kindness], an ecclesiastical living and promotion, a rectory or vicarage; all church preferments except bishoprics; also a fief in the feudal system. See ADVOWSON.

Beneficiary, he that is in possession of a benefice; also a cestui que trust, or person having the enjoyment of property, of which a trustee, executor, etc., has the legal possession. See CESTUI QUE TRUST.

Beneficiary privileges, patent rights and copyrights.

Beneficio primo ecclesiastico habendo, an ancient writ, which was addressed by the King to the Lord Chancellor, to bestow the benefice that should first fall in the royal gift, above or under a specified value, upon a person named therein.—Reg. Orig. 307.

Beneficium abstinendi, the power of an heir to abstain from accepting the inheritance.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 214; Cum. C. L. 156.

Beneficium cedendarum actionum, the privilege by which a surety could, before paying the creditor, compel him to make over to him the actions which belonged to the stipulator, so as to avail himself of them.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 332, 351.

Beneficium competentiae, a right of certain persons which saves them from being condemned beyond such an amount as they can pay without depriving themselves of the necessities of life.—Cum. C. L. 350.

Beneficium inventorii, the privilege which an heir had by an inventory of the testator's property to protect himself from the debts.—Cum. C. L. 159.

Beneficium non datum nisi propter officium. Hob. 148.—(A remuneration not given, unless on account of a duty performed.)

Beneficium ordinis, or excussionis or discussionis, a privilege by which a creditor was bound to sue the principal debtor first, and could only sue the sureties for that which he could not recover from the principal.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 351.

Beneficium principis debet esse mansurum. Jenk. Bent. 168.—(The benefit of a prince ought to be lasting.)

Beneficium separationis, the right to have the goods of an heir separated from those of the testator in favour of creditors.—Civil Law.

Benefit Building Societies, certain associations which have been established in different parts of the kingdom, principally amongst the industrial classes, for the purpose of raising by small periodical subscriptions a fund to assist the members thereof in obtaining a small freehold or leasehold property. The legislature afforded encouragement and protection to such societies by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 32. Consult Davis on Building Societies. By the 37 & 38 Vict. c. 42, and the 38 & 39 Vict. c. 9, the 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 32 has been repealed, and the law relating to such societies has been consolidated and amended.

Benefit of Clergy [privilegium clericale, Lat.], an arrest of judgment in criminal cases. The origin of it was this: Princes and states, anciently converted to Christianity, granted to the clergy very bountiful privileges and exemptions, and particularly an immunity of their persons in criminal proceedings before secular judges. The clergy, afterwards increasing in wealth, number, and power, claimed this benefit as an indefensible right, which had been merely a matter of royal favour, founding their principal argument upon this text of Scripture: 'Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm.' They obtained great enlargements of this privilege, extending it not only to persons in holy orders, but also to all who had any kind of subordinate ministration in the church, and even to laymen if they could read, applying it to civil as well as criminal causes. In criminal proceedings the prisoner was first arraigned, and then he might have claimed his benefit of clergy, by way of declinatory plea, or after conviction, by way of arrest of judgment. He was then, if a layman, burnt with a hot iron in the brawn of his left thumb, in order to show that he had been admitted to this privilege, which was not allowed twice to a layman. If a clerk he was handed over to the Ecclesiastical Court, and after the solemn farce of a mock trial, he was usually acquitted, and was made a new and an innocent man. These exemptions at length grew so burthensome and scandalous, that the legislature, from time to time, interfered, until the 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 6, abolished benefit of clergy.—2 Hale's Hist. 323; Bl. Com. 365.

Benefit Societies. See FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

Benefit of discussion, is that, whereby the antecedent heir, such as the heir of line in a pursuit against the heir of tailzie, etc., must be first pursued to fulfil the defunct's deeds and pay his debts. This benefit is likewise competent in many cases to cautioners.—Scotch Law.

Benerth, an ancient service which a tenant rendered to his lord with plough and cart.

Benevolence, nominally a voluntary gratuity given by subjects to their king, but in reality a tax or forced loan. It is now yielded only with consent of the House of Commons, in pursuance of the Petition of Right, 3 Car. I., and 1 W. & M. st. 2, s. 2. Also an aid granted by a tenant to his lord, in times of distress, abolished by 13 Car. II. c. 24.

Benevolentia regis habenda, the form of purchasing the royal pardon and favour, in ancient fines and submissions, to be restored to estate, title, or place.—Paroch. Antiq. 172.

Benignè faciendæ sunt interpretationes, propter simplicitatem laicorum, ut res magis valeat, quam pereat; et verba intentioni, non è contra, debent inservire. Co. Litt. 36.—(Constructions are to be made liberally, on account of the simplicity of the laity, that the thing may rather avail than perish; and words ought to serve the intention, not contrarywise.) This maxim relates to the mode of interpreting written instruments. The judges will rather apply the words of a document to fulfil its lawful intent, than destroy such intent because of insufficient language for to the intention, when once discovered, all technical forms of expression must give way.

Benignior sententia in verbis generalibus seu dubiis, est præferenda. 4 Co. 15.—(The more favourable construction is to be placed on general or doubtful expressions.)

Bequeath [fr. becwæthan, fr. cwæthan, A. S., to say], to leave by will to another. The word is properly applied to personalty only, but, in a will avails to transmit real property, as well as the word devise, which is the proper word; and vice versa.

Bequest, a gift of personal property by will; a legacy.

Berbiage, a rent paid for the depasturing of sheep.—Cowel.

Berbecaria, a sheep-down, or ground to feed sheep.

Bercaria, a sheep-fold, or other enclosure to keep sheep.

Berceia, Bercheria, the ancient names of Berkshire.

Berechingum, the ancient name of Barking, in Essex.

Berefellarii, the seven churchmen, who formerly belonged to the church of St. John of Beverley.—Blount.

Berewicha, or Berewica, a village or hamlet belonging to some town or manor.—Domesday Book.

Berghmaster [fr. berg, Sax., a hill], a bailiff or chief officer among the Derbyshire miners, who also executes the office of coroner; a mountaineer or miner.

Berghmoth, or Berghmote [fr. berg, Sax., a hill, and genote, an assembly], an assembly or court upon a hill, held in Derbyshire, for deciding pleas and controversies among the miners.—Squire on the Anglo-Saxon government.

Beria, Berie, or Berry, a large open field. Those cities and towns in England which end with this word are built on plain and open places, and do not derive their names from boroughs, as Spelman imagines; the true sense of the word berie is a flat wide campaign, as is proved from sufficient authorities by the learned Du Fresne, who observes that Beria Sancti Edmundi, mentioned by Mat. Paris, sub. ann. 1174, is not to be taken for the town, but for the adjoining plain.—Encyc. Lond.

Bermundi Insula, the ancient name of Bermondsey, in Surrey.

Bernet [fr. byran, Sax.], to burn.

Berra, a plain open heath.

Berry, or Bury [fr. beorg, Sax., a hill or castle], a villa or seat of habitation of a nobleman; a dwelling or mansion house; a Bersa, a limit or bound.

Bersare [fr. bersen, Ger.], to shoot or hunt.

Berwick-upon-Tweed, a town which was originally part of Scotland, but is now part of the realm of England, and bound by all acts of the British Parliament, whether specially named or otherwise (20 Geo. II. c. 42, s. 3). It is a county of a town corporate, and is no part of the county of Northumberland. See Hale's Hist. 257.

Besaile, or Besayle [fr. besaieul, Fr.], a father of a grandfather, i.e., a great grandfather.

Bescha [fr. bescher, Fr., to dig], a spade or shovel.

Besoin, need. See AU BESOIN.

Bestiality, the crime of men defiling themselves with beasts, punishable under 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 61, by penal servitude for life.

Bestials, beasts or cattle of any sort.

Betaches, laymen using glebe lands.

Bethlehem, a royal lunatic hospital. See 16 & 17 Vict. c. 96, s. 35, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 60, s. 2. See LUNATIC ASYLUM.

Better equity. It thus arises:—if a prior incumbrancer did not take a security which effectually protected him against any subsequent dealing to his prejudice by the party who had the legal estate, a second incumbrancer taking a security, which in its nature afforded him that protection, had 'the better equity.'—Deark v. Hall, 3 Russ. 1—65.

Betting-Houses, the act for the suppression of, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. Betting in the streets is prohibited by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 134, s. 23; and by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 52, s. 3, persons unlawfully playing or betting in streets or public places are to be deemed rogues and vagabonds within the meaning of the 5 Geo. IV. c. 83. By the 37 Vict. c. 15, s. 3, penalties are imposed on persons advertising or setting letters, circulars, telegrams, etc., as to betting. See GAMING.

Beverches, bed works, or customary services done at the bidding of the lord by his inferior tenants.

Bewared, expended. Before the Britons and Saxons had introduced the general use of money, they traded chiefly by exchange of wares.

Bewray [fr. vrohjan, Goth., to accuse; wrongia, wrogia, wreia, Fris.; vregan, vregian, A. S.; roja, Sw., to discover; rugen, G.], properly to accuse, and then to point out or discover.—Wedgw.

Bice Viasya, a man of the third Hindu caste, who by birth is a trader or husbandman.

Bid [fr. beidan, Goth.; bidan, abidan, A. S., to look for; sed qu.], an offer to give a price for an article about to be sold at an auction. See BIDDER—BIDDINGS.

Bidal, or Bidall [fr. biddan, Sax., to pray or supplicate], an invitation of friends to drink ale at the house of some poor man, who hopes thereby to be relieved by charitable contribution. It is something like 'house-warming,' i.e., a visit of friends to a person beginning to set up house-keeping.—26 Hen. VIII. c. 6.

Bidder, a person who makes an offer at an auction, which he may retract before acceptance, although there may be a condition prohibiting it.

Bidding of the beade, a charge or warning given by the parish priest to his parishioners at some special time, to come to prayers upon any festival or saint's day, according to the canons of the church; also asking the banns is called bidding.—Rubric.

Biddings, raising the price of a thing at a sale or auction. The French call this enchérir. It answers to what the Romans called licitari; they used to bid by holding up the hand or finger. See BID, BIDDER.

Bidentes, two-yearling stags, or sheep of the second year.—Paroch. Antiq. 216.

Biduana, a fasting for the space of two days.—Matt. West. 135.

Biens [Fr.], property; this term comprehends not merely goods and chattels, as in the common law, but also real estate, according to the sense attached to it by the civilians and continental jurists.—Story's Conf. Laws.

Biga, a cart, wain, or waggon; a chariot drawn by two horses, harnessed side by side; or, properly, a cart with two wheels, sometimes drawn by one horse.

Bigamus, a person guilty of the offence of bigamy.

Bigamus seu trigamus, etc., est qui diversis temporibus et successive duas seu tres uxores habuit. 4 Inst. 88.—(A bigamus or trigamus, etc., is one who at different times and successively has married two or three wives.)

Bigamy, the felonious offence of a husband or wife marrying again during the life of the first wife or husband. It is not strictly correct to call this offence bigamy; it is more properly denominated polygamy, i.e., having a plurality of wives or husbands at once; while bigamy, according to the canonists, consists in marrying two virgins successively, one after the death of the other, or in once marrying a widow. The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 57, provides that 'Whosoever, being married, shall marry any other person during the life of the former husband or wife, whether the second marriage shall have taken place in England or Ireland, or elsewhere, shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof, shall be liable, at the discretion of the Court, to be kept in penal servitude for any term not exceeding seven years, and not less than three (now five) years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour; but it is added that 'nothing in this section contained shall extend to any person marrying a second time, whose husband or wife shall have been continually absent from such person for the space of seven years then last past, and shall not have been known by such person to be living within that time, or shall extend to any person who at the time of such second marriage shall have been divorced from the bond of the first marriage, or to any person whose former marriage shall have been declared void by the sentence of any Court of competent jurisdiction.' A prosecution for this crime must be supported by evidence of the first and second marriages of the prisoner, and of the existence of the first wife or husband at the time of the second marriage. If the first marriage be void, an indictment for bigamy cannot be sustained. Thus, if a woman marry A, and in the lifetime of A, marry B, and after the death of A, and whilst B is alive, marry C, she cannot be indicted for bigamy in her marriage with C, because her marriage with B was a mere nullity. Proof, however, of a marriage which is voidable merely will support an indictment for bigamy. The first wife or husband is not a competent witness to prove any part of the case, but the second wife or husband is, after the first marriage is established, for she or he is not legally a wife or husband. See Russ. on Crimes.

Bilagines, bye-laws of corporations, etc.

Bilanciis deferendis, an obsolete writ addressed to a corporation for the carrying of weights to such a haven, there to weigh the wool anciently licensed for transportation.—Reg. Orig. 270.

Bilateral contract, a contract in which both the contracting parties are bound to fulfil obligations reciprocally towards each other; as a contract of sale, where one becomes bound to deliver the thing sold, and the other to pay the price of it.—Civil Law.

Bilboes [fr. boja, Lat; boia, Prov.; buie, O. Fr., fetters], a punishment at sea answering to the stocks on land.

Bilinguis, one who uses two tongues or languages; a jury, part Englishmen and part foreigners, which used to try a foreigner for a crime.

Bill [fr. bullā, M. Lat., a seal], an account; 2. A document submitted to parliament, in which are contained certain propositions for its consideration. If approved, it is passed, and becomes law in the shape of a statute. They are either (1) public, affecting the general interests of the state; or (2) private, enabling private individuals, associated together, to undertake works of public utility at their own risk, and, in a degree, for their own benefit; and also relating to naturalisation, change of name, or perfecting titles to estates, etc. Public bills may originate in either House, unless they be for granting supplies of any kind, or unless they involve directly or indirectly the levying or appropriation of any tax or fine, for then they must be initiated in the Commons; so must all private bills, which authorize the levying of local tolls or rates. Estate, peerage, and naturalisation bills are commenced in the Lords. As to the mode of procedure in order to obtain the passing of a private act, consult May's Parliamentary Practice. A public bill is brought into the House of Commons upon motion made to the house for leave to bring it in; but in the House of Lords a previous permission is unnecessary. The bill is presented to the house and then printed. A public bill is read a first time; and, at a convenient interval, a second time. The introduction of the bill may be opposed at once, as may the bill itself at any stage. If the Opposition succeed the bill must be dropped for that session. After the second reading the bill is considered in committee of the whole house, or by a 'Standing Committee' if it refer to law, justice, or trade, or by a Select Committee. It is there debated clause by clause, amendments may be made, the blanks supplied, and sometimes it is entirely remodelled. After it has gone through the committee the chairman reports it to the house, with the amendments made, and then the house reconsiders the whole bill. When the house has agreed or disagreed to the amendments of the committee, and sometimes added new amendments of its own, the bill is ordered to be reprinted, after which it is read a third time, and amendments are sometimes even then made to it, and further clauses added. The Speaker then puts the question whether the bill shall pass. If this is agreed to, the title to it is settled. After this the bill as passed is printed, and carried to the Lords. It there passes through the same forms as in the other house, and, if rejected, no more notice of it is taken, but the matter passes sub silentio, to prevent unbecoming altercations. But if it be agreed to the Lords send a message to the Commons that they have agreed to the bill. The bill remains with the Lords if they have made no amendment to it; but if any amendments be made such amendments are sent down with the bill to receive the concurrence of the Commons. If the Commons disagree to the amendments a conference usually follows between members deputed from either house, who, for the most part, settle and adjust the difference; but if both houses remain inflexible, the bill is then dropped. If the Commons agree to the amendments the bill is sent back to the Lords, by one of the members, with a message to acquaint them therewith. The same forms are observed, mutatis mutandis, when the bill begins in the House of Lords. And when both houses have done with the bill it is deposited in the House of Peers to wait the royal assent; except in the case of a bill of supply, which, after receiving the concurrence of the Lords, is sent back to the House of Commons, to be by them presented at the bar of the Lords to the Sovereign or the Royal Commissioners. Acts of amnesty, which originate with the Crown, are read only once in each house.

Bill of Adventure. See ADVENTURE, BILL OF.

Bill of Appeal, an abolished criminal prosecution.—59 Geo. III. c. 46. See BATTEL.

Bill of Attainder, a bill declaring persons attainted and their property confiscated.

Bill-book, a book in which an account of bills of exchange and promissory notes, whether payable or receivable, is stated: it should show the date of the bill, the term it has to run before it becomes due, the names of all the parties to it, and the time of its becoming due, together with the account for which it was given.

Bill Chamber, a department of the Court of Session in Scotland.—Bell's Dict.

Bill in Chancery, or Bill in Equity, a printed or written statement of a plaintiff's case, in the nature of a petition to the Court, praying for some redress. It was probably borrowed from the civil law or from the canon law (which is derived from the civil law), or from both.

Bills were divisible into two classes:—

I. ORIGINAL, initiating a suit relating to matters not before litigated: divided into—

(a) Praying relief, such are bills—

(1) Seeking a decree as to some right claimed, or wrong done or threatened.

(2) Of Interpleader.

(3) Of Certiorari.

(4) Quia timet.

(5) Of Peace.

(b) Not Praying relief, such were bills—

(1) To perpetuate testimony, or to examine witnesses de bene esse.

(2) Of discovery (technically so called).

II. NOT ORIGINAL OR SECONDARY, other wise called IN THE NATURE OF ORIGINAL BILLS, for controverting, suspending, or reversing a decree or order, or carrying it into execution, or for cross-litigation: such were bills—

(1) Of Review.

(2) In the nature of a Bill of Review.

(3) Supplemental, in the nature of a Bill of Review.

(4) Impeaching a decree for fraud.

(5) To suspend a decree or to avoid it for subsequent matter.

(6) To execute a decree in a former suit.

(7) Combining two or more of the qualities of the six former species.

(8) And those called Cross-bills.

The bills not original or secondary, which were in addition to or in continuance of an original bill, such as supplemental bills and bills of revivor, were virtually abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, ss. 52, 53. See Consol. Ord. 1860, xxxii., r. 2. See Daniell's Ch. Prac., 4th ed., 288 et seq. For the descriptions of the several bills, see their distinctive names, as PEACE, BILL OF.

Bills are now in name at least abolished, and all actions in the Supreme Court of Judicature are now commenced by writ of summons, followed in certain cases by a statement of claim (Jud. Act, 1875, Sched. 1, Ord. XIX., rr. 1, 2). See STATEMENT OF CLAIM, WRIT OF SUMMONS, and PLEADING. As to the practice prior to the coming into force of the Judicature Acts, 1873 and 1875, see the former edition of this work voce BILL IN CHANCERY, and Dan. Ch. Pr., ubi supra.

Bill of conformity, a bill filed by an executor or administrator, when the affairs of the deceased are so much involved that he cannot safely administer the estate, except under the direction of a Court of Chancery.

Bill of costs, an account of the charges and disbursement of an attorney or solicitor, incurred in the conduct of his client's business. It must be delivered, signed, to the client, one calendar month before an action can be brought to recover the amount thereof, in order to give the client an opportunity of taxing it. Conveyancing costs are taxable. An executor or administrator of an attorney or solicitor must also deliver a bill of costs, signed, before he can sue upon it. See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, ss. 37—39.

Bill of credit, a license or authority given in writing from one person to another, very common among merchants, bankers, and those who travel, empowering a person to receive or take up money of their correspondents abroad.

Bill in criminal cases, an indictment for a crime or misdemeanour preferred to a grand jury; evidence in support of it is adduced; if the grand jury think it a groundless accusation, they endorse 'not a true bill,' or 'not found,' and then the party is discharged without further answer, but a fresh bill may afterwards be preferred to a subsequent grand jury. If they are satisfied of the truth of the accusation, they then endorse upon it 'a true bill'; the indictment is then said to be found and the party stands his trial.—4 Br. & Had. Com. 408.

Bill of debt, or Bill obligatory, when a merchant by his writing acknowledges himself in debt to another, in a certain sum, to be paid on a certain day, and subscribes it at a day and place certain. It may be under seal or not.—Com. Dig. Merchant, F. 2.

Bill of entry, an account of the goods entered at the custom house, both inwards and outwards. It must state the name of the merchant exporting or importing, the quantity and species of merchandise, and whither transported, and whence.

Bill of exceptions. If a judge, at the trial of a cause at Visi Prius, mistook the law, either in directing a judgment of nonsuit, or in refusing or admitting evidence or challenges, and other matters, the counsel for the party dissatisfied with the ruling of the judge, might tender a bill of exceptions at any time before verdict, and require the judge to seal it. The case always went to the jury, and as soon as the bill of exceptions was completed, and judgment had been given upon the verdict, the mode of proceeding was by bringing error on the judgment, and having the matter determined in a Court of Error, and not in the Court out of which the record issued for the trial. The practice, however, of granting new trials had limited the number of cases in which counsel deemed it expedient to tender a bill of exceptions.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac.

By the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. LVIII., r. 1, bills of exceptions are abolished. But it is provided by s. 22, 'that nothing in the said Act, nor in any rule, etc., shall prejudice the right of any party to any action to have the issues for trial by jury submitted and left by the judge to the jury, etc.: Provided also, that the said right may be enforced either by motion in the High Court of Justice or by motion in the Court of Appeal, founded upon an exception entered upon or annexed to the record.' It is believed that this section has never been acted upon.

Bill of exchange. Defined in the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 61, s. 3, as 'an unconditional order in writing addressed by one person to another, signed by the person giving it, requiring the person to whom it is determinable future time a sum certain in money to or to the order of a specified person, or to bearer.' It is a chose in action, but, for the encouragement of commerce, it is assignable, at common law, by mere endorsement, so that very many names are frequently attached to one bill as endorsers, and each of them is liable to be sued upon the bill, if it be not paid in due time. The person who makes or draws the bill is called the drawer, he to whom it is addressed is, before acceptance, the drawee, and after accepting it, the acceptor; the person in whose favour it is drawn is the payee; if he endorse the bill to another, he is called the endorser, and the person to whom it is thus assigned or negotiated, is the endorsee, or holder, and so on ad infinitum. The earliest recorded bills of exchange, according to Beckmann (Hist. Invent. iii. 430), are mentioned by the jurist Baldus, and bear date A.D. 1328. But they were by no means in common use till the next century.—1 Hall. Lit. Hist., pt. 1, c. i., p. 53, n. (r).

The whole law of bills of exchange, except so far as relates to stamps and other small matters, is 'codified' by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, above mentioned, which, except s. 53, which provides that a bill is not an assignment of funds in the hands of the drawee, assimilates the law of England and Scotland, but makes comparatively but little alteration in the law of either country.

The remedy to recover on bills of exchange and promissory notes was much simplified and shortened by the Summary Procedure on Bills of Exchange Act, 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 67), the procedure under which was continued by Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. II. r. 6, but abandoned afterwards by one of the rules of April, 1880.

Bill of gross adventure, an instrument in writing which contains a contract of bottomry, respondentia, and every species of maritime loan.—Fr. Law.

Bill of health, a certificate or instrument, signed by consuls or other proper authorities, delivered to the masters of ships at the time of their clearing out from ports or places suspected of being particularly subject to infectious disorders, certifying the state of health at the time that such ship sailed. A clean bill imports that at the time the ship sailed no infectious disorder was known to exist. 'A suspected bill, commonly called a touched patent or bill, imports that there were rumours of an infectious disorder, but it had not actually appeared. A foul bill, or the absence of a clean bill, imports that the place was infected when the vessel sailed.'—Fr. Law. Dict.

Bill of indemnity, an act of parliament, passed every session until 1869, but discontinued in and after that year, as having been rendered unnecessary by the passing of the Promissory Oaths Act, 1868, for the relief of those who have unwittingly or unavoidably neglected to take the necessary oaths, etc., required for the purpose of qualifying them to hold their respective offices. See 29 & 30 Vict. c. 22; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 88; 31 & 32 Vict. c. 72, s. 16. See OATHS.

Bill of lading, a memorandum signed by masters of ships, in their capacity of carriers, acknowledging the receipt of merchants' goods; of which there are usually three parts—one kept by the consignor, one sent to the consignee, and one preserved by the master. It is the evidence of the title to the goods shipped; and by its endorsement and delivery, the transfer of the property in the goods specified therein is generally effected. By 18 & 19 Vict. c. 111, the rights of suit under a bill of lading vest in the consignee or indorsee (as if the contract contained in the bill of lading had been made with himself) without prejudice to any right of stoppage in transitu or of freight.

Bill of Middlesex, a fictitious mode of giving the Court of Queen's Bench jurisdiction in personal actions, by arresting a defendant for a supposed trespass. The 2 Wm. IV. c. 39, abolished this fiction; and after 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, all personal actions in the Superior Courts of Law at Westminster were commenced by writ of summons.

Bill of pains and penalties, a special act of the legislature which inflicts a punishment, less than death, upon persons supposed to be guilty of treason or felony, without any conviction in the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. It differs from a bill of attainder in this, that the punishment inflicted by the latter is death.—4 Br. & Had. Com. 334.

Bill of parcels, an account given by the seller to the buyer, containing particulars of the goods bought, and of their price.

Bill of particulars, a statement of a plaintiff's cause of action, or of a defendant's set-off.

Bill of peace. See PEACE.

Bill of Rights, a declaration delivered by the Lords and Commons to the Prince and Princess of Orange, 13th February, 1689, and afterwards enacted in parliament, when they became King and Queen. It sets forth that King James did, by the assistance of divers evil counsellors, endeavour to subvert the laws and liberties of this kingdom, by exercising a power of dispensing with and suspending of laws; by levying money for the use of the Crown by pretence of prerogative, without consent of parliament; by prosecuting those who petitioned the king, and discouraging petitions; by raising and keeping a standing army in time of peace; by violating the freedom of election of members to serve in parliament; by violent prosecutions in the Court of King's Bench, and causing partial and corrupt jurors to be returned on trials; excessive bail to be taken; excessive fines to be imposed, and cruel punishments to be inflicted; all of which were declared to be illegal. The declaration concludes in these remarkable words, 'And they do claim, demand, and insist upon all and singular the premises, as their undoubted rights and liberties.' And the act of parliament itself (1 W. & M. st. 2, c. 2) recognizes all and singular the rights and liberties asserted and claimed in this said declaration, to be the true, ancient, indubitable rights of the people of this kingdom.

Bill of sale, an assignment by deed of chattels-personal. It is important, where the bill of sale is by way of absolute assignment, that the purchaser should take possession of the chattels, since the continuance of their possession by the vendor is a badge or presumption of fraud. It being notorious that bills of sale are frequently resorted to for the purpose of defeating just claims, they are watched with considerable jealousy, and the question arises in every case, Is it an honest or a covinous transaction? It is, however, quite legal to protect property for the general body of creditors against the execution of a particular creditor.

If it be an absolute bill of sale, then, unless there have been a bonâ fide substantial change of possession of the goods, an execution creditor cannot be defeated by it; and it must be an exclusive possession under the assignment, and not a concurrent possession with the assignor, otherwise it is fraudulent and void against creditors by 13 Eliz. c. 5, made perpetual by 29 Eliz. c. 5. Where, however, the bill of sale is conditional by way of mortgage, and possession is postponed until default, or it is in settlement, there the absence of transmutation seems to be no evidence of fraud, if in accordance with the terms of the assurance. It becomes a frequent inquiry, when the assignor is a trader, whether the bill of sale, under which a claim is made, is fraudulent and an act of bankruptcy. It is so considered if it be void under the statute of Elizabeth; and also if it be of his whole property in consideration of a pre-existing debt; and so an assignment of a part of his property would be if made voluntarily and in contemplation of bankruptcy. A debtor may, however, prefer one creditor to the rest, and assign property to him even after the others have begun actions against him, so that it be not in anticipation of bankruptcy. (See Twyne's case, 3 Co. 80 [44 Eliz.], and 1 Smi. L. C. 1 et seq., where the principal cases are collected.) The Bankrupt Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 71), provides (s. 91) for the avoidance of settlements of property (except in certain cases) where the settlor becomes bankrupt within two years after such settlement; and (s. 92) for the avoidance of fraudulent preferences of all kinds in favour of any creditor where the debtor becomes bankrupt within three months after the date of the conveyance, transfer, charge, payment, obligation, etc., constituting such preference. By s. 15, all goods and chattels in the 'reputed ownership,' i.e., which at the commencement of the bankruptcy are in the possession, order, or disposition of the bankrupt, being a trader, by the consent and permission of the true owner, of which goods and chattels the bankrupt is the reputed owner, or of which he has taken upon himself the sale or disposition as owner, vest in the trustee as property of the bankrupt.

The registration of bills of sale was first provided for in 1854 by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31, which enacted that every bill of sale or a copy thereof should be void as against assignees in bankruptcy and execution creditors, unless the bill of sale or a copy thereof should have been filed in the Court of Queen's Bench within twenty-one days after its execution together with an affidavit of the time of the bill of sale being given, and a description of the residence and occupation of the deponent and of every attesting witness of the bill of sale. In 1866, by 29 & 30 Vict. c. 96, registration had to be renewed every five years. The two acts were consolidated with some important amendments by the Bills of Sale Act, 1878, 41 & 42 Vict. c. 31. The principal amendments were these:—The period within which to register was altered from twenty-one to seven days. The attestation of a solicitor, who is to state in the attestation that the effect of the bill of sale has been explained to the grantor, was required. The act is applied to trade machinery. The evasion of the law (held to be a successful evasion in Ramsden v. Lupton, L. R. 9 Q. B. 17) by giving successive bills of sale, of which the last only was registered, is prevented. Fixtures and growing are not to be deemed separately assigned when the land passes by the same instrument.

Further important amendments are effected by the Bills of Sale Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 43, the principal amendments being that schedule of the property comprised therein (s. 4); that an unregistered bill of sale is void as between grantor and grantee, and not only as between grantee and trustees in bankruptcy and execution creditors, as was formerly the case (s. 8); that the causes for which seizure may be made are limited to default in payment of the sum secured, bankruptcy, fraudulent removal of the goods, non-production of receipt for rent, and suffering execution (s. 7); that the bill is void unless it be in a form scheduled to the act (s. 9); that attestation by a solicitor is dispensed with, and attestation by a 'credible witness' substituted (s. 10); that a bill is void if made for less than 30*l.* (s. 12); and, by the repeal of s. 20 of the Act of 1878, that goods comprised in the bill are to be in the order and disposition of the bankrupt within the meaning of the bankruptcy law, and therefore vest, on bankruptcy of the grantor, in his trustees for the benefit of his creditors (s. 15).

Bill of sight. When a merchant is ignorant of the real quantities or qualities of any goods assigned to him, so that he is unable to make a perfect entry of them, he must acquaint the collector or comptroller of the circumstance; and he is authorized, upon the importer or his agent making oath that he cannot, for want of full information, make a perfect entry, to receive an entry by bill of sight for the packages by the best description which can be given, and to grant warrant that the same may be landed and examined by the importer in presence of the officers; and within three days after any goods shall have been so landed, the importer shall make a perfect entry, and shall either pay the duties, or shall duly warehouse the same.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 62, s. 24.

In default of perfect entry within three days, such goods are to be taken to the Queen's warehouse; and if the importer shall not, within one month, make perfect entry and pay the duties thereon, or on such parts as can be entered for home use, together with charges of moving and warehouse rent, such goods shall be sold for payment of the duties.—McCull. Com. Dict.

Bill of store, a license granted at the custom house to merchants, to carry such stores and provisions as are necessary for a voyage custom free.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 52.

Bill of sufferance, a license granted to a merchant, to suffer him to trade from one English port to another, without paying custom.

Bill in trade (both wholesale and retail, and workmen), an account of merchandise of goods delivered, or of work done and performed, etc.

Billa vera, a true bill.

Billet, a soldier's quarters in a civilian's house; (2) The ticket which authorizes him to occupy them.

Billeting Soldiers, finding quarters for them. This is regulated by Part iii. of the Army Act, 1881, which replaces the Annual Mutiny Acts. See ARMY.

Billeting on any inhabitant of the realm without his consent is illegal by 3 Car. I. c. 1 and other acts, but s. 102 of the Army Act, 1881, annually suspends these acts, and s. 104 obliges constables to provide billets. Section 104 subjects all innkeepers, etc., to the billets, and exempts private houses. The accommodation to be provided is very precisely laid down by s. 106 and Schedule 2; the maximum remuneration is fixed by the Army Discipline Commencement Act, which is passed every year.

Billets of gold, wedges or ingots of gold. —27 Edw. III. c. 27.

Billiards. By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, ss. 10—14, every house 'where a public billiard table or bagatelle board, or instrument used in any game of the like kind is kept' (not being a house licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquor to be consumed on the premises), must be licensed by justices of the peace. The allowing persons to play at billiards for money in a public-house subjects the publican to a penalty; nor may billiards be played in such a house, even by a lodger, after closing hours.

Bills of mortality, returns of the deaths which occur within a certain district.

It was with the view of communicating to the inhabitants of London, to the Court, and the constituted authorities of the city, accurate information respecting the increase or decrease in the number of deaths and the casualties of mortality occurring amongst them, that the bills of mortality were commenced in London after a visitation of the plague. The object of their publication was to calm exaggerated rumours, and to warn those who could do so conveniently to leave London, whenever the pestilence became more fatal than usual. The bills were commenced in 1592, during a time when the plague was busy with its ravages; but they were not continued uninterruptedly until the occurrence of another plague in 1603, from which period, up to the present time, they have been continued from week to week; excepting during the Great Fire, when the deaths of two or three weeks were given in one bill.

In 1605, the parishes comprised within the bills of mortality included the ninety-seven parishes within the walls, sixteen parishes without the walls, and six contiguous out-parishes in Middlesex and Surrey.

In 1626, the city of Westminster was included in the bills; in 1636, the parishes of Islington, Lambeth, Stepney, Newington, Hackney, and Redriff. Other additions were made from time to time. The parishes of Marylebone and St. Pancras, with some others, which at the beginning of the last century had only a population of 9,150 persons, but now contain a rapidly increasing population, were never included in the bills. The enactments providing for the registration of births, deaths, and marriages, now secure full statistics on these subjects. Consult the annual report of the Registrar-General of Births, Deaths, and Marriages in England; and see BIRTHS, MARRIAGES, and BURIALS.

Bill-stickers. See 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 90, as to defacing property of metropolitan vestry, and 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 54, subs. 10, as to defacing property of metropolitan owner or occupier.

Binonium, Vinocium, Brinonium, Vinovia, Binovia, ancient names of Binchester, in the bishopric of Durham.

Bipartite, of two parts.

Birds. Larceny may be committed at Common Law of domestic fowls, as hens, ducks, geese, etc. (1 Hale P. C. 511), and of tame pigeons, though unconfined (2 Den. C. C. R. 361), and of tame pheasants (1 F. & F. 350). The 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 21—23, provides, that whoever shall steal, or kill with intent to steal, birds ordinarily kept in a state of confinement, or for any domestic purposes, not being the subject of larceny at Common Law, or shall be in possession of any such bird, or the plumage thereof, knowing the same to have been stolen, shall be punishable on summary conviction by fine or imprisonment. As to unlawfully and wilfully killing or wounding house doves or pigeons under circumstances not amounting to larceny at Common Law, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 23; and see also 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 41.

Certain wild birds in the United Kingdom are protected during the breeding season by the Wild Birds' Protection Act, 1880, 43 & 44 Vict. c. 35 (for schedule to which see list of protected birds) replacing 32 & 33 Vict. c. 17 (as to sea birds), 35 & 36 Vict. c. 78, and 39 & 40 Vict. c. 29. This Act of 1880 was amended, as to an exception for birds received from abroad, etc., and by the insertion of larks in the schedule of protected birds, by the Wild Birds' Protection Act, 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 51.

Birretum, or Birretus, a thin cap fitted close to the shape of the head ; the cap or coif of a judge or serjeant-at-law.—Spelm.

Birth, the act of coming into life. The Roman law did not consider an infant legitimate which was born later than ten months after the death of the father, or the dissolution of the marriage. The Prussian code declares that an infant born 302 days after the husband's death shall be deemed legitimate. The French civil code declares that a child born in wedlock has the husband of its mother for its father. He may, however, disavow it, if he can prove that, from the 300th to the 180th day before its birth, he was prevented, either by absence, or some physical impossibility, from cohabiting with his wife. An infant born 180 days after marriage cannot be disavowed by him in the following cases:—(1) When he had a knowledge of his wife's pregnancy before marriage. (2) When he assisted at the act of birth, and signed a declaration of it. (3) When the infant is declared incapable of living. Lastly, the legitimacy of an infant born 300 days after the dissolution may be contested. It has been the practice in our Courts to consider forty weeks as the more usual time, yet they exercise a discretion of allowing a longer time, when the opinions of the faculty, or the peculiar circumstances of the case, are in favour of a protracted gestation.—Beck's Med. Juris.

Birth, concealing. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 60, which enacts that every person who shall, by any secret disposition of the dead body of a child, whether such child died before, at, or after his birth, endeavour to conceal the birth thereof, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, punishable with imprisonment not exceeding two years. The offence was first created by 21 Jac. I. c. 27.

Births, Marriages, and Deaths. By 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 86, amended by 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 22, a General Register Office is provided for keeping a register of births, deaths, and marriages in England. The Births and Deaths Registration Act, 1874, 37 & 38 Vict. c. 88, amends the law relating to the Registration of Births and Deaths in England in important particulars, and consolidates the law relating to the registration of births and deaths at sea. This Act (s. 1) imposes upon the father and mother of a child, and in their default, upon the occupier of a house in which to his knowledge a child is born, the duty of giving information to the registrar within forty-two days. By s. 10 a corresponding obligation to register a death is imposed upon relatives, etc.

The form for general registration of births comprises the time of birth, name, and sex of the child ; the name, surname, maiden surname, and profession of the parents ; the signature, description, and residence of the informant (who must be the father or mother, or, in case of their inability, the occupier of the house (6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 86, s. 20)) ; the date of registration and signature of the registrar, and also the child's baptismal name (if any be given after registration, within six months).

That for deaths comprises the time of death, name, and surname, sex, age, profession, and cause of death of the deceased ; the signature, description, and residence of the informant (who must be some person present at the death, or in attendance during the last illness, or else the occupier of the house (s. 25), with the date of registration and the signature of the registrar.

And the universal form for registration of marriages comprises the date of the marriage ; the name and surname, age, condition, profession, residence, father's name and surname, and father's profession of each of the parties : together with the place and form of marriage ; and the signatures of the person marrying the parties, and of two witnesses.

Searches may be made and certified copies obtained at the General Register Office, or at the office of the superintendent registrar of the district, or from the clergyman, or registrar, or any other person who shall, for the time being, have the keeping of the register books.

By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 92, provision is made for depositing with the registrar-general a number of non-parochial registers and records of births, baptisms, deaths, burials, and marriages, which had been collected by a commission appointed for that purpose, and for rendering such registers and records available as evidence. See 21 Vict. c. 25.

As to the registration of births, deaths, and marriages in Scotland, see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 80 ; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 29 ; and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 85.

Bisantium, Besantine, Bezant, an ancient coin, first issued at Constantinople ; it was of two sorts—gold, equivalent to a ducat, valued at 9s. 6d. ; and silver, computed at 2s. They were both current in England.

Bi-scot, a fine of 2s. for not repairing banks, ditches, and causeways.

Bishop [fr. ἐπίσκοπος, Gk. ; biscop, Sax.], an overseer or superintendent. The chief of the clergy in his diocese or jurisdiction in England, Wales, or Ireland, and the archbishop's suffragan or assistant. A bishop is elected by the Queen's conseil d'élire, or license to elect the person named by the Queen, in a letter missive, addressed to the dean and chapter ; and if they fail to make election in twelve days, the Queen, by letters patent, may nominate whom she pleases. A bishop is said to be installed, and there are four things necessary to his complete title :—

(1) election, which resembles the presentation of a clerk to an ecclesiastical benefice ; (2) confirmation, resembling admission ; (3) consecration, similar to institution ; (4) installation, answering to induction. The bishops are the lords spiritual in parliament. There are twenty-five bishoprics in England, beside the bishopric of Sodor and Man, the bishop of which is not a lord of parliament ; and eighteen in Ireland (13 & 14 Vict. c. 94). A bishop has three powers : (1) a power of ordination, gained on his consecration, by which he confers orders, etc., in any place throughout the world ; (2) a power of jurisdiction throughout his see or his bishopric ; (3) a power of administration and government of the revenues thereof, gained on confirmation. He has, also, a Consistory Court, to hear ecclesiastical causes, and visits and superintends the clergy of his diocese. He consecrates churches and institutes priests, confirms, suspends, excommunicates, and grants licenses for marriages. He has his archdeacon, dean and chapter, chancellor, who holds his courts and assists him in matters of ecclesiastical law, and vicar-general. He grants leases for three lives, or twenty-one years, reserving the accustomed yearly rent.

As to the resignation of archbishops and bishops when incapacitated by age or other infirmities, see 32 & 33 Vict. c. 111, the provisions of which are continued for three years from the end of Session 1872, by 35 & 36 Vict. c. 40, and made perpetual by 38 Vict. c. 19. As to Indian bishops, see 37 & 38 Vict. c. 77, s. 13.

Bishop's Court, an ecclesiastical court, held in the cathedral of each diocese, the judge whereof is the bishop's chancellor, who judges by the civil canon law ; and if the diocese be large, he has his commissaries in remote parts, who hold consistory courts, for matters limited to them by their commission.

Bishopric, a diocese or see of a bishop.

Bis idem exigi bona fides non patitur ; et in satisfactionibus, non permittitur amplius fieri quam semel factum est. 9 Co. 53.—(Good faith does not suffer the same thing to be exacted twice, and in giving damages, it is not allowed to give more than is given at once.)

Bissextile [fr. bis, Lat., twice, and sextilis, the sixth], leap year, consisting of 366 days, and happening every fourth year, by the addition of a day in the month of February, which in that year consists of twenty-nine days. Leap year is introduced in order to make up for the loss of the six hours by which the course of the sun annually exceeds the 365 days allowed for it in other years. The day thus added was by Julius Cæsar appointed to be the day before the 24th of February, which, among the Romans, was the sixth of the calends, and which, on this occasion, was reckoned twice ; whence it was called the bissextile. By 21 Hen. III., to prevent misunderstanding, the intercalary day and that next before it are to be accounted as one day. The supernumerary day, in leap years, is added to the end of February, and called the 29th of that month.—Encyc. Lond. ; 1 Reeves, c. v. 266. See CALENDAR, post.

Black Act, 9 Geo. I. c. 22, so called because it was occasioned by the outrages committed by persons with their faces blacked or otherwise disguised, who appeared in Epping Forest, near Waltham in Essex, and destroyed the deer there, and committed divers other enormities. Repealed by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27.

Black Acts, acts printed in the old black letter during the dynasty of the Stuarts in Scotland.

Black book, a book kept in the Exchequer, and at the Admiralty.

Black cap. It is a vulgar error that the head dress worn by the judge in pronouncing sentence of death is assumed as an emblem of the sentence. It is part of the judicial full dress, and is worn by the judges on occasions of especial state.

Black game, heath fowl, in contradistinction to red game, as grouse.

Black mail [fr. maile, Fr., a small piece of money], a certain rent of money, coin, or other thing, anciently paid to persons upon or near the borders, who were men of influence, and allied with certain robbers and brigands, for protection from the devastations of the latter ; rendered illegal by 43 Eliz. c. 13. Also rent paid in cattle, otherwise called neat-gild ; and all rents not paid in silver are called reditus nigri (black mail or rents), by way of distinction from the reditus albi (blanch-firmes, or white-rents).

Black Rod, Gentleman Usher of, a chief officer of the Queen, deriving his name from the Black Rod of office, on the top of which reposes a golden lion, which he carries. During the session of parliament he attends on the peers, and to his custody all peers impeached for any crime or contempt are first committed.—Black Book, 255.

Black ward, a sub-vassal, who held ward of the king's vassal.

Baldarius, a corn-monger, mealman, or corn-chandler.

Blade, fruit, corn, hemp, flax, herbs, etc.

Blanch firmes. In ancient times the Crown rents were many times reserved in libris albis or blanch firmes, in which case the buyer was holden dealbare firmam, i.e., his base money or coin, below standard, was melted down in the Exchequer, and reduced to the fineness of standard silver, or, instead thereof, he paid twelve pence in the pound by way of addition.—Lowndes on Coins, 5.

Blanch holding, an ancient tenure of the law of Scotland, the duty payable being trifling, as a penny or a peppercorn, etc., if required.—20 Geo. II. c. 50; 25 Geo. II. c. 20.

Blancoforda, the ancient name of Blandford, in Dorsetshire.

Blancum Castrum, Blane Castle, in Monmouthshire.

Blank acceptance. An acceptance written on the paper before the bill is made, and delivered by the acceptor, will charge the acceptor to the extent warranted by the stamp.

Blank bar, common bar, a plea in bar, which, in an action of trespass, was resorted to to compel the plaintiff to assign the place where a trespass was committed.

Blank bonds, Scotch securities, in which the creditor's name was left blank, and which passed by mere delivery, the bearer being at liberty to put in his name and sue for payment. Declared void by the Act 1696, c. 25.

Blank indorsement, when the name of the indorsee is not mentioned.

Blanks, a kind of white money (value 8*d.*) coined by Henry V. in those parts of France which were then subject to England; forbidden to be current in this realm by 2 Hen. VI. c. 9. Also, certain void spaces, sometimes left by mistake, in judicial proceedings, and which, if anything material be wanting, rendered the same void.

Blasphemy [fr. βλάπτω, Gk., to hurt, and φήμη, reputation; βλασφημέω, to speak impiously; blasphemo, Lat., to revile.—Wedg.], an offence against God and religion, by denying to the Almighty His Being and Providence, or by contumelious reproaches of our Saviour Christ. Also, all profane scoffing at the Holy Scripture, and exposing it to contempt and ridicule. It is both a spiritual and temporal offence. It is an offence both at Common Law and by statute 9 & 10 Wm. III. c. 32, in case the blasphemer has been educated in or at any time made profession of Christianity, which statute imposes disability for any office upon a first conviction, and imprisonment for three years, with further disabilities, upon a second conviction. See Cowan v. Milbourn, L. R. 2 Ex. 230, in which it was held to be a defence to an action for breach of contract to let a room for lectures intended to show 'that the character of Christ is defective,' etc., that the lectures were illegal. And see SWEARING.

Blatum bulgium, the ancient name of Bulness, in Cumberland.

Blaunpain, alias Blancpain, Whitbread.

Bl, sight, colour, etc.

Bleaching and dyeing. These works were at first regulated by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 78; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 8; 26 & 27 Vict. c. 38; and 27 & 28 Vict. c. 98. By the 33 & 34 Vict. c. 62, however, all these acts are repealed after the 1st Jan., 1872, and the Factory Acts are made to apply to them; and they are now regulated, along with other factories, by the consolidating 'Factory and Workshop Act, 1878.' See FACTORY.

Blench, Blench-holding. See ALBA FIRMA.

Blestium, Old Town, in Herefordshire.

Bleta [fr. blèche, Fr.], peat or combustible earth dug up and dried for burning.

Blinks, boughs broken down from trees and thrown where deer are likely to pass.

Blockade [fr. bloccato, Ital., military term], the disposition of troops or armed vessels, so as to cut off all external communication with an enemy's port, fortress, city, etc. The term is now generally applied to the blockade of a port by armed vessels. The two essential circumstances necessary to make a good blockade, are—(1) that there be actually stationed at the place a sufficient force to prevent the entry or exit of vessels; and (2) that the party violating it shall be proved to be aware of its existence. With regard to neutral vessels lying at the place where the blockade commences, the rule is, that they may retire freely after the notification of the blockade, taking with them the cargoes with which they may be already laden; but they must not take in any new cargo. The effect of a violation of blockade to the offending party, when captured, is the condemnation usually of both the ship and the cargo. If, however, it can be shown that the parties to whom the cargo belongs were not implicated in the offence committed by the master of the ship, the cargo will be restored. It has sometimes, on the contrary, happened that the owners of the cargo have been found to have been the only guilty parties, in which case the judgment has been for condemnation of the cargo and the restitution of the ship.—Consult Wheaton's Intl. Law.

Blood [fr. blood, Du.; blut, G.], kindred, lineage. It is a maxim that none shall claim as heir, who is not of the blood (i.e., kindred) of the purchaser.—Co. Litt. 12 a.

Bloodwit, or Blondveit [fr. blod, Sax., blood, and wyte, Old Eng., pity], an amercement for bloodshed; a customary fine, paid as a composition and atonement for shedding or drawing of blood. Paroch. Antiq.

Bloody hand. See BACKBERIND.

Blosseville, the ancient name of Bloville, Blofield.

Boiling hot and cold. See HOT AND COLD.

Board [fr. berd, Du.; brett, G., a plank or table], an office under the control of the executive government, as the Board of Trade, the Board of Works, the Board of Admiralty, the Board of Ordnance, the Board of Charities, and the Local Government Board, the business of which departments is conducted by officers specially appointed for that purpose: also an assembly of directors or officers for the despatch of business.

Boc, a charter.—Ang. Sax.

Bock-hord, or Book-hoard, a place where books or writings are kept.

Bock-land, Boc-land, or Book-land, one of the original modes of tenure of manor-land, also called charter-land or deed-land, which was held by a short and simple deed under certain rents and free services, and in effect differed in no respect from the free-socage lands, whence have arisen most of the freehold tenants, who hold of particular manors and owe suit and service to the same.—2 Bl. Com. 90. And see 'An Inquiry into the Rise and Growth of the Royal Prerogative in England.' By John Allen, 1839, 143—151; Kemble's Cod. Diplom. Introd. ciii.—cvi.; and FOLCLAND.

Bodotrio, the ancient name of the Firth of Forth.

Boduno; the people of Gloucestershire and Oxfordshire were formerly called so.

Body, the main part of any instrument; in deeds it is spoken of as distinguished from the recitals and other introductory parts and signatures; in affidavits, from the title, and jurat, q. v.; also, the term is used in writs to describe the person who is to be taken (as habeas corpus).

Body politic [fr. bodig, A. S.; bodhag, Gael.], the nation; also a corporation.

Boilary, water arising from a salt well belonging to a person who is not the owner of the soil.

Boiler Explosions Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 22, whereby detailed notice of an explosion from any boiler, i.e. (s. 3), 'any closed vessel used for generating steam, or for heating water, or for heating other liquids, or into which steam is admitted for heating, steaming, boiling, or other similar purposes,' must be sent within twenty-four hours by the 'owner or user,' or their agent, to the Board of Trade, who have power to order an inquiry with respect to the explosion. Boilers used exclusively for domestic purposes, and boilers used in the service of Her Majesty or on board certificated steamships are exempted from the Act, and so are some boiler explosions in mines.

Boiling to death, the punishment for poisoning inflicted by 22 Hen. III. c. 9, which was repealed by 1 Edw. VI. c. 12.

Bois, wood; sub-bois, underwood.

Bois saillis [Fr.], a coppice or copse.

Bolhagium, or Boldagium, a little house or cottage.—Blount.

Bolorium promontorium. The Land's End.

Bolt, a long narrow piece of silk or stuff.

Bolting [fr. bolt, Sax., a house], a private arguing of cases in the Inns of Court. Now discontinued.

Bona. This term, according to the Civil Law, includes all sorts of property, moveable and immovable.—Story's Conf. Laws, 375.

Bona confiscata, property forfeited for crime to the fiscus or public treasury.

Bonæ fidei possessor, in id tantum quod sese pervenerit tenetur.—(A possessor in good faith, is only liable for that which he himself has obtained.)—2 Inst. 285.

Bonâ fide, with good faith, implying the absence of all fraud or unfair dealing or acting, whether it consists in simulation or dissimulation. As to 'bonâ fide traveller,' see TRAVELLER.

Bona fides non patitur ut bis idem exigatur. See Maxim, 'Bis idem exigi,' etc.

Bona forisfacta, goods forfeited; called by the civilians bona confiscata, because they belonged to the fiscus, or imperial treasury.

Bona gestura, good behaviour.

Bona mobilia, moveable effects and goods.

Bona notabilia, notable goods—goods sufficient in amount to require a probate or administration to be taken out under ecclesiastical law. They were fixed by the 93rd canon (excepting in London, where the sum is 10*l.*), to be legal personal estate to the value of 5*l.* or upwards.

The jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts as to wills and administration is abolished. See Probate.

Bona patria, an assize of countrymen or good neighbours; it is sometimes called assiza bonæ patriæ, when twelve or more men are chosen out of any part of the country to pass upon an assize. The persons composing it are called juratores, because they are to swear judicially in the presence of the party, etc., according to the practice of Scotland.—Skene.

Bona vacantia, stray goods. Those things in which nobody claims a property, and which belong to the Crown, by virtue of its prerogative.—1 Bl. Com. 298.

Bonaught, or Bonaughty, an exaction imposed on the people of Ireland, at the will of the lord, for relief of the knights, called Bonaghti, who served in the wars.—Antiq. Hibern. 60.

Bona villa, de Bonevil.

Bona waviata, goods waved or thrown away by a thief in his flight for fear of being apprehended. They are given to the Crown by the law, as a punishment upon the owner for not himself pursuing the felon and taking away his goods from him.—1 Bl. Com. 296.

In the Roman law it was originally the property which a person left at his death, without having disposed of it by will, and without having any hæres. Such property was open to occupancy; and so long as the strict laws of inheritance existed, such an event must not have been uncommon. A remedy was, however, found for this by the bonorum possessio of the prætor.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Boncha [fr. bonna or bunna, Old Lat.], a rising bank, the bounds of fields.

Bond [fr. binds, band, bunden, A.S., to bind], a written acknowledgment or binding of a debt under seal. See DEED. When a bond is given by a simple contract debtor to his creditor, the debt is merged in the specialty. No technical form of words is necessary to constitute a bond. The person giving the bond is called the obligor, and he to whom it is given the obligee. A bond is called single when it is without a penalty, and an obligation when it contains a penalty, which is generally double the amount of the principal sum secured, although only the sum actually owing, with interest, can be recovered. See 4 & 5 Anne c. 16, ss. 12 & 13; and 8 & 9 Wm. III. c. 11, s. 8.

If one of several obligees release the obligor, the rest are barred of their remedy. If a bond be given to three obligees jointly, two cannot sue thereon unless they show that the third is dead; but where the obligation is several, each may maintain an action for his several debt.

If two or more bind themselves in a bond jointly and severally, the obligee may sue them all jointly, or he may sue any one of them, but if they are jointly and not severally bound, the obligee must sue them jointly. For the purpose of enabling an obligee to sue two or more of the obligors alone without joining the others, there must be in the bond a severance of any four, three, or two of them, according to the number of the obligors.

A bond conditioned either to do something which is malum in se or malum prohibitum, or to omit the doing of something which is a duty, or to encourage such crimes and omissions, is void. A bond may be valid in part and void in part, if such parts are separable. See RESIGNATION BOND.

The 9 Geo. IV. c. 94, validates certain bonds, covenants, and other assurances, for resignation of ecclesiastical preferments in certain cases.

There are two kinds of post obit bonds: (1) Where the sum secured is greater than the sum borrowed, but to be payable only upon a contingency, such as the obligor-expectant surviving his ancestor. (2) Where the sum secured is greater than the sum borrowed, but it is to be paid on the death of a particular person, whether the obligor be then alive or not, the time of payment being contingent only. The usury laws were abolished by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 90. See Chesterfield v. Janssen, 2 Ves. 125 (1751), and 1 Wh. & Tud. L. C. Ed. 4, 541, as to the interference of Equity in the case of frauds upon expectant heirs.

Bonds to procure marriage (or marriage brokerage bonds), or to restrain marriage, or for immoral considerations, such as future, but not past, cohabitation, and also in total restraint of trade are void.

Bondage, slavery; also a kind of tenure or occupation.

Bond-creditor, a creditor whose debt is secured by a bond.

Bondsman, a surety.

Bond-tenants, copyholders and customary tenants are sometimes so called.—Calthorp on Customs of London.

Boni judicis est ampliari jurisdictionem.—(It is the duty of a good judge to enlarge his jurisdiction, i.e., 'to amplify the remedies of the law, and, without usurping jurisdiction, to apply its rules to the advancement of substantial justice.')

Boni judicis est ampliari justitiam.—(It is the duty of a good judge to enlarge or extend justice.)

Boni judicis est causas litium dirimere et interest reipublicæ ut sit finis litium.—(It is the duty of a good judge to prevent litigation; and it concerns the State to end law suits.)

Boni judicis est judicium sine dilatione mandare executioni. Co. Litt. 289.—(It is the duty of a good judge to order execution without delay.)

Bonis non amovendis (that the goods be not removed), a writ addressed to the sheriff, where error is brought, commanding that the person against whom judgment is obtained be not suffered to remove his goods, till the error be tried and determined.—Reg. Orig. 131.

Bonitarian, the right of possession.—Civil Law.

Bonium, seu Bovium, Boverton, or Cowbridge, in Glamorganshire; also Bangor, in Flintshire.

Bono et malo (Writ de), an abolished writ of gaol delivery, which issued for every prisoner.

Bonum defendentis ex integra causa, malum ex quolibet defectu. 11 Co. 68.—The good of a defendant arises from a perfect case, his harm from any defect whatever.)

Bonus, premium or advantage; an occasional extra dividend; a gratuity.

Bonus iudex secundum æquum et bonum judicat, et æquitatem stricto juri præfert.—(A good judge decides according to what is just and good, and prefers equity to strict law.)—Co. Litt. 34.

Book of Common Prayer. See ACT OF UNIFORMITY, and PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT.

Book of rates [fr. boc, A. S.], an account declaring the duties of customs.—Jacob.

Book of responses, an account which the directors of the Chancery kept to enter all non-entry and relief duties payable by heirs who take precepts from Chancery.—Scotch Law.

Books. All the volumes which contain authentic reports of decisions in English courts, from the earliest times to the present, are called, par excellence, The Books. See REPORTS.

Books, copyright in. See 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45; and COPYRIGHT.

Booting, or Boting Corn [fr. bote or boot, Sax., compensation], rent corn, anciently so called.

Booty of War, property captured in war on land which falls to the forces capturing by grace of the Crown or to the Crown itself. By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 65, s. 22, the jurisdiction in matters of booty of war is in the judge of the Prize Courts (who is also judge of the Admiralty Court), on a reference by the sovereign. See Banda and Kirwee Booty L. R. 4 Adm. 436.

Borcovicus, Berwick-upon-Tweed.

Bordagium. See BORDLODE.

Bordaria [fr. bord, Sax.; domus, Lat.], a cottage.

Bordarii, or Bordamanna [fr. bords, Old Gall., limits, borders], boors, husbandmen, cottagers.—Domesday.

Bord-brigh [fr. bord-bryce, or burg-brych, Sax.], a breach or violation of surety-ship, pledge-breach, or breach of mutual fidelity.

Border Warrant [fr. bord, Fr., edge, margin], a process granted by a judge ordinary, on either side of the border between England and Scotland, for arresting the person or effects of a person living on the opposite side, until he find security, judicio sisti.—Bell's Dict.

Bord-halfpenny [fr. bord, Sax., a table, and halpeny, or half-penny], a customary small toll paid to the lord of a town for setting up boards, tables, booths, etc., in fairs or markets.

Bordlands, the demesnes which a lord keeps in his own hands for the maintenance of his board or table.—Bract. l. 1, t. 3, c. ix.

Bordlode, or Bordage, a service required of tenants to carry timber out of the lord's woods to his house, or the quantity of food or provision which the bordarii or bordmen paid for their bordlands. The old Scots had the term of burd and meet-burd for victuals and provisions, and burden-sack for a sack full of provender, whence probably came our word burden.—Spelm.

Bord-service, a tenure of bordlands.

Borel-folk, country people, from the Fr., boure, flocus, a lock of wool, because they covered their heads with such stuff.—Blount.

Borough [fr. burg, Fr.; burgus, Lat.; borhoe, or burg, A.S.], originally a walled town or other fortified place. In the Reform Act, 1832, by s. 79, the word means a town entitled to return a member to Parliament, or 'parliamentary borough,' and in the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, a town incorporated for the purposes of internal Government, and subject to the Municipal Corporation Acts, or 'municipal borough.' There are now (December, 1882) 246 'municipal boroughs.' See MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.

Borough Courts, private and limited tribunals, held by prescription, charter, or act of parliament, in particular districts for the convenience of the inhabitants, that they may prosecute small suits, and receive justice at home; in boroughs subject to the Municipal Corporation Acts they are termed 'borough civil courts' and regulated by ss. 175—188 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, but they are very few in number. See, further, INFERIOR COURTS.

Borough-English, a custom evidently of Saxon origin, and so named to distinguish it from the Norman customs. By this custom, which is occasionally met with in burghage tenemental lands, if a person have many sons, and die intestate, the youngest son inherits all the realty, which belonged to his father, situated within such borough. It is based on the assumption that the youngest son, on account of his tender age, is not so capable as the rest of his brethren to keep himself. Among the pastoral tribes, the sons, as soon as they attained the proper age, migrated from the paternal habitation, with an allotment of cattle, to seek a residence elsewhere; the youngest son usually continued with his father, and thus became the heir to his house.

The custom obtains in the manor of Lambeth, Surrey, in the manors of Hackney, St. John of Jerusalem in Islington, Heston and Edmonton in Middlesex, and in other counties.

Borough Fund, the revenues of a municipal borough derived from the rents and produce of the land, houses, and stocks belonging to the borough in its corporate capacity, and supplemented where necessary by a borough rate. See ss. 138—144 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, which specifies the purposes to which it is legally applicable, and allows (s. 141) orders of a town council for payment of money out of it to be questioned by the High Court on certiorari; and see LEEMAN'S ACT.

Borough-heads, borough-holders, bors-holders, or burs-holders.

Borough-reeve, the chief municipal officer in towns unincorporated before the Municipal Corporations Act, 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76.

Borough-sessions, courts established in boroughs under the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50. They are held by the recorders of the respective boroughs once a quarter, or oftener if they think fit, and at times to be fixed by them. The Court has 'cognizance of all crimes, offences, and matters' cognizable by the County Quarter Sessions, whose powers extend to all boroughs which may not have obtained a separate court by petition under s. 162 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882.

Borrowing [fr. borg. boch, A.S., a surety, pledge, loan], contracting a loan on security; taking money on credit. For the rights and duties of borrowers, consult Story on Bailments, 231, 234, 280.

Borsholder, borough's ealder, or head-borough, supposed to be the discreetest man in the borough, town, or tithing. By the Saxon laws there was a general custom of bail throughout the country, by which each man was answerable for his neighbour.

Bortmagad [fr. bord, Sax.; domus, Lat., and magad, ancilla], a housemaid.—Spelm.

Bosceage [fr. bosco, Ital.; silva, Lat.], food which wood and trees yield to cattle, as mast, etc.

Boscaria, woodhouses, or oxhouses, from bos, Lat.

Bosco, de, Bois, Boys.

Boscoarso, de, Brentwood, or Burntwood.

Bosco Boardi, de, Borhard.

Boscus [fr. bosco, Ital.; bois, Fr.], all manner of wood; boscus is divided into high wood or timber, hautbois; and coppice, or under-woods, sub-bosculus, sub-bois: but the high wood is properly called saltus, and in Fleta we read it maeremium.

Bossinnus, a rustic pipe.

Bostar, an ox-stall.

Bote [fr. bot, A.S.; beton, to repair, synonymous with estovers, Fr.; estoffer, to furnish], necessities for the maintenance and carrying on of husbandry. The owner of an estate for life or for years is entitled, unless expressly restrained by the terms of the conveyance or devise, to reasonable estovers or botes, i.e., necessary wood, such as house-bote, plough-bote, cart-bote, and hay-bote, or hedge-bote. House-bote is a sufficient allowance of wood from off the estate to repair or burn in the house, and sometimes termed fire-bote; plough-bote and cart-bote are wood to be employed in making and repairing all instruments of husbandry; and hay-bote or hedge-bote is wood for repairing of hays, hedges, or fences. The word also signifies reparation for any damage or injury done, as man-bote, which was a compensation or amends for a man slain, etc.—Lamb, c. xcix.

Boteless, or Bootless, a vain attempt, without emendation.

Botellaria, a buttery or cellar, in which the butts and bottles of wine and other liquors are deposited.

Botha, a booth, stall, or standing in a fair or market.—Mon. Angl. 2 par. fo. 132.

Bothagium, or Boothage, customary dues paid to the lord of a manor or soil, for the pitching or standing of booths in fairs or markets.—Paroch. Antiq. 680.

Bothna, or Buthna, a park where cattle are enclosed and fed; a barony, lordship, etc.—Skene.

Botiler of the King [pincerna regis, Lat.], an officer that provides the king's wines, who might (Fleta, l. 2, c. xxi.), by virtue of his office, choose out of every ship laden with sale wines, one cask before the mast, and one behind.—25 Edw. III. st. 5, c. 21.

Bottom [Old English], a valley.

Bottomry bond, or Contract, also Bottom-ree, or Bummaree, species of mortgage or hypothecation of a ship, by which her keel or bottom is pledged (partem pro toto) as a security for the repayment of a sum of money. If the ship be totally lost, the lender loses his money; but if she return safely, he recovers his principal, together with the interest agreed upon. Such bonds are allowed as valid in all trading nations, for the benefit of commerce, and as a pretium periculi for the extraordinary hazard run.—Abbott on Shipping, p. 2, c. iii.; 2 Bl. Com. 457. See RESPONDENTIA.

Bouche of Court, or Budge of Court, a certain allowance of provision from the king to his knights and servants, who attended him on any military expedition.

Bough of a tree, a symbol which gave seisin of land, to hold of the donor in capite.

Bought and sold notes. The practice of licensed brokers is to keep books wherein they enter the terms of any contract they effect, and the names of the parties. Such entry when signed by the broker, is a contract legally binding, as when the broker for a seller treats with a buyer, he is deemed the agent of both. It is the custom for the broker to deliver a transcript or memorandum of the entry in his book to each party, which is called a bought or sold note, the bought note being given to the seller, and the sold note to the buyer. But this is stated conversely in some of the books. As these notes contain the essential parts of the bargain, they will suffice in the absence of a corresponding entry in the broker's book; but if these notes describe the particulars differently or incorrectly, as one species of goods for another, or erroneously state the terms, no contract arises, and a variation of this nature cannot be corrected by a reference to the broker's book.—See Addison on Contracts.

Bound, or Boundary [fr. borne, bone, Fr., a limit], the utmost limits of land, whereby the same is known and ascertained. See ABUTTALS.

Boundaries. The Boundary Act, 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 64, as amended by the Boundary Act, 1868, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 46, fixes the divisions of counties, and the limits of cities and boroughs in England and Wales, in so far as respects the election of members to serve in parliament. The corresponding Acts for Scotland are 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 65, and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 48; and for Ireland, 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 89, and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 49.

The Boundaries of Municipal Boroughs are fixed under 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76, ss. 7, 8, and 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 103, in England and Wales.

Boundaries of Archdeaconries, etc. See 37 & 38 Vict. c. 63.

Bound-bailiffs, officers who arrest debtors, etc., and who enter into bonds for their good behaviour. The vulgar phrase 'bum-bailiff' is, perhaps, a corruption of this word. See BUM-BAILIFF.

Bounty, a premium paid by Government to the producers, exporters, or importers of certain articles, or to those who employ ships in certain trades, with a view of encouraging the establishment of some new branch of industry, or of fostering and extending a trade that is believed to be of paramount importance. Bounties have been generally abolished in England.

Bounty of Queen Anne, a royal charter, which was confirmed by Queen Anne, 2 Anne c. 11, whereby all the revenue of first-fruits and tenths is vested in trustees for ever, to form a perpetual fund for the augmentation of poor livings, and for advancing money to incumbents for rebuilding parsonage-houses. After the appropriation of the revenue arising from the payment of first-fruits and tenths to the augmentation of small livings, it was considered a proper extension of this principle to exempt the smaller livings from the encumbrance of those demands; and for that end, the bishops of each diocese were directed to inquire and certify into the Exchequer, what livings did not exceed 50*l.* a year, according to the improved value at that time; and it was further provided that such livings should be discharged from those dues in future. It has been still further regulated by subsequent statutes: viz., 5 Anne c. 24; 6 Anne c. 27; 1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 10; 3 Geo. I. c. 10; 43 Geo. III. c. 107; 45 Geo. III. c. 84, s. 4; 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 45; 1 & 2 Vict. cc. 20, 23, ss. 3, 4; c. 106, ss. 72 and 119; c. 107, s. 10; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 49; 3 & 4 Vict. cc. 20 and 113, s. 76; 4 & 5 Vict. c. 39, s. 4; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 69; and 33 & 34 Vict. c. 89 (Superannuation Act).

These trustees were erected into a corporation, and have authority to make rules and orders for the distribution of this fund. The principal rules established by them are, that the sum to be allowed for each augmentation shall be 200*l.*, to be laid out in land, which shall be annexed for ever to the living; and that this donation shall be made, first, to all livings not exceeding 10*l.* a year; then to all livings not above 20*l.*, and so in order, whilst any remain under 50*l.* a year. But when any private benefactor advances 200*l.*, the trustees give another 200*l.* for the advancement of any living not above 45*l.* a year, though it may not belong to that class of livings which they are then augmenting.

By the 46 Geo. III. c. 133, a very noble donation of 6000*l.* a year was granted for the augmentation of small livings not exceeding 150*l.* a year. The statute enacts that all such livings may be discharged from the payment of the land-tax, without any consideration for it, provided the whole annual account shall not exceed 6000*l.*—1 Bl. Com. 285; Phill. Eccl. Law, 290 et seq., 2069 et seq.

Bovata terræ, as much land as an ox can plough.—See OXGANG. 8 bovatae make 1 carucate.

Boverium, or Boveria, an ox-house.

Bovettus, a young steer, or castrated bullock.

Bovicula, a heifer, or young cow.

Bovill's (Sir W.) Act, to amend the law relating to the procedure in petitions of right.—23 & 24 Vict. c. 34.

Bow-bearer, an under officer of the forest, whose duty it is to oversee and true inquisition make, as well of sworn men as unsworn, in every balliwick of the forest; and of all manner of trespasses done, either to vert or venison, and cause them to be presented without any concealment, in the next court of attachment, etc.—Crompt. Juris., 201.

Bowling, Game of, legalised by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109.

Bowyers, manufacturers of bows and shafts. An ancient company of the city of London.—12 Edw. IV. c. 2; 33 Hen. VIII. c. 6; 8 Eliz. c. 10.

Boys, employment of, in factories, workshops, etc. See CHILDREN, FACTORY ACTS.

Bracelets, hounds or beagles of the smaller or slower kinds.

Bracenarius, a huntsman or master of the hounds.

Bracetus, a hound.—Mon Ang. t. 2, 283.

Brachylogy [fr. βραχύς and λόγος, Gk.], the method of expressing a sentence or argument concisely.

Bracium, a brewing; the whole quantity of ale brewed at one time, for which tolsestor was paid in some manors. Brecina, a brew-house.

Bracton, the author of the treatise entitled De Legibus et Consuetudinibus Angliæ. Bracton's book, compared with that of Glanville, is a voluminous work. It is divided into five books, and these into tracts and chapters. See 2 Reeves' Hist. c. viii. 86, note (a), for an analysis of the several divisions of the chapters, and a complete digest of the contents of this venerable code. If this law treatise had been printed with such divisions and notification of its contents as are given in the note referred to, the arrangement of the whole would have struck the eye as distinctly as it does the understanding upon perusal; it being, in truth, a comprehensive and particular account of the law, digested with a strict adherence to method and system. Consistently with the extensiveness and regularity of the plan, the several parts of it are filled with a copious and accurate detail of legal learning. The rules of property are explained; the proceedings in actions, through the minutest steps, are investigated and developed; while every proposition is supported by fair deduction, or corroborated by the authority of some adjudged case, so that the reader never fails of deriving instruction or amusement from the study of this scientific treatise on our ancient laws and customs. Bracton was deservedly looked up to as the first source of legal knowledge, even down to the time of Lord Coke, who seems to have made this author his guide in all inquiries into the foundation of our law.

The author of this work is usually styled Henry de Bracton; though he passed, as fancy or mistake may have dictated, by the names of Brycton, Britton, Briton, Breton. He is said to have lived at the latter part of the reign of Henry III. There is internal evidence that the book was written before the fifty-second year of this king; for it takes no notice of the writ of entry in the post, nor of the regulations about distresses, attachments, guardians in socage, and other points, made by the statute of Marlbridge; and as he quotes a case in the forty-sixth year of this king, it must follow that the book was written, or, at least, received the author's last hand, some time between that and the fifty-second year. It is said that Bracton was a judge, and, speaking of some judges of his time he calls them insipientes, et minus doctos, qui cathedram judicandi ascendunt antequam leges didicerint (Brac. I.)—Hales' Hist. 189. In Lincoln's Inn Library is an ancient M.S. copy of Bracton, which is said to be more correct than the printed copies.

Brahmen, Brahmin, Brahman, or Bramin, a divine, a priest, the first Hindu caste.

Branding in the hand or face with a hot iron. A punishment inflicted by law for various offences, after the offender had been allowed benefit of clergy. Abolished by 3 Geo. IV. c. 38.

Brasiator [fr. brasium, Lat., malt], a maltster, a brewer.—Old Records.

Brasium, malt.

Brawling [fr. brailler, Fr., to brawl], the offence of quarrelling, or creating a disturbance in the church or churchyard, punished by 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 4 (repealed by 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 1), by cutting off the party's ears, etc. By 23 & 25 Vict. c. 32, the jurisdiction of Ecclesiastical Courts in England and Ireland, in suits for brawling, was abolished as against persons not in holy orders; and persons guilty of riotous, violent, or indecent behaviour in churches and chapels of the Church of England or Ireland, or in any chapel of any religious denomination, or in England in any place of religious worship duly certified under the provisions of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 81, or in churchyards or burial grounds, on conviction before two justices were made liable to a penalty of not more than 5*l.*, or imprisonment for any term not exceeding two months.

Breach of Close, an unwarrantable entry on another's land; for every man's land is in the eye of the law enclosed and set apart from his neighbour's, and that either by a visible and material fence, as one field is divided from another by a hedge, or by an invisible boundary, existing only in the contemplation of law, as when one man's land adjoins to another's in the same field. Every such entry or breach of a man's close carries necessarily along with it some damage or other.

Breach of Covenant, a violation of an agreement contained in a deed either to do or not to do some act; it is a civil injury.—3 Bl. Com. 155.

Breach of Duty, the not executing any office, employment, trust, etc., in a proper manner: for every person who undertakes the duties of any office, etc., contracts with those who employ and trust him to perform it with integrity, diligence, and skill; and if by his want of either of those qualities any injury accrues to individuals, they have therefore their remedy in damages by an action.—3 Bl. Com. 163.

Breach of Peace, offences against the public, which are either actual violations of the peace, or constructive violations, by tending to make others break it. Both of these species are either felonious or not felonious. The felonious breaches are: (1) The riotous assembling of twelve persons or more, and not dispersing upon proclamation. (2) The riotous demolishing of churches, houses, buildings, or machinery (24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 11 & 12). (3) Maliciously sending, delivering, or uttering, or directly or indirectly causing to be received, knowing the contents thereof, any letter or writing threatening to kill or murder any person (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 16). The remaining offences are not felonious: (4) Affrays. (5) Riots, routs, and unlawful assemblies, which must have three persons at least to constitute them. (6) Tumultuously petitioning, which was carried to an enormous height in the times preceding the great rebellion, wherefore, by 13 Car. II. st. 1, c. 5, it is enacted that not more than twenty names shall be signed to any petition to the King or either House of Parliament for any alteration of matters established by law in church or state, unless the contents thereof be previously approved, in the country by three justices, or the majority of the grand jury at the assizes or quarter sessions, and, in London, by the lord mayor, aldermen, and common council; and that no petitions shall be delivered by a company of more than ten persons, on pain in either case of incurring a penalty not exceeding 100*l.* and three months' imprisonment. (7) Forcible entry or detainer, which is committed by violently taking or keeping possession of lands or tenements with menaces, force, and arms, and without the authority of the law. (8) Riding, or going armed with dangerous or unusual weapons, terrifying the good people of the land. (9) Spreading false news (12 Rich. II. c. 11). (10) False and pretended prophecies, with intent to disturb the peace, as they raise enthusiastic jealousies in the people, and terrify them with imaginary fears. These are the actual breaches of the peace; the remainder are constructive. (11) Challenges to fight, either by word or letter, or being the bearer of such challenges. (12) Libels, which, taken in their largest and most extensive sense, signify any writings, pictures, or the like, of an immoral or illegal tendency; but in the sense of a constructive breach of the peace, they are malicious defamations of any person, and especially a magistrate, made public by either printing, writing, signs, or pictures, in order to provoke him to wrath, or expose him to public hatred, contempt, and ridicule.

Breach of pound. See POUND BREACH.

Breach of prison, an escape by a prisoner lawfully in prison.

Breach of promise, a violation of one's word or undertaking, such as the breach of the condition of a bond, etc.

Breach of promise of marriage. The parties in this action are, by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, s. 2, made competent to give evidence in such action.

Breach of trust, a violation of duty by a trustee, executor, or other person in a fiduciary position. The Court of Chancery has adopted two principles in regard to the liability consequent upon a breach of trust: 1st. That with a view not to deter persons from undertaking a trust, the Court is extremely liberal, and will so determine as not to strike terror into persons acting for the benefit of others, and not for their own; and will endeavour to protect a trustee from any mischief that may happen from a misapplication of trust-money, and where executors intend fairly to discharge their duty, the Court will not hold them liable upon slight grounds. 2ndly. That care must be had to guard against an abuse of their trust.—13 Ves. 410. See 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35.

Causes relating to the execution of charitable and private trusts, are assigned to the Chancery Division of the High Court (Jud. Act, 1875, s. 34).

No claim of a cestui que trust against his trustee for any property held on an express trust, or in respect of any breach of such trust, shall be held to be barred by any Statute of Limitations (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 25 (2)).

A breach of trust was not a criminal offence until 20 & 21 Vict. c. 54. It is now punishable, by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 80, replacing that act, as a misdemeanour, with fine and imprisonment.

Bread. The acts relating to the sale of bread are 3 Geo. IV. c. 106 (metropolis); and 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 37, which prescribes that bread 'except French, or fancy bread, or rolls,' must be sold by weight, etc.

Breaking bulk, a term formerly used to signify the separation of goods in the hands of a bailee which made him liable for felony. Since the 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, this distinction is immaterial.

Breaking of arrestment, is the contempt of the law committed by an arrestee who disregards the arrestment used in his hands, and pays the sum or delivers the goods arrested to the debtor. The breaker is liable to the arrester in damages.—Scotch Dict.

Brecca [fr. brèche, Fr.], a breach or decay.

Brecina. See BRACINUM.

Brede (adj.), broad.—Bract. Also in Saxon, deceit.

Bredwite [fr. bread and wite, Sax.], a fine or penalty imposed for defaults in the assize of bread.—Paroch. Antiq. 114.

Brehon, the Irish name for a judge.

Brehon law, a rule of right, unwritten but delivered by tradition from one to another, in which oftentimes there appeared great show of equity in determining the right between party and party, but in many things repugnant quite, both to God's laws and man's. This law was formally abolished, 40 Edw. III., it being unanimously declared to be indeed no law, but a lewd custom crept in of later times.—Spencer's State of Ireland, 1513; Hale's Hist. 217; 1 S. S. 82.

Brenagium, a payment in bran, which tenants anciently made to feed their lords' hounds.

Brephotrophi, curators of places for receiving foundlings.

Bresina, wether-sheep.—Mon. Ang. t. 1, c. 406.

Bretoyse, or Bretoise, the law of the Welsh marches, observed by the ancient Britons.

Bretwalda (wielder), ruler of the Britons.

Breve, a writ, by which a person is summoned or attached to answer an action, complaint, etc., or whereby anything is commanded to be done in the Courts, in order to justice, etc. It is called breve, from the brevity of it, and is addressed either to the defendant himself, or to the chancellors, judges, sheriffs, or other officers. Skene, de verb 'Breve.' See WRIT; ORIGINAL WRIT; JUDICIAL WRIT.

Breve ita dicitur, quia rem de qua agitur, et intentionem petentis, paucis enarrat. 2 Inst. 39.—(A writ is so called because it briefly states, in few words, the matter in dispute, and the object of the party seeking relief.)

Breve judiciale debet sequi suum originale, et accessorium suum principale. Jenk. Cent. 292.—(A judicial writ ought to follow its original, and an accessory its principal.)

Breve judiciale non cadit pro defectu forme. Jenk. Cent. 43.—(A judicial writ fails not through defect of form.)

Breve perquirere, to purchase a writ or license of trial, in the King's Courts, by the plaintiff, qui breve perquisivit; whence the usage of paying 6s. 8d. fine to the Crown where the debt is 40l., and of 10s. where the debt is 100l., etc., in suits and trials for money due upon bond, etc.

Breve de recto, a writ of right or license for a person ejected out of an estate, to sue for the possession of it.

Brevet, a commission conferring on an officer a degree of rank immediately above that which he holds in his particular regiment; without, however, conveying a power to receive the corresponding pay. Brevet rank does not exist in the royal navy, and in the army it neither descends lower than that of captain, nor ascends above that of lieutenant-colonel.

Brevia magistralia, official writs framed by the Clerks in Chancery to meet new injuries, to which the old forms of action were inapplicable.—4 Reeve's, 426.

Brevia selecta, abbrev., Brev. Sel. [Lat.], choice writs or processes.

Brevia, tum originalia quam judicialia, patiuntur Anglica nomina. 10 Co. 132.—(Writs, as well original as judicial, bear English names.)

Brevia testata, written memoranda, introduced to perpetuate the tenor of a conveyance and investiture, when grants by parol became productive of dispute and uncertainty. To this end the persons who attended as witnesses were registered in the deed, and this was anciently done without their own signatures (writing not then being a general accomplishment), for they merely heard the deed read, and then the clerk added their names in a sort of memorandum, thus, 'his testibus, Johanne Moore, Jacobo Smith, et aliis ad hanc rem convocatis.'—The modern system of conveyancing is an elaborate extension of these brevia testata.—2 Bl. Com. 307.

Brevibus et rotulis liberandis, a writ or mandate to a sheriff to deliver to his successor the county, and appurtenances, with the rolls, briefs, remembrance, and all other things belonging to his office.—Reg. Orig. 295.

Bribery [fr. briber, Fr., to devour or eat greedily], the taking by, or giving to, a person in a judicial or public office, of any fee, gift, reward, or brocade, to influence his behaviour in his office, or the taking or giving a reward for appointing another to a public position. As to bribery at elections for members of parliament, see the Act for Consolidating and Amending the Laws relating to Bribery, Treating, and Undue Influence at Elections (17 & 18 Vict. c. 102) originally in force for five years only, continued and amended by successive statutes, and applied to Municipal Elections by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, s. 77.

Bribour [fr. bribeur, Fr.], a pilferer of other men's goods.—28 Edw. II. c. 1.

Bricks, the duties of excise on, were repealed by 13 & 14 Vict. c. 9.

Bricolis, an engine by which walls were beaten down.—Blount.

Bridewell, a house of correction.

Bridge [γέφυρα, Gk.; pons, Lat.; bric, Sax.], a building of brick, stone, wood, or iron, erected across a river, ditch, valley, or other place, for the common ease and benefit of travellers. Public bridges, which are of general convenience, are of common right to be repaired by the whole inhabitants of that county in which they lie. If the bridge be within a city or town corporate, the inhabitants of such city and town corporate shall repair it; if within a riding, the inhabitants of the riding shall repair it. The inhabitants of a county, etc., are, therefore, bound to repair every public bridge within it; unless, when indicted for the non-repair of it, they can show their plea that some other person is liable, ratione tenuræ: and every bridge in a highway is, by 22 Hen. VIII. c. 5, deemed a public bridge for this purpose. If part of a bridge be within one county, etc., and the other part within another county, etc., each party shall repair that part of the bridge which is within it. Besides the bridge, the county is bound to repair 300 yards of the road adjoining either end of it. As to the offence of pulling down, throwing down, or destroying a bridge, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 29 and 33. See HIGHWAYS, and Burn's Justice, voce 'Bridges.'

Bridge-masters, persons chosen by the citizens, who have certain fees and profits belonging to their office, as in the case of London Bridge.—Lex. Lond. 283.

Brief [fr. brevis, Lat.; brief, Dutch; a letter], an abbreviated statement of the pleadings, proofs, and affidavits in any legal proceeding, with a concise narrative of the facts and merits of the plaintiff's case.

defendant's defence, for the instruction of counsel at the trial or hearing.

Brief al'evesque, a writ to the bishop which, in quare impedit, shall go to remove an incumbent, unless he recover or be presented pendente lite.—1 Keb. 386.

Brief, or Brieve, out of the Chancery, a writ issued in Scotland in the name of the sovereign in the election of tutors to minors, the cognoscing of lunatics or of idiots, and the ascertaining the widow's terce; and sometimes in dividing the property belonging to heirs-portioners. In these cases only brieves are now in use.—Consult Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Brief, Papal, the Pope's letter upon matters of discipline.

Briefs for collecting charities, licenses to make collection for repairing churches, restoring loss by fire, etc.—4 Anne, c. 14.

Briga [fr. brigue, Fr.], debate, contention.

Brigandine [lorica, Lat.], a coat of mail or ancient armour, consisting of numerous jointed scale-like plates, very pliant and easy for the body, mentioned in 4 & 5 P. & M. c. 2; Jer. xlv. 4, and li. 3.

Brigantes, the ancient name for the inhabitants of Yorkshire, Lancashire, Durham, Westmoreland, and Cumberland.

Brigbote, or Bragbote [fr. brig, Sax.; pontus, Lat.; and bote, compensatio], the contribution to the repair of bridges, walls, and castles, which by the old laws of the Anglo-Saxons might not be remitted.—Fleta, l. 1, c. xlvii.

Bristol bargain, where A. lends B. 1000*l.* on good security, and it is agreed that 500*l.*, together with interest, shall be paid at a time stated; and as to the other 500*l.*, that B., in consideration thereof, should pay unto A. 100*l.* per annum for seven years.

British America. See Fur Trade Act, 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 66, and North-Western Territories Act, 22 & 23 Vict. c. 26, and 'The British North America Act,' 30 & 31 Vict. c. 3, and see WASHINGTON, TREATY OF, and the next title.

British Columbia, the territory on the north-west coast of North America, once known by the designation of New Caledonia. Its government is provided for by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 99. Vancouver Island is united to it by the 29 & 30 Vict. c. 67. See 33 & 34 Vict. c. 66.

British Kaffraria. See 28 & 29 Vict. c. 5.

British Pharmacopœia. See 25 & 26 Vict. c. 91, s. 2.

Britton, a small French law tract under the name of Britton, thought by some to have been composed under the direction of Edward I., and by others considered as nothing more than an abridgment of Bracton, with the subsequent alterations that had been made in the law; and to be called Britton, as one of the names of Bracton himself.—2 Reeves, c. xi. p. 280.

Broad-arrow, used as a Government mark, is thought to have had a Celtic origin; and the so-called arrow may be the \rightarrow or α , the broad α of the Druids. This letter was typical of superiority either in rank and authority, intellect, or holiness; and is believed to have stood also for king or prince. Public Stores are marked with the Broad Arrow. See Public Stores Act, 1875.

Brocage, the wages or hire of a broker; also termed Brokerage.—12 R. II. c. 2.

Brocella [fr. brusca, obs. Lat.; broce, Fr.], a wood, a thicket, or covert of brushwood, hence brouce of wood, and brousing of cattle.

Brode-halfpenny, or broad-halfpenny. See BORD-HALFPENNY.

Broken Stowage, that space in a ship which is not filled by her cargo.

Broker [fr. broceur, Fr.; tritor, Lat.; a person who breaks into small pieces], an agent employed to make bargains and contracts between other persons in matters of trade, commerce, and navigation, for a compensation commonly called a brokerage. Domat says (B. 1, tit. 17, s. 1, art. 1):—‘The engagement of a broker is like to that of a proxy, a factor, and other agent; but with this difference, that the broker being employed by persons who have opposite interests to manage, he is, as it were, agent both for the one and the other, to negotiate the commerce or affair in which he concerns himself. Thus his engagement is twofold, and consists in being faithful to all the parties, in the execution of what each one of them entrusts him with. And his power is not a trust, but to explain the intentions of both parties, and to negotiate in such a manner as to put those who employ him in a condition to treat together personally.’

Where he is employed to buy or sell goods, he is not entrusted with the custody or possession of them, and is not authorized to buy or sell them in his own name. He is strictly, therefore, a middle-man, or intermediate negotiator between the parties, and for some purposes (as that of signing a contract within the Statute of Frauds) he is treated as the agent of both parties, but primarily he is deemed merely the agent of the party by whom he is originally employed. A broker being personally confided in, cannot ordinarily delegate his authority to a sub-agent or clerk under him, or to any other person, unless the principal give an assent, either expressed or implied, thereto. A broker differs from an auctioneer in two respects; a broker may buy as well as sell, but an auctioneer can only sell; a broker cannot sell personally at public auction, for that is the appropriate function of an auctioneer, but he may sell at private sales, which an auctioneer (as such) does not.

There are various sorts of brokers now employed in commercial affairs, whose transactions form, or may form, a distinct and independent business. Thus, for example, there are exchange and money-brokers, stock-brokers, ship-brokers, and insurance-brokers, who are respectively employed in buying and selling bills of exchange, or promissory notes, railway-scrip, goods, stocks, ships, or cargoes; or in procuring freights or charter-parties. The character of a broker is also sometimes combined in the same person with that of a factor. In such cases, we should carefully distinguish between his acts in the one character and in the other, as the same rules do not always apply to each. See FACTOR. The Romans called brokers Proxenetae.

Brokers in London must be admitted by the lord mayor and aldermen, paying 5*l.* on admission, and a like sum annually, under a penalty of 100*l.* They were also required to take an oath, and enter into a bond for the observance of certain regulations. A broker, who is not duly qualified, cannot recover any compensation.—6 Anne c. 16; 57 Geo. III. c. 60. But by the 33 & 34 Vict. c. 60, the brokers of the City of London are now relieved from the necessity of entering into a bond; and though still admitted by, and liable to pay fees to the Court of Mayor and Aldermen, are in many respects freed from their supervision.

As to frauds by brokers, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 75 et seq.

The term ‘broker’ is also applied to the agent or ‘bailiff’ employed by a landlord to distrain. See 57 Geo. III. c. 93, s. 6, whereby every broker must give a copy of his charges to the person on whose goods he distrains.

Brokerage, the commission or per-centage paid to brokers on the sale or purchase of bills, funds, goods, etc.

Bronze Coinage. See 33 & 34 Vict. c. 10, repealing 22 & 23 Vict. c. 30.

Brooke's (Sir Robert) Abridgment, a work printed in 1568, and an improvement on the plan of Statham and Fitzherbert. The cases are here arranged with more strict regard to the title; but the order in which they are strung together is very little better, being generally guided only by the chronology. He observes one method, which contributes, in some degree, to draw the cases to a point; he generally begins a title with some modern determination in the reign of Henry VIII., as a kind of rule to guide the reader in his progress through the heap of ancient cases which follow. He abridges, with great care, in the language of his own time, sometimes adding a short observation, or quere, furnished by the experience of later times. So that, upon the whole, the substance of the year-books, to which it is an excellent repository, is conveyed in this one volume, in a style and manner more generally acceptable than the original. This has the praise of being the most correct of these works.—Foster.

Brossus, bruised or injured with blows, wounds, or other casualty.—Cowel.

Brothel [fr. bordel, Fr.], a lewd place, the habitation of prostitutes. To keep such a house is an offence at Common Law, the prosecution of which is specially encouraged by 25 Geo. II. c. 36, s. 5.

Brother-in-law, a wife's brother or a sister's husband. There is not any relationship, but only affinity between brothers-in-law.

Brougham's (Lord) Acts. For a list of these, see Biddle's Table of References to the Public General Acts. The best known of them are, the Beer Act of 1830, 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 64, the Judicial Committee Act of 1833, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 41, the County Court Act of 1846, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 46, the Act for shortening the language of Acts of Parliament, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 21, and the Evidence Acts of 1845 and 1851, 8 & 9 Vict. c. 113, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99.

Brudhote. See BRIGBOTE.

Brudkop [fr. brautkauf, Low. Sax., purchase], betrothment.

Bruere [erica, Lat., heath], heath-ground.

Brueria [fr. brær, Sax., briar], thorns, briars, heath.—Par. Ant. 620.

Bruilletus, a small coppice or wood.

Bruillus [fr. breil, brevil, Fr., a thicket], a clump of trees in a park or forest.

Bruneta. See BURNETA.

Bruscia, a wood.—Mon. Ang. t. 1, fol. 773.

Brutum fulmen, an empty noise: an empty threat.

Bubbles [fr. bobbel, Dutch], projects started by dishonest individuals to cheat and rob the public. The South-Sea Project and the Railway Mania are examples. The 6 Geo. I. c. 18, punished such fraudulent undertakings; and so did 7 Geo. II. c. 8, commonly called the Bubble Act, or 'Barnard's Act,' repealed by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38.

Bucinus, a military weapon for a footman.

Bucklarium, a buckler.

Buckstall, a toil to take deer.—4 Inst. 306.

Buckwheat, a French wheat, called in Essex brank, and in Worcestershire, crap.—15 Car. II. c. 5.

Budget (The). The Chancellor of the Exchequer makes one general statement every year to the House of Commons, which is intended to present a comprehensive view of the financial condition of the country. Sometimes there are preliminary, or supplemental, or occasional speeches; but the great general statement of the year has, for a long time past, been quaintly called 'The Budget,' from the French bougette, by a common figure of speech, putting the name of that which contains, to signify the thing contained. The annual speech known by that appellation, embraces a review of the income and expenditure of the last, as compared with those of preceding years; remarks upon the financial prospects of the country; an exposition of the intended repeal, modifications, or imposition of taxes during the session, and a detail of the public expenditure during the current period, with its grounds of justification.—Dod's Parl. Comp. The Secretary of State for India also makes an annual financial statement for his department.

Buggery [fr. bugarone, or buggerare, Ital.], a detestable and abominable sin, amongst Christians not to be named.—3 Inst. 58; 12 Rep. 36; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 61.

Building Acts. The acts commonly so called apply only to the metropolis, and in more modern times have been called the Metropolitan Building Acts. Their main object is to prevent fires. See Metropolitan Building Acts, 1855 and 1862, and Metropolitan Management and Building Act, 1878, and consult Woolrych's Metropolitan Buildings Acts, 3rd ed., by Macnamara. The old Building Act, par excellence, 14 Geo. III. c. 78, although otherwise partial and repealed, has two sections, 83 and 86, which are still in force and of universal application. Section 83 provides for the application of insurance money in reinstatement of insured buildings after damage by fire, and section 86 that no action shall lie against a person in whose house a fire accidentally begins.

Building (Benefit) Society. See BENEFIT BUILDING SOCIETIES.

Building lease, a lease of land for a long term of years, usually 99, at a rent called a ground rent, the lessee covenanting to erect certain edifices thereon according to specification, and to maintain the same, etc., during the term. At the end of the term, the land, with the edifices upon it, reverts in fee simple to the legal representative of the letter. Such leases of settled estates are in many cases regulated by the Settled Land Act, 1882, or the Settled Estates Act, 1877, replacing the Settled Estates Act, 1856.

Bul, in the ancient Hebrew chronology, the eighth month of the ecclesiastical, and the second of the civil year. It has since been called Marshewan, and answers to our October.

Bull [fr. bullā, Lat., a stud or boss]; a brief or mandate of the Pope or Bishop of Rome, so called from the seal of lead or gold affixed to it, upon which was engraved on one side an image of St. Paul on the right of a cross, and that of St. Peter on the left, and on the other the Pope's name, and the year of his pontificate. To procure, publish, or put in use any of these is made treason by 13 Eliz. c. 2 and 7 Anne c. 21; and see 28 Hen. VIII. c. 16.

Bull (cant term of the Stock Exchange), one who speculates for a rise in the market.

Bull and Boar. By the custom of some places the parson was obliged to keep these animals for the use of the parishioners, in consideration of his having tithes of calves and pigs, etc.—1 Roll. Abr. 559.

Bullary, a bucket of brine.

Bull Baiting. See BATING.

Bulletin [fr. bullet, Lat., a sealed despatch], an official notice of a public transaction or matter of public importance; an abridged edition of the London Gazette.

Bullio salis, as much salt as is made at one wealing, or boiling; a twelve gallon measure of salt.—Mon. Ang. t. 2.

Bullion [fr. billon, Fr., copper], uncoined gold and silver in the mass. Those metals are called so, either when smelted from the native ore, and not perfectly refined; or when they are perfectly refined, but melted down into bars or ingots, or into any unwrought body, of any degree or fineness. As to the purchase of bullion for the Mint, see 33 & 34 Vict. c. 10, s. 9, which provides that the Treasury may, from time to time, issue to the Master of the Mint, out of the growing produce of the Consolidated Fund, such sums as may be necessary to enable him to purchase bullion, in order to provide supplies of coin for the public service. As to bullion marks, see 5 & 6 Vict. c. 47, ss. 59, 60; and as to the weights used in sales of bullion, see Weights and Measures Act, 1878, replacing 16 & 17 Vict. c. 29.

Bulter, or Boulter, the bran or refuse of meal after it is dressed; also the bag in which it is dressed.—51 Hen III. Hence, bulsted, or boulsted bread, being the coarsest bread.

Bum-bailiff [fr. the notion of a humming, droning, or dunning noise; the term bum is applied to dunning a person for debt.—Hall], a person employed to dun one for a debt; the bailiff employed to arrest for debt.—Wedgw. See BOUND-BAILIFF.

Bungalow, a country-house in the East Indies.

Burden of proof [onus probandi, Lat.]. The most prominent canon of evidence is, that the point in issue is to be proved by the party who asserts the affirmative, according to the civil law maxims, Ei incumbit probatio qui dicit, non qui negat, and Affirmanti non neganti incumbit probatio. The burden of proof lies on the person who has to support his case by proof of a fact which is peculiarly within his own knowledge, or of which he is supposed to be cognizant. See EVIDENCE.

Bureau [fr. bujo, It., dark], a large writing table; also the office of any functionary where public business is transacted.

Bureaucracy, government by departments, each under a chief; a word to describe the system, used in an invidious sense.

Burgage-holding, a tenure by which lands in royal boroughs in Scotland are held of the Sovereign. The service was watching and warding, and was done by the burgesses within the territory of the borough, whether expressed in the charter or not.—Scotch Dict. See 31 & 32 Vict. c. 101.

Burgage-tenure, one of the three species of free socage holdings, is a tenure whereby houses and lands which were formerly the site of houses, in an ancient borough, are held of some lord by a certain rent. There are a great many customs affecting these tenures, the most remarkable of which is the custom of Borough-English (which see).—Litt. s. 162. This tenure is obviously a fragment of Saxon freedom. As to the right of voting for members of parliament in respect of these interests, see 2 Wm. IV. c. 45; and see 2 Bl. Com. 82—3; Glanv. 1, 3, 7.

Burgbote, a contribution towards the building or repairing of castles or walls of a borough or city.—Cowel; Fleta, l. 1, c. 47.

Burgesses [fr. burgeise, O. E.; bourgeois, O. Fr.; burgensis, Lat.], generally the inhabitants of a borough or walled town; sometimes restricted to the magistrates, etc., of corporate towns, and sometimes to the representatives of a borough in the Commons House of Parliament; in and for the purposes of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, those persons who by one year's residence in a borough and occupation of property and payment of rates are entitled to be 'enrolled,' and when enrolled, to elect the 'council,' by which a municipal corporation is capable of acting. See MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.

Burgessour, a burglar.—Brit.

Burgh-breche [fidejussionis violatio, Lat., a breach of pledge], a fine imposed on the community of a town, for a breach of the peace, etc.—Leg. Canuti, c. lv.

Burgheristhe, or Bugheriche, a breach of the peace in a city, etc.—Domesday.

Burgh, in Scotland equivalent to 'borough' in England.

Burgh-mails, yearly payments to the Crown of Scotland, introduced by Malcolm III., and resembling the English fee-farm rents.—Encyc. Lond.

Burghware, a citizen or burgess.

Burglary [fr. burg, Sax., a house, and larron, a thief, fr. latro, Lat.], called by our ancient law hamesecken. A breaking and entering by night into or out of a dwelling-house with intent to commit a felony. There are four things to be considered in this definition: (1) The time; it must be by night, and not by day; and night in the perpetration of this offence, is to be considered as commencing at nine in the evening, and concluding at six in the morning (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 1). (2) The place; it must be a mansion-house, or dwelling-house, or some building connected therewith. The 53rd section of 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, enacts 'that no building, although within the same curtilage with the dwelling-house, and occupied therewith, shall be found to be part of such dwelling-house, for the purposes of this act (which include burglary) unless there shall be a communication between such building and dwelling-house, either immediate or by means of a covered and enclosed passage leading from one to the other.' (3) The manner; there must be both a breaking and an entry to complete it. But they need not be both done at once; for if a hole be broken one night, and the same breakers enter the next night through the same, they are burglars. Breaking or taking out the glass of, or otherwise opening a window, picking a lock, opening it with a key, lifting the latch of a door, or unloosing any fastening, coming down a chimney, are breakings within the authorities; as for the entry, any the least degree of it, with any part of the body, or with an instrument held in the hand is sufficient; as to step over the threshold; to put a hand or a hook in at a window to draw out goods, or a pistol to demand one's money; introducing the hand between the glass of an outer window and an inner shutter, are all of them burglarious entries. (4) The intent must be felonious, either at Common Law or by Statute, as robbery, murder, rape, or any other felony, whether actually perpetrated or not. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 52, as amended by the Penal Servitude Act, 1864, burglary is punishable with penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than five years, or by imprisonment.—See Russell on Crimes.

Burmote, a court of a borough.—Leg. Canuti, c. xlv.

Burgomaster, a German mayor or Burgo-meister.

Buri, husbandmen.—Mon. Ang., t. 3, p. 183.

Burial, the act of interring the dead. The 4 Geo. IV. c. 52, abolished the barbarous mode of burying persons found felo de se, and directs that their burial shall take place without any marks of ignominy, privately in the parish churchyard, between the hours of nine and twelve at night, under the direction of the coroner. The burial of dead bodies cast on shore is enforced by 48 Geo. III. c. 75. The principal Burial Acts are the Cemeteries Clauses Act, 1847, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 47 (regulating Cemetery Companies); 15 & 16 Vict. c. 85 (Metropolitan Burial Boards); 17 and 18 Vict. c. 87 (borough burial boards); 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81; and the Burials Act, 1880, 43 & 44 Vict. c. 41 (allowing burial in churchyard without church rites). See Chit. Stat., vol. i., tit 'Burial,' and vol vi., tit. 'Statutes of 1880.' The 36 & 37 Vict. c. 50 facilitates the acquisition of new sites for burial grounds.

Burial in some part of the parish churchyard without payment for breaking the soil is a common law right, and that right will be enforced by mandamus, but not burial in an iron coffin or vault, or even in any particular part of a churchyard, as the family vault for example, that being within the discretion of the incumbent. In order to acquire a perfect right to be buried in a particular vault or place, a faculty must be obtained from the ordinary, as in the case of a pew; or a man may prescribe that he is occupier of an ancient messuage in a parish, and ought to have separate burial in such a vault within the church, and such prescription implies that a faculty was originally obtained (8 B. & C. 293). The faculty, however, fails when the family cease to be parishioners.

A clergyman may be prosecuted in the Ecclesiastical Court for improperly refusing to bury a dissenter or other person, for by the 60th Canon 'no minister shall refuse or delay to bury any corpse that is brought to the church or churchyard (convenient warning being given him before), in such manner and form as is prescribed in the book of Common Prayer' (3 Phil. Ec. Cas. 264—306). A conspiracy to prevent a burial is indictable at common law, and so is the wilfully obstructing a clergyman in reading the Burial Service over the dead in the parish church, and by threats and menaces hindering the burial (7 Dowl. & Ryl. 461).

As to the enforcement on the occasion of burials, of the rules and ceremonies prescribed by the Book of Common Prayer, see PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT.

A creditor cannot arrest or detain the body of a deceased debtor. See per Lord Ellenborough in Jones v. Ashburnham, 4 East, 445.

Funerals are exempt from tolls by 3. Geo. IV. c. 126, s. 32. The 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 74, regulating schools of anatomy, was intended to prevent the stealing of dead bodies, which is contrary to common decency, and abhorrent to the general sentiments and feelings of society. As to the registration of deaths, see REGISTRATION OF BIRTHS, DEATHS, AND MARRIAGES.

Burial Board. See BURIAL, and 34 & 35 Vict. c. 33. Local boards of health may be constituted burial boards.—Consult Glen's Public Health Acts.

Burkism (from the name of its first perpetrator), the practice of killing persons for the purpose of selling their bodies for dissection.

Burlaw. See BYE-LAW.

Burnetta, or Brunetta, cloth made of dyed wool.—Lyndewood.

Burning in the hand. See BRANDING.

Burning of houses, outhouses, etc. See ARSON, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 1 et seq. As to setting fire to churches, mills, ships, etc., see 1 Vict. c. 89.

Burrochium, a burroch, dam, or small wear over a river, where traps are laid for the taking of fish.—Cowel.

Bursa, a purse.

Bursar [fr. bursarius, Lat.; whence purse, and purser, a ship's officer], a treasurer of a college.

Bursaria, the exchequer of collegiate or conventual bodies; or the place of receiving, paying, and accounting by the bursars. Also stipendiary scholars, who live upon the burse, fund, or joint-stock of the college.

Burseholders. See HEADBOROUGH.

Bushel [fr. busse, Du., a box; busken, a little box], a dry measure containing eight gallons or four pecks.

Busones comitatus, the barons of a county.—Blount; 2 Reeves, c. viii., p. 2.

Bussa, a ship.—Blount.

Busellas [fr. bouts, O. Fr., leathern vessels for holding wine], a bushel.

Busta, Bustus, and Buscus, browse or brushwood.

Bustard [fr. outarde, Fr.], a large bird of game, usually found on downs and plains.—25 Hen. VIII. c. ii.

Butscarle, mariners or seamen.—Seld. Mare Claus. 184.

Butler [fr. bouteiller, Fr., as if fr. bouteille, a bottle; or fr. buttery, butt, a barrel]. See BOTILER.

Butler's ordinance. A law for the heir to punish waste in the life of the ancestor. Though it be on record in the parliament book of Edward I., yet it never was a statute, nor ever so received; but only some constitution of the king's council, or lords in parliament, which never obtained the strength or force of an act of parliament.—Hale's Hist., p. 18.

Butlerage, an ancient hereditary duty belonging to the Crown, much older than the customs. It was a right of taking two tuns of wine from every ship importing into England twenty tuns or more, and by King Edward I. was exchanged into a duty of 2s. for every tun imported by merchant strangers. It was called butlerage, because paid to the king's butler; and also prisage, because it was a taking or purveyance for wine to the king's use.—4 Inst. 30; 1 Bl. Com. 314.

Butt, 108 gallons.

Butticella, or Butticellin, a less measure.

Butts, the ends of short pieces of land in arable ridges or furrows. Also the place where archers meet with their bows and arrows to shoot at a mark.

Butty, a local term in the north for the associate or deputy of another; also of things used in common.

Buyer [fr. bycgan, bohte, A.S.; bygge, O.E.; to purchase for money], a purchaser. See CAVEAT EMPTOR.

Buying of Pleas. See MAINTENANCE.

Buzonis, the shaft of an arrow before it is fledged and feathered.

Bye and Bee [fr. by, Sax.], habitation, as bying, i.e., a dwelling-house.

Bye-bil-wuffa, a deed of mortgage or conditional sale. See KUL-KUBALA.—Ind.

By-laws, or Bye-laws [fr. bilagines, from by, Sax., pagus, civitas, and lagen, lex, Spelm.], the laws, regulations, and constitutions of corporations, for the government of their members. They may be made at courts-leet or courts-baron, by commoners or inhabitants, in vills, etc., guilds, or fraternities of trade duly incorporated. They are binding, unless contrary to law, or unreasonable, and against the common benefit, and then they are void. There are nice distinctions drawn between by-laws made in restraint of a trade, and those to regulate it. If a by-law do not mention how the penalty for disobedience of it is to be recovered, debt, or assumpsit will lie, but if warranted by special custom, distress and sale of the party's goods may be made. No trading company is allowed to make by-laws which may affect the Crown, or the common profit of the people, under penalty of 40*l.*, unless they be approved by the chancellor, treasurer, and chief justices, or the judges of assize.—19 Hen. VII. c. 7.

By the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, the council have express power to make such by-laws as to them shall seem meet 'for the good rule and government of the borough,' and for prevention and suppression of nuisances not already punishable in a summary manner by virtue of any act [see, e.g., the Public Health Act, 1875, ss. 47, 50, and 171] in force throughout the borough.

Railway Companies have the power of making by-laws, by 8 Vict. c. 20. Like powers are contained in the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, s. 124; Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847, s. 96; Market and Fairs Clauses Act, 1847, s. 42; Harbours, Docks, and Piers Clauses Act, 1847, s. 83; Towns Improvements Clauses Act, 1847, ss. 126, 200; Towns Police Clauses Act, 1847, ss. 68, 71, and various other Acts. See Lumley on By-laws.

In Scotland those laws are called laws of birlaw or burlaw, which are made by neighbours elected by common consent in the birlaw courts, wherein cognizance is taken of complaints between neighbour and neighbour. And birlaws, according to Skene, are leges rusticorum, laws made by husbandmen, etc., concerning neighbourhood.

Bysax, the first month of the Bengal year, beginning on the 11th of April, and ending on the 11th of May.

C.

C, inscribed upon a ballot in the Roman Courts of Judicature, stood for condemno.—Tay. C. L. 192.

Cab. See 16 & 17 Vict. cc. 33 and 127, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 115.

Cabal. A small association for the purpose of intrigue; an intrigue. This name was given to that ministry in the reign of Charles II. formed by Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale, who concerted a scheme for the restoration of popery. The initials of these five names form the word 'cabal'; hence the appellation.—Hume, ix. 69. For a succinct account of the Cabal Ministry, see 2 Hall. Cons. Hist. 374.

Cabalist, a factor or broker in French commerce.

Caballa, belonging to a horse.—Domesday.

Caballaria [fr. caballus, Lat., a mill-horse], pertaining to a horse. It was a feudal tenure of lands, the tenant furnishing a horseman suitably equipped in time of war, or when the lord had occasion for his service.

Cabinet Council, a private and confidential assembly of the most considerable ministers of state, to concert measures for the administration of public affairs; first established by Charles I.

Cable [fr. cabl, Welsh; cabel, Dut.], the great rope of a ship, to which the anchor is fastened. The proof and sale of chain cables and anchors is regulated by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 27, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 51.

Cablish [fr. cado, Lat., to fall; cablis, O. Fr.], brushwood, or more properly windfall-wood according to Spelman.

Cachepolus, or Cacherellas, an inferior bailiff, or cathpole.—Jacob.

Cachet, Lettres de, letters issued and signed by the kings of France, and counter-signed by a secretary of state, authorizing the imprisonment of a person. Abolished during the revolution of 1789.

Cadastu, an official statement of the quantity and value of realty made for purposes of taxation.—Fr. Law.

Cade, a cask containing, of herrings 500, but of sprats 1,000.—Book of Rates, fol. 45.

Cadet [fr. cadet, Fr.; capdel, Gascon; the younger son of a family; said to be fr. capitulum, little chief.—Wedgw.], one who is trained for the army by a course of military discipline at Woolwich, etc., previously to obtaining a commission in the army. Also a younger brother.—Encyc. Lond.

Cadi, a Turkish magistrate.

Cadit quæstio: there's an end to the argument.

Caduca, the lapse of a testamentary disposition.—Sand. Just. 196, 225.

Caep gildum, restoring cattle or goods.

Caerleon, in Wales, an archbishopric which became subject to the Archbishop of Canterbury in the reign of Henry I.

Cæsarian operatio [fr. Cæsar, or rather Cæso, the first of that name, who was cut out of his mother's womb], a surgical operation whereby the fœtus, which can neither make its way into the world by the ordinary and natural passage, nor be extracted by the attempts of art, whether the mother and fœtus be yet alive, or whether either of them be dead, is, by a cautious and well-timed operation, taken from the mother, with a view to save the lives of both, or either of them. Consult Tayl. Med. Jur., 2nd ed., II. 216 et seq.

If this operation be performed after the mother's death, the husband cannot be tenant by the courtesy; since his right begins from the birth of the issue, and is consummated by the death of the wife; but if mother and child are saved, then the husband would be entitled after her death.

Cæterorum, a kind of administration granted after a limited administration for the rest of the estate.

Cagia, a cage or coop for birds.—Rot. Claus.; 38 Hen. III.

Cairns' Act, for enabling the Court of Chancery to award damages, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27.

Calangium, and Calangia, a challenge, claim, or dispute.—Mon. Angl. tom. 2, fol. 252.

Calcetum and Calcea [fr. calx, Lat.; charus, Fr., chalk], a causey, or common hard-way, maintained and repaired with stones and rubbish.—Kennet's Gloss.

Calcutta, Bishop of, the metropolitan bishop of India.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 85, s. 94; and see 53 Geo. III. c. 155, s. 49, 34 & 35 Vict. c. 62, and 37 Vict. c. 13.

Caledonia, the northern part of Britannia. For the precise signification of the term, consult Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Geography.

Calefagium, a right to take fuel yearly.—Blount.

Calendar [fr. calendarium, Lat.; fr. calendæ, the first day in the month in Roman reckoning], the order and series of months, together with the festivals and fasts, which make up the year. There are two modes of computing time—by the annual course of the sun, and by the periodical revolutions of the moon. The solar year consists of 365 days, 5 hours, 48', 45", 30''; the lunar year of 354 days, 3 hours, 48', 38", 12''' The Mahometans adopt the lunar year. The solar year, calculated by the ancient Egyptians, has undergone various corrections and denominations. The chief of these now in use are the three following: (1) The Julian year, so called because Julius Cæsar introduced into the Roman Empire the solar or Egyptian year, instead of the lunar year. The Russians and Greeks are the only nations that now use the Julian year. The common Julian year consists of 365 days, and the bissextile, which returns every four years, of 366 days. This computation is faulty, inasmuch as it allows 365 days and 6 entire hours, for the annual revolution of the sun, being an excess every year of 11', 14", 30'', beyond the true time. This, in a course of ages, had amounted to several days, and began at length to derange the order of the seasons. Leo X. paid some attention to this, but Gregory XIII. caused a new calendar to be drawn up, which is called the (2) Gregorian year; and because the civil year had gained ten days, he ordered, by a bull published in 1582, that these days should be expunged, so that instead of the 5th of October, 1582, it should be reckoned the 15th. The Catholic states adopted this new calendar, but the Protestants and the rest of Europe adhered to the Julian, and hence the distinction between the old and new style, to which it is necessary to attend in all public acts and writings since 1582. The difference until 1699 was ten days, and eleven from 1700, twelve days must be reckoned during 1800, so that the 1st of January of the old style answers to the 13th of the new. (3) The Reformed Calendar differs from the Gregorian, as to the method of calculating the time of Easter and other moveable feasts. The Protestants of Germany, Holland, Denmark, and Switzerland, adopted this in 1700, Great Britain in 1752, Sweden in 1753, but since 1776, the Protestants of Germany, Switzerland, and Holland have adopted the Gregorian. In England the year used to commence on the 25th of March until 1753, when by the 24 Geo. II. c. 23, the beginning of the year was transferred to the 1st of January, and the 3rd of September, 1752, was reckoned the 14th of the same month in order to accommodate the English chronology to the new style.—28 Geo. II. c. 30; 6 Rymer's Fœdera, 119; Koch's Europe, Introd.; 2 Hall. Lit. Hist. 56, 329.

Calendar month, a period of time consisting of thirty days in April, June, September, and November; of thirty-one days in the remainder of the months, except February, which consists of twenty-eight days, unless in leap year when the intercalary day is added, making twenty-nine days. The term 'month' in acts of parliament since 1850, is to mean calendar month.—13 Vict. c. 21, s. 4. So too in the Rules of the Supreme Court.—Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. LVII., r. 1.

Calendar of prisoners, a list of all the prisoners' names in the custody of the sheriff of each county, prepared before the arrival of the judges on their respective circuits. At the end of the assize, the clerk of assize makes out four written lists of all the prisoners, with separate columns, containing their crimes, verdicts, and sentences, leaving a blank column, which the judge fills up opposite to the names of the prisoners, by writing to be reprieved, or respited, or imprisoned, etc. These four calendars are signed by the judge and clerk of assize; then one is given to the sheriff, another to the gaoler, and the judge and the clerk of assize each keep another. If the sheriff afterwards receive no special order from the judge, he executes the judgment of the law in the usual manner, agreeably to the directions in his calendar.—Christian's note to 4 Bl. Com. c. xxxii. 104.

Calends [fr. καλέω, Gk., to call], the first days of each month among the Romans.

Greek Calends, a term for a time never likely to arrive.

Call, the election of students to the degree of barrister-at-law, hence (2) The ceremony or epoch of election, and (3) The number of persons elected. See INNS OF COURT.

Call of the House, an imperative summons sent to every member of the House of Commons, on some particular occasion, when the sense of the whole house is deemed necessary. Members not attending when their names are called, are reported as defaulters, and ordered to attend on another day, when, if they still be absent, and no excuse offered, they may be committed to the custody of the serjeant-at-arms.—Lex. Parl.

Calling the jury, successively drawing out of a box into which they have been previously put, the names of the jurors on the panels annexed to the nisi prius record, and calling them over in the order in which they are so drawn. The twelve persons whose names are first called, and who appear, are sworn as the jury, unless some just cause of challenge or excuse, with respect to any of them, shall be brought forward.

Calling the plaintiff. When a plaintiff or his counsel, seeing that sufficient evidence has not been given to maintain the issue, withdraws, the crier is ordered to call or demand the plaintiff, and if neither he, nor any person for him, appear, he is non-suited, the jurors are discharged without giving a verdict, the action is at an end, and the defendant recovers his costs. See NONSUIT.

Calling upon a prisoner. When a prisoner has been found guilty on an indictment, the clerk of the court addresses him and calls upon him to say why judgment should not be passed upon him. To this, he is strictly only entitled to point out a defect of law in the indictment or otherwise.

Callis, the king's highway, according to old writers.—Hunt, l. 1.

Calls, instalments by which the capital in a public company is gradually paid up. See Companies Clauses Act, 1845, s. 21; and Companies Act, 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89, s. 70 et seq.; and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 131, ss. 24, 25.

Calpes, a gift to the head of a clan, as an acknowledgment for protection and maintenance.—Scotch Law.

Calumnia, the offence committed by a man who, in the language of Gaius, intelligit non recte se agere sed vexandi adersarii gratia actionem instituit.—Sand. Just., ed. 5, 256, 488.

Calumniators, accusers of innocent persons.

Camalodunum, Maldon, in Essex.

Cambist [fr. cambium, Lat.], a person skilled in cambistry or exchanges; a trader or dealer in promissory notes and bills of exchange. Technical among merchants and bankers.

Cambridge. See UNIVERSITY.

Camera [fr. καμάρα, Gk.], the judge's chamber in Serjeant's Inn.—Ken. Glos.

The judge's private room behind the Court. It was thought that by consent of both parties the judge might at any time hear a civil cause in private if he chose, until, in the Divorce Court, the full Court refused to do so (shortly after the Legislature had refused to enact a clause, in a bill for the amendment of the practice of the Court, which gave the Court power to hear any case in private at its discretion, without the consent of the parties), two of the members of the Court referring to this fact as a reason for their refusal. It is believed, however, that this precedent has not been followed, and the point remains in uncertainty.

Cameralistics, the science of finance or public revenue, comprehending the means of raising and disposing of it.

Camera stellata, the Star Chamber. Its authority was enlarged and confirmed by Rot. Parl. 3 Hen. VII. n. 17, and abolished in the reign of Charles I., a little before the commencement of the civil wars.—Hume, iv. 96.

Camisia, a garment belonging to priests, called the Alb.—Pet. Blesensis.

Camoca, a garment made of silk.—Mon. Angl. tom. 3, p. 81.

Campana bajula, a small hand-bell, used in the ceremonies of the Roman church, and retained amongst the Protestants by sextons, parish clerks, and criers.—Camb. ap. Wharton Angl. Sacr. par. 2, p. 637.

Campartum, a part of a larger field or ground, which would otherwise be in gross or common.—Prinne, His. Coll. Vol. III. p. 89.

Campbell's (Lord) Acts for amending the practice in prosecutions for libel, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93; also 6 & 7 Vict. c. 96, providing for compensation to relatives in the case of a person having been killed through negligence; also 20 & 21 Vict. c. 83, in regard to the sale of obscene books, etc.

Campaltum, a corn-field.—Pet. in Parl. 30, Ed. I.

Campfight [fr. duellum, Lat.; combat, Fr.], the trial of a cause by duel or combat of two champions in the field, for decision of some controversy. If it were a crime deserving death, the campfight was for life or death; if the offence deserved only imprisonment, the campfight was accomplished when one combatant had subdued the other, so as either to make him yield or take him a prisoner. The accused might choose another to fight in his stead, but the accuser was obliged to fight in his own person. The combatants were armed with similar weapons.—3 Inst. 221; Verstegan's Rest. of decayed Intel. 64.

Campus maii, an anniversary assembly of our ancestors, held on May-day, when they confederated for the general defence of the kingdom.—Leges. Edw. Conf. c. 35.

Can, clearance, averment.—Anc. Hist. Eng.

Cana, a rod or distance in the measure of ground.

Canada. See 3 & 4 Vict. c. 35; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 118; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 71; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 56; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 63; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 21; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 118; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 56; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 23; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 34; 22 & 23 Vict. cc. 10, 26; 30 & 31 Vict. cc. 3, 16; and 33 & 34 Vict. c. 82; 36 & 37 Vict. c. 45; 37 & 38 Vict. c. 26; and 38 & 39 Vict. c. 38.

Canal. As to breaking down bank, dam, wall, etc., of, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 30; as to setting fire to buildings belonging to, see s. 4; as to stealing vessels from, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 63.

By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 28, canal companies may vary their tolls, but must charge the public equally; and by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 42, they may act as carriers. The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854, as amended by the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, provides for the interchange of traffic between canal and railway companies, and for the due maintenance of canals by railway companies owning them.

Canellaria Curia, the ancient denomination of the Court of Chancery.

Canellarii Angliæ dignitas est, ut secundus à rege in regno habetur. 4 Inst. 78.—(The dignity of the Chancellor of England is, that he is deemed the second from the sovereign in the kingdom.)

Cancellation, according to Bartolus, an expunging or wiping out of the contents of an instrument by two lines drawn in the manner of a cross; also used to signify any manner of obliteration and defacement. Consult 2 Br. & Had. Com. 496 & 564.

Cancelli (lattice work), the rails or balusters inclosing the bar of a court of justice or the communion-table. Also the lines drawn on the face of a will or other writing, with the intention of revoking or annulling it.

Candidate [fr. candidatus, Lat., clothed in white], a competitor, one who solicits or proposes himself for a place or office. The name is borrowed from the Toga Candida in which competitors at Rome were habited.—Vide Plutarch in Coriolan.

Candlemas-day, a festival appointed by the church to be observed on the second day of February in every year, in honour of the purification of the Virgin Mary, being forty days after her miraculous delivery. At this festival formerly the Protestants went, and the Papists now go in procession with lighted candles; they also consecrate candles on this day for the service of the ensuing year.

Canes opertiæ, dogs with whole feet, not lawed, i.e., not having the fore-claws cut off, in order to disable them from running at deer.

Canestellus [dim. of canistrum, Lat.], a basket.

Canfara, a trial by hot iron.

Canipulus, a short sword.—Blount.

Canon [fr. κανον, Gk., a rule], a law or ordinance of the church; also a residentiary member of a cathedral chapter.—3 & 4 Vict. c. 113. As to the resignation of canons, see 35 & 36 Vict. c. 8.

Canon Law. When Christian communities formed themselves into congregations (ἐκκλησίαι), certain resolutions were agreed upon for their government; these were termed rules (κανόνες, forma, disciplina); the phrases canonica sanctio, lex canonica, and canonum jura, were not introduced until the ninth century, nor the phrase jus canonicum until the canon law began in the twelfth century to be treated as a science. The canon law, properly so called, denotes the ecclesiastical law, sanctioned by the Church of Rome. It borrows from the Roman law many of its principles and rules of proceeding, though not servilely, nor without such variations as the independence of its tribunals and the different nature of its authorities might be expected to produce (2 Hall. Lit. Hist. pt. 2, c. iv. s. 3, p. 173). A comprehensive history of the canon law is yet to be given to the world (Droit Ecclésiastique). The component parts of the canon law are:—The Decree, containing three parts:—(a) distinctions; (b) causes; (c) a treatise concerning consecration. (2) The Decretals, also in three parts:—(a) Gregory's decretals in five books; (b) the sixth decretal; (c) the Clementine constitutions. (3) The Extravagants of John XXII. and other later Popes were subsequently added as novel constitutions. The term 'extravagant' is used in the canon law to denote documents which transcend the limits of a particular collection. From the careful revisions and scientific treatment of the canon law, it was received very generally in the Christian states. The rules for its application are as follows:—1st, In cases not contained in the civil law, or the rule for which was obscure, open to doubtful interpretation, or not expressly determined, if precisely and clearly resolved by the canon law, this latter formed the basis of decision; and on the contrary, if the case were not provided for, or ambiguously resolved by the canon law, when it was directly met, or its solution more clearly inferable from the civil law, this latter was to be preferred. 2nd, In cases of conflict, the civil law formed the rule in courts of civil, and the canon in those of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Thus, when a matter of canon law cognizance arose in civil law courts, the decision was given according to the rules of the canon law; and vice versâ when a question of civil law cognizance occurred before an ecclesiastical tribunal. 3rd, Within the imperial states, the civil law formed the basis, and the canon law in the papal states. 4th, In matters of a feudal nature, the civil was preferred to the canon law. 5th, In forensic causes, the canon is not presumed to differ from the civil law. The canon law of England comprehends besides the collections of the Roman pontiff's legatine and provincial constitutions. Also, the canon law, so far as it was received here before the 25 Henry VIII. c. 19, and is not repugnant to the common law, the statute law, and the law concerning the royal prerogative, is acknowledged to be in force by the authority of parliament.

The canons made in England in 1603, and revised in 1865, are binding on the clergy only. The canon law is founded principally upon the civil law, and so interwoven with it in its many branches, that there is no understanding the canon law rightly, without being very well versed in the civil law; wherefore its knowledge is absolutely necessary for the dispatch of all causes of ecclesiastical cognizance. And the civil law not only serves to explain the canon law, but by the practice of ecclesiastical courts it is allowed to come in aid of and to support the canon law in cases which are there omitted.

Canonical, agreeable to the canons of the church.

Canonical obedience, that duty which a clergyman owes to the bishop who ordained him, to the bishop in whose diocese he is beneficed, and also to the metropolitan of such bishop.

Canonist, a professor of ecclesiastical law.

Canons of the church. See CANON.

Canons of inheritance, the rules directing the descent of real property throughout the lineal and collateral consanguinity of the owner dying intestate, who is technically called the purchaser. The 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, materially altered the old canons of real property descent, but because the act does not extend to any descent which took place on the death of any persons who died before the 1st January, 1834, it is deemed expedient to give both old and new:—

The old canons, which obtain in cases of ancestors dying before 1st January, 1834, are the following:—

(1) That inheritances shall lineally descend to the issue of the person who last died actually seised, in infinitum, but shall never lineally ascend.

(2) That the male issue shall be admitted before the female.

(3) That where there are two or more males in equal degree, the eldest only shall inherit; but the females all together.

(4) That the lineal descendants in infinitum, of any person deceased, shall represent their ancestor; that is, shall stand in the same place as the person himself would have done had he been living.

(5) That on failure of lineal descendants, or issue of the person last seised, the inheritance shall descend to his collateral relations being of the blood of the first purchaser, subject to the three preceding rules.

(6) That the collateral heir of the person last seised must be his next collateral kinsman of the whole blood.

(7) That in collateral inheritances the male stocks shall be preferred to the female (that is, kindred derived from the blood of the male ancestors, however remote, shall be admitted before those from the blood of the females, however near), unless where the lands have in fact descended from a female.

The canons according to the new law grafted upon the old, are the following:—

(1) That inheritances shall, in the first place, lineally descend to the issue of the last purchaser in infinitum, by 'purchaser' being meant the person who last acquired the land, otherwise than by descent.

(2) That the male issue shall be admitted before the female.

(3) That where two or more of the male issue are in equal degree of consanguinity to the purchaser, the eldest only shall inherit, but the females all together.

(4) That all the lineal descendants, in infinitum, of any person deceased, shall represent their ancestor; that is, shall stand in the same place as the person himself would have done had he been living.

(5) That on failure of lineal descendants, or issue of the purchaser, the inheritance shall descend to his nearest lineal ancestor.

(6) That the father and all the male paternal ancestors of the purchaser, and their descendants, shall be admitted before any of the female paternal ancestors, or their heirs; all the female paternal ancestors and their heirs before the mother, or any of the maternal ancestors, or her or their descendants; and the mother and all the male maternal ancestors, and her and their descendants, before any of the female maternal ancestors, or their heirs.

(7) That a kinsman of the half blood shall be capable of being heir; and that such kinsman shall inherit next after a kinsman in the same degree of the whole blood, and after the issue of such kinsman, when the common ancestor is a male, and next after the common ancestor, when such ancestor is a female.

(8) That in the admission of female paternal ancestors, the mother of the more remote male paternal ancestor and her heirs shall be preferred to the mother of a less remote male paternal ancestor and her heirs; and in the admission of female maternal ancestors, the mother of the more remote male maternal ancestor and her heirs shall be preferred to the mother of a less remote male maternal ancestor and her heirs.—William's Real Property.

(9) Where there shall be a total failure of heirs of the purchaser, or where any lands shall be descendible, as if an ancestor had been the purchaser thereof, and there shall be a total failure of the heirs of such ancestor, then, and in every such case, the land shall descend, and the descent shall thenceforth be traced from the person last entitled to the land as if he had been the purchaser thereof.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 19. This enactment is to be read as part of the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, s. 20.

Cantel, or Cantle [fr. chantel, Fr.], a lump, or that which is added above measure; also a piece of anything, as 'cantel of bread,' or the like.—Blount.

Canterbury, Archbishop of, the Primate of All England; the Chief Ecclesiastical Dignitary in the Church: his customary privilege is to crown the Kings and Queens of England; while the Archbishop of York has the privilege to crown the Queen-Consort, and be her perpetual chaplain. The Archbishop of Canterbury has also, by 25 Hen. VIII. c. 21, the power of granting dispensations in any case not contrary to the Holy Scriptures and the law of God, where the Pope used formerly to grant them, which is the foundation of his granting special licenses to marry at any place or time; to hold two livings (which must be confirmed under the Great Seal), and the like; and on this also is founded the right he exercises of conferring degrees in prejudice of the two universities; but although he can confer all the degrees which are taken in the universities, yet the graduates of the two universities, by various acts of parliament, and other regulations, are entitled to many privileges, which are not extended to what is called a Lambeth degree.—1 Bl. Com. 381, Phill. Eccl. Law 32, 37, 792, 821, 1233. The power of conferring medical degrees appears to be superseded by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, sch. A 10, called 'The Medical Act.' See ARCHBISHOP.

Cantred, or Kantress [fr. cant, or centre, Brit., a hundred, and tre, a town or village], a hundred Welsh villages.—Mon. Aug. p. l. f. 319; 28 Hen. VIII. c. 3.

Cap of maintenance, one of the regalia or ornaments of State belonging to the sovereigns of England, before whom it is carried at the coronation and other great solemnities. Caps of maintenance are also carried before the mayors of several cities in England.—Encyc. Lond.

Capacity, an ability or fitness to do or to receive, to sue or to be sued.—Consult Story's Conflict of Laws, c. iv., tit. 'Capacity of Persons.'

Capax doli, capable of committing crime.

Cape, a judicial writ touching a plea of lands or tenements, divided into cape magnum, or the grand cape, which lay before appearance to summon the tenant to answer the default, and also over to the demandant; the cape ad valentiam was a species of grand cape; and cape parvum, or petit cape, after appearance or view granted, summoning the tenant to answer the default only.—Termes de la Ley; 3 Step. Com., 7th ed., 606, n.

Capella, an oratory, or depending place of divine worship; also a chest, cabinet, or other depository of precious things, especially of religious relics.—Ken. Paroch. Antiq. 580.

Capellus, a cap, bonnet, helmet, or other covering for the head.

Capias (that you take). The writ of capias (which was a writ directing the sheriff to take the body of the defendant), as a means of commencing an action at Common Law, was altogether abolished, and a new writ, called a 'capias on mesne process,' or 'bailable process,' was introduced by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 3, which limited the application of the writ to cases in which the cause of action amounts to 20*l.* or upwards, and the debtor is about to quit England, unless forthwith apprehended. By 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 6, it is enacted, that after the commencement of that act, a person shall not be arrested upon mesne process, in any action. Nevertheless, where a plaintiff has good cause of action against the defendant to the amount of 50*l.* or upwards, and the defendant is about to quit England, and the absence of the defendant from England will materially prejudice the plaintiff in the prosecution of his action, a judge may order the defendant to be arrested, unless, or until, security be found.—See MESNE PROCESS.

A capias is the process of an indictment when the person charged is not in custody, and in cases not otherwise provided for by statute.—4 Step. Com., 7th ed., 383.

Capias ad audiendum judicium (that you take to hear judgment). This writ is awarded and issued, in case the defendant be found guilty of a misdemeanour (the trial of which may, and does usually, happen in his absence, after he has once appeared), to bring him up to the Court to receive sentence, and, if he abscond, he may be prosecuted even to outlawry.—4 Bl. Com. 375.

Capias ad respondendum (that you take to answer). A process issued in cases of injury accompanied with force, or otherwise, against the defendant's person, when he neglected to appear upon the former process of attachment, or had no substance whereby to be attached, subjecting his person to imprisonment.—3 Bl. Com. 281 See 48 Geo. III. c. 58.

Capias ad satisfaciendum (that you take to satisfy); called in practice a ca. sa. A writ of execution of the highest nature, inasmuch as it deprives a person of liberty, till the satisfaction awarded be made; and therefore, when a man is once taken in execution upon this writ, no other process can be sued out against his lands and goods, unless he escape, or is rescued; but by 21 Jac. I. c. 24, if the defendant die while charged in execution upon this writ, the plaintiff may, after his death, sue out a new execution against his lands, goods, or chattels. This writ is addressed to the sheriff, commanding him to take the body of the defendant, and have him at Westminster on a day therein named, or immediately after the execution of the writ, to make the plaintiff satisfaction for his demand, or remain in custody till he does. The general rule is that any person may be arrested under this writ who is not privileged from being held to bail under a capias ad respondendum. By 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 57, this kind of execution was abolished 'in any action for the recovery of any debt wherein the sum recovered shall not exceed 20*l.*, exclusive of the costs recovered by such judgment,' and by the Debtors' Act, 1869, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, in any action whatever, unless the defendant could, but would not pay. See IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Capias in withernam (that you take by way of reprisals). If the goods before an action of replevin have been concealed, so that the sheriff cannot replevy them, then, upon plaint being levied in the County Court by the plaintiff, the plaintiff may issue this writ directing the sheriff to take goods or cattle of the defendant, to the value of those taken by him, and deliver them to the plaintiff, who gives a bond with sureties, conditioned to prosecute his suit and to return the goods, etc., so to be delivered to him, if a return of them should be afterwards adjudged. Goods taken in withernam cannot be replevied till the original distress is forthcoming.

Also, after verdict and judgment for defendant in replevin, and the usual writ of execution de retorno habendo has been sued out, to which the sheriff has returned that the goods, etc., are concealed or eligned, i.e., conveyed to places unknown to him, so that he cannot execute the writ, the defendant may then sue out a capias in withernam, requiring the sheriff to take other goods, etc., of the plaintiff to the value of the goods, etc., eligned, and deliver them to the defendant, to be kept by him until the plaintiff deliver to him the goods, etc., originally replevied. See REPLEVIN.

Capias pro fine, or Misericordia (that you take for the fine or in mercy). Formerly if the verdict was for the defendant, the plaintiff was adjudged to be amerced for his false claim; but if the verdict was for the plaintiff, then in all actions vi et armis, or where the defendant, in his pleading, had falsely denied his own deed, the judgment contained an award of a capiatur pro fine; in all other cases, the defendant was adjudged to be amerced. The insertion of the misericordia, or of the capiatur in the judgment, is now unnecessary.—See 1 Ch. Arch.

Capias utlagatum (that you take the outlaw). This writ is either general, against the person only; or special, against the person, lands, and goods; but outlawry is abolished in civil proceedings. See OUTLAWRY.

Capiatur, judgment quod. See CAPIAS PRO FINE, or MISERICORDIA.

Capita [M. Lat.], abutals or boundaries.

Capita (heads). Distribution or personalty per capita (professedly borrowed from the civilians, and enacted in the Statutes of Distributions) happens when all the claimants claim in their own right, in equal degree of kindred, and not jure representationis (per stirpes), in the right of another person, as if the next of kin be the intestate's three children, A., B., and C.; and here the intestate's personalty is divided into three equal portions, and distributed per capita, one to each. So succession per capita is where the claimants are next in degree to the ancestor, in their own right, and not by right of representation.—2 Steph Com., 7th ed., 211.

Capital [fr. capitalis; caput, Lat.], in political economy, that portion of the produce of industry existing in a country, which may be made directly available, either for the support of human existence, or the facilitating of production ; but, in commerce, and as applied to individuals, it is understood to mean the sum of money which a merchant, banker, or trader adventures in any undertaking, or which he contributes to the common stock of a partnership. Also the fund of a trading company or corporation, in which sense the word stock is generally added to it.—McCull. Com. Dict. As to circulating and fixed capital, see 1 Mill's Pol. Econ. b. 1, c. vi.

Capital felonies, those crimes upon conviction of which the offender is condemned to be hanged. The crimes now punishable with death are high treason and murder. Since 24 & 25 Vict. cc. 96, 97, 98, and 100, numerous offences, formerly capital, have ceased to be so.

Capitale, a thing which is stolen, or the value of it.—Blount.

Capitale vivens, live cattle.—Ibid.

Capitation, a tax or imposition raised on each person in consideration of his labour, industry, office, rank, etc. It is a very ancient kind of tribute, and answers to what the Latins called tributum, by which taxes on persons are distinguished from taxes on merchandise, called vectigalia.

Capite, tenure in, lands held by tenants immediately from the king. It was the most honourable tenure, and was of two kinds, either ut de honore, where the land was held of the king, as proprietor of some honour, castle, or manor, or ut de coronâ, where it was held in right of the Crown itself. When these tenants in capite granted portions of their lands to inferior persons, they were called mesne (middle) lords or barons, with regard to such inferior tenants, who were styled tenants paravail, the lowest tenants, because they were supposed to make avail or profit of the lands. This tenure is abolished, so that tenures now created by the Crown are in common socage.—12 Car. II. c. 24.

Capitilium, poll-money.

Capitium, a covering for the head.—1 Hen. IV.

Capitula itineris, articles of inquiry.—2 Reeves, c. viii. p. 4.

Capitula ruralia, assemblies or chapters, held by rural deans and parochial clergy, within the precinct of every deanery; which at first were every three weeks, afterwards, once a month, and subsequently, once a quarter.—Cowel.

Capitulary, a code of laws.

Capitulation [fr. capitula, Lat., to treat upon terms; fr. capitulum, a little head or division], the treaty which determines the conditions under which a place besieged is abandoned to the commanding officer of the besieging army; (2) an agreement by which the prince and the people, or those who have the right of the people, regulate the manner of government.

Capitulum est clericorum congregatio sub uno decano in ecclesiâ cathedrali. Co Litt. 98.—(A chapter is a congregation of clergy under one dean in a cathedral church.)

Capituli agri, head-lands; lands lying at the head or upper end of furrows, etc.—Ken. Par. Ant. 137.

Captain [fr. capitano, It., a head-man; fr. caput, Lat.], a leader or commander of a company of soldiers; who is either a general, governing a whole army, or special, as leader of a band or regiment.—Blount. Also the commander of a ship or vessel.

Captator, a person who obtains a gift or legacy through artifice.

Caption, that part of a legal instrument, as a commission, indictment, etc., which shows where, when, and by what authority it is taken, found, or executed.—Arch. Crim. Plead. tit. 'Caption.'

Captives, prisoners. As in the goods of an enemy, so also in his person, a sort of qualified property may be acquired, by taking him a prisoner of war, at least till his ransom be paid.—2 Bl. Com. 402.

Capture, the arrest or seizure of a person or thing, particularly applied to the seizure of ships by an enemy in time of war. On 16th April, 1856, a treaty or declaration was signed at Paris, between the powers of Great Britain, Austria, France, Russia, Sardinia, and Turkey, by which privateering is abolished, so far as those powers are concerned. See LETTERS OF MARQUE; and see 2 Br. & Had. Com. 597.

Caputagium, head or poll-money.

Caput anni, the first day of the year.

Caput baroniæ, the castle or chief seat of a baron.

Caput jejunii, the beginning of the Lent Fast, i.e., Ash Wednesday.

Caput loci, the head or upper part of a place.

Caput lupinum, a wolf's head. An outlawed felon was said to be caput lupinum, and might be knocked on the head, like a wolf.

Caput mortuum, dead; obsolete.

Car, and Char [fr. caer, Brit., city], names of places beginning with these words signify city, as Carlisle, Cardiff, etc.

Carat, a weight equal to three and one-sixth grains.

Carcan, a pillory.

Carcanum, a prison.—Leg. Canut. Reg

Carcatus, loaded, a ship freighted.

Carcel-age, prison-fees.

Carcer ad homines custodiendos non ad puniendos, dari debet. Co. Litt. 620.—(A prison ought to be given for the custody, not the punishment, of persons.)

Carcer non supplicii causa sed custodia constitutus.—(A prison is ordained not for the sake of punishment, but of ward.)—Lofft. 119.

Cards. To keep a common house for card-playing is unlawful.—17 & 18 Vict. c. 38; and see GAMING. Cheating at cards is punishable by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100, s. 17.

Carecta and Carectata, a cart and cart-load.

Caretorius, or Carectarius, a carter.—Blount.

Cargo [fr. cargo, Sp., the load of a ship; charge, Fr.], the lading of a ship, the merchandise or wares contained and conveyed in a ship.

Caristia, dearth, scarcity, dearness.—Cowel.

Caritas or Karite, a grace-cup, an extraordinary allowance of wine or liquor.

Cark, a quantity of wool, whereof thirty make a sarplar.—27 Hen. VI. c. 2.

Carle. See KARLE.

Carnal knowledge. See RAPE.

Carno, an immunity or privilege.—Cowel.

Carcome, a license by the Lord Mayor of London to keep a cart.

Carpemeals, a coarse cloth.—7 Jac. I. c. 16.

Carrels, closets, or apartments for privacy, or retirement.

Caretta, a carriage, cart, or wain-load.

Carricle, or Carracle, a ship of great burden.

Carrier, in its general sense, a person who undertakes to transport the goods of other persons from one place to another for hire. It is not, however, every person who undertakes to carry goods for hire that is deemed a common carrier.

To bring a person within the description of a common carrier, he must exercise it as a public employment; he must undertake to carry goods for persons generally; and he must hold himself out as ready to transport goods for hire, as a business, not as a casual occupation, pro hac vice.

Common carriers are generally of two descriptions: (1) carriers by land; (2) carriers by water. Of the former description are the proprietors of stage-waggon and stage-coaches, and railroads, which ply and run between different places, and carry goods for hire. So are truckmen, waggoners, teamsters, cartmen, and porters, who undertake to carry goods for hire, as a common employment, from one town to another, or from one part of a town or city to another. Of the latter description are the owners and masters of ships, whether they are regular packet ships or carrying smacks, or coasting ships, or other ships carrying on general freight. So are the owners and masters of steam-boats engaged in the transportation of goods for persons generally for hire. So are the lightermen, hoymen, barge-owners, ferrymen, and boatmen, and others employed in the same manner. The owners of a steam-boat, who undertake to tow freight boats for hire, or undertake to tow vessels in or out of port for hire, are not ordinary carriers, but are responsible only for common skill, care, and diligence in their undertaking.—Story on the Law of Bailments, 500.

The two obligations of a common carrier are (1) to carry for everybody, and (2) to answer for all things carried as insurers.

The second obligation, that of insurers, is restricted by the 'Carriers' Act,' 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 68, which protects carriers from liability in case of the loss of certain specified articles exceeding the value of ten pounds (excepting loss by the felony of the carrier's servants or his own personal default), unless the party delivering the goods declare the value, and offer to pay, if required, an extra charge for carriage, but requires that the notice of the increased charges that may be required shall be affixed in the office, and of which, when so affixed, every person is bound to take notice. It then declares that all other notices, then already or thereafter to be given, shall not protect a carrier from liability, excepting when so given under the terms of the act, viz., when certain specified articles exceed the value of 10*l.*, and when such notice has been duly affixed; but as to any other goods, or even the specified articles, when under the value of 10*l.*, carriers cannot by any notice protect themselves from the ancient common law liability. The act, however, allows effect to any express special contract made with a carrier.

The articles specified in the Carriers' Act, supra (11 Geo. IV. & 1 Wm. IV. c. 68), are the following:—gold or silver coin, of this or any foreign state, or gold or silver in a manufactured or unmanufactured state, or precious stones, jewellery, watches, clocks, or time-pieces, trinkets, bills, bank notes, order notes, or securities for payment of money, stamps, maps, writings, title-deeds, paintings, engravings, pictures, gold or silver plate, or plated articles, glass, china, silks, manufactured or unmanufactured, or wrought up or not with other articles, furs, and lace.

The carriage of gunpowder and other dangerous goods is regulated by s. 33 et seq. of the Explosives Act, 1875.

Carrying away infant females under sixteen. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 55, whoever shall unlawfully take, or cause to be taken, any unmarried girl, being under the age of sixteen years, out of the possession, and against the will of her father and mother, or of any other person having the lawful care or charge of her, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour. The abduction of a natural daughter from her putative father is within this law. In order to constitute this offence, it is not necessary that any corrupt motive should be the inducement to commit the offence, and the consent of the child herself would be no excuse, the gist of the offence being the taking away of infant-daughters from the possession of their parents or guardians.

Cart-bote. See BOTE.

Carte blanche, a white card, or free permission, signed at the bottom with a person's name, and sometimes sealed, giving another person power to superscribe what conditions he pleases. Applied generally in the sense of unlimited authority being granted.

Cartel [fr. cartella, It., pasteboard], a piece of pasteboard with some inscription on it, hung up in some place, and to be removed.—Flor. Hence a written challenge openly hung up; afterwards any written challenge. See CHARTEL.

Cartel-ship, a vessel commissioned in time of war to exchange the prisoners of any two hostile powers; also to carry any particular proposal from one to another; for this reason, the officer who commands her is particularly ordered to carry no cargo, ammunition, or implements of war, except a single gun for the purpose of signals.—Encyc. Lond.

Cartulary [fr. carta, Lat., paper], a place where papers or records are kept.

Caruca [fr. carr, old Gallic], a plough.

Carucage, a tax imposed on every plough for the public service.

Carucatarius, he that held lands in carvage, or plough-tenure.—Paroch. Antiq. 354.

Carucate [fr. carucata terra], Carvage, or Carve of land, a plough-land of 100 acres, or, according to Skene, as much land as may be tilled in a year and a day by one plough.—Ken. Glos. This quantity varies in different countries from 60 to 120 acres.

Case. The action on the case lay where a party sues for damages, for any wrong or cause of complaint to which covenant or trespass will not apply. This action originated in the power given by the Statute of Westminster 2, to the clerks of Chancery, to frame new writs in consimili casu with writs already known. Under this power, they constructed many writs for different injuries, which were considered as in consimili casu with, that is, to bear a certain analogy to, a trespass. The new writs invented for the cases supposed to bear such analogy, received, accordingly, the appellation of writs of trespass on the case (brevia 'de transgressione super casum') as being founded on the particular circumstances of the case thus requiring a remedy, and to distinguish them from the old writ of trespass; and the injuries themselves, which are the subjects of such writs, were not called trespasses, but had the general name of torts, wrongs, or grievances. The writs of trespass on the case, though invented thus, pro re nata, in various forms, according to the nature of the different wrongs which respectively called them forth, began, nevertheless, to be deemed as constituting, collectively, a new individual form of action; this new genus took its place by the name of trespass on the case, among the more ancient actions of debt, covenant, trespass, etc. Such being the nature of this action, it comprises, of course, many different species. There are two, however, of more frequent use than any other species of trespass on the case, viz. assumpsit and trover. The difference between an action of trespass and an action on the case is, that in the former the plaintiff complains of an immediate wrong, and in the latter, of a wrong that is the consequence of another act. The action on the case is equally applicable to consequential injuries to the real and personal property, as to the personal character of the party by whom it is brought.—Steph. Plead. 12.

As the technical mode of pleading at Common Law is now abolished by the Judicature Acts, 1873 & 1875, the term 'action on the case' will only continue to exist as a convenient mode of expression, and will cease to be a term of art.

For different kinds of action on the case, see MALICIOUS PROSECUTION, NEGLIGENCE, DECEIT, LIBEL, SLANDER, SEDUCTION, LIGHTS, WAYS, SEDUCING TO LEAVE SERVICE.

Case for the opinion of Courts of Law. Prior to the passing of the 16. & 17 Vict. c. 86, s. 61, the Court of Chancery used to direct such cases for the opinion of a Court of Law; but that Act gave the Court of Chancery the power of deciding questions of law. Now since the passing of the Judicature Acts, if an action is thought more suited to one Division of the High Court than that in which it is entered, it can be transferred by order of the Lord Chancellor or the Court or a judge. See Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. LI., rr. 1, 2, 3, and see TRANSFER OF CAUSES.

Case stated, a narrative (agreed upon by both parties to an action, or drawn up by an impartial person agreed upon by them or settled by the Court or a judge) setting forth the facts and points in dispute, with a view to a prompt decision. By the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XXXIV., the parties after writ may concur in stating questions of law in a special case; or if it appear to the Court or a Judge from the pleadings or otherwise that there is a question of law which it would be convenient to have decided in that manner, they or he may order a special case to be stated; subject to certain provisions for the protection of married women, infants, and persons of unsound mind. See SPECIAL CASES. The appeal from the County Courts may be in the form of a case stated. As to cases stated by justices of the peace, see 20 & 21 Vict. c. 43, 35 & 36 Vict. c. 26, and 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 33.

Cash [fr. caisse, Fr., a chest], money, properly ready money.

Cashier, a person entrusted with the monetary interest of a public company, usually under the order of directors; also a deprivation of office.

Cashlite, a mulct.

Cassation [from casser, Fr., to quash], a making null or void of any unjust or illegal act or decision; also a decision in the last resort.—Fr. Law.

Cassatum and Cassata, a house, with land sufficient to maintain one family.

Cassetur breve (that the writ be quashed). When the defendant pleaded sufficient matter in abatement and the plaintiff could not deny it, he could either obtain leave to amend his declaration, he might at once enter on the roll a cassetur breve, or judgment upon his prayer that his writ might be quashed, to the intent that he might sue out a better. 2 Chit. Arch. Prac. Pleas in abatement are, however, now abolished by the Judicature Act, 1875. See ABATEMENT.

Cassidile, a little sack, purse, or pocket.

Cassock, or Cassula [fr. casag, Gael., a long coat], a garment belonging to a priest.

Cast, defeated at law, condemned in costs or damages.

Castel, or Castle [fr. castellum, dim. of castrum, Lat.], a fortress in a town; a principal mansion of a nobleman.—1 Inst. 31.

Castellain, the lord, owner, or captain of a castle; the constable of a fortified house; a person having the custody of one of the Crown mansions; an officer of the forest.—Bract. Manv.

Castellarium, the precinct or jurisdiction of a castle.

Castellarum operatio, castle-work or service and labour done by inferior tenants for the building and upholding of castles of defence; towards which some gave their personal assistance, and others paid their contributions. See TRINODA NECESSITAS. Castleward was the service of guarding or watching at such castle.

Caster and Chester [fr. castrum, Lat.]. The places ending with either of these words were the sites of the castles built by the Romans.

Castigatory, a certain engine of correction, otherwise called the tre-bucket, tumbrel tymborella, cucking-stool, scolding-school, ducking-stool, goginstole, and cokestole, corrupted from choking-stool. It was a punishment provided for scolding women, wherein they were plunged or soused over head in the water.

It was also called Cathedra Stercoralis, and by the Saxons seacalfing stole, and anciently inflicted on brewers and bakers transgressing the laws, who were ducked in stercore (in stinking water).—Domesday Book.

Castig an essoin. See ESSOIN.

Castig vote, the vote given by the chairman or president of a deliberate assembly, when the suffrages of the meeting are equal.

The chairman of vestries has a casting vote (58 Geo. III. c. 69, s. 2), and so has the mayor or other chairman at a meeting of a Town Council (Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, s. 22, and Sched. 11, Rule 11), and the chairman of local boards. By the Companies Clauses Act, 1845, the chairman of directors has a casting vote (s. 92), as has the chairman of a committee (s. 96), and the chairman of a general meeting (s. 76).

Castle-ward, an imposition laid upon persons living within a certain distance of a castle towards the maintenance of those who watch and ward the same.—Magna Charta; 32 Hen. VIII. c. 48.

Casual ejector, the fictitious Richard Roe in the mixed action of ejectment, before the fiction was abolished by the C. L. P. Act, 1852. See EJECTMENT.

Casual Pauper. Any destitute wayfarer or wanderer applying for, or receiving relief. See Pauper Inmates Discharge and Regulation Act, 1871, 34 & 35 Vict. c. 108, and Casual Poor Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 36.

Casual poor, those who are not settled in a parish.

Casualty of wards, the mails and duties due to the superior in ward-holdings.—Scotch Law Dict.

Casu consimili, a writ of entry, granted where tenant by the courtesy, or tenant for life, alienated in fee, or in tail, or for another's life, and was brought by him in reversion against the party to whom such tenant so alienated to his prejudice, and in the tenant's lifetime.—Termes de la Ley. Abolished.

Casu proviso, a writ of entry, given by the Stat. of Gloucester, c. 7, where a tenant in dower alienated in fee, or for life, etc., and it lay for him in reversion against the alienee.—F. N. B. 207. Abolished.

Casus belli, an occurrence giving rise to, or justifying war.

Casus foederis, a case stipulated by treaty, or which comes within the terms of a compact.

Casus omissus, a point unprovided for by statute.

Casus omissus et oblivioni datus dispositioni communis juris relinquitur.—(A case omitted and consigned to oblivion is left to the disposal of the common law.)—5 Rep. 38, and Br. Max., 5th ed., 46.

Cat. A cat is not the subject of larceny at Common Law: for the punishment for stealing a cat see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 21; for maliciously killing or wounding, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 41; and for painful experiment on, see 39 & 40 Vict. c. 77, s. 5.

The master of a ship freighted with goods, which are the subject of depredation by rats, is bound to have cats on board, or he cannot charge the insurer. (2) The instrument with which criminals are flogged in England. [See WHIPPING.] It consists of nine lashes of whipcord tied on to a wooden handle.

Catalla, chattels. The word among the Normans primarily signified only beasts of husbandry, or as they are still called, 'cattle'; but in a secondary sense the term was applied to all moveables in general, and not only to these, but to whatever was not a fief or feud.—1 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 280. See CATALS.

Catalla justè possessa amitti non possunt. Jenk. Cent. 28.—(Chattels justly possessed cannot be lost.)

Catalla reputantur inter minima in lege. Ibid. 52.—(Chattels are considered in law among the least things.)

Catalis captis nomine districtionis, an obsolete writ that lay where a house was within a borough, for rent issuing out of the same, and which warranted the taking of doors, windows, etc., by way of distress.—Old Nat. Bre. 66.

Catalis reddendis, an obsolete writ that lay where goods delivered to a man to keep till a certain day were not upon demand redelivered at the day.—Reg. Orig. 39.

Catals, goods and chattels. See CATALLA.

Catapulta, a warlike engine to shoot darts; a crossbow.

Catascopus, an archdeacon.—Du Cange.

Catching bargain, a purchase from an expectant heir, for an inadequate consideration. See EXPECTANT HEIR.

Catchland. Land in Norfolk, so called because it is not known to what parish it belongs, and the minister who first seizes the tithes of it, by right of pre-occupation, enjoys them for that year.—Cowel.

Catchpole, a sheriff's officer or bailiff, so called.

Categorical, direct; unqualified; unconditional.

Category [fr. κατηγορία, Gk.], a series or order of all the predicates or attributes contained under a genus.

Cathedral [fr. καθέδρα, Gk., a seat], the church of the bishop and head of the diocese, in which is his seat of dignity. The Cathedral Acts are 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, 4 & 5 Vict. c. 39, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 77, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 35, 27 & 28 Vict. c. 70, and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 39; and as to Wales, see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 77.

Our cathedrals and collegiate churches have been divided into four classes:—1st, consisting of thirteen, being the cathedrals of the old foundation, or Ecclesie Cathedralres Canoniarum Secularium; 2nd, consisting of eight conventual cathedrals, constituted with deans and chapters by Hen. VIII.; 3rd, containing the five cathedrals founded, together with new bishoprics, by Hen. VIII.; 4th, the new cathedrals of Ripon and Manchester; and (under 38 & 39 Vict. c. 34, s. 4) St. Albans.

Cathedral preferments, all deaneries, archdeacons, and canonries, and generally all dignities and offices in any cathedral or collegiate church, below the rank of a bishop. Consult Stephens on the Clergy.

Cathedratic, a sum of 2s. paid to the bishop by the inferior clergy; but from its being usually paid at the bishop's synod, or visitation, it is commonly named synodals.—Burn's Dict.

Catholic [fr. καθολικός, Gk.], universal, general. The rise of heretics induced the primitive Italian church to assume to itself the appellation of Catholic, being a characteristic to distinguish itself from all private or particular sects. The Romish church, assuming this claim, distinguishes itself by the name of Catholic, in opposition to all those who have separated from her communion in the eucharist, and whom she considers as heretics and schismatics, and herself only as the true and Christian church. See ROMAN CATHOLIC.—Encyc Lond.

Catholic Emancipation Act, 10 Geo. IV. c. 7. See ROMAN CATHOLIC.

Cattle [derived by Skinner, Menage, and Spelman, fr. capitalia, quæ ad caput pertinent, personal goods; in which sense chattels is yet used. Mandeville uses Catele for price], beasts of pasture, neither wild nor domestic. As for injury to cattle by dogs, see 28 & 29

Vict. c. 60. As to larceny of cattle, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 10, and as to killing cattle, etc., with intent to steal the carcase, skin, or any part of the animal killed, see s. 11. As to the prevention of cattle plague, pleuro pneumonia, and foot and mouth disease, by slaughtering or preventing the movement of infected animals and restricting the importation of foreign cattle, see Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, 1878, 41 & 42 Vict. c. 74, repealing and replacing an act of 1869 having the same title, and itself repealing eight prior acts in pari materia, being 38 Geo. III. c. 65; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 105; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 107; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 62; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 2; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 15; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 110; and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 125. The Act of 1878, like the acts which precede it, and in even greater degree, depends for its effectual working upon orders to be made by the Privy Council from time to time.

Cattle-gate, common for one beast.

Catzurus, a hunting-horse.

Cauda terræ, a land's end, or the bottom of a ridge in arable land.

Caulceis, ways pitched with flint or other stones. See CALCETUM.

Caurcines. Italian money-lenders in England, about the year 1235, who called themselves the Pope's merchants.

Causa causans, the immediate cause; the last link in the chain of causation.

Causa matrimonii prælocuti, a writ which lay where a woman gave lands to a man in fee simple, etc., to the intent he should marry her, and he refused to do so in any reasonable time, being thereunto required.—Reg. Orig. 66. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Causâ mortis (in prospect of death). See DONATIO MORTIS CAUSA.

Causa proxima, the same as Causa causans.

Causa proxima, non remota spectatur. Bac. Max. R. I.—(The immediate, not the remote cause, is to be regarded.)

Causa vaga et incerta non est causa rationalis. 5 Co. 57.—(A vague and uncertain cause is not a reasonable cause.)

Causam nobis significes quare, a writ addressed to a mayor of a town, etc., who was by the king's writ commanded to give seisin of lands to the king's grantee; on his delaying to do it, requiring him to show cause why he so delayed the performance of his duty.

Cause, a suit or action; motive or reason; that which produces an effect.

Cause of action, a right to sue. As to joinder of causes of action see that title.

Cause-list, a printed roll of actions to be tried in the order of their entry, with the names of the solicitor for each litigant.

Causes célèbres, a work containing ports of the decisions of interest and importance in French Courts in the 17th & 18th centuries. The first series, in 22 vols., is by Gayot de Pitival; the second, called the Nouvelles Causes Célèbres, in 15, by Des Essarts. A work called the English Causes Célèbres was commenced; the first volume contained cases of the greatest interest. The word is applied to any English cause of great interest and importance.

Causea [fr. chaussée, Fr., a paved road], a causeway.

Cautio pro expensis, security for costs.

Caution, a species of bail; security.

Cautione admittenda, a writ that lies against a bishop who holds an excommunicated person in prison for contempt, notwithstanding he offers sufficient caution or security to obey the orders and commandment of the church for the future.—Reg. Orig. 66.

Cautioner, a surety.

Cauzi, Cazi, Kazi, a Mahometan official.—Indian. See KAZI.

Caveat (that he take heed), a warning or caution. If a person desired to stop the enrolment of a decree in Chancery, in order to present a petition of appeal to the Lord Chancellor, he entered a caveat with his Lordship's secretary, which prevented the enrolment for twenty-eight days. See APPEAL. It is sometimes entered to prevent the issuing of a lunacy commission. It is also entered to stay the probate of a will, letters of administration, a license of marriage, or an institution of a clerk to a benefice.

Caveat actor, caveat emptor (let the doer—let the purchaser beware).

Caveat emptor, qui ignorare non debuit quod jus alienum emit. Hob. 99.—(Let a purchaser beware; who ought not to be ignorant that he is purchasing the rights of another.)

'If a man,' said Tindal, C. J. (Brown v. Edgington, 2 Scott, N. R. 504), 'purchase goods of a tradesman, without, in any way, relying upon the skill and judgment of the vendor, the latter is not responsible for their turning out contrary to his expectation; but, if the tradesman be informed at the time the order is given of the purpose for which the article is wanted, the buyer relying upon the seller's judgment, the latter impliedly warrants that the thing furnished shall be reasonably fit and proper for the purpose for which it is required.'

Caveat viator. Let the traveller beware. 'Suppose there is an enclosed yard with several dangerous holes in it, and the owner allows the public to go through the yard, does that cast on him any obligation to fill up the Cavendum est à fragmentis. Bac. Aph. 26.

—(Beware of small pieces.)

Cavers, persons stealing ore from mines in Derbyshire, punishable in the berghmote or miners' court; also officers belonging to the same mines.

Cavil, to use a captious argument.

Ceap, a bargain; anything for sale; chattel; also cattle, as being the usual medium of barter. Sometimes used instead of Ceapgild, see next title.

Ceapgild [fr. ceap, Sax., cattle, and gild, payment], payment in cattle, market price.

Cede, to assign or transfer.

Cedent, an assignor.

Celibacy [fr. celibatus, Lat.], an unmarried or single state of life.

Cellerarius, a butler in a monastery; sometimes in universities called manciple or caterer.

Cemetery [fr. κοιμητήριον, Gk., fr. κοιμάω, to set to sleep], a place of burial, differing from a churchyard by its locality and incidents; by its locality, as it is separate and apart from any sacred building used for the performance of Divine service; by its incidents, that inasmuch as no vault or burying-place in an ordinary churchyard can be purchased for a perpetuity, in a cemetery a permanent burial place can be obtained. See The Cemeteries Clauses Act, 1847, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 65, tit. 'Burial.'

Cenegild [fr. cinne, Sax., relation, and gild, payment], an expiatory mulct paid by one who killed another, to the kindred of the deceased.

Cenninga, notice given by a buyer to a seller that the thing sold was claimed by another, in order to appear and justify the sale. —Athel. ap. Brompt. c. iv.

Censaria [fr. cenic, Fr.], a farm or house and land let at standing rent.

Censarii, farmers.—Blount.

Censuales, a species or class of the oblati or voluntary slaves of churches or monasteries, i.e., those who, to procure the protection of the church, bound themselves to pay an annual tax or quit-rent only of their estates to a church or monastery. Besides this, they sometimes engaged to perform certain services. —Potg. de Stat. Serv. l. 1, c. i., ss. 6, 7.

Consumethidus, a dead rent, like that which is called mortmain.—Blount.

Censure [fr. census, Lat.], a custom observed in certain manors in Devon and Cornwall, where all persons above the age of sixteen years are cited to swear fealty to the lord, and to pay 1*ld.* per poll, and 1*ld.* per acre.

after: these thus sworn are called censores. Also a judgment which condemns some book, person, or action, or more particularly a reprimand from a superior.—Surv. Dict. Corn.

Census, a numbering of the people. It takes place in this country once in every ten years. The first was taken in 1801 under 41 Geo. III. c. 15; the subsequent Census Acts were for 1811, 51 Geo. III. c. 6; for 1821, 1 Geo. IV. c. 94; for 1831, 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 30; for 1841, 4 & 5 Vict. c. 7; for 1851, 13 & 14 Vict. c. 53, and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 44 (Ireland); for 1861, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 61 (England), 23 & 24 Vict. c. 62 (Ireland), and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 98 (Scotland); for 1871, 33 & 34 Vict. 107 (England), 33 & 34 Vict. c. 108 (Scotland), and 33 & 34 Vict. c. 80 (Ireland). The last census was taken on 4th April, 1881, under 43 & 44 Vict. c. 37 (England), 43 & 44 Vict. c. 38 (Scotland), and 43 & 44 Vict. c. 28 (Ireland). Under these acts of 1880 the census papers contain 'particulars of the name, sex, age, rank, profession or occupation, condition as to marriage, relation to head of family, and birthplace of every living person who abode in every house on the night of Sunday, the 3rd April, 1881.' The early census acts only got at the numbers, occupations, etc., by a series of questions to overseers, clergymen, etc. The Act of 1840, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 99, was the first to get at the name, etc., of every person in every house.

Population, for a particular purpose, is sometimes expressly directed to be ascertained 'by the last published census for the time being.' See, e.g., Licensing Act, 1872, s. 65.

Census Regalis, the annual revenue (or income) of the Crown.

Centenarii, petty judges, under-sheriffs of counties, that had rule of a hundred, and judged smaller matters among them.—1 Vent. 211.

Centeni, the principal inhabitants of a district composed of different villages, originally in number a hundred, but afterwards only called by that name.

Centralisation. This word is used to express the system of government prevailing in a country where the management of local matters is in the hands of functionaries appointed by the Ministers of State, paid by the State, and in constant communication, and under the constant control and inspiration of the Ministers of State, and where the funds of the State are largely applied to local purposes. Such a system is contrasted with the English, under which a great portion of the affairs of every locality is managed by independent and self-governing institutions, such as municipali ties, and by unpaid magistrates who, although appointed by the Crown and removable for just cause, are comparatively independent of the Ministers of the Crown for the time being, as they are not paid for their services.

Central Criminal Court. This court was erected in 1834, by 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 36, which, reciting that it was expedient, for the more effective and uniform administration of justice in criminal cases, that offences committed in the metropolis, and certain parts adjoining thereto, should be tried by justices and judges of oyer and terminer, and gaol delivery in the city of London, proceeded to constitute a new tribunal, which it entitled 'The Central Criminal Court,' to consist of the lord mayor, the lord chancellor, the judges of the three Superior Courts at Westminster, the judges in bankruptcy, the judges of the admiralty, the dean of the arches, the aldermen, recorder, and common serjeant of London, the judges of the sheriffs' court of the city of London [now 'The City of London Court'], and any person who had, or shall have been lord chancellor, a judge of any of the Superior Courts at Westminster, or who might be thereafter appointed by general commission of the queen. To this court Her Majesty may issue commissions of oyer and terminer, and gaol delivery, for the trial of all cases of treasons, murders, felonies, and misdemeanours committed within the city of London and county of Middlesex, and in certain specified parts of the counties of Essex, Kent, and Surrey, all of which constitute a district which is to be, for the purposes of that act, deemed and taken to be one county, and also commissions of gaol delivery to deliver the gaol of Newgate of the prisoners therein charged with any of the offences aforesaid. The court sits at the sessions house in the Old Bailey; and there are usually twelve sessions held in every year, at times fixed by any eight of the judges at Westminster. Two provisions in this statute, and also several subsequent statutes, greatly augmented the jurisdiction of this tribunal, by first curtailing that of the courts of quarter sessions within the district assigned to the Central Criminal Court, and restraining them from trying nearly all the serious kinds of felony (4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 36, s. 17); and by transferring to it the entire criminal jurisdiction of the Court of Admiralty (s. 22), following up, in 1837, by 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. cc. 84—89, by the operation of which all the serious offences punishable under them, if committed within the jurisdiction of the Admiralty, may be, and have ever since been, tried at the Central Criminal Court. Two of the judges usually attend each session for the purpose of trying the more important offences. All the judges of the High Court of Justice, except such as were appointed before the Jud. Act, 1873, and were not liable then to serve (s. 11), may be in the commission for the Central Criminal Court. The less important offences are tried by either the recorder or common serjeant or the judge of the City of London Court; on every occasion the lord mayor or some of the aldermen being also present on the bench. See 9 & 10 Vict. c. 24; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55; and as to removal into this court of indictments for offences committed out of the jurisdiction, see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 16.

Central Office of Supreme Court. Established by Jud. (Officers) Act, 1879, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 78.

Ceola, a large ship.—Blount.

Cepi corpus et paratum habeo (I have taken the body and have it ready), a return made by the sheriff upon an attachment, capias, etc., when he has the person, against whom the process was issued, in custody.—F. N. B. 26.

Cepit in alio loco, a plea in replevin, when the defendant took the goods in another place than that mentioned in the declaration.—Woodf. L. & T., 10th ed., 822.

Ceppagium, the stumps or roots of trees which remain in the ground after the trees are felled.—Fleta, c. xli.

Ceragram, a payment to find candles in the church.—Blount.

Certa debet esse intentio, et narratio, et certum fundamentum, et certa res quæ deducitur in iudicium. (The design and narration ought to be certain, and the foundation certain, and the matter certain, which is brought into Court to be tried.)—Co. Lit. 303a.

Certainty, truth, fact. This word is technically used in pleading in two different senses, signifying either distinctness or particularity, as opposed to undue generality.

Certificando de recognitione stapulæ, a writ commanding the mayor of the staple to certify to the Lord Chancellor a statute-staple taken before him where the party himself detains it, and refuses to bring in the same. There is a like writ to certify a statute-merchant, and in divers other cases.—Reg. Orig. 148, 151, 152.

Certificate, a testimony given in writing to declare or verify the truth of anything.

(2) Trial by certificate.—As to the kind of issue upon which this trial might occur, see 3 Bl. Com. 333. One of the most important of these was the issue ne unques accouple en loial matrimonie. This arose in the action of dower, in which the tenant might plead in bar that the defendant 'was never ac-coupled to her alleged husband in lawful matrimony.'

As to a chief clerk's certificate in Chancery, consult 2 Dan. Ch. Pr., 4th ed., 1237—48.

As to a magistrate's certificate of the dismissal of a charge, see 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 14; and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 44 (applicable to assault).

As to a certificate of qualification as an apothecary, see 55 Geo. III. c. 194, and 6 Geo. IV. c. 133.

As to a certificate of medical men in lunacy, see 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 96.

As to a certificate of dissenting places of worship, see 1 Wm. & M. Sess. 1, c. 18; 52 Geo. III. c. 155; 31 Geo. III. c. 32; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 115; 9 & 10 Vict. c. 59; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 36; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 81; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 119, ss. 17 & 24.

As to certificates for costs, see 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 5, which is applied to all actions commenced or pending in the High Court of Justice, in which any relief is sought which can be given in a County Court. Jud. Act, 1873, s. 67. As to when costs follow the event see COSTS.

As to when certificates and examined copies are admissible in evidence, consult Taylor on Evidence, s. 1441 et seq.; and Biddle's Table of References to the Statutes, voce, 'Certified and Examined Copies.'

Certificates in the Customs. No goods can be exported by certificate, except foreign goods formerly imported, on which the whole or a part of the customs paid on importation is to be drawn back.

Certification, in Scotch judicial procedure, is the assurance given to a party of the course to be followed in case he does not appear or obey the order of the Court.—Bell's Dict.

Certification of assize, a writ anciently granted for the re-examining or re-trial of a matter passed by assize before justices, now entirely superseded by the remedy afforded by means of a new trial.

Certified Copy. As to when admissible in evidence, see Taylor on Evidence, ss. 1391, 1440 et seq., and Biddle's Table of References to the Statutes, voce 'Certified and Examined Copies.'

Certiorari (to be more fully informed of), an original writ issuing out of the Crown side of the Court of Queen's Bench (now the Queen's Bench division of the High Court of Justice) in criminal cases, addressed, in the Queen's name, to the judges or the officers of inferior courts, commanding them to certify or to return the records of a cause depending before them, to the end the party may have the more sure and speedy justice, before such justices as shall be assigned to determine the cause.—F. N. B. 145, 242, 245.

Certiorari lies to remove into the Queen's Bench, which is the sovereign ordinary court of justice in criminal causes, all indictments, coroners' inquisitions, summary convictions by magistrates, orders of removal of paupers, and of poor's rates, also orders made by the poor law commissioners, commissioners of sewers, tithe commissioners, town councils, and railway companies, for the purpose of being examined and 'quashed,' if contrary to law. A certiorari is frequently granted, either (1) to consider and determine the validity of indictments, and the proceedings thereon, and to quash or confirm them as there is cause; (2) where it is surmised that a partial or insufficient trial will probably be had in the Court below, the indictment is removed in order to have the person against whom it is found tried at the bar of the Queen's Bench; or before the justices of Nisi Prius; or (3) it is so removed in order to plead the royal pardon there. The writ may be granted either at the instance of the prosecutor or the defendant. A prosecutor was formerly entitled to a writ of certiorari as a matter of right, but a defendant could only obtain it by express leave of the Court, and upon his entering into recognisances; but to prevent abuses, by the wanton and improvident application for it, the 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 33, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, s. 5, provide that a prosecutor must obtain the previous leave of the Court to issue it, and enter into recognisances. And see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 16; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 12.

An appeal does not lie unless it be expressly given by statute, but certiorari always lies unless it be expressly taken away by statute, and special clauses in modern statutes have frequently taken it away. See, e.g., Public Health Act, 1875, s. 262; Railways Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, s. 156; but even such clauses do not apply to cases where a decision is impeached for substantial want of jurisdiction (Reg. v. Cheltenham Commissioners, 1 Q. B. 467).

A certiorari to remove a conviction or order made by justices of the peace must be applied for within six months (13 Geo. II. c. 18).

The removal of County Court actions by certiorari is regulated by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 90; or if the claim do not exceed 5*l.*, by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 38.

Certiorari, bill of, an original bill praying relief. It was filed for the purpose of removing a suit pending in some inferior court of equity into the Court of Chancery, on account of some alleged incompetency of the inferior court, or some hardship in its proceedings.—Stor. Eq. Pl. 356; and 2 Dan. Ch. Prac., 4th ed., 1435.

It would appear that similar relief may now be obtained by an action in the Chancery Division of the High Court. See Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34.

Cert Money, quasi certain money. Head-money paid yearly by the residents of several manors to the lords thereof, for the certain keeping of the leet, and sometimes to the hundred. It is called certum letæ in ancient records.

Certum est quod certum reddi potest. 9 Co. 47.—(That is certain which can be rendered certain.) See illustrations of this maxim in Broom's Legal Maxims.

Cerura, a mound, fence, or inclosure.

Cervisarii [fr. cerevisia, ale], tenants who paid a duty called by the Saxons drinclean, i.e., retributio potus.—Domesday.

Cess [fr. asseoir, Fr., to fix], an assessment, or tax. In Ireland, it was anciently applied to an exaction of victuals, at a certain rate, for soldiers in garrison. Antiq. Hibern.

Cessa regnare, si non vis judicare. Hob. 155.—(Cease to reign, if you wish not to adjudicate.)

Cessante causâ, cessat effectus. Wing. 29.—(The cause ceasing, the effect ceases.)

Cessante primitivo, cessat derivativus.—(The primitive ceasing, the derivative ceases.)

Cessante ratione legis, cessat ipsa lex. Co. Litt. 70.—(The reason of the law ceasing, the law itself ceases.)

This maxim may be thus illustrated:—Where a contract, not under seal, is made with an agent in his own name, for an undisclosed principal, and on which, therefore, either the agent or principal may sue, the defendant, as against the latter, is entitled to be placed in the same situation at the time of the disclosure of the real principal, as if the agent dealing in his own name had been in reality the principal, and this rule is to prevent the hardship under which a purchaser would labour, if after having been induced by peculiar considerations—such, for instance, as the consciousness of possessing a set-off—to deal with one man, he could be turned over and made liable to another, to whom those considerations would not apply, and with whom he would not willingly have contracted.—Broom's Maxims.

Cessante statu primitivo, cessat derivativus. 8 Rep. 34.—(The original state ceasing, the derivative ceases.)

Cessavit, a writ which lay (by the Statute of Gloucester, 6 Edw. I. c. 4, and Westminster 2, 13 Edw. I. c. 21) when a man who held lands by rent or other service, neglected or ceased to perform his services, for two years together, or where a religious house had lands given to it, on condition of performing some certain spiritual services, as reading prayers, giving alms, etc., and neglected it; in either of which cases, if the cesser or neglect had continued for two years, the lord, or donor, and his heirs, had a writ of cessavit to recover the land itself.—F. N. B. 208. This writ was abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Cesser, proviso for. Where terms for years are raised by settlement, it is usual to introduce a proviso that they shall cease when the trusts end. This proviso generally expresses three events:—(1) the trusts never arising; (2) their becoming unnecessary or incapable of taking effect; (3) the performance of them.—Sug. V. & P., 14th ed., 621—3.

Cesset executio (let execution stay). Where defendants plead severally, if they be found guilty of the same trespass, the damages cannot be severed, but the jury who try the first issue shall assess damages against all; and there shall be a cesset executio until the other issues are tried, when the other defendants, if found guilty, shall be contributory to those damages.—11 Co. 6 a, 7 a.

Cesset processus, a stay of proceedings entered on the record.

Cessio bonorum (a surrender of goods). By the Roman law a cessio bonorum of the debtor was not a discharge of the debt, unless the property ceded was sufficient for that purpose. It otherwise operated only as a discharge pro tanto, and exonerated the debtor from imprisonment. Huberus informs us, that in Holland a cessio bonorum does not even exempt from imprisonment, unless the creditors assent; and Heineccius proclaims the same as the law of some parts of Germany. The Scottish law conforms to the Roman code in its leading outlines, and the modern code of France adopts the same system.—Story's Conflict of Laws, 492; and see 2 Br. & Had. Com. 623.

Cessio in jure, a fictitious suit, in which the person who was to acquire the thing claimed (vindicabat) the thing as his own, the person who was to transfer it acknowledged the justice of the claim, and the magistrate pronounced it to be the property (addicebat) of the claimant.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 89, 122.

Cession, a ceasing, yielding up, or giving over. By 21 Hen. VIII. c. 13 (repealed by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106), if any one having a benefice of 8l. per annum, or upwards, accepted any other, the first was adjudged void, unless he obtained a dispensation. A vacancy thus made, for want of a dispensation, was called cession.—1 Bl. Com. 392. See PLURALITY.

Cessionary Bankrupt, one who gave up his estate to be divided amongst his creditors.

Cessment, an assessment, or tax.

Cessor, he who ceases or neglects so long to perform a duty that he thereby incurs the danger of the law.—Old Nat. Br. 136.

Cessure or Cessor, ceasing, giving over, departing from.

C'est le crime qui fait la honte, et non pas l'echafaud.—(It is the offence which produces shame, and not the scaffold).

Cestui que trust, the person who possesses the equitable right to property and receives the rents, issues, and profits thereof, the legal estate of which is vested in a trustee. There is such a confidence between the cestui que trust and his trustee, that no action at law would lie between them (except where the trustee admitted that he had in his possession money belonging to the cestui que trust, in which case an action lay against the trustee), but resort must have been had to a Court of Equity. Now an action will be brought in the Chancery Division of the High Court. (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34 (3).)

The phrase, cestui que trust, is Norman French. In the Roman law the trustee was commonly called Herēs Fiduciarius; and the cestui que trust, Herēs Fidei Commissarius. Mr. Justice Story prefers Fide commissary, as at least equally within the analogy of the English language. But the term 'Beneficiary' has not as yet acquired any general use in a different sense, and is gradually coming into use.

No claim of a cestui que trust against his trustee for property held on express trusts or in respect of any breach of such trust shall be held to be barred by any statute of limitations (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 25 (2).)

Cestui que use, in old law tracts cestui à que use. Previously to the Statute 27 Hen. VIII. c. 10 (usually called the Statute of Uses), the use was an equitable or beneficial interest enjoyed by the cestui que use, distinct from the legal property in the land, which was held by the feoffee to uses. The Statute of Uses destroyed the intervening estate of the feoffee to uses, and transferred the possession to the cestui que use, converting his equitable or beneficial interest into a legal estate; thus the use and possession being incorporated, the separate existence of the use is virtually extinguished, and he, who was called the cestui que use before the statute, is now to all intents and purposes the legal owner, the use being executed in him. Thus a conveyance transmuting the possession to A. to the use of B., A.'s estate (feoffee to uses) is destroyed by the statute, the possession is given by B. (cestui que use), in whom the legal estate is vested.—Consult 2 Br. & Had. Com. 525 et seq.

Cestui que vie, the person for whose life any lands, tenements, or hereditaments are held.—See Cestui que vie Production Act, 6 Anne, c. 18.

Chacea, a station of game, more extended than a park, and less than a forest; also the liberty of chasing or hunting within a certain district; also the way through which cattle are driven to pasture, otherwise called a drove-way.—Blount; Bract. 1, 4, c. xlv.

Chasea est ad communem legem. Reg. Br. 806.—(A chase is by common law.)

Chaceare, ad lapores vel vulpes. To hunt hares or foxes.—Cart. Abb. Glast. MS. 87.

Chacurus [fr. chasseur, Fr.], a horse for the chase, or a hound, dog, or courser.

Chaffery, traffic; the practice of buying and selling.

Chaffwax, an officer in Chancery, who fitted the wax to seal writs, commissions, and other instruments. The office was abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 23.

Chain, an engineer's measure of 22 yards length.

Chain Cables. See ANCHORS.

Chairman of Committees of the whole House. In the Commons, this officer, always a member, is elected by the House on the assembling of every new parliament. When the House is in committee on bills introduced by the Government, or in committee of ways and means, or supply, or in committee to consider preliminary resolutions, it is his duty to preside; he sits, not in the Speaker's chair, but at the table in the seat of the clerk of the House. On divisions, when the numbers happen to be equal, he gives the casting-vote, but in committees he never otherwise votes. In August, 1853, it was, by a resolution of the House, decided that during the unavoidable absence of the Speaker, this officer should preside in his stead, being only so appointed, however, from day to day. See 18 & 19 Vict. c. 84. In the Lords the Chairman of Committees of the whole House is elected by the House every session; he usually holds in addition the office of Deputy Speaker of the House of Lords.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Chaldron, Chaldern, or Chalder, twelve sacks of coals, each holding three bushels, weighing about a ton and a half. In Wales they reckon twelve barrels or pitchers a ton or chaldron, and 29 cwt. of 120 lbs. to the ton.

Chalking, or Caulking, stopping the seams in a ship or a vessel.—Rot. Parl., 50 Edw. III.

Challenge [fr. challenger, O. Fr., to accuse of], an exception taken either against things or jurors.

In civil actions, when a full jury appear, either party may challenge them for cause, as well the talesmen as the jurors originally returned. Challenges are of two kinds: (1) to the array; (2) to the polls, and each of these is again subdivided into principal challenges, and challenges to the favour.

(1) A challenge to the array is an exception to all the jurors returned by the sheriff collectively, not for any defect in them, but for some partiality or default in the sheriff or his under officer who arrayed the panel; this is either (a) a principal challenge, as that the sheriff or other returning officer is of kindred or affinity to the plaintiff or defendant, if the affinity continue; that one or more of the jury are returned at the nomination of the plaintiff or defendant; that an action of battery is pending at the suit of the plaintiff or defendant against the sheriff, or at the suit of the sheriff against the plaintiff or defendant; that an action of debt is pending at the suit of the plaintiff or defendant against the sheriff, but not if by the sheriff against the plaintiff or defendant; that the sheriff or returning officer holds land depending upon the same title with that in litigation between the parties; that the sheriff, etc., is under the distress of the plaintiff or defendant; that the sheriff, etc., is counsel, attorney, officer, servant, or gossip of either party, or is an arbitrator in the same matter, and has treated thereof. (β) A challenge for favour, being such as implies at least a probability of bias or partiality in the sheriff, but does not amount to a principal challenge, as that the plaintiff or defendant is tenant to the sheriff, or that the parties are connected by marriage, etc. It seems very doubtful if the array in special jury cases can be challenged. Challenges to the array are, however, seldom resorted to, since for the causes above named, the jury-processes may be directed to the coroner, or they would be grounds for a new trial.

(2) A challenge to the polls, which is an exception to one or more of the jurors who have appeared individually: Either (a) a principal challenge, which may be subdivided into (a) challenge propter honoris respectum, as, if a lord of parliament be called, he may challenge himself or he may have his writ of privilege, but it is doubtful if either party can challenge him. 6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 2; (b) challenge propter defectum, that the juror is not qualified, or if a woman be impanelled she may be challenged propter defectum sexus, unless it be on a writ de ventre inspiciendo; (c) challenge propter affectum, by reason of some supposed bias or partiality; (d) challenge propter delictum, when for some act of the juror, he has ceased to be, in consideration of law, probus et legalis homo. (β) A challenge to the polls for favour is of the same nature with the principal challenge propter affectum, but of an inferior degree.

No challenge can be made before a full jury have appeared; a challenge to the polls is made ore tenus, that to the array in writing.

The trial of challenges to the array is entirely in the discretion of the Court, sometimes they are tried by two of the coroners, sometimes by two of the jury, sometimes by the Court itself. Challenges to the polls, if to the favour, are tried by two jurors, who have been sworn; if two have not been sworn, the Court appoints two indifferent persons to try them, thence called triers, who are superseded as soon as two jurors are sworn; a principal challenge to the polls is tried by the Court itself.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. by Pren., 12th ed., 382, 433.

In criminal cases, challenges may be made, either on the part of the Crown, or on that of the prisoner, and either to the whole array, or to the separate polls for the very same reasons that they may be made in civil cases. In capital cases, the prisoner, in favorem vite is allowed an arbitrary and capricious species of challenge, without showing any cause at all, limited, in cases of treason to thirty-five, and in felonies to twenty.—22 Hen. VIII. c. 14; 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 3. See Archbold's Criminal Pleading.

Challenges to fight, either by word or letter, or to be the bearer of such challenges, are misdemeanours, punishable by fine and imprisonment.—4 Br. & Had. Com. 173.

Chamber, the place where certain assemblies are held; also the assemblies themselves.

Chamber Clerks, of the Judges.—As to their positions since the coming into force of the Judicature Acts, see Jud. Act, 1873, s. 79, amended by Jud. Act, 1875, s. 35.

Chamber of Commerce, an assembly of merchants and traders, where affairs relating to trade are treated of. There are establishments of this sort in most of the chief cities in France; and, in this country, chambers of this kind have been established.

Chamberdekins, or Chamber-Deacons, certain poor Irish scholars, clothed in mean habit, and living under no rule; also beggars banished from England, 1 Hen. V. cc. 7 & 8.

Chamberlain [fr. chambellan, Fr., custos cubiculi, or cubicularius, Lat.], a person who has the management or direction of a chamber or chambers. It is variously used in our laws, statutes, and chronicles. Among the most important are (1) The Lord Chamberlain of Great Britain, the sixth high officer of the Crown, to whom belongs the government of the palace at Westminster, and upon solemn occasions are delivered the keys of Westminster Hall; he disposes of the Sword of State, to be carried before the Queen when she comes to Parliament, and goes on the right hand side, next to the Queen's person; he has the care of providing all things in the House of Lords during its session; and the gentleman usher of the black rod, yeoman usher, etc., are under his authority. As to his power of licensing theatres in the metropolis, see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 68, and THEATRE. The office is hereditary. (2) The Lord Chamberlain of the Household; he has the oversight and direction of all officers belonging to the Queen's chambers, except the precincts of the bedchamber. (3) The Chamberlain of London; who keeps the city money, presides over the affairs of the citizens and their apprentices, etc.

Chambers fr. chambre, Fr.; camera, Lat., καμάρα, Gk.], a vault or arched roof, place with an arched roof. The rooms or apartments belonging to the Inns of Court are so called. Also the rooms in which the judges of the Supreme Court sit for the dispatch of summary business.

Chambers, Judges', are quasi-private rooms, in which the judges dispose of points of practice and other matters not sufficiently important to be heard and argued in Court. See SUMMONS, ORDER.

The jurisdiction of a judge at chambers depends partly on Statute and partly on the Common Law. An appeal lies to a Divisional Court or to a judge sitting in Court according to the practice of the Division of the High Court to which the matter in question is assigned (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 50). By Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. LIV., the masters in the Queen's Bench Division, and the Registrars in the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division may exercise the jurisdiction of a judge in chambers (subject to appeal to a judge), except in matters relating to crime or to the liberty of the subject, and certain other matters set out in the above Order as amended by Rule 2 b. thereof. An appeal lies from a master to a judge at chambers by summons within four days; and from a master or judge to a Divisional Court by motion within eight days.

Chambers of the king [Regie camera]. The exclusive territorial jurisdiction of the British Crown over the inclosed parts of the sea along the coasts of the island of Great Britain has immemorially extended to those bays called the King's chambers; that is, portions of the sea cut off by lines drawn from one promontory to another.—Wheat. Internat. Law, 234.

Chambre peinte, anciently St. Edward's Chamber, called the Painted Chamber, destroyed by fire with the Houses of Parliament.

Champart, field rent; champerty.

Champarty, or Champerty [fr. champ parti, Fr.; campi partitio, Lat., a division of the land, etc.], properly a bargain between a plaintiff or defendant in a suit and a third person, campum partire, to divide between them the land or other matter sued for, in the event of the litigant being successful in the suit; whereupon the champertor is to carry on the party's suit or action at his own expense; or it is the purchasing the right of action, or suit of another person; illegal by common law, and also by 3 Edw. I. c. 25; 13 Edw. I. st. 1, c. 49, and 32 Hen. VIII. c. 9. See Hutley v. Hutley, L. R. 8 Q. B. 112; in re Attorneys' and Solicitors' Act, 1870, 1 Ch. D. 573.

Champertors, persons who move pleas or suits, or cause them to be moved, either by their own procurement, or by others, and sue them at their proper costs, in order to have part of the land in variance, or part of the gain.—33 Edw. I. c. 2.

Champion, a person who fights a combat in his own cause, or in place of another.—Bract. l. 3, tr. 2, c. 21; 3 Bl. Com. 339.

Champion of the king or queen, an ancient officer, whose duty it was to ride armed cap-à-piè, into Westminster Hall at the coronation, while the king was at dinner, and by the proclamation of a herald, make a challenge, 'that if any man shall deny the king's title to the crown, he is there ready to defend it in single combat.' The king drank to him, and sent him a gilt cup covered, full of wine, which the champion drank, retaining the cup for his fee. This ceremony, long discontinued, was revived at the coronation of George IV., but not afterwards.

Chance, misfortune, accident, deficiency of will. Where a man commits an unlawful act by misfortune and chance, and not by design, his will not co-operating with the deed, such act wants one main ingredient of a crime. If an accidental mischief should follow from the performance of a lawful act, the party stands excused from all guilt; but if the act be felonious, and a consequence ensues not foreseen or intended, as the death of a man, or the like, his want of foresight shall be no excuse, for, being guilty of one offence, in doing antecedently what is in itself unlawful, he is criminally guilty of whatever consequence may follow.

But a very important distinction is made in such cases, viz., whether the unlawful act is also in its original nature wrong and mischievous; for a person is not answerable for the incidental consequences of an unlawful act, which is merely malum prohibitum; as, where any unfortunate accident happens from an unqualified person being in pursuit of game he is amenable only to the same extent as a man duly qualified.—Post. 259; 1 Hale's P.C. 475.

Chancel, the part of a church in which the communion table stands; it belongs to the rector or the impropiator.—2 Br. & Had. Com. 420.

Chancellor, the Lord High [fr. cancello, Lat., to cancel], the highest judicial functionary in the kingdom, and superior, in point of precedency, to every temporal lord. He is appointed by the delivery of the Queen's great seal into his custody. He may not be a Roman Catholic (10 Geo. IV. c. 7, s. 12). He is a cabinet minister, a privy counsellor, and prolocutor of the House of Lords by prescription (but not necessarily, though usually, a peer of the realm), and vacates his office with the ministry by which he was appointed. When royal commissions are issued for opening the session, for giving the royal assent to bills, or for proroguing parliament, the Lord Chancellor is always one of the commissioners, and reads the royal speech on the occasion. To him belongs the appointment of all justices of the peace throughout the kingdom. Being, in the earlier periods of our history, usually an ecclesiastic (for none else were then capable of an office so conversant in writings), and presiding over the royal chapel, he became keeper of the Sovereign's conscience, visitor, in right of the Crown, of the hospitals and colleges of royal foundation, and patron of all the Crown livings under the value of twenty marks per annum in the King's books. He is the general guardian of all infants, idiots, and lunatics, and has the general superintendence of all charitable uses—and all this, over and above the vast and extensive jurisdiction which he exercises in his judicial capacity in the Supreme Court of Judicature, of which he is the head. See CHANCERY, SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE.—3 Bl. Com. 47, and 3 Br. & Had. Com. 27—33. There is also a Lord High Chancellor of Ireland; but the Chancellorship of Scotland was abolished at the Union.

Chancellor of a cathedral, one of the quatuor personæ, or four chief dignitaries of the Cathedrals of the Old Foundation. The duties assigned to the office by the statutes of the different chapters vary; but they are chiefly of an educational character, with special reference to cultivation of theology.

Chancellor of a diocese, or of a bishop, a law officer, appointed to hold the Bishop's Court in his diocese, and to adjudicate upon matters of ecclesiastical law. He is the vicar-general of the bishop, and must be a Doctor of Civil Law, so created in some university.—37 Hen. VIII. c. 17.

Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, an officer before whom, or his deputy, the Court of the Duchy Chamber of Lancaster is held. This is a special jurisdiction concerning all matters of equity relating to lands held of the Crown in right of the Duchy of Lancaster; which is a thing very distinct from the county palatine (which has also its separate chancery for sealing of writs or the like), and comprises much territory lying at a vast distance from it, as particularly a very large district surrounded by the city of Westminster. The proceedings in this Court are the same as were those in the High Court of Chancery; so that it seems not to be a court of record, and indeed it has been holden that the Court of Chancery had a concurrent jurisdiction with the Duchy Court, and might take cognisance of the same causes. The jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery as a Court of Appeal from the Duchy Court of Lancaster is now transferred to the Court of Appeal (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 18.)—3 Bl. Com. 78. See COUNTY PALATINE.

Chancellor of the Exchequer, a Minister of State, who is entitled to precedence in the Court of Exchequer, and takes care of the interests of the Crown in addition to his other parliamentary duties. He has also authority in matters relating to the finance of the State.—25 Hen. VIII. c. 16; 33 Hen. VIII. c. 39.

Chancellor of the Order of the Garter, and other military orders, an officer who seals the commissions and the mandates of the chapter and assembly of the knights; keeps the register of their proceedings, and delivers their acts under the seal of their order.—Stow's Annals, 706.

Chancellor of the two Universities, the president of those bodies, the office being honorary.

The Chancellors' Courts in the two Universities enjoy the sole jurisdiction, in exclusion of the Queen's Courts, when a scholar or privileged person is one of the parties, over all civil actions and suits whatsoever, excepting where a right of freehold is concerned, and of all injuries and trespasses against the peace, mayhem and felony excepted (Brown v. Renouard, 12 East, 13; Thornton v. Ford, 15 East, 635; and these, by the University charter, they are at liberty to try and determine, either according to the Common Law of the land, or according to their own local customs, at their discretion. The judge of the Chancellor's Court at Oxford is the Vice-Chancellor, who is deputy or assessor. By 17 & 18 Vict. c. 81, s. 45, the Court of the Vice-Chancellor of Oxford is now governed by the Common and Statute Law of the realm, and no longer by the rules of the Civil Law. And see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 36; 19 & 20 Vict. cc. 31 & 95; and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 25. As to Cambridge, the right of the University, or any member thereof, to claim consanguinity of any action or criminal proceeding wherein any person who is not a member of the University is a party, has ceased.—19 & 20 Vict. c. 17, s. 18, and see c. 88.

Chance-medley [fr. chaude meslée, Fr.; fr. chaud, hot, and meslée, fray, mesler, meler, to mingle, mescolare, It. When the element chaud lost its meaning to ordinary English ears, it was replaced by chance, in accordance with the meaning of the compound.—Wedg.], a casual affray. Such killing of a person as happens either in self-defence on a sudden quarrel, or in the commission of an unlawful act, without any deliberate intention of doing any mischief.—1 Hawk. P. C. c. xxx. s. 1. It is sometimes termed chaud-medley, which more properly signifies an affray in the heat of blood or passion.

It is frequently difficult to distinguish this species of homicide, upon chance-medley in self-defence, from that of manslaughter in the proper legal sense of the word. But the true criterion between them seems to be this: When both parties are actually combating at the time when the mortal stroke is given, the slayer is then guilty of manslaughter; but if the slayer has not begun to fight, or, having begun, endeavours to decline any further struggle, and afterwards, being closely pressed by his antagonist, kills him to avoid his own destruction, this is homicide, excusable by self-defence. For which reason the law requires that the person who kills another in his own defence should have retreated as far as he conveniently or safely can to avoid the violence of the assault before he turns upon his assailant, and that not fictitiously, or in order to watch his opportunity, but from a real tenderness of shedding another's blood. The Civil Law, in this respect, goes further than ours—'qui cum aliter tueri se non possunt, damni culpam dederint, innoxii sunt.' (Those who, when they cannot otherwise defend themselves, destroy their assailants, are innocent.)—Bl. Com. 184; 4 Br. & Had. Com. 216.

Chancery. [fr. cancelli, cancellarii, Lat.;

chancellerie, Fr.] The Court of Chancery was the highest court of Judicature in this kingdom next to parliament.

For some purposes it may still be said to exist as an Independent Court; but as a Court of Justice its powers and jurisdiction are now transferred to (1) The High Court of Justice, and (2) The Court of Appeal (Jud. Act, 1873, ss. 16—18).

(I.) There is now by the Judicature Act, 1873, a division of the High Court of Justice called the Chancery Division. The judges of this division at present are the Lord Chancellor, who is President of the Division, the Master of the Rolls, and the Vice-Chancellors of the former Court of Chancery (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 31, subd. 1). To this Division are assigned (1) matters in which the Court of Chancery had exclusive statutory jurisdiction (except County Court appeals), and (2) causes and matters for the administration of estates of deceased persons, dissolution of partnerships, or taking of partnership or other accounts; redemption and foreclosure of mortgages, raising of portions or other changes on land; sale and distribution of proceeds of property subject to a lien or charge; execution of trusts, charitable or private; rectification, setting aside, or cancelling deeds or other written instruments; specific performance of contracts between vendors and purchasers of real estates, including contracts for leases; partition or sale of real estates; wardship of infants and care of their estates.

(II.) The powers and jurisdiction of the Court of Appeal in Chancery, formerly consisting of the Lord Chancellor and Lords Justices of Appeal in Chancery, are now transferred to the Court of Appeal (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 18, subd. 1). See APPEAL, COURT OF. But the jurisdiction of the Lords Justices in respect of lunatics is vested in the existing Lords Justices so long as they remain judges of the Court of Appeal, and afterwards is to be vested in such judges of the High Court or the Court of Appeal as the Crown shall appoint. (Jud. Act, 1875, s. 7).

The Courts of Chancery were either superior or inferior. The superior was called the High Court of Chancery, consisting of six separate tribunals which ranked in the following order:—

(1) The Court of the Lord High Chancellor of Great Britain, whose name has given to these courts their appellation.

(2) The Court of the Master of the Rolls, so called from his being the Keeper of the Records of Chancery.

(3) The Court of the two Lords Justices of Appeal appointed by letters-patent, pursuant to 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83, and having precedence next after the Lord Chief Baron of the Court of Exchequer.

The Lord Chancellor, together with these Judges, formed the Court of Appeal in Chancery, which court exercised and performed the ministerial, judicial, and statutory powers, authorities, and duties thereto possessed by the Lord Chancellor as a judge in his own Court of Chancery. It also exercised the appellate jurisdiction in Bankruptcy, pursuant to the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 71.

This Court was constituted by one of the Lords Justices and the Lord Chancellor sitting together; or by the two Lords Justices sitting apart from the Lord Chancellor, who, while sitting alone or apart from the Lords Justices, exercised the same powers as though this Court of Appeal had not been established. The Lord Chancellor regulated the sittings and business of this Court.

(4, 5, and 6) The separate Courts of the three Vice-Chancellors.

The inferior Courts of Chancery as Courts of first instance retain their jurisdiction; they are the Equity Courts of the Palatine Counties of Durham and Lancaster; the Courts of the two Universities (Oxford and Cambridge); the Lord Mayor's Court in the City of London; the Court of Chancery in the Isle of Man, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27; and the County Courts by 28 & 29 Vict. c. 99. See COUNTY COURTS.

The practice of this Court was regulated by various acts of parliament, among which the most important are the 13 & 14 Vict. c. 35, 14 & 15 Vict. c. 83, 15 & 16 Vict. cc. 86, 87, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 78 and 98.—Consult Daniell's Chanc. Prac.

The practice of the Chancery Division of the High Court is now regulated by the Judicature Acts, 1873 and 1875, and the rules annexed to the latter act. See the various titles relating to Practice and Procedure.

As to the investment of money paid into the Court of Chancery, see 35 & 36 Vict. c. 44, and Jud. Act, 1873, s. 30.

Chancery Common Law Seal, for the sealing of writs, etc., out of the Petty Bag Office.—12 & 13 Vict. c. 109, ss. 11, 14. See now the 37 & 38 Vict. c. 81, s. 5.

Chancery Court of York. See 37 & 38 Vict. c. 85, s. 7, and ARCHES COURT.

Chancery (Great Seal [Offices] Abolition Act). See 37 & 38 Vict. c. 81.

Chancery Regulation Act, 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 42, for England, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 47, for Ireland.

Chandala, the most degraded Hindoo caste.

Changer, or Chaunger, an officer belonging to the mint, who exchanges coin for bullion brought in by merchants or others.—6 Hen. II. c. 12.

Changing of Solicitor. No attorney can be changed without the order of a judge (Reg. Gen. II. T. 1853, r. 4). The order is usually made on payment of the solicitor's bill of costs. See SOLICITOR.

Chanter. The chief singer in the choir of a cathedral. Mentioned in 13 Eliz. c. 10.

Chantry, or Chantry [fr. cantaria, Lat.], a little church, chapel, or particular altar, endowed with lands, or other revenues, for the maintenance of priests, to sing mass, etc., for the souls of the donors, etc. See 1 Edw. VI. c. 14, abolishing them.

Chapel [fr. capella, Lat., chapelle, Fr.], a building either adjoining to a church, for performing divine service, or separate from the mother-church, where the parish is large, and then called a chapel of ease, for the accommodation of those parishioners who dwell at a distance from the parish church. These may be parochial, and have a right to sacraments and burials, and to a distinct minister, by custom, though subject in some respects to the mother-church.—2 Inst. 363.

In an act of parliament 'chapel' means a Church of England chapel only, unless words be used as in the Parliamentary Registration Act, 1843, 6 Vict. c. 18, s. 23, showing that places of worship which do not belong to the Established Church are to be included.

Chapelry, the precincts and limits of a chapel.

Chaperon, a hood or bonnet anciently worn by the knights of the garter, as part of the habit of that noble order; also a little escutcheon fixed in the forehead of horses drawing a hearse at a funeral.

Chapitre [fr. capitula, Lat., chapters of a book], a summary of matters to be inquired of or presented before justices in eyre, justices of assize, or the peace, in their sessions. Also articles delivered by the justice in his charge to the inquest.—Britton, c. iii.

Chaplain [fr. capellanus, Lat.], an ecclesiastic who performs divine service in a chapel; but it more commonly means one who attends upon a king, prince, or other person of quality, for the performance of clerical duties in a private chapel.—4 Rep. 90.

Chaplain of the Queen's Prison. He is appointed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department during pleasure. See 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22, s. 22.

Chapman [fr. ceapman, Sax.], a cheapener, one that offers as a purchaser; also a seller.—Webster.

Chapter [fr. capitulum, Lat.], a congregation of ecclesiastical persons in a cathedral church, consisting of canons, or prebendaries, whereof the dean is the head, all subordinate to the bishop, to whom they act as assistants in matters relating to the church, for the better ordering and disposing the things thereof, and the confirmation of such leases of the temporality and offices relating to the bishopric, as the bishop shall make from time to time. And they are termed capitulum, as a kind of head, instituted not only to assist the bishop in manner aforesaid, but also anciently to rule and govern the diocese in the time of vacation.—Burn's Dict.

Character. Witnesses to speak to the good character of a prisoner are called in his defence, and, if they speak to nothing else, it is the custom that the counsel for the prosecution should not reply. It is not allowable to state any particulars of the prisoner's conduct, either in proof of his good or bad character; but if he call witnesses to his good character, a previous conviction against him may be put in evidence. Witnesses to the bad character of a prisoner can be called only to contradict witnesses to his good character, and evidence so called must be confined to general reputation (R. v. Rowton, Leigh and Cave, 530), but a previous conviction may then be given in evidence.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 19, s. 9.

Charge, the instructions of a judge to a grand jury; the judge's summing up of the evidence at a trial by jury; the periodical address of a bishop or archdeacon to his clergy; the taking proceedings against a prisoner; an obligation imposed on property; a commission.

Chargé d'affaires, a diplomatic representative at a foreign court, to whose care are confided the affairs of his nation.

Charge and Discharge, the old mode of taking accounts in Chancery. For an explanation of it, see Dan. Ch. Pr., 4th ed., 1139 n.

Charge (v.a.), to lay a duty upon any one, to acquaint any with the nature of their duty. See CHARGE SHEET. The clerk of the arraigns gives the prisoner in charge to the jury, by reading an abstract of the indictment, and they are bound to proceed to deliver him until they are discharged. To prefer an accusation against any one to the police.

Charges, expenses, costs.

Charge-sheet, a paper kept at a police-station to receive each night the names of the persons brought and given into custody, the nature of the accusation, and the name of the accuser in each case. It is under the care of the inspector on duty.

Charging order, an order obtained from a Court or judge under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 14, and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82, binding the stocks or funds of a judgment debtor with the judgment debt. See 23 & 24 Vict. c. 127, ss. 27—29, as to solicitors' costs. See Dan. Ch. Pr., 4th ed., 933—7, and 1 Ch. Arch. Pr., 12th ed., 541. And see now Jud. Act, 1875, Order XLVI.

Charitable Uses and Trusts. The 9 Geo. II. c. 26, commonly called 'The Mortmain Act,' after reciting that gifts or alienations of land in mortmain (see MORTMAIN) were prohibited by Magna Charta and other wholesome laws as prejudicial to the common utility, and that such public mischief had greatly increased by many large and improvident dispositions, made by languishing or dying persons to charitable uses, to take place after their deaths to the disherison of their lawful heirs, enacts that after the 24th June, 1736, no lands or other hereditaments whatsoever, nor any sums of money, or any other personal estate whatsoever, to be laid out or disposed of in the purchase of any lands or hereditaments should be given, or any ways conveyed to any person or persons, bodies politic or corporate, or otherwise, for any estate or interest whatsoever, or any ways charged or incumbered by any person or persons whatsoever in trust, or for the benefit of any charitable uses whatsoever; unless such gift, etc., be made by deed executed in the presence of two or more credible witnesses twelve calendar months before the death of such donor or grantor, and be enrolled in the Court of Chancery within six calendar months after execution: and be without any power of revocation, reservation, trust, condition, limitation, or agreement whatsoever, for the benefit of the donor or grantor, or of any person claiming under him.

Land, therefore, given by will to charitable uses will generally descend to the heir-at-law. When a bequest of personal property for charitable purposes, which if standing alone would be valid, is connected with and dependent upon a devise of real estate which is void, the devise being the principal and failing, the accessory must fail with it; and the next of kin or residuary legatees will take it.

The act is not to make void the dispositions of any lands, tenements, hereditaments, or of any personal estate to be laid out in the purchase of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, which should be made in any other manner or form than by such act is directed, to or in trust for either of the two universities in England (Oxford and Cambridge), or any of the colleges or houses of learning within either of the said universities, or to or in trust for the colleges of Eton, Winchester, or Westminster, or any or either of them, for the better support and maintenance of the scholars only upon the foundations of the said colleges of Eton, Winchester, and Westminster (s. 4). And see 45 Geo. III. c. 101.

The following dispositions are also exempted from the Mortmain laws: where a power given to invest money, destined for charitable purposes, either in lands or in the funds, is merely discretionary and not imperative, for which a testator has pointed out two modes, the one consistent but the other inconsistent with the statute, Equity will adopt the legal mode and carry it into effect (The Mayor, etc., of Faversham v. Ryder, 2 Eq. Rep. 749, 1854). A similar exemption is also applied to the cases where money is not to be laid out in acquiring realty, but in ameliorating any land, or for beautifying, sustaining, or repairing buildings already vested in trustees for charitable uses. Acts of Parliament passed from time to time have also specially exempted devises of lands or moneys charged thereon to the trustees of the British Museum for the benefit of that institution (5 Geo. IV. c. 39, s. 3); or to the governors of Queen Anne's Bounty (2 & 3 Anne, c. 11, s. 4; 43 Geo. III. c. 136, s. 1; and 45 Geo. III. c. 84, s. 3); the commissioners of Greenwich Hospital, and of the Royal Naval Asylum; the members of the Seamen's Hospital Society; the governors of St. George's Hospital; and of the Foundling Hospital (13 Geo. II. c. 29); and of 'Public Schools' (32 & 33 Vict. c. 58, s. 2); also public parks, museums, or libraries (34 & 35 Vict. c. 13); together with a few other public charities. (See full list in 'Index to Statutes Revised,' tit. 'Mortmain.) The Mortmain Act does not extend to gifts of realty and personalty in Scotland and Grenada or the West Indies.

The strictness of the law of Mortmain has been relaxed in the case of gifts of land for schools by the 'School Sites Acts,' 4 & 5 Vict. c. 38, s. 16, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 37, s. 3, and, generally, by 24 Vict. c. 9, which provides that a conveyance for charitable uses shall not be void by reason of containing certain stipulations for the donor's benefit, and dispenses with a deed in the case of copyholds, and by 25 Vict. c. 17, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 106, 27 Vict. c. 13, and 29 & 30 Vict. c. 57.

All the former jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in reference to the execution of charitable trusts is now vested in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34 [3]). See CHARITIES.

Charities, or public trusts. One of the earliest fruits of the Emperor Constantine's zeal, or pretended zeal, for Christianity, was a permission to his subjects to bequeath their property to the church. This permission was soon abused to so great a degree as to induce the Emperor Valentinian to enact a mortmain act by which it was restrained. But this restraint was gradually relaxed; and in the time of Justinian, it became a fixed maxim of Roman jurisprudence, that legacies to pious uses (which included all legacies destined to works of charity, whether they related to spiritual or temporal concerns), were entitled to peculiar favour, and to be deemed privileged testaments.

The high authority of the Roman law, coinciding with the religious notions of the times, could hardly fail to introduce these principles of pious legacies into our Common Law; and the zeal and learning of the ecclesiastical tribunals must have been constantly exercised to enlarge their operation. Lord Thurlow was clearly of opinion that the doctrine of charities grew up from the Civil Law; and Lord Eldon, in assenting to that opinion, has judiciously remarked, that, at an early period the ordinary had the power to apply a portion of every man's personal estate to charity; and when afterwards the statute compelled a distribution, it is not impossible that the same favour should have been extended to charity in wills, which by their own force, purported to authorize such a distribution.

The history of the law of charities prior to the 43rd Eliz. c. 4, which is emphatically called the Statute of Charitable Uses, is extremely obscure. This statute provided a new mode of enforcing charitable uses by a commission from the Court of Chancery.

Charity (as Sir William Grant has justly observed), in its widest sense, denotes all the good affections men ought to feel towards each other; in its more restricted and common sense, relief to the poor. In neither of these senses is it employed in the Court of Chancery. In that Court it means a general public use, and comprehends 'relief of aged, impotent, and poor people; maintenance of sick and maimed soldiers and mariners, schools of learning, free schools, and scholars of universities; repairs of bridges, ports, havens, causeways, churches, sea-banks, and highways; education and preferment of orphans; the relief, stock, or maintenance of houses of correction; marriages of poor maids; supportation, aid, and help of young tradesmen, handicraftsmen, and persons decayed; relief or redemption of prisoners or captives; and aid or ease of any poor inhabitants, concerning payments of fifteenths, setting out of soldiers, and other taxes.'—Preamble of 43 Eliz. c. 4.

It is clear that no superstitious uses are within the purview of the statute; such as are gifts of money for the finding or maintenance of a stipendiary priest; or for the maintenance of an anniversary or obit; or for prayers for the dead; or for such purposes as the superior of a convent, or her successor, may judge expedient. But there are certain uses which though not within the letter, are yet deemed charitable within the equity of the statute. Such is money given to maintain a preaching minister; to maintain a schoolmaster in a parish; for the setting up a hospital for the relief of poor people; for the building of a sessions-house for a city or county; for the making of a new, or for the repairing of an old pulpit in a church; or for the buying of a pulpit-cushion, or pulpit-cloth; or for the setting of new bells where there were none, or for mending of them when they are out of repair.

Upon the whole it seems to be the better opinion, that the jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery over charities, where no trust is interposed, or where there is no person in esse capable of taking, or where the charity is of an indefinite nature, is not to be referred to the general jurisdiction of that court. It sprang up after the statute of Elizabeth, and rests mainly on its provisions.

The jurisdiction exercised by the Lord Chancellor, under the 43 Eliz. c. 4, over charities, is held to be personal in him, and not exercised in virtue of his ordinary or extraordinary jurisdiction in Chancery; and in this respect it resembles the jurisdiction exercised by him in cases of idiots and lunatics, which he exercises purely as the personal delegate of the Crown, which has a right to guard and enforce all charities of a public nature, by virtue of its general superintending power over the public interests, where no other person is intrusted with that right.

But as the Court of Chancery might also proceed in many, although not in all, cases of charity by original bill, as well as by commission under the statute of Elizabeth, the jurisdiction became mixed in practice, that is to say, the jurisdiction of bringing informations in the name of the Attorney-General was mixed with the jurisdiction given to the Chancellor by the statute. So that it was not always easy to ascertain in what cases he acted as a judge, administering the common duties of a Court of Equity, and in what cases he acted as a mere delegate of the Crown, administering its peculiar duties and prerogatives. And again, there is a distinction between cases of charity, where the Chancellor is to act in the Court of Chancery, and cases where the charity is to be administered by the Queen under her sign manual. Lord Eldon, after a full review of all the cases, came to the conclusion (which is now the settled rule), that where there is a general indefinite purpose of charity, not fixing itself upon any particular object, the disposition and administration of it are in the Queen by her sign manual; but that where the gift is to trustees with general objects, or with some particular objects pointed out, there the Court of Chancery would take upon itself the administration of the charity, and execute it under a scheme to be reported by a chief clerk.—Moggridge v. Thackwell, 7 Ves. 36—86; Story's Equity Jurisp. c. xxxi. See the Charitable Trusts Acts, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 137; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 124; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 76; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 76; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 51; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 50; and the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 24, passed to facilitate the incorporation of trustees of charities for religious, educational, literary, scientific, and public charitable purposes, and the enrolment of certain charitable trust deeds. See also 23 & 24 Vict. c. 134, amending the law as to Roman Catholic charities; c. 136, amending the law as to the administration of endowed charities, and also 25 & 26 Vict. c. 112; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 110; and 33 & 34 Vict. c. 34. As to the execution of trusts for charities, see last article.

Charity Commissioners. Charitable trusts are under the control of four commissioners, two of whom must be barristers of not less than twelve years standing, who are appointed to secure their due administration. Their powers and duties are to be found in the Charitable Trusts Acts, 1853, 1855, 1860, and 1869; and see particularly 37 & 38 Vict. c. 87, whereby all powers and authorities by the Endowed Schools Acts (see that heading) vested in the Endowed School Commissioners, are transferred to the Charity Commissioners.

Charre of lead, thirty pigs of lead.

Charta Chyrogrophata, or Communis, an indenture.

Chartu de non ente non valet. Co. Litt. 36.—(A charter concerning a thing not in existence avails not.)

Charta de una parte, a deed-poll.

Charta est legatus mentis. Ibid.—(A deed is the representation of the mind.)

Charta non est nisi vestimentum donationis. Ibid.—(A deed is nothing else than the vestment of a gift.)

Chartæ libertatum are Magna Charta (see that title) and Charta de Foresta.

Charta de Foresta is taken from the roll of 25 Edward I., and has a confirmation of that date prefixed to it, similar to that prefixed to Magna Charta. This charter, though of infinite importance at the time it was made, contains in it nothing interesting to a modern lawyer, any further than as it gives some specimen of the nature of the institution of Forest Laws, and the burthens thereby brought on the subject. It contains sixteen chapters.—1 Reeves, c. v. 254; 4 Bl. Com. 423; 4 Br. & Had. 505.

Chartarum super fidem mortuis testibus, ad patriam de necessitudine recurrendum est. Co. Litt. 36.—(The witnesses being dead, the truth of charters must of necessity be referred to the country, i.e., a jury.)

Chartel [fr. cartel, Fr.], a letter of defiance or challenge to a single combat; also an instrument or writing between two states for settling the exchange of prisoners of war.

Charter [fr. charta, Lat.; chartre, Fr.], an evidence of things done between man and man. Charters of the Queen are written instruments granting certain privileges or exemptions to towns (see, e.g., the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 210) or corporations; e.g., to 'chartered' banking companies, or to a college or university (see College Charter Act, 1871, 34 & 35 Vict. c. 63), or to the Apothecaries Company, whose charter, granted by James I., is recited in 55 Geo. III. c. 194. Charter of pardon, forgiving a felony or other offence committed against the Crown and its dignity. Charter of the forest comprises the laws of the forest.—Fleta, l. 3, c. 14; Co. Litt. 6.

Chartered ship, a ship hired or freighted.

Charterer, a person who charters or hires a ship for a voyage or for a certain period; also a Cheshire freeholder.—Sir P. Ley's Antiq. f. 356.

Charter-House [fr. chartreux, Fr.], formerly a convent of Carthusian monks in London, now a college founded and endowed by Thomas Sutton.

Charter-land, otherwise called bookland, properly held by deed under certain rents and free-services. It in effect differs nothing from the free socage lands, and hence have arisen most of the freehold tenants, who hold of particular manors, and owe suit and service to the same.—2 Bl. Com. 90.

Charter-party [fr. charta partita, Lat., a divided charter; charte partie, Fr. According to Boyer, the derivation of the word is 'quia per medium charta incidebatur et sic fiebat charta partita,' because when notaries were less common there was only one instrument made for both parties; this they cut in two, and gave each his portion, joining them together at their return, to know if each had done his part.—4 Encyc. Brit.

1797, 360], an agreement in writing, by which a shipowner agrees to let an entire ship, or part thereof, to a merchant, for the carriage of goods on a specified voyage, or during a specified period, for a sum of money which the merchant agrees to pay as freight for their carriage. By such an agreement the ship is said to be chartered to the merchant, who is called the charterer. There are certain terms usually to be found in all charter-parties, e.g., a statement of the burthen of the ship, an undertaking by the shipowner that the ship, being seaworthy and furnished with necessaries, shall be ready by a certain day to receive the cargo, shall sail when loaded, and deliver her cargo at her port of destination (the act of God or the king's enemies excepted), the charterer undertaking to load and unload the ship, within a certain number of days, called the lay or running days, and if he detain her longer, to pay dennurage, i.e., a certain sum of money for each extra day, and also to pay freight agreed. See 2 Instit. 673; see the works on Shipping of Abbot, Maude & Pollock, or Maclachlan.

Chartis Reddendis, an ancient writ which lay against one who had charters of feoffment intrusted to his keeping and refused to deliver them.—Reg. Orig. 159.

Chase [fr. chasse, Fr.], a privileged place for the preservation of deer and beasts of the forest, of a middle nature between a forest and a park. It is commonly less than a forest, and not endowed with so many liberties, as officers, laws, courts; and yet it is of larger compass than a park, having more officers and game than a park. Every forest is a chase, but every chase is not a forest. It differs from a park in that it is not enclosed, yet it must have certain metes and bounds, but it may be in other men's grounds as well as in one's own.—Mainw. 49.

Chastisement. As to the correction of a child by its parent, an apprentice or scholar by his master, or a criminal by an officer, see Addison on Torts.

Chastity. The English law justifies a woman killing one who attempts to ravish her, and so, too, the husband or father may justify killing a man who attempts a rape upon his wife or daughter; but not if he takes them in adultery by consent, for the one is forcible and felonious, but not the other.—1 Hale, P. C. 485, 486; and 4 Br. & Had. Com. 214.

Chattel-interests. The difference between freeholds and non-freeholds, or chattel-interests, consists, for the most part, in the fixity or non-fixity of their duration. It is the latter property, viz., uncertainty, that characterizes a freehold ; it is the former, viz., certainty, that characterizes a non-freehold. Hence every tenancy of a definite duration is a term, i.e., a period accurately ascertained during which the interest or estate is to endure. The non-freeholds are deemed merely chattel-interests, and differ from freeholds not only in quantity but in order and kind ; for freeholds are considered of greater interest than non-freeholds, and therefore if a term of 1,000 years and an estate for life vest in the same person, in the same right, the term will merge in the life estate, unless an intervening estate prevent such an union of interests. Chattel-interests devolve upon the personal representatives of the owner. Five species of estates rank as chattel-interests:—(a) for years ; (b) from year to year ; (c) at will ; (d) by elegit ; and (e) on sufferance.

Chattels, or Catals [fr. catalla, Lat.; chatel, Fr.; chaptel, old Fr.], goods moveable and immoveable, except such as are in the nature of freehold or parcel of it. They are either (1) personal, which belong immediately to the person of the owner, and for which, if they are injuriously withheld from him, he has no other remedy than by a personal action ; (2) real, which either appertain not immediately to the person, but to some other thing by way of dependency, as a box with writings of land ; or issue out of some immoveable thing, as a lease, or rent for a term of years ; and they concern the realty, lands, and tenements ; such as an interest in advowsons, in statutes-merchant, and the like.—1 Inst. 118. See CATALLA.

Chaud-medley. See CHANCE-MEDLEY.

Chaumpert, an ancient tenure.—Blount.

Chantry rents, money paid to the Crown by the servants or purchasers of chantry-lands.—22 Car. II. c. 6.

Cheap, subst. purchase, bargain ; adj. low in price. The word cheap forming part of the name of a place, denotes that in that place there was a market, e.g., Cheapside, Eastcheap, Westcheap.

Cheap railway trains. See 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85 (sometimes called the Cheap Trains Act), ss. 6, 7 ; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 75 ; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 41 ; and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33, s. 14.

Cheat. See CHEATS.

Cheaters, or Escheators, were officers appointed to look after the king's escheats, a duty which gave them great opportunities of fraud and oppression, and in consequence many complaints were made of their misconduct. Hence it seems that a cheater came to signify a fraudulent person, and thence the verb to cheat was derived.—Wedgwo.

Cheats, deceitful practices, in Defrauding or endeavouring to defraud another of his known right, by means of some artful device, contrary to the plain rules of common honesty ; as by playing with false dice, by causing an illiterate person to execute a deed to his prejudice, or reading it over to him in words different from those in which it is written ; selling one commodity for another, or using false weights and measures, and the like.—1 Hawk. 188. 'If a person in the course of his trade or business, openly and publicly carried on, put a false mark or token upon an article so as to pass it off as a genuine one, when in fact it is only a spurious one, and the article is sold and money obtained by means of that false mark or token, that will be a cheat at Common Law.'—Per Cockburn, C. J., in R. v. Closs, 27 L. J. M. C. 54. Cheating at play is punishable in like manner as obtaining money by false pretences, under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 17.

Check, Cheque, or Draft. See CHEQUE.

Check-roll, a list or book, containing the names of such as are attendants on, or in the pay of the Queen or other great personages, as their household servants.—19 Car. II. c. 1.

Chelsea Hospital. See 47 Geo. III. st. 2, c. 25 ; 55 Geo. III. cc. 125, 136 ; 7 Geo. IV. c. 16 ; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 106, ss. 3, 4 ; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 70 ; 6 & 7 Vict. cc. 31, 95 ; 9 & 10 Vict. cc. 9, 10 ; 10 & 11 Vict. cc. 4, 54 ; 11 & 12 Vict. cc. 84, 103 ; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 15.

Chelsea Hospital Out-pensioners. See 5 & 6 Vict. c. 70, and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 15.

Chemists and Druggists. See 55 Geo. III. c. 194, s. 28 ; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 56, and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 121.

Cheque. An order addressed to a banker requesting him to pay to (a) the person therein mentioned, or his order, or (b) the person therein mentioned, or the bearer of the cheque, the sum of money therein mentioned : defined in the 'codifying' Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 61, s. 73—by which such provisions of the Bills of Exchange Act as are applicable to a bill of exchange payable on demand apply also to a cheque—as a 'Bill of Exchange drawn on a banker payable on demand.'

Chester, was declared to be no longer a county palatine by 11 Geo. IV. & 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, s. 13.—See 3 Reeves, 156. As to Chester Courts, see 30 & 31 Vict. c. 36.

Chevage, Chevagium, or Cherage [fr. chef, Fr.], a tribute sum of money formerly paid by such as held land in villenage to their lords in acknowledgment, and was a kind of head or poll money.—Bract. l. 1, c. x.

Chevantia [fr. chevancé, Fr.], a loan or advance of money upon credit ; also goods, —Mon Ang. t. l. 629.

Chevisance [fr. chevir, i.e., venir à chef de quelque chose, Fr., to come to the end of a business], an agreement or composition; an end or order set down between a creditor or debtor; an indirect gain in point of usury, etc.; also an unlawful bargain or contract.

Chezé, a homestead or homesfall which is accessory to a house.—Div. of Purl. 162, note.

Chicane [fr. chicaner, Fr., to wrangle], the use of tricks and artifice.

Chief Baron of the Exchequer, the presiding judge in the Court of Exchequer, and afterwards in the Exchequer division of the High Court of Justice, with whom five puisné judges were associated. In 1881, after the death of Lord Chief Baron Kelly, the office was abolished by Order in Council under s. 31 of the Jud. Act, 1873, and merged in that of Chief Justice of England.

Chief Clerks of Judges in Equity, appointed under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80, s. 16, to act in the place of the abolished Masters in Ordinary. For their duties see Smi. Eq. Pr. 506; and Dan. Ch. Pr. They are continued in office under the judges of the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, by Jud. Act, 1873, ss. 77—86.

Chief Justice of England, the presiding judge in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, and in the absence of the Lord Chancellor, President of the High Court, and also an ex officio judge of the Court of Appeal (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 5; Jud. Act, 1875, s. 4). The full title is, 'Lord Chief Justice of England.'

Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the presiding judge in the Court of Common Pleas, and afterwards in the Common Pleas Division of the High Court of Justice, and one of the ex officio judges of the High Court of Appeal (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 5, and Jud. Act, 1875, s. 4). He had five (formerly four, until 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, see s. 11) puisné judges associated with him. In 1881, after the promotion of Lord Chief Justice Coleridge to the office of Lord Chief Justice of England, the office was abolished by Order in Council under s. 31 of the Jud. Act, 1873, and merged in that of Lord Chief Justice of England.

Chief-rents [fr. reditus capitales, Lat.], the annual payments of freeholders of manors; also denominated quit rents (quieti redditus), because thereby the tenant goes free of all other services.—See MANOR.

Chief, tenants in, persons who held their lands immediately under the king (in capite), in right of his Crown and dignity.

Chiefrie, a small rent paid to the lord paramount.

Chievance, usury.

Child, Abandoning or exposing, when under two years of age. Made a misdemeanour by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 27.

Child as a witness. The admissibility of the evidence of a child of tender years depends upon the degree of understanding it possesses, and the religious education it has received.—See Tayl. on Evid. s. 1249.

Child, Concealment of birth of. Made a misdemeanour, by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 60.

Child, Criminal responsibility of. Above fourteen a child is presumed to be doli capax; but between seven and fourteen a child is presumed to be doli incapax, though the rule prevails that 'malitia supplet etatem.' Under seven a child cannot be guilty of felony.

Childbearing. The English law admits of no presumption as to the time when a woman ceases to bear children, though this enters into most other codes.—Beck's Med. Juris., 148, 402. The possibility of bearing a child after the age of fifty-four was recognised in Croxton v. May, 9 Ch. 388.

Children. As to the employment of, in factories, workshops, etc., see FACTORY, and consult Notcutt on the Factory Acts. See also the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 76), s. 6 et seq.; the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 77), s. 4 et seq.; and see EDUCATION. The employment of children under fourteen in dangerous public performances is punishable under the Children's Dangerous Performances Act, 1879, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 34.

Child-stealing. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 56.

Childwife, a fine or penalty of a bond-woman unlawfully begotten with child.—Cowel.

Chiltern Hundreds. A member of the House of Commons cannot resign his seat. He may, however, become disqualified by acceptance of office of profit under the Crown. A member therefore usually vacates his seat by the acceptance of the stewardship of the Chiltern Hundreds, or some other nominal office in the gift of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The practice began about the year 1750; but the duties of the stewardship have long since ceased, and the office is but retained to serve this particular purpose. The Chiltern Hills are a range of chalk eminences separating the counties of Bedford and Hertford, passing through the middle of Bucks from Tring in Hertfordshire to Henley in Oxfordshire. Formerly these hills were covered with thick beechwood, and sheltered numerous robbers; to put these marauders down, and protect the inhabitants of the neighbourhood from their depredations, an officer was appointed under the Crown, called the Steward of the Chiltern Hundreds, which were Burnham, Desborough, and Stoke.

The Crown, for the convenience of the House at large, is always ready to confer on any member 'the Stewardship of Her Majesty's Chiltern Hundreds, the Stewardship of the Manor of Poynings, of East Hendred and Northstead, or the Escheatorship of Munster,' sinecures which he continues to hold till some other member solicits a similar accommodation.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Chimin [fr. chemin, Fr.], a way, which is either the Queen's highway (chiminus reginæ), or a private way: the first is that over which the subjects of this realm, and all others under the protection of the Crown, have free liberty to pass, though the property in the soil itself belong to some private individual; the last is that in which one person or more have liberty to pass over the land of another, by prescription or charter. This is divided into chimin in gross, where a person holds a way principally and solely in itself, and chimin appendant, where a person has it as appurtenant to some other thing; as if he rent a close or pasture, with covenant for ingress and egress through and over other land, over which otherwise he might not pass.—Kitch. 117; Co. Litt. 56.

Chiminage, or Pedagium, toll due by custom for having a way through a forest.—Co. Litt. 56.

Chimney-money, or Hearth-money, a crown duty for every fireplace in a house.—14 Car. II. c. 2. Long since repealed.

Chimney-sweepers, prohibition for minors to ascend chimneys, requirement of certificates for master chimney sweepers, and general regulations.—3 & 4 Vict. c. 85; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 37; and 38 & 39 Vict. c. 70.

China Marriage Act, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 61.

China trade. See 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 93; amended by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 56; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 80; and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 9.

Chinese Passengers' Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 104.

Chip, Cheap, Chipping, signify the place to be a market town, as Chippingham, Chipping-Norton, Chipping-Wicomb.—Blount.

Chippingavel, or Cheapingavel, toll for buying and selling.

Chirchgemot, Chirgemot, Kirmote, a synod, a meeting in a church or vestry.—Blount.

Chirograph [fr. χείρ, a hand, and γράφω, Gk., to write], a deed or other public instrument in writing, which anciently was attested by the subscription and crosses of witnesses: afterwards, to prevent frauds and concealment, people made their deeds of mutual covenant in a script and rescript, or in a part and counterpart, and in the middle between the two copies they drew the capital letters of the alphabet, and then tallied or cut asunder in an indented manner, the sheet or skin of parchment; which, being delivered to the two parties concerned, were proved authentic by matching with and answering one another. Deeds thus made were denominated symgrapha by the canonists, and with us chirographa, or handwritings. Chirograph was also used for a fine, the manner of engrossing which and cutting the parchment into two pieces was observed in the chirographer's office of the Court of Common Pleas until those assurances by matter of record were abolished by the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74—2 Bl. Com. 296; 2 Inst. 468; Kenn. Antiq. 177; Mon. Ang., t. 2, p. 94.

Chirographa, writings emanating from a single party, the debtor.—Civil Law.

Chirographer, an officer of the Common Pleas, who kept the fines. Abolished.

Chirographum apud debitorem repertum præsumitur solutum.—(A deed found with the debtor is presumed to be paid.)

Chirurgeon [fr. χειρουργός, Gk.], the ancient denomination of a surgeon.

Chivalry [fr. chevalier, Fr., a knight], a military dignity, supposed by some to have taken its rise soon after the death of Charlemagne, and by others during the crusades, because in these expeditions many chivalrous exploits were performed, and a proud feeling of heroism engendered. For a description of the origin, object, and character of this military institution see Gibbon's Decline and Fall, chap. 58. See TENURE.

Chivalry, Court of, anciently held as a court of honour merely, before the Earl-Marshal, and as a criminal court before the Lord High Constable, jointly with the Earl-Marshal. It had jurisdiction as to contracts and other matters touching deeds of arms or war, as well as pleas of life or member. It also corrected encroachments in matters of coat-armour, precedence, and other distinctions of families. It is now grown entirely out of use, on account of the feebleness of its jurisdiction and want of power to enforce its judgments, as it could neither fine nor imprison, not being a court of record.—3 Bl. Com. 68, and 4 Br. & Had. Com. 360 n.

Chivalry, Guardian in. See TENURE.

Chloroform, administering. It is a felony for any person to administer or attempt to administer chloroform, or other stupefying drug, with intent to enable himself or another to commit, or to assist another in the commission of, any indictable offence.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 190, s. 22.

Choke, Attempt to. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 21.

Choky, Chokee, a chair, seat, guard, watch. The station of a guard or watchman. A place where an officer is stationed to receive tolls and customs.—Indian.

Cholera Act, 2 Wm. IV. c. 10, continued by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 75. It has expired, and has not been revived; but s. 134 of the Public Health Act, 1875, gives power to the Local Government Board to make regulations for the prevention of 'any formidable epidemic disease.'

Chop-church [ecclesiarum permutatio, Lat.], changing benefices.—9 Hen. VI. c. 95.

Choral. In ancient times a person admitted to sit and serve God in the choir.

Chorepiscopi, bishops of the country in the early times of the church.

Chose [Fr., a thing]; it is used in divers senses, of which the four following are the most important.

(1) Chose local, a thing annexed to a place, as a mill, etc.

(2) Chose transitory, that which is moveable, and may be taken away, or carried from place to place.

(3) Chose in action, otherwise called chose in suspense, a thing of which a man has not the possession or actual enjoyment, but has a right to demand by action or other proceeding. It is rather in potentia than in esse, as a debt, bond, etc. A well-known rule of the Common Law was, that no possibility, right, title, or thing in action, can be granted to third parties, for it was thought that a different rule would be the occasion of multiplying litigation: as it would in effect be transferring a lawsuit to a mere stranger. At law, therefore, with the exception of negotiable instruments, bills of exchange, etc., an interesse termini, and some few other securities, this until lately continued to be the general rule, unless the debtor assented to the transfer; if he assented then the right of the assignee was complete at law, so that he might maintain an action against the debtor, upon the implied promise to pay him the debt, which results from such assent.

Now, however, by the Jud. Act, 1873, s. 25 (6), any absolute assignment by writing under the hand of the assignor of any debt, or other legal chose in action, of which express notice has been given to the debtor, trustee, or other person from whom the assignor would have been entitled to claim such debt or chose in action, shall be effectual in law to pass the legal right in such debt or chose in action from the date of such notice, and all legal and other remedies for the same; subject to certain provisions contained in the section. See DEBT.

Courts of Equity have heretofore been in use to give effect to assignments of trusts, and possibilities of trusts, and contingent interests, whether they were in real or personal estates, as well as to assignments of choses in action, such equitable transfer being in the nature of an agreement, of which the Court directed the performance.—Co. Litt. 213 a; 2 Bl. Com. 442; 2 Saunders on Uses, 40; 2 Story's Eq. Jurisp. 278.

(4) Choses in possession, where a person has not only the right to enjoy but also the actual enjoyment of the thing.

Chout, a fourth, a fourth part of sums litigated; Mahratta chout, a fourth of the revenues exacted as tribute by the Mahrattas.—Indian.

Chrematistics [fr. χρημα, Gk.], the science of wealth

Chrismatis denarii [fr. κρίσμα, Gk.], chrisom pence, paid to the diocesan or his suffragan by the parochial clergy about Easter. It is otherwise called quadragesimals, or paschals, or Easter-pence. Obsolete.

Christian name, the name given at the font distinct from the surname. It has been said from the bench, that a Christian name may consist of a single letter.

Christianity, the religion of Christians. It is part of the law of England, and all blasphemies against it are punished by fine and imprisonment at Common Law, and by 9 & 10 Wm. III. c. 32. See BLASPHEMY.

Christmas-day, a festival of the Christian church, observed on the 25th of December, in memory of the birth of Jesus Christ. It is one of the usual quarter-days for the payment of rent and salaries; it is also a day on which the offices of the Supreme Court are closed (Order LXI., Rule 2). With respect to this, and also to the closing of public-houses, and the payment of bills of exchange, it stands in the same position as Good Friday.

Chrysology [fr. χρυσός and λόγος, Gk.], that branch of political economy relating to the production of wealth.

Church [fr. kerch, Dut.; kerche, High Ger.; kyrichia, Sw.; chirch, Teut.; cyric circe, Sax.; κυριακον, Gk., a temple of God], used in several senses:—(1) The collective body of persons professing one and the same religion; or the religion itself; thus we say, the Church of Christ. (2) Any particular congregation of Christians associating, as the Church of Antioch. (3) A particular sect of Christians, as the Greek Church. (4) The building in which a congregation of Christians

Church of England The Church of England is a distinct branch of Christ's Church, and is also an institution of the State (see the first clause of Magna Charta), of which the Sovereign is the supreme head by Act of Parliament (26 Hen. VIII. c. 1), but in what sense is not agreed. The Sovereign must be a member of the Church, and every subject is in theory a member. The standard of doctrine and practice is now settled by the 13 & 14 Ch. II. c. 4. See further voce ACT OF UNIFORMITY. Nevertheless the State has in various ways acknowledged the existence of non-conforming bodies. See DISSENTERS.—Consult Cripp's Law of the Church and Clergy.

Church-building Commissioners' Acts. For the purpose of extending the accommodation afforded by the national church, so as to make it more commensurate with the wants of the people, the following statutes have been passed: 58 Geo. III. c. 45; 59 Geo. III. c. 134; 3 Geo. IV. c. 72; 5 Geo. IV. c. 103; 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 72; 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 38; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 61; 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 75; 1 & 2 Vict. cc. 106, 107; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 49; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 60; 4 & 5 Vict. c. 38; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 56; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70; 9 & 10 Vict. cc. 68, 88; 11 & 12 Vict. cc. 37, 71; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 97; 17 & 18 Vict. cc. 14, 32; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 127; 35 & 36 Vict. c. 49; and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 50. In the year 1856 the powers of the Church Building Commissioners were, by the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 55, transferred to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, a body incorporated by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 77. See ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS.

Church Discipline Act, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86; which repealed 1 Hen. VII. c. 4. And see 33 & 34 Vict. c. 91, and PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT.

Church Patronage (Scotland) Act, 1874, 37 & 38 Vict. c. 82.

Churchesset [fr. churchset, ciricseot, Sax.], corn paid to the church. Fleta says, it signifies a certain measure of wheat, which, in times past, every man, on St. Martin's day, gave to holy church, as well in the times of the Britons as of the English; yet many great persons, after the coming of the Romans, gave their contributions according to the ancient law of Moses, in the name of first fruits; as in the writ of King Canutus sent to the Pope is particularly contained, in which they call it churchsed.—Seld. Hist. Tithes, 216.

Church Estate Commissioners, a committee of the ecclesiastical commissioners. See 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94, ss. 1, 3.

Church-rates, tributes, by which the expenses of the church are to be defrayed; made by the parishioners at large, that is, by the majority of those present at a vestry summoned for that purpose by the Church-wardens; and when made were recoverable in the Ecclesiastical Court, or, if the arrears did not exceed 10*l.* and no question were raised as to the legal liability, before two justices of the peace.—4 & 5 Vict. c. 36; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 14, s. 9. See Prid. Church-wardens' Guide. Compulsory church-rates were abolished by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 109.

Church-scot, customary obligations paid to the parish priest; from which duties the religious sometimes purchased an exemption for themselves and their tenants.

Church-wardens, anciently styled Church Reeves or Ecclesie Guardiani, the guardians or keepers of the church, and representatives of the body of the parish; but though in some sort ecclesiastical officers, they are always lay persons. They are a quasi corporation (Smith v. Adkins, 8 M. & W. 362). They are sometimes appointed by the minister, sometimes by the parish in vestry assembled, sometimes by both together, sometimes one by the minister, one by the church-wardens, as custom directs. But where there is no custom, it is said the election must be according to the canons, that they shall be chosen by the joint consent of the minister and parishioners, if it may be; but if they cannot agree, then the minister is to choose one and the parishioners another. They are to be chosen yearly in Easter-week, and are generally two in number; are obliged when chosen to serve, and are sworn to execute the office faithfully. Several persons are, however, exempted from the office, viz., peers of the realm, members of parliament, sheriffs, acting justices of the peace, clergymen, Roman Catholic clergymen, solicitors, practising physicians and surgeons in London, practising apothecaries, officers in the army, navy, or marines, though on half-pay, registrars of births, etc., officers of the excise or customs or post-office, and persons living out of the parish unless they occupy a house of trade there (Steer's P. L. 84). One of their chief duties is the care and management of the goods belonging to the church, such as the organ, bells, Bible, and parish books. But as to the church and churchyard, they have no sort of interest therein; and if any damage be done thereto, the parson only or vicar shall have the action. It is also part of their office, unless other persons are appointed by the ordinary for that purpose, to have the care of the benefice during its vacancy, or while it is under sequestration for the debts of the incumbent. They are moreover required to see to the reparation of the church, and to make such order relative to seats in the church and chancel, not appropriated to particular purposes, as the ordinary (who has in general the sole power in this matter) shall direct, and in practice, the arrangements are usually made by the church-wardens, even without any special direction from the ordinary. It is incident also to their office to enforce proper and orderly behaviour during divine service; formerly too they were joined with the overseers in the care and maintenance of the poor. If church-wardens waste the goods of the church, or be guilty of other misbehaviour, they are liable to removal; at the end of the year they are bound to render an account of all their receipts and disbursements.—Prid. Churchwardens' Guide; Steer's Parish Law, by Macnamara.

Churchyard is the freehold of the rector or vicar.—See 2 Step. Com. As to consecration, see 'Consecration of Churchyards Acts,' 1867 & 1868.

Churle [fr. ceorl, Sax.; carl, Germ.], a tenant at will, of free condition, who held lands of the Thanes, on payment of rents and services: of two sorts; one who hired the lord's tenementary estate, like our farmers; the other that tilled and manured the demesnes (yielding work and not rent), and were called his sockmen or ploughmen.—Spelm.

Ciltre, corruptly Siltre, Chiltern.

Cinque Ports [quinque portus, Lat.], the five most important havens in the kingdom, lying on the coast towards France, viz., Dover, Sandwich, Romney, Hastings, and Hythe; to which Winchelsea and Rye have since been added. The 18 & 19 Vict. c. 48 (amended by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 1), abolishes all jurisdiction and authority of the Lord Warden of the Cinque Ports and Constable of Dover Castle, in or in relation to the administration of justice in actions, suits, or other civil proceedings at Law or in Equity; and see 27 & 28 Vict. c. 80, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 53.

Circada, á tribute anciently paid to the bishop or archbishop for visiting churches.—Du Fresno.

Circar, head of affairs; the state or government; a grand division of a province; a headman. A name used by Europeans in Bengal to denote the Hindu writer and accountant employed by themselves, or in the public offices. See SIRCAR.

Circuits (seven, eight formerly), certain divisions of England and Wales, appointed for the judges to go formerly twice a year, in the respective vacations after Hilary and Trinity terms, but more recently oftener, and at no precisely fixed periods, to administer justice in the several counties. Two judges go on each of the seven circuits. The following were the circuits and assize towns as they stood altered by Order in Council made pursuant to 26 & 27 Vict. c. 122:—

(1) Northern Circuit: Appleby, Carlisle, Newcastle, Durham, Lancaster, Manchester, and Liverpool.

(2) Home Circuit: Hertford, Chelmsford, Maidstone, Lewes, Kingston, in spring; Guildford or Croydon, in summer.

(3) Western Circuit: Winchester, Salisbury, in summer, Devizes, in spring, Dorchester, Exeter, Bodmin, Taunton, in spring, Wells, in summer, Bristol.

(4) Oxford Circuit: Reading, in spring, Abingdon, in summer. Oxford, Worcester, Stafford, Shrewsbury, Hereford, Monmouth, Gloucester.

(5) Midland Circuit: Warwick, Derby, Nottingham, Lincoln, York, and Leeds.

(6) Norfolk Circuit: Leicester, Northampton, Oakham, Aylesbury, Bedford, Huntingdon, Cambridge, Bury St. Edmunds, in summer, Ipswich, in spring, Norwich.

(7) North Wales Circuit: Newtown, Dolgelly, in summer; Welchpool, Bala, in spring; Carnarvon, Beaumaris, Ruthin, Mold, Chester.

(8) South Wales Circuit: Swansea, in spring; Cardiff, in summer. Carmarthen, Haverfordwest, Cardigan, Brecon, Presteign, Chester.

By the Judicature Act, 1875, s. 22, it is provided that by Order in Council regulations may be made for the circuits, altering their arrangement and discontinuing any assizes, and especially transferring the business of the Surrey assizes to London. The following are the circuits as they stand altered by Order in Council of the 5th February, 1876, made pursuant to the above Act:—

(1) Northern Circuit: Counties of Westmoreland, Cumberland, and Lancaster.

(2) North-Eastern Circuit: Counties of Northumberland, Durham, and York, and counties of the town of Newcastle-upon-Tyne, and city of York.

(3) Midland Circuit: Counties of Lincoln, Nottingham, Derby, Warwick, Leicester, Northampton, Rutland, Buckingham, and Bedford; the counties of the city of Lincoln and town of Nottingham; the borough of Leicester.

(4) South-Eastern Circuit: Counties of Norfolk, Suffolk, Huntingdon, Cambridge, Hertford, Essex, Kent, and Sussex; and county of the city of Norfolk.

(5) Oxford Circuit: Counties of Berks, Oxford, Worcester, Stafford, Salop, Hereford, Monmouth, Gloucester, and counties of the cities of Worcester and Gloucester.

(6) Western Circuit: Counties of Southampton, Wilts, Dorset, Devon, Cornwall, Somerset; and counties of the cities of Exeter and Bristol.

(7) North and South Wales Circuit: (a) North Wales Division—Counties of Montgomery, Merioneth, Carnarvon, Anglesea, Denbigh, Flint, and Chester. (b) South Wales Division—Counties of Glamorgan, Carmarthen, Pembroke, Cardigan, Brecknock, and Radnor; and counties of the borough of Carmarthen, and town of Haverfordwest.

Circuity of action, a longer course than requisite of proceeding to recover a thing sued for.—Termes de la Ley. Wherever the rights of the litigant parties were such that the defendant would be entitled to recover back from the plaintiff the same sum which the plaintiff sought to recover, the defendant might plead the facts which constitute such right as a defence, in order to avoid circuity of action.—Bullen & Leake on Pleading, 3rd ed., 558. Now all counter-claims may be raised in the defence to an action. See Jud. Act, 1873, s. 24 (3), Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XIX., r. 3. See STATEMENT OF DEFENCE, COUNTER-CLAIM.

Circuitus est evitandus; et boni judicis est lites dirimere, ne lis ex lite oriatur. 5 Co. 31.—(Circuity is to be avoided; and it is the duty of a good judge to determine litigations, lest one law-suit arise out of another.) On this maxim depends the law of set-off.—2 Geo. II. c. 22, s. 13; 8 Geo. II. c. 24, s. 5.

Circulating medium, more comprehensive than the term money, as it is the medium of exchanges, or purchases and sales, whether it be gold or silver coin or any other article.

Circumduction, a judicial declaration that the time allowed to either party for leading proof has elapsed.—Scotch Law.

Circumspecte agatis (that you act cautiously), the statute 13 Edw. I. st. 4, A.D. 1285, relating to prohibitions. 2 Inst. 187; 2 Reeves 215.

Circumstantial evidence, presumptive proof, when the fact itself is not proved by direct testimony, but is to be inferred from circumstances, which either necessarily or usually attend such facts. It is obvious that a presumption is more or less likely to be true, according as it is more or less probable that the circumstances would not have existed unless the fact which is inferred from them had also existed; and that a presumption can only be relied on until the contrary is actually proved. Circumstantial evidence has, in some instances, undoubtedly been found to produce a much stronger assurance of a prisoner's guilt than could have been produced by more direct and positive testimony. As a general principle, however, it is true that positive evidence of a fact from credible eye-witnesses is the most satisfactory that can be produced; and the universal feeling of mankind leans to this species of evidence in preference to that which is merely circumstantial. If positive evidence of a fact can be produced, circumstantial evidence ought not to be trusted. Chief Baron Gilbert, therefore, considered it a higher species of proof. He says, 'when the fact itself cannot be proved, that which comes nearest to the proof of the fact is the proof of the circumstances which necessarily or usually attend such facts, and which are called presumptions and not proofs, for they stand instead of the proofs of the fact till the contrary be proved.'—1 Phill. Evid. c. 7, s. 2. See Wills on Circumstantial Evidence.

Circumstantibus, tales de (so many of the bystanders). In civil and criminal trials, where by reason of the default of the jury, or of challenge, there is not a sufficient number of the jurors impanelled, the judge may direct the sheriff to add to the panel the names of a sufficient number of persons qualified to act as jurymen who may be present or can be found, who are called tales de circumstantibus.—6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 37; 3 Step. Com.

Circumvention, fraud or deceit.—Scotch Law.

Ciric-Bryce, any violation of the privileges of a church.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Ciric Sceat [punitice seminum], church-scot, or shot, an ecclesiastical due, payable on the day of St. Martin, consisting chiefly of corn.—Anc. Hist. Eng.

Cisleu, or Chisleu, the ninth month of the ecclesiastical and the third of the civil Hebrew year, answering nearly to our November.—Jahn's Bib. Antiq.

Citatio ad reassumendam causam, a citation which issued when a party died pending a suit, against his heir, to revive the cause.

Citatio est de jure naturali. (A summons is by natural right.)

Citation, a summons to appear, applied particularly to process in the spiritual, probate, and matrimonial courts; a reference to authorities in support of an argument.

Citation to see proceedings. See the Legitimacy Declaration Act, 1858, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 93, s. 7.

Citationes non concedantur priusquam exprimitur supra quod re fieri debet citatio.—12 Co. 44.—(Summonses should not be granted, before that it is explained for what cause a summons ought to issue.)

Citizen, a freeman, or one who has resided and kept a family in the City.—Roll. Rep. 138, 149.

City [fr. citê, Fr.], a town corporate, which has usually a bishop and cathedral church. It is called civitas, because it is governed by justice and order of magistracy; oppidum, for that it contains a great number of inhabitants; and urbs, because it is in due form begirt about with walls.—Cowel.

City of London Court. This court was, prior to the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 35, known as the 'Sheriffs Court of the City of London.' Its procedure was, theretofore, regulated by Acts and Rules peculiar to itself; but by the above act it becomes to all intents and purposes a County Court.

Civil, stands for the opposite of criminal, of ecclesiastical, of military, or of political.—1 Mill's Log.

Civil Bill Court, a tribunal in Ireland with a jurisdiction analogous to that of the County Courts in England. The judge of it is also Chairman of Quarter Sessions (where the jurisdiction is more extensive than in England), and performs the duty of revising barrister. The procedure of the Civil Bill Courts is regulated by the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 99; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 1; and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 66.

Civil commotion, an insurrection of the people for general purposes, though it may not amount to rebellion, where there is an usurped power.

Civil death. A man is said to be civilly dead when he has been attainted of treason or felony, and, in former times, when he abjured the realm or went into a monastery. The 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, provides that after the passing of that act no confession, verdict, inquest, conviction, or judgment of or for any treason or felony, or felo de se, shall cause any attainder or corruption of blood, or any forfeiture or escheat.

Civil Law, that rule of action which every particular nation, commonwealth, or city has established peculiarly for itself, more properly distinguished by the name of municipal law.

The term 'civil law' is now chiefly applied to that which the old Romans compiled from the laws of nature and nations.

The 'Roman Law' and the 'Civil Law' are convertible phrases, meaning the same system of jurisprudence; it is now frequently denominated 'the Roman Civil Law.'

The collections of Roman Civil Law, before its reformation in the 6th century of the Christian era by the eastern Emperor Justinian, were the following:—

(1) Leges Regiæ. These laws were for the most part promulgated by Romulus, Numa Pompilius, and Servius Tullius. To Romulus are ascribed the formation of a constitutional government, and the imposition of a fine, instead of death, for crimes; Numa Pompilius composed the laws relating to religion and divine worship, and abated the rigour of subsisting laws; and Servius Tullius, the sixth king, enacted many wise and good laws to maintain the cause of the poor, and to stop the oppression of the rich. He also revived many of the obsolete laws of Romulus and Numa Pompilius.

Sextus Publius Papyrius, Pontifex Maximus, in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus, collected the royal laws, which collection is known by the name of Jus Civile Papyrianum. Legislation under the regal dynasty must have been extremely simple; very few relics of it, however, have been preserved, and among them it is almost impossible to distinguish the genuine from the spurious. The Leges Regiæ have been edited by Lipsius, and other men of learning; and of the supposed laws of Romulus, a separate collection was published by Balduinus.

(2) Leges Decemvirales, or the Laws of the Twelve Tables. The uncertain state of the law, in the Republican era, and the uneasiness occasioned by the continual quarrels of the patricians and plebeians, rendered systematic legislation indispensable, so after great opposition on the part of the patricians, a law was proposed by Caius Terentilius Horsa (B.C. 460, A.U.C. 293), to appoint a commission to draw up a body of laws; and (in B.C. 452, A.U.C. 301) three commissioners are said to have been chosen by the patricians to visit Greece, in order to collect materials for a code; upon their return, after an absence of three years, ten commissioners, including the three, were appointed, with the title De Legibus Scribendis, whose duty it was to revise, digest, and enforce the new laws. All other magisterial offices were then suspended, and these ten commissioners, or Decemviri, became invested with the sole management of state affairs. The Ten Tables they drew up, having been approved by the senate and comitia, were engraved on metal, and suspended in the Comitium, and all parties were so well satisfied with the result of the first year's administration of the Decemviri, that it was resolved to continue the same sort of government for another year—new members were elected to sit upon this commission, the only one re-elected being Appius Claudius. In the former year the whole ten had been taken from the patrician class, but this year three of them were plebeians. The new laws drawn up by this new commission having been duly approved, and reduced to writing on two supplementary tables, made up the total number of Twelve Tables, by which name they were subsequently known, and under which they became famous. To judge from the fragments of these laws which have survived, they were very epigrammatic and positive in their nature; they formed the catechism of education for the Roman youth; indeed, all well-educated persons were expected to know them by heart. Cicero, in his book De Oratore, describes the law of the Twelve Tables as a summary of all that is excellent in the libraries of the philosophers.

The laws of the Twelve Tables were illustrated by the commentaries of several ancient lawyers, especially Antistius, Labeo, and Caius; the fragments of these laws have been collected and explained by many of the moderns, by Balduinus, Rœvardus, Marcilius, Augustinus, Gravina, Funccius, Bouchaud, Gothofredus, and others.

(3) Jus Civile Flavianum, and its subsequent edition, Jus Civile Ælianum. This collection consists of the forms of pleadings, called Actiones Juris, adopted in all proceedings and acts of court. It was compiled about 446 A.U.C. or B.C. 312, by Appius Claudius Cæcus, who, being blind, was obliged to employ an amanuensis, Gaius Flavius, hence the title of the collection.

The Flavian collection being the first, was naturally imperfect; in consequence of which Sextus Ælius Pætus, surnamed Catus, published about 553 A.U.C. or 200 B.C. a supplement to it, again promulgating the new formulæ subsequently introduced, together with an interpretation of the laws of the Twelve Tables, whence it is called Tripartita, because the first part contained the laws of the Twelve Tables; the second, their interpretation; and the third, the forms of pleadings.

(4) Edictum Perpetuum Juliani. Ofilius, in Julius Cæsar's time, made a compilation of the Prætor's Edicts, which was made perpetual by Salvius Julianus, at the command of the Emperor Adrian, many years later.

(5) The Codes of Gregorius, Hermogenius, and Theodosius the Younger.

Gregorius, or Gregorianus, appears to have collected the imperial constitutions belonging to the intermediate reigns from Adrian to Constantine the Great.

Hermogenianus, or Hermogenes, is supposed to have formed a supplementary collection, and the remaining fragments consist entirely of the constitutions of Diocletian and Maximian.

The compilations are to be esteemed as the works of two private lawyers; the fragments which Cujacius (the most celebrated of all the interpreters of the Roman law) has placed at the end of the Theodosian Code are all the remains of these two productions.

The Theodosian Code collects the constitutions enacted from the time of Constantine the Great (A.D. 312) up to A.D. 438. This work is of considerable magnitude, and is still extant, it is supposed, in an imperfect state, from three hundred and twenty constitutions being found in Justinian's Code, which are sought in vain in that which remains to us of the Theodosian. It is probable that this book, having been compiled by imperial command, had the stamp of authority. There are added to it the newer constitutions of Theodosius, Valentinianus III., Marcianus, Majorianus Severus, and Anthemius. Theodosius the Younger also made another code, divided into seventeen books, called the Theodosian Code, which, however, was never completed.

This Code was followed, until suppressed by Justinian's order, and is not unworthy of the attention of the learned. The editor and expounder of the Theodosian Code is Jacobus Gothofredus, or Godefroy, who is the first and most illustrious of modern civilians. He bestowed his assiduous labour upon this Code for thirty years, and left his great commentary to be completed by Antoine Marville, who published it at Lyons in 1665. It is an immense storehouse of judicial and historical knowledge. Ritter published another edition of it some seventy years afterwards.

Such were the several collections of laws before Justinian's reign. Those made by that emperor's order, which compose the body of the Civil Law in its present state, will now be referred to.

The Imperial, or Civil Law, as consolidated by Justinian, consists of four parts:—

(1) The Institutions, in which the elements of jurisprudence are disposed in a didactic form, its chief and leading objects are explained in a regular series, and the whole arranged in such a way as neither to oppress the student with a multitude and a variety of matter, nor yet to leave him destitute of any necessary helps to facilitate his progress in legal knowledge.

These Institutes were composed chiefly from Gaius, and especially from his Aureorum (of important matters), in order to teach the rudiments of law, and the great principles of equity, and were divided so as to form an elementary introduction to legal study. This division is in four books, each book into several titles, and every title into several parts; the first (not numbered) is called Principium, which is the beginning of the title; and those which follow paragraphs. The Institutes are quoted with the letter I.

or Inst. thus § si adversus, 12 I. De Nuptiis, is nothing more than twelve paragraphs of the title De Nuptiis, which, on reference to the index, will be found to be the tenth of the first book; this is usually now cited I. i. 10, 12.

(2) The Digest or Pandects, which are rules founded on the pure spirit of jurisprudence. The words 'Digest' and 'Pandect' are not synonymous; the former means an abstract of the opinions of lawyers upon certain points of law; the latter, from πᾶν, all, and δέχομαι, to receive, signifies a compendium of the law.

Tribonian received the imperial command De Conceptione Digestorum, A.D. 530, with directions to choose his colleagues; and seventeen were ultimately appointed with absolute power to make such use of preceding works as should appear most conducive to the object in view. Tribonian's library afforded forty of the works of the most renowned civilians, which, with above two thousand other treatises, containing three millions of lines, were abridged into a hundred and fifty thousand; the work was completed in the incredibly short space of three years, and published on the 16th December, A.D. 533, a month after the appearance of the Institutes: its publication having been delayed a month, in order that the elementary work might precede it. —1 Colqu. R. C. L. 66.

The Digest is compiled from the decisions, conjectures, questions, and disputes of the most famous lawyers who had existed up to that time; and thus the substance of many thousand treatises is compressed into one work, which superseded all the then existing Digests, and rendered unnecessary references which had become not only laborious, but almost impossible. The Pandects were divided into fifty books, each book containing several titles divided into laws, and the laws generally into several parts or paragraphs.

Besides this distribution of the Digest into fifty books, it was divided into seven parts, but the reason that induced the emperor to make this division is not known. Some supposed it was done in order to separate the different matters, and include all that related to one subject in one part, consisting of several books. Others attribute it to the superstitious respect of the ancients for the number seven, as the most perfect. This book is variously quoted by the letters D. P. or π, or II., and ff., which latter is supposed to be a corruption of the D with a stroke through the middle, or perhaps a corruption of the Greek π. The most ancient method of quotation is by mentioning the initial words of the law and paragraph with those of the book or title, which necessitates a reference to the general index, with which all modern editions are not furnished; thus, § sin. ver. l. quæsitum est D. de Peculio. The second by citing the initial words and numbers of the law or paragraph with the initial words of the book or title; thus, § sin. ver. 3 l. quæsitum est 30 D. de Peculio. The third by mentioning the number of the law or §, with the initial words of the book or title; thus, § 3 l. 30 D. de Peculio, which is the method adopted by Heineccius. The modern mode, which avoids all reference to the index, is thus, D 15, 1, 30, 3. The first paragraph is not numbered, and is usually quoted by the abbreviation in pr. (in principio), in like manner the last paragraph is sometimes quoted by the words in fin. (fine), or § ult. (paragraphus ultimus). —1 Colq. R. C. L. 68.

(3) The Code. Within six years after the publication of the Code, it was suppressed as imperfect, and replaced by a new edition entitled the Codex Repetitæ Prælectionis, containing 200 of Justinian's own laws, and the 50 decisions on the most obscure and debatable points of jurisprudence. The Code was divided into twelve books, each book into titles, and each title into laws, each law containing several parts. The first is called Principium, being the beginning of the law, and those which follow, paragraphs. The letter C is the invariable mark of the Codex, which may be variously quoted by the initial words of the paragraph, law, book, or title. The nine first books were emphatically called the Codex; the latter three (tres libri) contained the Jus Publicum, which had been separated from the whole at an early period, as of less practical utility, and often bound up with other works.

(4) The Novels, or New Constitutions, which are explanatory of the Code. After Justinian's decease, some parts of his Novels, to the number of 168, were collected and reduced into one volume, together with thirteen of the Greek edicts; which, together, make up the fourth and last division of the Corpus Juris Civilis. The greatest part of these Novels was composed in Greek, owing to the seat of the empire being then at Constantinople, where few or none spoke Latin in perfection; notwithstanding which some of them were published in Latin, and have been noticed by Antonius Augustinus. There are four Latin translations of the Novels. The Novels are quoted by their respective numbers. They are directed either to magistrates, bishops, or citizens of Constantinople, and were of equal force and authority for those private persons to whom they were addressed, and who were enjoined to have them proclaimed and to see them executed according to their form and tenor.

By the Civil Law was governed the greater part of Britain, for the space of about 360 years (from Claudius to Honorius), during which period some of the greatest masters of that law, whose opinions appeared collected in the body of it—as Papinian, Paulus, and Ulpian—sat in the seat of judgment in this island. After the declension of the Roman empire, the Saxon, Danish, and Norman laws superseded a great portion of the Roman law; but not very long afterwards it began again to manifest its influence, and entered largely into the composition of the Common Law. Under the influence of the foreign ecclesiastics who, pouring into this country after the Conquest, long monopolized the administration of the law, great encouragement was given to the adoption of the Civil Law, till the nobility and laity became so jealous of its prosperity, and alarmed at its progress, that a long and fierce feud ensued between the laity, stoutly struggling for the Common Law, and the clergy for the Civil and Canon Law, to which, in the end, they entirely betook themselves; and, withdrawing from the temporal courts, left them to the superintendence of the common lawyers; still, however, keeping an ecclesiastic at the head of affairs, in the high station of chancellor, who, as his office gradually increased in influence and power, was enabled, in time, to introduce much of the spirit of the Civil Law into the administration of Municipal Law, especially in the Courts of Equity.

‘The whole body of the Civil Law’ (remarks Chancellor Kent, 1 Comm. 548) ‘will excite never-failing curiosity, and receive the homage of scholars, as a singular monument of wisdom. It fills such a large space in the eye of human reason; it regulates so many interests of man as a social and civilised being; it embodies so much thought, reflection, experience, and labour; it leads us so far into the recesses of antiquity, and it has stood so long against the waves and weathers of time, that it is impossible, while engaged in the contemplation of the system, not to be struck with some portion of the awe and veneration which are felt in the midst of the solitudes of a majestic ruin.’

Civil List, an annual sum granted by parliament at the commencement of each reign, for the expenses of the royal household and establishment, as distinguished from the general exigencies of the state; it is the provision made for the Crown out of the taxes, in lieu of its proper patrimony, and in consideration of the assignment of that patrimony to the public use. This arrangement has prevailed from the time of the Revolution downwards, though the amount fixed for the civil list has been subject in different reigns to considerable variation. At the commencement of the present reign a civil list was settled upon Her Majesty for life, to the amount of 385,000*l.* per annum, payable quarterly, out of the consolidated fund, of which the sum of 60,000*l.* is assigned for Her Majesty’s privy purse; in return for which grant it was provided, that the hereditary revenues of the Crown (with the exception of the hereditary duties of excise on beer, ale, and cider, which were to be discontinued during the present reign) should, during the present Queen’s life, be carried to and form part of the consolidated fund. The civil list is properly the whole of the sovereign’s revenue in her own distinct capacity; the rest being rather the revenue of the public or its creditors, though collected and distributed again in the name and by the officers of the Crown. The civil list, therefore, now stands in the same place as the hereditary income did formerly; but with this great difference, that it is not chargeable, as the hereditary income was, with the general and public expenses of government.

By the Civil List Act, passed at the Queen’s accession, 1 & 2 Vict. c. 2, Her Majesty is also empowered to grant pensions to the amount of 1200*l.* per annum, chargeable on her civil list revenues, which are intended for the remuneration of those who have just claims on the royal beneficence, or by their services or discoveries have merited the gratitude of their country. See LAND REVENUES OF THE CROWN.

Civil Procedure Acts Repeal Acts, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 59, and 44 & 45 Vict. c. 59.

Civil remedy, one open to a private person as opposed to a criminal prosecution.

Civil service. This term properly includes all functions under the Crown except military and naval functions.

Civilian, one that professes the knowledge of the Civil Law.

Civilization, a law; an act of justice, or judgment which renders a criminal process civil; performed by turning an information into an inquest, or the contrary.—Harris.

Civitas et urbs in hoc differunt, quod incolae dicuntur civitas, urbs verò complectitur ædificia. Co. Litt. 409.—(A city and a town differ in this, that the inhabitants are called the city, but town includes the buildings.)

Clades [fr. clida, cleta, cleia, fr. the Brit., clie and chia, Irish], a wattle or hurdle.—Paroch. Antiq. 575.

Claim [fr. clamer, Fr. ; clamo, Lat., to call], a challenge of interest of anything which is in another's possession, or at least out of a man's own possession, as claim by charter, descent, etc.—Plow. 359 a.

Claim in equity. In simple cases, where there was not any great conflict as to facts, and a discovery from a defendant was not sought, but a reference to chambers was nevertheless necessary before final decree, which would be as of course, all parties being before the Court, the summary proceeding by claim was sometimes adopted, thus obviating the recourse to plenary and protracted pleadings. This summary practice was created by orders 22nd April, 1850, which came into operation on the 22nd May following. See Sm. Ch. Pr. 664. By Consolid. Ord. 1860, viii. r. 4, claims were abolished.

Claim of liberty, a suit or petition to the Queen in the Court of Exchequer, to have liberties and franchises confirmed there by the attorney-general.

Clam delinquentes magis puniuntur quam palam. 8 Co. 127.—(Those sinning secretly are punished more severely than those sinning openly.)

Clam, vi, aut precario, by force, stealth, or importunity.

Claim, Statement of. See STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

Clamea admittenda in itinere per attornatum, an ancient writ by which the king commanded the justices in eyre to admit the claim by attorney of a person who was in the royal service, and could not appear in person.—Reg. Orig. 19.

Clandestine mortgages. Statute of 4 & 5 Wm. & Mary c. 16, A.D. 1692, enacted that if any person, having once mortgaged his lands for a valuable consideration, shall again mortgage the same lands, or any part thereof, to any person, the former mortgage being in force, and shall not discover in writing to the second mortgagee the first mortgage, such mortgagor so again mortgaging his lands shall have no relief or equity of redemption against the second mortgagee. But this act is not to bar of her dower any widow who does not legally join her husband in such second mortgage.

Clarendon (Constitutions of). At a great council held at Clarendon, a village in Wiltshire, A.D. 1164, in the tenth year of the reign of Henry II., a code of laws was brought forward by the king, under the title of the ancient customs of the realm, and known as the famous 'Constitutions of Clarendon'; and as Becket had solemnly promised he would observe what were really such, the king procured the principal propositions in dispute to be enacted, and declared by the council under that denomination. Nothing will enable us to judge so well of the pretensions of the clergy as a perusal of these Constitutions. They are contained in sixteen articles, ten of which were considered by the see of Rome as so hostile to the rights of the clergy, that Pope Alexander, in full consistory, passed a solemn condemnation on them; the other six he tolerated, not as good, but less evil.

These Constitutions were calculated to give a rational limitation to the secular and ecclesiastical judicature; and furnished a basis on which these separate jurisdictions might have been founded, without any inconvenience to the nation, or diminution of the temporal authority; and they were with that view confirmed, A.D. 1176, at a council held at Northampton.—1 Reeve's Hist. c. ii. 75—80.

Classarius [fr. classis, Lat.], a seaman or soldier serving at sea.

Claud [Brit.], a ditch; claudere, to enclose, or turn open fields into enclosures.—Paroch. Antig. 236.

Clause irritant. By this clause, in a deed or settlement, the acts or deeds of a tenant for life or other proprietor, contrary to the conditions of his right, become null and void; and by the 'resolutive' clause such right becomes resolved and extinguished. Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Clause resolutive. See last title.

Clause rolls [rotuli clausi, Lat.], contain all such matters of record as were committed to close writs; these rolls are preserved in the Tower. See CLOSE ROLLS.

Clausula generalis de residuo non ea complectitur quæ non ejusdem sint generis cum iis quæ speciatim dicta fuerunt. Lofft. 419.—(A general clause of reservation does not comprehend those things which may not be of the same kind with those which have been specially expressed.)

Clausula generalis non refertur ad expressa. 8 Co. 154.—(A general clause does not refer to things expressed.)

Clausula quæ abrogationem excludit ab initio non valet.—(A declaration which excludes rescission is inoperative from the first.) Consult Bac. Max. R. 19.

Clausula vel dispositio inutilis per præsuppositionem remotam vel causam ex post facto non fulcitur. Bac. Max. Reg. 21.—(An unnecessary clause or disposition is not rendered valid by a remote presumption or a cause arising after the event.)

Lord Bacon explains clausula vel dispositio inutilis, when the acts or the words work or express no more than the law by intentment would have supplied; and such a clause or disposition is not supported by any subsequent matter which might give effect to the particular words or acts.

Clausula inconsuetæ semper inducunt suspicionem. 3 Co. 81.—(Unusual clauses always excite suspicion.)

Clausum paschiæ, the morrow of the utis, or eight days of Easter; the end of Easter; the Sunday after Easter-day.—2 Inst. 157.

Clausura heyæ, an enclosure of a hedge.

Claves insulæ, the keys of the Island of Man, or twelve persons to whom all ambiguous and weighty causes are referred.

Clavia, a club or mace.

Clavigeratus, a treasurer of a church.—Mon. Angl. t. 1, p. 184.

Clawa, a close or small measure of land.—Mon. Angl. t. 2, p. 250.

Clean hands are required from a plaintiff, i.e., he must be free from reproach in his conduct. But there is this limitation to the rule, that his conduct can only be excepted to in respect of the subject-matter of his claim; everything else is immaterial. The rule can be more frequently applied in Equity than at Common Law. See ILLEGALITY, CONTRACTS. In pari delicto potior est conditio defendentis.

Clear. In asserting an estate to be of any given 'clear' yearly rent, the parties should attend to the meaning of the word 'clear' in an agreement between buyer and seller, which is free of all outgoing, incumbrances, and extraordinary charges not according to the custom of the country, as tithes, poor-rates, church-rates, etc., as these are natural charges on the tenant, but subject nevertheless to the land-tax and all other outgoing which, according to such custom, ought to be borne by the landlord.—Sugd. V. & P., 14th ed., 222.

Clearance, a certificate that a ship has been examined and cleared at the custom-house.

Clear days. If a certain number of clear days be given for the doing of any act, the time is to be reckoned exclusively as well of the first day as the last.—1 Chit. Arch. Pr.

Clearing, among London bankers a method adopted by them for exchanging the drafts of each other's houses, and settling the difference. At fixed hours, each day, a clerk from each banker attends at the clearing-house, bringing all the drafts on the other bankers which have been paid into his house during that day, and delivers to each of the other clerks the obligations he has against his house, receiving from each the obligations due from his own. Balances are struck at the end of the day, the clerk to the Clearing House making up the accounts between each bank. The balances are not paid to or received from the other bankers as formerly, but are settled with the Clearing House, which keeps an account itself at the Bank of England. There is also a Country Clearing House. Consult McLeod on Banking.

Clearing-house, the place where the operation termed clearing is carried on, situated in a corner of Post Office Court, in Lombard Street.

Clementines, the collection of decretals or constitutions of Pope Clement V., made by order of John XXII., his successor, who published it in 1317.

Clement's Inn, an inn of chancery. See INNS OF CHANCERY.

Cler. fil. (clerici filius), the son of a clergyman.

Clergy [fr. clergé, Fr.; clerus, Lat.; κληρος, Gk.], the assembly or body of clerks or ecclesiastics set apart from the rest of the people or laity, in order to superintend the public worship of Almighty God, and the other ceremonies of religion, and to administer spiritual counsel and instruction.

The clergy, in general, were formerly divided into (1) regular, who lived under certain rules, being of some religious order, and were called men of religion, or the religious; such as abbots, priors, monks, etc.; and (2) secular, that did not live under any certain rules of the religious orders, as bishops, deans, parsons, etc. Now, the term comprehends all persons in holy orders, and in ecclesiastical offices, viz., archbishops, bishops, deans, and chapters, archdeacons, rural deans, parsons (either rectors or vicars), and curates, to which may be added parish clerks.—2 Steph Com., 7th ed., 660, and 1 Br. & Had Com. 454 et seq. The declaration of conformity to the church to be taken by clergy on entering on any curacy, benefice, etc., is now regulated by the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 122. The clergy are exempt from serving on juries; they are free from arrest while officiating (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 36). They are restrained from farming more than eighty acres, unless with the sanction of the bishop (1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, s. 28), and they cannot carry on any trade (s. 29). It is a misdemeanour to obstruct or assault them while in the exercise of their duties (24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 36). The clergy of the Episcopalian Church in Scotland are now admitted to officiate and hold benefices in England upon certain conditions. See 27 & 28 Vict. c. 94, and 'The Clerical Disabilities Act, 1870' (33 & 34 Vict. c. 91), by which last-mentioned act the clergy upon resigning their preferments, etc., are, upon certain conditions, enabled to throw off the disabilities, disqualifications, restraints, and prohibitions attaching to their clerical office by virtue of the 41 Geo. III. c. 63; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76, s. 28; and 3 & 4 Vict. c. 86. See Chitty's Statutes, vol. i., tit. 'Church and Clergy'; Phillimore's Ecclesiastical Law. See also PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT; BENEFIT OF CLERGY and COLONIAL CLERGY.

Clerical error, a mistake in copying.

Clerici non ponantur in officiis. Co. Litt. 96.—(Clergymen should not be placed in offices), i.e., in secular offices. See Lofft. 508.

Clerici, vel monachi, ne secularibus negotiis se immisceant. Ferrier's Rom. Hist. 117.—(Clergymen or monks should not mix themselves in secular matters).

Clerico capto per statutum mercatorum, etc., a writ for the delivery of a clerk out of prison, who is taken and incarcerated upon the breach of a statute-merchant.—Reg. Orig. 147.

Clerico convicto commissio gaolæ in defectu ordinarii deliberando, an ancient writ, that lay for the delivery to his ordinary, of a clerk convicted of felony, where the ordinary did not challenge him, according to the privilege of clerks.—Ibid. 69.

Clerico infra sacros ordines constituto, non eligendo in officium, a writ directed to those who have thrust a bailiwick or other office upon one in holy orders, charging them to release him.—Ibid. 143.

Clericum admittendum, a writ of execution directed not to the sheriff, but to the bishop or archbishop, and requiring him to admit and institute the clerk of the plaintiff.—3 Bl. Com. 413.

Clericus ut agricola et mercator, tempore belli, ut oret, colat, et commutet, pace fruatur. 2 Inst. 58.—(Clergymen, husbandmen, and merchants, in order that they may preach, cultivate, and trade, enjoy peace in time of war.)

Clericus non connumeretur in duabus ecclesiis. 1 Rol. R.—(A clergyman should not be appointed to two churches.)

Clerk [fr. cleric, Sax., clericus, Lat.], originally a learned man or man of letters, whence the term is appropriated to churchmen, who were called clerks and now clergymen; the nobility and gentry being bred to the exercise of arms; and none left to cultivate the sciences but ecclesiastics. Where the canon law has full power, the word 'clerk' comprehends sacerdotes, diaconi, subdiaconi, lectores, acolyti, exorcistæ, and ostiarii. The word has been anciently used for a secular priest, in opposition to a religious or a regular.

Clerk of Affidavits in Chancery. The office was abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 27.

Clerk of Arraigns, an assistant to the Clerk of Assize. His duties are in the Crown Court on circuit.

Clerks of Assize, officers who officiate as associates on the circuits. They record all judicial proceedings done by the judges on the circuit.

Clerk of Reports in Chancery, abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 27.

Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. See 37 & 38 Vict. c. 81.

Clerk of the Custodies, of lunatics and idiots, the office of, abolished. See 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 111; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 84; and 5 & 6 Vict. c. 84, s. 10.

Clerk of the House of Commons, an officer of great trust and importance. He, with two assistants, sits at the upper end of the table. The Crown appoints him by letters patent, and when necessary he can appoint a deputy. The appointment of the other clerks in the service of the house is vested in him. It is his duty to make minutes, not of the arguments held in the house, but of the decisions at which it arrives; in other words, to record its votes, resolutions, addresses, orders, reports, divisions, and all other proceedings in which it may be engaged; to see that they are correctly printed and distributed to the members, to read aloud all such documents as the house may order to be read, to perform the duty (without taking the chair) of president or moderator during the choice of a Speaker, putting a question and directing a division in the same manner as a chairman would.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Clerk of Justices of the Peace, Clerk of Petty Sessions, Clerk of Special Sessions. The duties of these officers are, by the Justices Clerks Act, 1877, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 43, s. 5, performed by one salaried clerk, called in the act 'clerk of a petty sessional division.' Such clerk must, by s. 7, be either a barrister of not less than fourteen years' standing, or a solicitor, or have served for not less than seven years as a clerk to a magistrate or to a metropolitan police court.

Clerk of the Patents. By the 37 & 38 Vict. c. 81, provision has been made for the abolition of this office connected with the Great Seal.

Clerk of the Peace. His duties are to officiate at sessions of the peace, to prepare indictments, and to record the proceedings of the justices, and to perform a number of special duties in connection with the affairs of the county. See 4 Step. Com.

Clerk of the Petty Bag. By the 37 & 38

Vict. c. 81, provision has been made for the abolition of this office connected with the Great Seal.

Clerk of Warrants in Common Pleas, for registering deeds in Middlesex. See 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 30, s. 28. And see now Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34.

Clerks of the Enrolments in Chancery. Their offices and those of their deputies are abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 103.

Clerks of Records and Writs. Three officers in Chancery appointed under 5 & 6 Vict. c. 103. See their duties, Sm. Ch. Pr. 28; Dan. Ch. Prac., 4th ed., 686 et seq. They are now officers of the Supreme Court (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 77).

Client [fr. cliens, Lat., said to contain the same element as the verb clueo, to hear or obey, and accordingly compared by Niebuhr with the German word hoeriger, a dependent], a person who seeks advice of a lawyer or commits his cause to the management of one, either in prosecuting a claim, or defending a suit in a court of justice. The relation between solicitor and client, and the power which his situation gives the former over the latter, makes it impossible to be perfectly assured, in certain cases, whether in their transactions the client is a free agent or under influence and imposition; a Court of Equity, therefore, will not let a solicitor take a security from his client, pending a suit, by way of gratuity, however reasonable it might be; and Equity will not allow a solicitor to make a purchase from his client whilst the relation subsists.

Among the Romans, nearly all citizens were comprehended into two classes—patron and client. Their relative rights and duties were as follows:—The patron was the legal adviser of the client; he was the client's guardian and protector, as he was the guardian and protector of his own children; he maintained the client's suit when he was wronged, and defended him when another complained of being wronged by him; in a word, the patron was the guardian of the client's interests both public and private. The client contributed to the marriage portion of the patron's daughter, if the patron were poor; and to his ransom, or that of his children, if taken prisoners; he paid the costs and damages of a suit which the patron lost, and of any penalty in which he was condemned; he bore a part of the patron's expenses incurred by his discharging public duties, or filling the honourable places in the state. Neither party could accuse the other or bear testimony against the other, or give his vote against the other. This relationship between patron and client subsisted for many generations, and resembled in all respects a relationship by blood. It was the glory of illustrious families to have many clients, and to add to the number transmitted to them by their ancestors. Smith's Dict. of Antiq. The word is used in modern practice to signify the relation of the suitor to his solicitor, and also to his counsel; and, besides, the relation of solicitor to counsel.

Clifford's Inn, an Inn of Chancery. See INNS OF CHANCERY.

Cloere [fr. cloaca, Lat.], a prison or dungeon.

Close, a field or piece of land parted off from other fields or common land by banks, hedges, etc. Every entry upon another's land (unless by the owner's leave, or in some very particular cases) is an injury of wrong, for which an action of trespass will lie to recover such damages as a jury may think proper to assess, and this injury is called trespass quare clausum fregit, or trespass for breaking a man's close.

Close rolls, and Close writs, royal letters, under the Great Seal, addressed to particular persons for particular purposes, which, because they are not intended for public inspection, are closed and sealed, and recorded in the close rolls; hence their name.—2 Bl. Com. 346.

Closh, an unlawful game (supposed to be the same as skittles), forbidden by 17 Ed. IV. c. 3, and 33 Hen. VIII. c. 9.

Close of pleadings. In a civil action 'as soon as either party has joined issue upon any pleading of the opposite party simply without adding any further or other pleading thereto, the pleadings as between such parties shall be deemed to be closed.' (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XXV.)

Cloture. The procedure in deliberative assemblies whereby debate is closed. Introduced in the English Parliament in the session of 1882.

Clough, a valley.—Domesday. Also an allowance of two pounds in every hundred-weight for the turn of the scale, on buying goods wholesale by weight.—Lex Mercat. See ALLOWANCE.

C.L.P. Act. Abbreviation for Common Law Procedure Act.

Club-law, regulation by force; the law of arms.

Clubs, or Club-houses, associations to which individuals subscribe for purposes of mutual entertainment and convenience; the affairs of which are generally conducted by a steward or secretary, who acts under the immediate superintendence of a committee. The members of a club, merely as such, are not liable for debts incurred by the committee, for work done or goods supplied to the club. See 2 M. & W. 172.

Clypeus, or Clipeus, a shield; metaphorically one of a noble family. Clypei prostrati, noble families extinct.—Mat. Paris, 463.

Coadjutor, an assistant, helper, or ally; particularly a person appointed to assist a bishop, who from age or infirmity is unable to perform his duty. 52 Geo. III. c. 62; 1 Gibbs. Cod. 155. As to the distinction between an executor and a coadjutor, see Wms. Exs., 7th ed., 253.

Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872. See 35 & 36 Vict. c. 76.

Coal-note, a particular description of promissory note formerly in use in the port of London. See 3 Geo. II. c. 26, ss. 7, 8; repealed by 47 of Geo. III. sess. 2, c. lxxviii, s. 28.

Coal-whippers. See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 101; and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 36.

Coast-guard. See 19 & 29 Vict. c. 83.

Coasting trade. See 12 & 13 Vict. c. 29; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 5; and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 96.

Coat armour, heraldic ensigns, introduced by Richard I. from the Holy Land where they were first invented. Originally they were painted on the shields of the Christian knights, who went to the Holy Land during the crusades, for the purpose of identifying them, some such contrivance being necessary in order to distinguish knights when clad in armour from one another.

Cocherings or Cosherings, Irish exactions or tributes, now reduced to chief rents. See BONAUGHT.

Cocket, a seal belonging to the custom-house, or rather a scroll of parchment, sealed and delivered by the officers of the custom-house to merchants, as a warrant that their merchandizes are entered; likewise a sort of measure.—Fleta, l. 2, c. ix.

Cock-fighting, a criminal offence.—12 & 13 Vict. c. 92; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60.

Cock-pit, a name which used to be given to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the Council-room being built on the old cock-pit of Whitehall Place.

Cocksetus, a boatman, a cockswain.—Covel.

Cocula, a cogne or drinking-cup.

Code, a collection or system of laws. The collection of laws and constitutions, made by order of the Emperor Justinian, is distinguished by the appellation of 'The Code,' by way of eminence. See CODIX JUSTINIANEUS.

The Code Napoleon, or Civil Code of France, proceeding from the French Revolution, and the administration of Napoleon, while First Consul, effected great changes in the laws of that country. In 1800 Bonaparte directed a commission of jurists of the first eminence in France, under the presidency of Cambacérès, to frame a code of laws for the kingdom. The commission consisted of Tronchet, president of the Court of Cassation, Bigot de Préameneu, Portalis, and Malleville. The first code, which was framed, and of which a projet was printed early in 1801, was sent to the different courts of justice for their remarks and suggestions. The remarks and suggestions were also printed, and the whole was then laid before the section of legislation of the Council of State, consisting of Boulay, Berlier, Emmery, Portalis, Roederer, Réal, and Thibaudeau. Bonaparte and Cambacérès, his colleague in the consulship, took an active part in the debate. The various heads of the code were successively discussed, and then laid before the tribunate, where some of the provisions met with considerable opposition. At length the code passed both the tribunate and the legislative body, and was promulgated in 1804, as the 'Code Civil des Français.' When Napoleon became emperor, the name was changed to that of Code Napoleon, by which it is still often designated, though it is now styled by its original name of Code Civil. A Code de Procédure Civile, a Code de Commerce, Code d'Instruction Criminelle, and Code Pénal, were afterwards compiled and promulgated under Bonaparte's administration. To these was subsequently added a Code Forestier, or regulations concerning the forests, which was promulgated under Charles X. in 1827. All these codes are sometimes called 'Les six Codes.' A Code de la Conscription, and a Code Militaire, were also promulgated under Napoleon. All these codes under his administration are sometimes confusedly designated by the name of the Code Napoleon.—Life of Napoleon, by Vieusseux; Myer's Esprit des Institutions Judiciaires.

In British India the law has been partly codified; in Great Britain the only 'codification' is that effected by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 61—'an act to codify the law relating to Bills of Exchange Cheques, and Promissory Notes.'

A Criminal Code (Indictable Offences) Bill was submitted to Parliament in 1878. This Bill, which was drawn by Mr. Justice Stephen when at the Bar, was referred to a Royal Commission consisting of Lord Blackburn, Mr. Justice Lush, Mr. Justice Stephen, and Mr. Justice Barry (an Irish Judge). After the Report of the Commissioners the Bill was re-introduced, and referred to a Select Committee of the House of Commons, whose sittings, however, were cut short by a dissolution of Parliament. For a historical sketch of the subject of codification, see further Holland's Essays on the Form of the Law, 29.

Codex, a roll or volume.

Codex Justinianus. In February of the year A.D. 528, Justinian appointed a commission, consisting of ten persons, to make a new collection of imperial constitutions. The commission was directed to compile one code from those of Gregorianus, Hermogenianus, and Theodosius, and also from the constitutions of Theodosius made subsequently to his code from those of his successors, and from the constitutions of Justinian himself.

The code was divided into twelve books, each book into titles, and each title into laws, each law containing several parts. The first is called Principium, being the beginning of the law, and those which follow, paragraphs, so that the part next to the beginning is the first paragraph: a Greek term, signifying a part of a section of a law that contains one article, the sense whereof is complete.

The first book of the Code treats of the Catholic faith, churches, bishops, ecclesiastical persons, heretics, Jews, pagans, church privileges; then of laws and their different kinds; and lastly, of magistrates.

The second book explains the forms to be observed in commencing a suit; then it treats of restitutions; and after that of compromises, sureties that are to be given, and the oath of calumny.

The third book speaks of those who may stand in judgment of contestatio litis in a case; of holydays; of the jurisdiction wherein we are to pursue our rights; after which it treats of undutiful testaments, undutiful donations, and dowries; of the demand of inheritance; of the real action of services; of the law aquila; of mixed actions; of actions for crimes done by slaves; of gaming; of burying-places, and funeral expenses.

The fourth book begins with the explanation of personal actions, arising out of loans and other causes; after which it speaks of obligations and actions, which have their effect in relation to heirs and other persons bound by them; then it speaks of testimonial or written evidence; of things borrowed for the use of the contract by pledge, and the personal action thereon founded on the senatus consulta Macedonianum, and Velleianum; of compensation; usury; deposits; mandate; partnership; buying and selling; permutation; hiring and mortgages.

The fifth book treats of espousals; donations in contemplation of marriage: then of marriages; women's portions; of the action for the recovery of the dowry; of the donations made between married persons; of estates given in dowry; of alimony due from fathers to their children, and from children to their fathers; of concubines; of natural children, and the ways of making them legitimate; after which it treats of testamentary, legal, or dative tutorship; of those who have a power to appoint or be appointed tutors; of the administration of tutors; and the action arising thereon against them and their heirs and bondmen; then it shows after what manner the office of a tutor ceases; and lastly, it speaks of the alienation of minors' estates.

The sixth book first treats of slaves and theft by freemen, of the rights their patrons have over them and their goods; then it explains at large the praetorial possession called bonorum possessio; after which it explains the whole question of testaments, e.g., institutions and substitutions, preteritions and disinheritances, the right of deliberate refusal of an inheritance, the opening of wills, of codicils, of legacies, and fiduciary bequests; and lastly, of successions to intestate estates.

The seventh book begins with manumissions, after which it treats of matters relating to prescriptions; and then of sentences and appeals of the session; of estates or goods; of the seizure of the debtor's goods and sale thereof; and lastly, of the privileges of the exchequer, and those of dowries; and the revocation of goods alienated to defraud creditors.

The eighth book begins with possessory judgments in law, called *injunctio*s; then treats of pledges and pawns; of stipulations, novations, and delegations; of payments, acceptilations, and evictions: after which it treats of paternal power, emancipations of children, and their ingratitude; it explains the ius postliminii; custom or unwritten law; donations, and lastly, of abrogations and the penalty on celibacy.

The ninth book treats of criminal judgments and the punishment of crimes. The first title explains what relates to accusations, public or private; prisons; how the accusation drops by the death of the accuser or accused. The following titles speak of criminal judgments, which are treasons, adulteries, and other unlawful copulations, public and private violence, rape, homicide; and under this last head of the correction of slaves. The rest of the crimes which are under criminal judgments and are explained in this book are parricide, maleficium, which comprehends poisoning, sacrilege, jugglery, sorcery, and witchcraft, the robbing of sepulchres, and forging certificates and wills, extortion, cheating, sacrilege, and raising sedition and tumult.

Afterwards this book treats of judgments commenced for private offences, such as stealing, or abstracting anything out of another man's inheritance before administration be taken, rapine, cozenage, called crimen-stellionatus, injury, and some others; then it speaks of abolition of accusations proceeding either from the accuser or the accused; and lastly explains punishment, under which is comprised the confiscation of goods.

The tenth book treats of the rights and prerogative of the exchequer; of unclaimed property, and how the same may be incorporated into the prince's domain; of those by whose means such unclaimed property is discovered; after which it speaks of treasurer's tributes levied upon the people; tolls; superimpositions; magistrates called decuriones, and matters relating to them; of the freedom of citizens, of the inhabitants of cities, of the domicile or place of abode of public officers, and the causes which exempt persons from bearing them; of ambassadors; of the different kinds of public offices, and the functions of officers, and of those who were entrusted with civil government and the reformation of manners.

The last two books treat of the rights common to municipal towns with the city of Rome, which were four in number;

The rights of bodies corporate and communities;

The rights of the public; or censor's registers;

The rights of dignities and the military;

The rights of magistrates to execute judgment.

Of these the first two are set forth in the eleventh, and the last two in the twelfth book.

Irnerius (the founder of the celebrated law-school of Bologna in the 12th century), it would appear, first possessed the first nine books of the Codex only; the latter three, which contained the jus publicum, had been separated from the whole at an early period, as of less practical utility, and often bound up with other works. These three latter books are termed the Tres Libri, while the nine first were emphatically called the codex.

Within six years after the publication of the Code, it was suppressed as imperfect, and replaced by a new edition entitled the Codex Repetitæ Prælectionis, containing 200 of Justinian's own laws, and the 50 decisions on the most obscure and debateable points of jurisprudence.

They had the force of law given them by the emperor's constitution placed at the head of the work by way of preface.

The letter C. is invariably the mark of the Codex, which may be variously quoted by the initial words of the paragraph, law, book, or title, thus: § ad fil. l. Meminimus, C. De Jur. Fisc. or Quando et quibus.

By the initial words and numbers of the paragraphs and law, and the initial words of the book and title, thus: § ad fil. l. Meminimus 2, C. De Jur. Fisc. or Quando et quibus.

By the number of the law and paragraph, with the initial words of the book or title, thus: § 1, l. 2, De Jur. Fisc. or Quando et quibus.

The modern method adopts simply numbers, thus: C. 10, 32, 2, l. Pr. stands for the Principium, or first paragraph not numbered, and in fin. or fine for the latter part of the lex.—1 Colqu. R. C. L. 58—60. See CIVIL LAW.

Codex Theodosianus. In the years 429 and 435, Theodosius II., commonly called Theodosius the Younger, appointed commissions consisting first of eight then of sixteen persons, to form into a code all the edicta and leges generales from the time of Constantine, and according to the model of those of Gregorianus and Hermogenianus. Antiochus was at the head of both commissions. It seems, however, to have been originally the design of the emperor, not only to make a code which should be supplementary to, and a continuation of, the Codex Gregorianus and Hermogenianus, but also to complete a work on Roman law from the classical jurists, and the constitutions prior to those of Constantine. However this may be, the first commission did not accomplish this, and what we have now is the code which was compiled by the second commission. This code was completed and promulgated as law in the Eastern empire in 438, and declared to be the substitute for all the constitutions made since the time of Constantine. In the same year the code was forwarded to Valentinian III., the son-in-law of Theodosius, by whom it was laid before the Roman Senate, and confirmed as law in the Western empire.—Smith's Dict. of Antig.

Codicil [fr. codicillus, Lat., a little book, tablet, or writing], a supplement to a will, containing anything which the testator wishes to add, or any explanation or revocation of what the will contains. It must be executed with the same formalities as a will under the Wills Act, 1 Vict. c. 26, by s. 1 of which the term 'will' extends to a codicil.

Codification. The collection of all the principles of any system of law into one body after the manner of the Codex Justinianus and other Codes. See CODE.

Co-emptio, the sale of a wife to a husband—Civil Law. Consult Colquhoun's Roman Civil Law, Vol. I., s. 558.

Co-emption, the act of purchasing the whole quantity of any commodity.

Cofferer of the Queen's Household, a principal officer of the royal establishment, next under the controller, who, in the counting-house and elsewhere, had a special charge and oversight of the other officers, whose wages he paid. He passed his accounts in the Exchequer.—30 Eliz. c. 7.

Cogitationis poenam nemo meretur. 2 Inst. Jur. Civ. 658.—(No man deserves punishment for a thought.) But see TREASON.

Cognati, relations by the mother's side.

Cognitione. See COSENAGE.

Cognisor, and Cognisee. The former is he who passed or acknowledged a fine of lands or tenements to another; the latter is the person to whom the fine of the lands, etc., was acknowledged.—32 Hen. VIII. c. 5.

Cognitionibus mittendis, an abolished writ to a Justice of the Common Pleas, or other, who has power to take a fine, who having taken the fine defers to certify it, commanding him to certify it.—Reg. Orig. 68.

Cognitor, a person appointed by a party to a suit to conduct it for him.—Civil Law.

Cognizance, or Conusance, the hearing of a thing judicially; also an acknowledgment of a fine; and in replevin it was the pleading of a defendant who acted as bailiff, etc., to another, in making a distress, by which he alleged the right or title to be in that person by whose command he acted. If the person who ordered the distress was sued, his pleading was called an Avowry.—Step. Plead. 225. Cognizance of pleas is a privilege granted by the Crown to a city or town, to hold pleas of all contracts, etc., within the liberty of the franchise; and when a person is impleaded for such matters in the Courts of Westminster, the mayor, etc., of such franchise may ask cognizance of the plea, and demand that it shall be determined before them; but if the Courts at Westminster are possessed of the plea before cognizance be demanded, it is then too late.—Ternnes de la Ley.

Cognizance (Judicial), knowledge upon which a judge is bound to act without having it proved in evidence: as the public statutes of the realm, the ancient history of the realm, the order in course of proceedings in parliament, the privileges of the House of Commons, the existence of war with a foreign state, the several seals of the Queen, the Superior Courts and their jurisdiction, and the privileges of their officers, and many other things. A judge is not bound to take cognizance of current events, however notorious, nor of the law of other countries. See Roscoe's Nisi Prius.

Cognomen majorem est ex sanguine trahunt, hoc intrinsecum est; agnomen extrinsecum ab eventu. 6 Co. 65.—(The cognomen is derived from the blood of ancestors, and is intrinsic; and agnomen arises from an event, and is extrinsic.)

Cognovit actionem (he has confessed the action), a defendant's written confession of an action brought against him, to which he has no available defence. It is usually upon condition that he shall be allowed a certain time for the payment of the debt or damages, and costs. It is supposed to be given in Court, and it impliedly authorizes the plaintiff's attorney to do everything necessary in order to obtain judgment.

The 3 Geo. IV. c. 39, s. 3, enacts that every cognovit given in the Court of Queen's Bench, or a true copy thereof, if given in any other Court, shall, together with an affidavit of the time of the execution thereof, be filed within 21 days, or be void against the assignees, if the defendant become bankrupt. The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 66, provides that in addition, another book or index shall be kept, containing the names, additions, and descriptions of the defendants, etc., giving any cognovit, but containing no farther particulars. This statute was passed to prevent frauds on creditors by a secret cognovit. See 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, s. 136. By 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 24, it is provided, that, 'after the commencement of this act, a warrant of attorney to confess judgment in any personal action, or cognovit actionem given by any person, shall not be of any force unless there is present some attorney of one of the Superior Courts on behalf of such person, expressly named by him, and attending at his request to inform him of the nature and effect of such warrant or cognovit before the same is executed, which attorney shall subscribe his name as a witness to the due execution thereof, and thereby declare himself to be attorney for the person executing the same, and state that he subscribes as such attorney'; and by sect. 25, it is provided, that a warrant of attorney to confess judgment, or cognovit actionem not executed in manner aforesaid, shall not be rendered valid by proof that the person executing the same did, in fact, understand the nature and effect thereof, or was duly informed of the same. These provisions come in place of those contained in the 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 9, 10, which are repealed by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 83. The 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, also contains various provisions in regard to the filing of warrants of attorney, cognovits, and judge's orders.—2 Chit. Arch. Proc.

Cohæredes una persona cœsuntur, propter unitatem juris quod habent. Co. Litt. 163.—(Co-heirs are deemed as one person, on account of the unity of right which they possess.)

Co-heir, one of several to whom an inheritance descends.

Co-heiress, a woman who has an equal share of an inheritance with another woman.

Cohuagium, a tribute made by those who meet promiscuously in a market or fair.—Du Cange.

Coif [fr. coiffe, Fr.], the badge of serjeants-at-law, who are called serjeants of the coif, from the lawn coif they wore on their heads under their caps when created serjeants.—Cowel. See SERJEANT, and consult Manning's Serviens ad legem.

Coigne, horse-meat, man's meat, and money at pleasure.—Irish Term.

Coin [fr. coign, Fr.; cuneus, Lat., a wedge], a piece of metal stamped with certain marks, and made current at a certain value. Strictly speaking, coin differs from money, as the species differs from the genus. Money is any matter, whether metal, paper, beads, shells, etc., which has currency as a medium in commerce. Coin is a particular species, always made of metal, and struck according to a certain process called coining. The coining of money is in all States the prerogative of the sovereign power; and, as money is the medium of commerce, it is the Crown's prerogative and monopoly as arbiter of domestic commerce, to give it authority or make it current.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 99, it is made a felony to counterfeit coin (s. 2); to colour or gild, so as to make a resemblance to gold or silver coin (s. 3); to impair or lighten coin (s. 4); to have in unlawful possession filings or clippings produced by impairing or lightening coin (s. 5); to buy or sell or import or utter counterfeit coin (ss. 6, 7, and 8). There are numerous other provisions tending to the suppression of the manufacturing, importing, and uttering of counterfeit coin.

By 33 & 34 Vict. c. 10, the laws relating to the coinage and Her Majesty's Mint are consolidated and amended. Amongst other provisions, that act fixes the standard of all coins as specified in the first schedule. See TENDER.

Coke, Sir Edward, Chief Justice of England in the time of James I. Author of the Institutes, and of an edition of Littleton's Treatise on Tenures, and of Reports (see REPORTS). The greatest text-writer and reporter among English lawyers.

Cold-water-ordeal, the trial which was ordinarily used for the common sort of people, who, having a cord tied about them under their arms, were cast into a river; if they sank to the bottom until they were drawn up, which was in a very short time, then were they held guiltless; but such as did remain upon the water were held culpable, being, as they said, of the water rejected and kept up.—Verstegan.

Coliberts, tenants in socage, particularly such villains as were manumitted or made freemen; but they had not an absolute freedom, for though their condition was better than that of servants, yet they had superior lords, to whom they paid certain duties, and in that respect they might be called servants, though they were of middle condition, between freemen and servants.—Du Cange.

Collate (v.a.). See COLLATION.

Collateral, indirect, sideways, that which hangs by the side; applied in several ways, thus:—collateral assurance, that which is made over and above the deed itself; collateral consanguinity or kindred, which descend from the same stock or ancestor as the lineal relations, but do not descend from each other, as the issue of two sons; collateral issue, where a criminal convict pleads any matter allowed by law, in bar of execution, as pregnancy, pardon, an act of grace, or diversity of person, viz., that he or she is not the same that was attainted, etc., the issue upon which when taken is tried by a jury instanter; collateral security, where a deed is made of other property, besides that already mortgaged, for the better safety of the mortgagee, or a bill of exchange given, or pledge deposited to secure a pre-existing debt; collateral warranty was where the heir's title to the land neither was, nor could have been, derived from the warranting ancestor, as where a younger brother released to his father's disseisor with warranty, this was collateral to the elder brother. The whole doctrine of collateral warranty seems repugnant to plain and unsophisticated reason and justice; and even its technical grounds are so obscure that the ablest legal writers are not agreed upon the subject.—Wright's Tenures, 168; Gilbert's Tenures, 143. But now warranty is abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 14.

Collatio bonorum (a contribution of goods). Where a portion of money, advanced by the father to a son or daughter, is brought into hotchpot, in order to have an equal distributory share of his personal estate at his death, according to 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 10.

Collation, the comparison of a copy with its original to ascertain its correctness; or the report of the officer who made the comparison.

Collation of seals, when upon the same label one seal was set on the back or reverse of the other.

Collation to a benefice, where the bishop and patron are one and the same person, in which case the bishop cannot present the clergyman to himself, but does, by the one act of collation or conferring the benefice, the whole that is done in common cases both by presentation and institution.—2 Bl. Com. 22.

Collatione factâ uni post mortem alterius, a writ directed to justices of the Common Pleas, commanding them to issue their writ to the bishop, for the admission of a clerk in the place of another presented by the Crown, where there had been a demise of the Crown during a suit; for judgment once passed for the king's clerk, and he dying before admittance, the king may bestow his presentation on another.—Reg. Orig. 31.

Collatione Heremitagii, a writ whereby the king conferred the keeping of an hermitage upon a clerk.—Reg. Orig. 303, 308.

Collative advowson. See ADVOWSON.

Collegatory, a person who has a legacy left to him in common with other persons.

College [fr. colligo, Lat., to bring to], a civil corporation, company, or society of men, having certain privileges, and endowed with certain revenues, founded by royal license. An assemblage of several of these colleges is called an university.

College of Doctors of Laws, exercent in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts, called Doctors' Commons. See further 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, ss. 116, 117, and see ADVOCATE.

Collegia, the guild of a trade.—Civil Law.

Collegiate Church, a religious house built and endowed for a society or body corporate, a dean or other president and secular priest, as canons or prebendaries, independently of any cathedral.

Collegium est societas plurium corporum simul habitantium. Jenk. Cent. 229.—(A college is a society of several persons dwelling together.)

Colliery. The following statutes for the regulation and inspection of coal mines in Great Britain, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 99; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 151; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 79, were consolidated, with amendments by the Coal Mines Regulation Act, 1872.

Colligendum bona defuncti (Letters ad). In defect of representatives and creditors to administer to an intestate, etc., the Probate Court may commit administration to such discreet person as it approves of, or grant him these letters to collect the goods of the deceased, which neither makes him executor nor administrator; his only business being to keep the goods in his safe custody, and to do other acts for the benefit of such as are entitled to the property of the deceased.—1 Wms. Ex., 7th ed., 275, 445.

Collision of Ships, the striking or running foul of one ship against another. The remedy is either an action at law, or a suit in the Court of Admiralty. The possibilities under which a collision may occur, and the rules acted on by the Court of Admiralty, have been thus stated by Lord Stowell in 2 Dods. 85:—'In the first place, it may happen without blame being imputable to either party: as where the loss is occasioned by a storm or any other vis major, in that case the misfortune must be borne by the party on whom it happens to light, the other not being responsible to him in any degree. Secondly, a misfortune of this kind may arise where both parties are to blame, where there has been a want of due diligence or of skill on both sides; in such a case the rule of law is, that the loss must be apportioned between them, as having been occasioned by the fault of both of them. Thirdly, it may happen by the misconduct of the suffering party only, and then the rule is that the sufferer must bear his own burthen. Lastly, it may have been the fault of the ship which ran the other down, and in that case the injured party would be entitled to an entire compensation from the other.'

In a Court of Common Law the same rule prevailed in the 1st, 3rd, and 4th cases; but in the 2nd, viz., where both parties are to blame, the rule was that if the negligence of both substantially contributed to the accident, neither could maintain an action against the other; but that if one of them by the exercise of ordinary care might have avoided the consequences of the other's negligence, the former was liable for any injury that the latter might have sustained. See Maude and Pollock on Shipping; Tuff v. Warman, 2 C. B. N. S. 740, and Wms. & Bruce Adm. Pr. 72. But by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25 (9), it is provided that in any cause or proceeding for damages arising out of a collision between two ships, if both ships are found to have been in fault, the rules hitherto in force in the Court of Admiralty, so far as they have been at variance with the rules in force in the Courts of Common Law shall prevail.

In pursuance of the Merchant Shipping Act Amendment Act, 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 63), Orders of Council were issued in 1863 and 1879, promulgating Regulations for Preventing Collisions at Sea, which contain rules concerning lights, rules concerning fog signals, steering, and sailing rules. As to the Mersey, see 37 & 38 Vict. c. 52.

Collistrigium, a pillory.

Collitigant, one who litigates with another.

Collocation, the order in which creditors are placed and paid.—Fr. Law.

Colloquium, a talking together ; a conversation. 2. A term in pleading applied to the statement in declaration for libel or slander, that the libellous or slanderous imputation had reference to the plaintiff.

Collusion [collusio, Lat., fr. colludo, to play together, to unite in the same play or game, and thus to unite for the purposes of fraud or deception], a deceitful agreement or compact between two or more persons to do some act in order to prejudice a third person, or for some improper purpose. Collusion in judicial proceedings is a secret agreement between two persons that the one should institute a suit against the other, in order to obtain the decision of a judicial tribunal for some sinister purpose, and appears to be of two kinds. (1) When the facts put forward as the foundation of the sentence of the Court do not exist. (2) When they exist, but have been corruptly preconceived for the express purpose of obtaining the sentence. In either case the judgment obtained by such collusion is a nullity. See The Duchess of Kingston's case, 2 Smith's Leading Cases. Collusion between the petitioner and either of the respondents in presenting or prosecuting a suit for dissolution of marriage, is a bar to such suit.—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, ss. 30 & 31.

Colonial Attorneys Relief Act, 1874.—37 & 38 Vict. c. 41.

Colonial clergy. As to the position of clergy ordained in the colonies when they come to England, see 59 Geo. III. c. 60, which enacted that no such clergyman should officiate or hold preferment in England without the consent of the archbishop of the province, and of the bishop of the diocese ; and see 3 & 4 Vict. c. 33 ; 5 Vict. c. 6 ; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 4 ; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 52 ; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 49 ; 26 & 27 Vict. c. 121 ; and 27 & 28 Vict. c. 94 ; and particularly 'The Colonial Clergy Act, 1874,' 37 & 38 Vict. c. 77.

Colonial coinage. By 29 & 30 Vict. c. 65, the Queen in Council may make gold coined in the colonies legal tender in England, and may revoke such order. See TENDER.

Colonial dioceses. Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Colombo, Mauritius, Victoria, Hong Kong, Labuan, Cape Town, Sierra Leone, Natal, Graham's Town, Quebec, Montreal, Toronto, Nova Scotia, Fredericton, Newfoundland, Rupert's Land, Jamaica, Barbadoes, Antigua, Guiana, Sydney, Newcastle, Melbourne, Adelaide, Tasmania, New Zealand, Gibraltar, Jerusalem, etc., etc.

Colonial Governors (Pensions) Acts. See 28 & 29 Vict. c. 113, and 35 & 36 Vict. c. 29.

Colonial lands and casual revenues of the Crown.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 39.

Colonial laws repugnant to the home laws or statutes are void.—7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 22, and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 190. The validity of laws passed by colonial legislatures is established and defined by the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 63, by which it is enacted that no colonial law shall be void for repugnancy to the law of England, unless it be repugnant to the provisions of some act of parliament extending to the colony, or to any order made under authority of such act, or having in the colony the force and effect of such act. In the case of such repugnancy the colonial law shall be void to the extent thereof and not otherwise. By the same act all colonial legislatures are empowered to establish courts of judicature, and to abolish and re-constitute the same, and to make laws respecting the constitution, powers, and procedure of the legislature in each colony respectively in accordance with the requirements of any act of parliament in force in every such colony.

The certificate of the clerk, or other proper officer of a legislative body in any colony that the document to which it is attached is a true copy of a colonial law assented to by the Governor, or of any bill reserved for the signature of Her Majesty's pleasure by the Governor shall be prima facie evidence that such document is so, and that the facts are true ; and any proclamation purporting to be published by the authority of any Governor in any newspaper in the colony, and signifying Her Majesty's disallowance of any colonial law, or her assent to any reserved toll, shall be prima facie evidence of such disallowance or assent. See COLONY.

Colonial Courts Jurisdiction Act, 1874. See 37 & 38 Vict. c. 27.

Colonial lighthouses.—18 & 19 Vict. c. 91.

Colonial Marriages Validity Act, 28 & 29 Vict. c. 64. All the laws made or to be made by the legislature of any of Her Majesty's possessions for the purpose of establishing the validity of marriages previously contracted therein, are to have the same effect within all parts of Her Majesty's dominions as within the place where they were made.

Colonial office, the department of State through which the Sovereign appoints Colonial Governors, etc., and communicates with them. Until the year 1854, the Secretary for the Colonies was also Secretary for War. See WAR OFFICE.

Colonus, a husbandman or villager, who was bound to pay yearly a certain tribute ; or, at certain times in the year, to plough some part of the lord's land ; hence clown.

Colony [fr. colo, Lat., to cultivate], a settlement in a foreign country possessed and cultivated, either wholly or partially, by immigrants and their descendants, who have a political connection with and subordination to the mother-country, whence they emigrated. In other words, it is a place peopled from some more ancient city or country.

England was not the first among European nations that planted settlements in parts beyond Europe. But by her own colonization, and by the conquests of the settlements of other nations, she has now acquired a more extensive dominion of colonies and dependencies than any other nation. The colonies of Great Britain exceed in number, extent, and value those of every other country.

Colonies are acquired either (1) by conquest, (2) by cession under treaty, (3) by occupancy, as Newfoundland, New South Wales, and Van Dieman's Land, and (4) by hereditary descent. By far the greater part of the colonies was acquired by conquest or cession. In the first two cases, the territory retains its former laws until they are altered by the home government, i.e., the Queen in Council, yet subordinate to the authority of parliament. The alterations may be general or partial, leaving the old laws still in force touching matters unprovided for. In the third case (which is strictly a plantation), the English laws, so far as they are applicable to the condition of an infant colony, are ipso facto in force in such colony, for there can be no existing laws to contest the superiority; and besides, the occupants could not have any power to establish laws independently of the mother-country, to whom their allegiance is still due ; and they also carry with them the laws of their country, which are their inalienable birthright. Such a colony is, then, not subject to legislation by the Crown, nor is a country which comes to the Crown by title of descent. Such colonies retain their own laws till changed by the act of the imperial parliament, to whose legislative authority every kind of colony is subject, as portions of the British dominions, and whose protection they have a right to demand, for the resistance of hostile aggression, and the peaceful possession of their territory. As a general rule, an act of parliament must name the colony in order to bind it, but there are exceptions.—Clark's Col. Law ; Burge's Col. and For. Law. See COLONIAL LAWS. See also the Act 26 & 27 Vict. c. 84, confirming acts of colonial legislatures declaring or altering the constitution of such legislatures, or of any branch thereof, or the mode of appointing or electing the members of the same ; and 'The Courts (Colonial) Jurisdiction Act, 1874' (37 & 38 Vict. c. 27).

Colorado Beetle. An insect indigenous to Colorado, one of the United States of America, so destructive to vegetables that an act, called the Destructive Insects Act, 1877, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 68, has been passed to prevent its introduction into Great Britain by means of Orders in Council prohibiting or regulating the landing of potatoes, etc., likely to introduce it, and giving powers to destroy crops on which it may be found, and compensation to persons whose crops may be destroyed accordingly.

Colour, a term of the ancient rhetoricians, and early adopted into the language of pleading. It was an apparent or prima facie right; and the meaning of the rule, that pleadings in confession and avoidance should give colour, was that they should confess the matter adversely alleged, to such an extent, at least, as to admit some apparent right in the opposite party, which required to be encountered and avoided by the allegation of new matter. Colour was either express, i.e., inserted in the pleading, or implied, which was naturally inherent in the structure of the pleading.—Steph. Plead. 233. Express colour was abolished by C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 64.

Colour of office, an act unjustly done by the countenance of an office, being grounded upon corruption, to which the office is as a shadow and colour.—Plowd. 64.

Colourable alteration, an alteration made only for the purpose of evading the law (of copyright for instance).

Colpices, young poles, which being cut down, are made levers or lifters.—Blount.

Colpo, a small wax candle.

Combarones, the fellow barons or commonalty of the Cinque Ports.

Combat, trial by single. See BATTEL.

Combaterre [fr. cumbe, Sax. ; kum, Br. ; comb, Eng.], a valley or piece of low ground between two hills.—Ken. Glos.

Combe [ccom, W.], a narrow valley.

Combination, an assembly of workmen met to perpetrate unlawful acts. The acts on this subject, 6 Geo. IV. c. 129 ; 22 Vict. c. 34 ; and 9 Geo. IV. c. 31 ; are greatly altered by the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875.

Combustibility, Præternatural, or Spontaneous combustion. A question may arise in cases where persons are found burnt to death, whether there can be such a thing as præternatural combustibility of the human body ?

Combustio pecuniæ, the ancient method of testing mixed and corrupt money, paid into the Exchequer, by melting it down.

Come ceo; as well for this.

Comes, a count, or superior officer of a county.

Cominus [Lat.], hand-to-hand; in personal contact.

Comitatu commissio, a writ or commission whereby a sheriff is authorized to enter upon the charges of a county.—Reg. Orig. 295.

Comitatu et castro commissio, a writ by which the charge of a county, together with the keeping of a castle, is committed to the sheriff.—Ibid.

Comitatus, a county.

Comites, earls, courtiers, or companions.

Comitissa [Lat.], a countess.

Comitiva, a companion or fellow-traveller; a troop or company of robbers.

Comity of nations, the most appropriate phrase to express the true foundation and extent of the obligation of the laws of one nation within the territories of another. It is derived altogether from the voluntary consent of the latter; and it is inadmissible, when it is contrary to its known policy, or prejudicial to its interests. In the silence of any positive rule, affirming or denying, or restraining the operation of foreign laws, courts of justice presume the tacit adoption of them by their own government, unless repugnant to its policy, or prejudicial to its interests. It is not the comity of the courts, but the comity of the nation, which is administered and ascertained in the same way, and guided by the same reasoning, by which all other principles of the municipal law are ascertained and guided.—Story's Conflict of Laws, s. 38, and Westlake's Pr. Int. Law.

Commandery, a manor or chief messuage with lands and tenements thereto appertaining, which belonged to the priory of St. John of Jerusalem, in England; he who had the government of such a manor or house was styled the commander, who could not dispose of it, but to the use of the priory, only taking thence his own sustenance, according to his degree. The manors and lands belonging to the priory of St. John of Jerusalem were given to Henry the Eighth by 32 Hen. VIII. c. 20, about the time of the dissolution of abbeys and monasteries; so that the name only of commanderies remains, the power being long since extinct.

Commandite or in commendam, partnerships in France which are limited where the contract is between one or more persons, who are general partners, and jointly and severally responsible, and one or more other persons, who merely furnish a particular fund or capital stock, and thence are called commanditaires, or commendataires, or partners en commandite; the business being carried on under the social name or firm of the general partners only, composed of the names of the general or complimentary partners, the partners en commandite being liable to losses only to the extent of the funds of capital furnished by them.—Code of Commerce of France, art. 23, 24; Pothier, de Société, n. 60, 102. These partnerships are allowed in several of the States of America.—3 Kent's Com. 35. The 28 & 29 Vict. c. 86, s. 1, provides that the advance of money by way of loan to a person engaged in trade upon a contract in writing that the lender shall receive a rate of interest varying with the profits, or shall receive a share of the profits, shall not 'of itself' constitute the lender a partner with the borrower. In the session of 1881 a Bill to introduce commandite into this country was brought in by the Government, but not proceeded with.

Commandment, order, direction; also the offence of inducing another to transgress the law, or do anything contrary to it. The civilians call it mandatum.

Commarchio, the confines of the land.

Commenda, Commendam, or Ecclesia commendata, a living commended by the Crown to the care of a clerk, to hold till a proper pastor is provided for it. This may be temporary for one, two, or three years, or perpetual, being a kind of dispensation to avoid the vacancy of the living, and is called a commendam retinere, and has been usually granted to bishops in the poorer sees to aid the deficiency in their episcopal revenue. There was also a commendam recipere, which was to take a benefice de novo in the bishop's own gift, or the gift of some other patron consenting to the same; and this is the same to him as institution and induction are to another clerk.—Mireh. on Adv. c. vii. s. 6. But now by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 77, s. 18, no ecclesiastical dignity, office, or benefice shall be held in commendam by any bishop unless he shall have held the same when the act passed; and every commendam thereafter granted, whether to retain or to receive, and whether temporary or perpetual, shall be absolutely void.

Commenda est facultas recipiendi et retinendi beneficium contra jus positivum à supremâ potestate. Moore, 905.—(A commendam is the power of receiving and retaining a benefice contrary to positive law, by supreme authority.)

Commendators, secular persons upon whom, during Popery, ecclesiastical benefices were bestowed in Scotland; called so, because the benefices were commended and intrusted to their supervision.

Commendatory, he who holds a church living or preferment in commendam.

Commendatory letters, such as are written by one bishop to another on behalf of any of the clergy, or others of his diocese travelling thither, that they may be received among the faithful; or that the clerk may be promoted; or necessities administered to others, etc.

Commendatum. See DEPOSIT.

Commendatus, one who lives under the protection of a great man.—Spelm.

Commerce [fr. commutatio mercium, Lat.], the intercourse of nations in each other's produce and manufactures, in which the superfluities of one are given for those of another, and then re-exchanged with other nations for mutual wants. There is a distinction between commerce and trade; the former relates to our dealings with foreign nations, colonies, etc.; the latter to mutual dealings at home.

The affairs of commerce are regulated by the Law Merchant, Lex Mercatoria, or Commercial Law. 'Lord Mansfield,' said Mr. Justice Buller (Lickbarrow v. Mason, 2 T. R. 631), 'may be truly said to be the founder of the commercial law of this country. We all know that, from his time, the great study has been to find out some certain general principles which shall be known to all mankind, to rule not only one particular case, but to serve as a guide to the future. Most of us have heard those principles stated, reasoned upon, enlarged, and explained, till we have been lost in admiration at the strength and stretch of the human understanding.' Commercial law is based upon very different principles from those which govern real property law, and is derived from a variety of sources and authorities—from the custom of merchants, from international law, from the different maritime codes of ancient Europe, and from the imperial code of Rome.—See McCull. Com. Dict.

Commercium jure gentium commune esse debet, et non in monopolium et privatum parvorum questum convertendum. 3 Inst. 181.—(Commerce, by the law of nations, ought to be common, and not converted to monopoly and the private gain of a few.)

Commissariat, the whole body of officers in the commissaries' department.

Commissary, one who is sent or delegated to execute some office or duty as the representative of his superior. In ecclesiastical law, an officer of the bishop, who exercises spiritual jurisdiction in distant parts of the diocese. In military affairs, an officer who has the charge of furnishing provisions, clothing, etc., for an army.

Commission, the warrant or letters-patent which all persons exercising jurisdiction, either ordinary or extraordinary, have, to authorize them to hear or determine any cause or action, or do other lawful things, as the commission of the judges, etc. There was formerly a High Commission Court founded on 1 Eliz. c. 1, but it was abolished in the reign of Charles II., though an impotent attempt was made to re-establish it during the succeeding reign.

In commerce, the order by which any one traffics or negotiates for another; also the per-centage given to factors or agents for transacting the business of others.

Commission of Anticipation, an authority under the Great Seal to collect a tax or subsidy before the day.—15 Hen. VIII.

Commission of Array, issued to send into every county officers to muster or set in military order the inhabitants. The introduction of commissions of lieutenancy, which contained in substance the same powers as these commissions, superseded them.—2 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 585.

Commission of Assize. See ASSIZE.

Commission of Bankruptcy, the authority formerly given by the Lord Chancellor to certain commissioners, empowering them to proceed in the bankruptcy of a trader. Abolished by 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 56, s. 12.

Commission of Charitable Uses.—43 Eliz. c. 4. See CHARITABLE USES.

Commission-day, the opening day of the assize; so called because on that day the Royal Commission to the Judges is read in Court.

Commission del Credere, where an agent of a seller undertakes to guarantee to his principal the payment of the debt due by the buyer. The phrase del credere is borrowed from the Italian language, in which its signification is equivalent to our word guarantee or warranty.—Story's Agency, 28.

Commission of Delegates, issued under the Great Seal to certain persons, usually lords, bishops, and judges, to sit upon an appeal to the king in the Court of Chancery, where a sentence was given in any ecclesiastical cause by the archbishop.—25 Hen. VIII. c. 19, repealed by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 92.

Commission of Lunacy, issued out of Chancery, to inquire whether a person alleged to be a lunatic be so or not. See IDIOTS AND LUNATICS.

Commission of Patents for Inventions. See LETTERS-PATENT.

Commission of Railways, appointed by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 105; but this act is repealed by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 64, and the jurisdiction restored to the Board of Trade. But see now RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

Commission of Rebellion, an attaching process, formerly issuable out of Chancery, to enforce obedience to a process or decree; abolished by Order of 26th August, 1841.

Commission of Sewers, directed to certain persons to see drains and ditches well kept and maintained in the marshy parts of England for the better conveyance of the water into the sea, and the preservation of the grass upon the land.—13 Eliz. c. 9.

Commission of the Peace, issues under the Great Seal for the appointment of justices of the peace.

Commission to inquire of Faults against the Law, anciently set forth on extraordinary occasions and corruptions.

Commission to Examine Witnesses, was under 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 35, issued in Chancery suits, where the witnesses resided abroad; and at common law under the 1 Wm. IV. c. 22, s. 4.

Now by the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XXXVII., it is provided that the court or a judge may at any time for sufficient reason order that any particular fact or facts may be proved by affidavit, or that the affidavit of any witness may be read at the hearing or trial, on such conditions as the court or judge may think reasonable, or that any witness whose attendance in court ought from some sufficient cause to be dispensed with, be examined by interrogatories or otherwise before a commissioner or examiner; provided that where it appears to the court or judge that the other party bonâ fide desires the production of a witness for cross-examination, and that such witness can be produced, an order shall not be made authorising the evidence of such witness to be given by affidavit (r. 1). Upon any motion, petition, or summons evidence may be given by affidavit; but the court or a judge may, on the application of either party, order the attendance for cross-examination of the person making any such affidavit (r. 2).

Commission to take answer in Chancery, issued when defendant lives abroad, to swear him to such answer.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 21. Obsolete. See Jud. Acts, 1873, 1875.

Commission to take up Men for War, issued to press or force men into the Queen's service.—Fost. Rep. 154.

Commission merchant. A factor is commonly said to be an agent employed to sell goods or merchandize, consigned or delivered to him by or for his principal for a compensation commonly called factorage or commission. Hence he is often called a commission-merchant or consignee; and the goods received by him for sale are called a consignment.—Story's Agency, 28.

Commissioner, a person authorized by letters-patent, act of parliament, or other lawful warrant, to examine any matters, or execute any public office, etc. The Commissioners Clauses Act, 1847, 10 Vict. c. 16, regulates the qualification, etc., of commissioners, who under an act of parliament execute undertakings of a public nature; and in particular enacts by s. 60 that they are not to be personally liable.

Commissioners of Northern Lighthouses. 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, pt. vi., s. 389 et seq., 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, ss. 43—8.

Commissioners of Turnpike Roads. See 3 Geo. IV. c. 126, ss. 61, 62, 65, and 4 Geo. IV. c. 95, s. 32. And 3 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 131.

Commissioners of Woods, Forests, Land Revenues, Works, and Buildings, Board of, established by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 1, and divided into a board of 'Commissioners of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues,' 15 & 16 Vict. c. 62 (with power to the Crown to appoint in lieu of them a Surveyor-General of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues), and a board of 'Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works and Public Buildings,' which has the management of the royal parks in and near London.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 42, s. 21. See 29 & 30 Vict. c. 39, s. 46, and c. 62, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 84, and 2 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 535.

Commissioners to administer Oaths. Attorneys at Common Law were appointed such commissioners under 29 Car. II. c. 5, subject to certain later acts and rules. Solicitors in Chancery were appointed to discharge duties formerly belonging to the office of Master Extraordinary (16 & 17 Vict. c. 78), and were not eligible for the appointment until they were of ten years' standing. By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 82, every person who at the commencement of the Act was authorised to administer oaths in any court whose jurisdiction is transferred to the High Court of Justice (see s. 16) became a commissioner for the like purpose in all matters pending at any time in the High Court or the Court of Appeal. The appointments are made by the Lord Chancellor (s. 84).

Commissoria lex, the term applied to a clause often inserted in conditions of sale, by which a vendor reserved to himself the privilege of rescinding the sale, if the purchaser did not pay his purchase-money at the time agreed on.—Dig. 18, tit. 3.

Commitment, the sending a person to prison by warrant or order, either for a crime, contempt, or contumacy.—4 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 354 et seq.; also the committing to prison by any court for a term not exceeding six weeks, or until payment of the sum due, any person who makes default in payment of a judgment debt. See the Act for the Abolition of Imprisonment for Debt, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 5; and also COUNTY COURTS.

Committal. See COMMITMENT.

Committee, certain persons elected or appointed, to whom any matter or business is referred either by a legislative body or by any corporation or society.

Committee of a Lunatic or Idiot, the person to whom the care and custody of a lunatic is committed by the Court.

Committees of Parliament. First, those of the whole house, which may be to consider of certain resolutions, as to the nature of which considerable latitude prevails; or the house resolves itself into such committee to consider the details of a bill, the principal of which may be discussed at any or all of its other stages; or there may be committees for financial purposes, as those of 'supply' or 'ways and means.' Secondly, there are select committees, chosen by ballot or otherwise, for some specific purpose; the numbers composing such bodies seldom exceed twenty or thirty members; occasionally, these are declared committees of secrecy. Thirdly, committees on private bills. When the whole house is in committee, the Speaker vacates the chair, the mace is placed under the table, and the Chairman of Ways and Means, or, in his absence, some other member is called on to preside, who sits in the seat of the senior clerk. For committees of supply, and ways and means, and bills introduced by ministers, there is a chairman, who receives a salary.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Committitur piece, an instrument in writing on parchment, which charges a person, already in prison, in execution at the suit of the person who arrested him.—2 Ch. Arch., 12th ed., 1208.

Commodatum. He who lends to another a thing for a definite time, to be enjoyed and used under certain conditions, without any pay or reward, is called commodans; the person who receives the thing is called commodatarius, and the contract is called commodatum. It differs from locatio and conductio in this, that the use of the thing is gratuitous.—Dig. 13, tit. 6; Instit. iii. 2, 14.

Commodum ex injuria sui nemo habere debet. Jenk. Cent. 161.—(No person ought to have advantage from his own wrong.)

Common, a profit which a man has in the land of another; it derives its name from the community of interest which thence arises between the claimant and the owner of the soil, or between the claimant and other commoners entitled to the same right; all which parties are entitled to bring actions for injuries done to their respective interests, and that both as against strangers and against each other. It is called an incorporeal right, which lies in grant, as if originally commencing in some agreement between lords and tenants, for some valuable consideration which, by lapse of time, being formed into a prescription, continues, although there be no deed or instrument in writing which proves the original contract or agreement. It differs from a rent, principally in freedom of enjoyment on the one hand, and in freedom from obligation on the other; which the law expresses by the quaint antithesis that it lies not in render but in prender. It is also incidentally distinguished by its fruits being always taken in kind, and being in general not otherwise measured than by limiting the instruments of enjoyment. The Prescription Act, 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 71, s. 1, enacts, that after thirty years' enjoyment a right of common cannot be defeated by merely showing it commenced within time of memory, and after sixty years' enjoyment the right shall be absolute and indefeasible, unless it appear that the same was taken and enjoyed under some deed or writing.

There are four sorts of common, viz.:—

(1) Common of pasture, limited or unlimited, which is the right of feeding one's beasts in another's land, and this is subdivided into:

(a) Appendant, which is a privilege belonging to the owners or occupiers of arable land holden of a manor, to put upon its wastes their commonable beasts, viz., horses, kine, or sheep, being such as either plough or manure the soil.

(b) Appurtenant, which arises from no connection of tenure, nor from any absolute necessity, but may be annexed to lands in other lordships, or extend to other beasts besides such as are generally commonable, as swine, goats, or geese. This can only be claimed by grant, or by title of prescription, which supposes a now forgotten grant.

(c) Because of vicinage or neighbourhood (pur cause de vicinage), which takes place where the tenants of two adjoining manors have suffered their cattle to range indiscriminately over both wastes, and it seems that either lord may put an end to it by erecting a fence. In close connection with this, and substantially of the same kind, is common of shack, or the right of persons occupying lands lying together in the same common field, to turn out their cattle after harvest, to feed promiscuously in that field.

(d) In gross or at large, which is neither appendant nor appurtenant to land, but is annexed to a man's person, by granting it to him and his heirs by deed, or it may be claimed by prescriptive right, as by a parson of a church or a corporation sole.

(2) Common of piscary, a liberty of fishing in another's water. It is either appendant, appurtenant, or in gross.

(3) Common of turbary, a license to dig turf upon the land of another, or in the lord's waste; it may be either appendant or appurtenant, i.e., appendant or appurtenant to a house, and not to lands, for turfs are to be burnt in the house, or it may be in gross.

(4) Common of estovers or estouviers, or necessities, a liberty of taking necessary wood, for the use or furniture of a house, or farm, from off another's estate. The Saxon word bote is used by us as synonymous with the French estovers. House-bote, then, is a sufficient allowance of wood to repair, or to burn in the house; which latter is sometimes called fire-bote; plough-bote and cart-bote are wood to be employed in making and repairing all instruments of husbandry; and hay-bote or hedge-bote is wood for repairing of hays, hedges, or fences.—2 Bl. Com. 32.

The Inclosure of Commons is regulated by the Inclosure Acts (for a list of which see INCLOSURE), but these acts contain (see especially 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, s. 30) many provisions for the protection of commoners and the formation of 'recreation grounds' and 'field gardens,' and the Commons Act, 1876, 39 & 40 Vict. c. 56, not only amplifies such provisions, but lays down various new regulations to prevent 'inclosure in severalty as opposed to regulations of commons' being made unless it be proved to the satisfaction of the Inclosure Commissioners and of parliament 'that the inclosure will be of benefit to the neighbourhood, as well as to private interests, and to those who are legally interested in commons.'

Common assurances, the legal evidences of the translation of property, whereby every person's estate is assured to him, and all controversies, doubts, and difficulties are either prevented or removed.

The common assurances are of four kinds:—(1) By matter in pais, or deed, which is an assurance transacted between two or more private persons, in pais, in the country; that is (according to the old common law, upon the very spot to be transferred. (2) By matter of record, or an assurance transacted only in the sovereign's public courts of record, or under the authority of a public board or commission empowered by act of parliament to record its proceedings. (3) By special custom obtaining in some particular places and relating only to some particular species of property: which three are such as take effect during the life of the party conveying or assuring. (4) The fourth take no effect till after his death, and that is by devise, contained in his last will and testament.—2 Bl. Com. 290.

Common bar, otherwise called a bar at large or blank bar. If a plaintiff declared in trespass quare clausum fregit, for breaking his close in a certain parish, without naming or otherwise describing the close, if the defendant happened to have any freehold land in the same parish, he might be supposed to mistake the close in question for his own, and might therefore plead what was called the common bar, viz., that the close in which the trespass was committed was his own freehold. And then it would have been necessary for the plaintiff to new assign. By rule of Court, Reg. Gen. Trin. T. 1853, r. 18, the plaintiff was bound to designate the close or place in the declaration, by name or abutments or other description.—Steph. Plead. 256. See NEW ASSIGNMENT. The expression is now obsolete, as the Judicature Acts, 1873, 1875, have abolished the Common Law forms of pleading.

Common Bench [fr. banc, Sax., bench], a name of the Court of Common Pleas. See COMMON PLEAS.

Common Council, the councillors of the City of London. See COUNCIL.

Common counts. The indebitatus counts in declarations, for goods sold and delivered, or bargained and sold, for work done, for money lent, for money paid, for money received to the use of the plaintiff, for interest or for money due on an account stated, were so called. They are now as technical forms of pleading superseded by the Judicature Acts, 1873, 1875. See STATEMENT OF CLAIM; see also JOINDER OF CAUSES OF ACTION.

Common day of plea in land, an ordinary day in court, as Octabis Hilarii, Quindena Pasche, etc.—51 Hen. III. st. 2 & 3.

Common fine, a small sum of money paid to the lords by the residents in certain leets. Fleta, l. 7, c. xlviiii.

Common Hall, a court in the city of London, at which all the citizens, or such as are free of the city, have a right to attend.

Common informer, a person who prosecutes others for breaches of penal laws, or furnishes evidence on criminal trials.

Common intendment, ordinary meaning.

Common Law [lex communis, Lat.], the meaning of this term is very ambiguous, the expression being used in various senses according to the objects with which it is contrasted, it being so contradistinguished, sometimes from the Statute Law, sometimes from the Civil and Canon Law, occasionally from the lex mercatoria, and frequently from Equity. Some writers have made use of it to designate simply a law 'common' to all the realm. It is also sometimes adopted in opposition to criminal law, which is certainly erroneous, since the common law includes all the criminal law, which is not of positive statutory origin.

Lord Wensleydale, then Mr. Baron Parke, in Mirehouse v. Mennell, 8 Bing. 515, on error in the House of Lords, observes:— 'Our Common Law system consists in applying to new combinations of circumstances those rules of law which we derive from legal principles and judicial precedents; and for the sake of attaining uniformity, consistency, and certainty, we must apply these rules when they are not plainly unreasonable or inconvenient, to all cases which arise; and we are not at liberty to reject them, and abandon all analogy to them, in those to which they have not hitherto been judicially applied, because we think that the rules are not as convenient or reasonable as we ourselves could have devised. It appears to me to be of great importance to keep this principle of decision steadily in view, not merely for the determination of the particular case, but for the interests of law as a science.'

The distinction between written and unwritten law is adopted from the Romans, who borrowed it from the Greeks (Inst. 1. 1, t. 2, ss. 3, 9, 10). In thus distinguishing our own laws into the scriptæ or statute, and non scriptæ or common, we use the latter in a peculiar and restrained sense; signifying by it nothing more than that the original institution and authority of the law are not set down in writing, as is the case with acts of parliament; but that it receives its binding power, as a law, from long and immemorial usage, and universal reception throughout the realm. The authenticity of these customs, rules, and maxims rests entirely upon reception and usage, as declared by our judges, who are the sworn depositaries and interpreters of our law. This common law is properly distinguished into three kinds.

(1) General customs, or those applicable to and governing the whole kingdom, comprehending the law of nations and the law merchant. (2) Particular customs, i.e., affecting the inhabitants of particular districts. (3) The Civil and Canon Laws, properly denominated the ecclesiastical, military, maritime, and academical laws.—1 Bl. Com. 35; 1 Br. & Had. Com. 54; Hale's Hist. of the Com. Law c. iii.; Mackintosh's England, 274; 1 Kent's Com. 447, 468.

By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24, all branches of the Supreme Court of Judicature are to administer Law and Equity concurrently; and by s. 25, and Jud. Act, 1875, s. 10, the rules of law on certain points are altered.

Common Law Procedure Acts, 1852, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76; 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125; and 1860, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126. See now SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE ACTS.

Common Pleas, the Court of, so called because its original jurisdiction was to determine controversies between subject and subject, one of the three Superior Courts of Common Law at Westminster, presided over by a lord chief justice and five (formerly four, until 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, s. 11, sub-sec. 8) puisné judges. It was detached from the King's Court (Aula Regis) as early as the reign of Richard I., and the 14th clause of Magna Charta enacted that it should not follow the King's Court, but be held in some certain place. Its jurisdiction was altogether confined to civil matters, having no cognizance in criminal cases, and was concurrent with that of the Queen's Bench and Exchequer in personal actions and ejectment. It had a peculiar or exclusive jurisdiction in the following cases:—

(I.) Formal or plenary.

(1) Real actions, under the C. L. P. Act, 1860, s. 26.

(2) Under the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 125), over petitions complaining of an undue return or undue election of a member of parliament.

(II.) Summary.

Under the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 31). See now RAILWAY COMMISSIONERS.

(III.) Auxiliary.

(1) Registration of judgments, annuities, etc. (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 82; 18 Vict. c. 15).

(2) Under 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, respecting the fees connected with conveyances executed by virtue of the act, and also with the examination of married women concerning their assurances. See 11 & 12 Vict. c. 70; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 75; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 73; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 96.

(IV.) Appellate.

Appeals from the Revising Barristers' Courts, under 6 Vict. c. 18.

By Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34, the exclusive jurisdiction of this court was retained for the 'Common Pleas Division,' which represented it; but by order in council under s. 31 of that act, that division was merged in the Queen's Bench Division.

Common Prayer [preces publicæ, Lat.], the liturgy, or public form of prayer prescribed by the Church of England to be used in all churches and chapels, and which the clergy are enjoined to use under a certain penalty.—1 Eliz. c. 2; 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 4. See PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT, 1874, and ACT OF UNIFORMITY.

Common scold. See SCOLD.

Common seal, a seal used by a corporation as the symbol of their incorporation.

Common Serjeant, a judicial officer of the Corporation of the City of London: an assistant to the Recorder. See Pulling on the Laws and Customs of London.

Common Vouchee. Obs. See RECOVERY.

Common weal [bonum publicum, Lat.], the common good.

Commonable beasts, such as are necessary for the ploughing or manuring of land, as horses, oxen, cows, and sheep.

Commonalty [populus, plebs, communitas, Lat.], the people of England.—2 Inst. 539.

Commonance, the commoners, or tenants and inhabitants, who have the right of common or commoning in open field.—Cowel.

Commons, part of the demesne land of a manor (or land the property of which was in the lord), which, being uncultivated, was termed the lord's waste, and served for public roads and for common of pasture to the lord and his tenants.—2 Bl. Com. 90.

Commons House of Parliament, the Lower House, so called, because the commons of the realm, that is, the knights, citizens, and burgesses returned to parliament, representing the whole body of the commons, sit there. See HOUSE OF COMMONS; PARLIAMENT.

Commons Inclosure Acts. See INCLOSURE ACTS.

Commonwealth, the social state of a country, without regarding its form of government: also a republic, or that form of government in which the administration of public affairs is open to all, with few, if any, exceptions. 2. The period of the administration of the Parliamentary Army, and the Protector Cromwell. The journals of this parliament are found along with the rest. See DE JURE and UPPER BENCH.

Commorancy or Commorant, an abiding, dwelling, continuing, or lying in a certain place.

Commorientes, persons who die by the same accident or upon the same occasion. By English law, there is no presumption of survivorship. See Wing v. Angrave, 8 House of Lords Cases, 183.

Commorth, or Comorth [fr. cymmorth, Brit.; subsidium, Lat.], a contribution which was gathered at marriages, and when young priests said or sung the first masses. Prohibited by 26 Hen. VIII. c. 6.—Cowel.

Commote, half a cantred or hundred in Wales, containing fifty villages.—Stat. Wallæ, 12 Edw. I. Also a great seignory or lordship, and may include one or divers manors.—Co. Litt. 5.

Commune Concilium Regni Angliæ, the common council of the king and people assembled in parliament.

Communi custodia, an obsolete writ which anciently lay for the lord, whose tenant, holding by knight's service, died, and left his eldest son under age, against a stranger that entered the land, and obtained the ward of the body.—Reg. Orig. 161; 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Communia placita non tenenda in scaccario, an ancient writ directed to the treasurer and barons of the Exchequer, forbidding them to hold pleas between common persons (i.e., not debtors to the king, who alone originally sued and were sued there) in that court, where neither of the parties belonged to the same.—Reg. Orig. 187, since superseded by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 39.

Communis error facit jus. 4 Inst. 240.—(Common error makes a right). 'It has been sometimes said,' observed Lord Ellenborough, in Isherwood v. Oldknow, 3 M. & S. 396, 'communis error facit jus; but I say, communis opinio is evidence of what the law is, not where it is an opinion merely speculative and theoretical, floating in the minds of persons, but where it has been made the groundwork and substratum of practice. See Broom's Leg. Max., 5th ed., 139.

Communism, an equality of distribution of the physical means of life and enjoyment as a transition to a still higher standard of justice, that all should work according to their capacity, and receive according to their wants.—1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 248.

Communis rixatrix, a common (female) brawler, a scold.

Community, a society of people living in the same place, under the same laws and regulations, and who have common rights and privileges.

Commutation, conversion; the change of a penalty or punishment from a greater to a less; or giving one thing in satisfaction of another, as commuting tithes into a rent-charge, copyhold services into money-payments, etc., annual payments into one lump payment, etc.

Commutative contract, one in which each of the contracting parties gives and receives an equivalent.

Companage, all kinds of food, except bread and drink.—Spel.

Companies Acts (1862), 25 & 26 Vict. c. 89; (1867) 30 & 31 Vict. c. 131. See JOINT STOCK COMPANY; and 33 & 34 Vict. c. 104.

Companies Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845, 8 Vict. c. 16. See also 26 & 27 Vict. c. 118; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 127; 31 & 32 Vict. c. 119; and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 48.

Companion of the Garter, one of the knights of that most noble order.

Company [fr. con and pagus, Lat., one of the same town, or con and panis, one that eats of the same mess], a society of persons joined in a common interest, for the purpose of carrying on some commercial or industrial undertaking.—McCull. Comm. Dict. See JOINT STOCK COMPANY.

Comparison of handwriting. Handwriting in dispute may be compared with any writing, proved to the satisfaction of the judge to be genuine, by the witnesses, and their evidence submitted to the jury, on the question of the handwriting in dispute—in civil cases, by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 27, and in criminal by 28 & 29 Vict. c. 18, s. 8.

Comparuit ad diem (he appeared at the day).

Compass, The Mariner's, an instrument used by mariners to point out the course of a ship at sea. It consists of a magnetised steel bar called the needle, attached to the under side of a card, upon which are drawn the points of the compass, and supported by a fine pin, upon which it turns freely in a horizontal plane. A magnetic needle so balanced, subject to a correction for its variation or declination, possesses the property of pointing out the true direction of north and south; and thus the ship's course may at any time be ascertained. The needle and card are enclosed in a cylindrical box covered with glass, which is kept in a horizontal position, notwithstanding the rolling or lurching of the ship, by an ingenious contrivance called gimbles. The declination or variation of the needle is the angle which it makes with the geographical meridian at any given place. It is different at different places, and at the same place varies from time to time. Thus in the year 1581 at London, the declination was 11° 15' to the east, and in the year 1832 it was 24° 12' to the west of the meridian.

Compassing [fr. compasser, Fr., to encircle, con, with, and passus, a step, Lat.], imagining or contriving.

Compaternity, spiritual affinity.

Compendia sunt dispensia. Co. Litt. 305.

—(Abbreviations are detriments.)

Compellativus, an adversary or accuser.—

Leg. Athel.

Compensatio criminum (compensation of offences), a term used by the canonists. Where husband and wife had both been guilty of adultery, there was, according to the doctrine of the Canon Law, a compensatio criminum, i.e., the guilt of the one was neutralised by that of the other, and both were restored to the position of innocent persons. See DIVORCE.

Compensation, making things equivalent, satisfying or making amends, a reward for the apprehension of criminals; also that equivalent in money which is paid to the owners and occupiers of lands taken or injuriously affected under the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845. See Lloyd or Ingram on Compensation. Also (in Scotch Law) a sort of right by set-off or stoppage, whereby a person who has been sued for a debt, demands that the debt may be compensated with what is owing to him by the creditor.

Compertorium, a judicial inquest in the Civil Law, made by delegates or commissioners to find out and relate the truth of a cause.—Paroch. Antiq. 575.

Complainant, one who urges a suit or commences a prosecution against another.

Complaint, statement of. See STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

Complice, one who is united with others in an ill-design; an associate; a confederate; an accomplice.

Compos mentis (sound of mind).

Composition, an amicable arrangement of a law-suit.

2. An agreement or contract between a parson, patron, or ordinary, and the owner of lands, that such lands shall for the future be discharged from payment of tithes, by reason of some land or other real recompense given to the parson in lieu and satisfaction thereof. No real composition, however, since the 13 Eliz. c. 10, is, in general, good for any longer term than three lives, or twenty-one years, though made by consent of the patron and ordinary. But by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 100, s. 2, every composition for tithes which had then been made or confirmed by the decree of any Court of Equity in England, in a suit to which the ordinary, patron, and incumbent were parties, and which had not been since set aside or departed from, is valid in law.

(3) Also an agreement made between an insolvent debtor and his creditors, by which the latter accept a part of their debts in satisfaction of the whole. Deeds of composition, inspectorship, and arrangement, if executed or assented to by a majority of the creditors representing three-fourths in value, were made binding on the rest of the creditors, on the observance of certain formalities, by the Bankruptcy Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 104, ss. 192—8.

For the many decisions on this enactment, see De Gex, Holland, or Griffiths on Composition Deeds. It was repealed by the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, which, by sections 126—7, makes elaborate provisions for the acceptance of a composition by creditors without recourse to proceedings in bankruptcy. See particularly ss. 125—7.

Compositio mensurarum, the title of an ancient ordinance for measures, not printed.

Compost, several sorts of soil or earth and other matters mixed, in order to make a fine kind of mould for fertilizing lands.

Compound householder. The payment of rates has always been one of the ingredients in the qualification for the parliamentary franchise; but modern statutes have enabled the owners of small houses to pay the rates for the occupiers and receive a composition for so doing. To prevent the occupiers being disfranchised by this process, it was enacted that they might claim to be rated themselves, and such householders so claiming became commonly known as 'compound householders,' as appears from the title to the Act 14 & 15 Vict. c. 14.

Compound interest, interest upon interest, i.e., when the interest of a sum of money is added to the principal, and then bears interest, which thus becomes a sort of secondary principal.

Compound spirits, Act as to the warehousing of, 28 & 29 Vict. c. 98.

Compounding, arranging, coming to terms; compounding felony is where the party robbed not only knows the felon, but also takes his goods again, or other amends, upon an agreement not to prosecute; this offence is denominated theftbote, and is punishable by fine and imprisonment. It is no offence to compound a misdemeanour (unless the offence is virtually an offence against the public), for the party injured may maintain an action to recover compensation in damages. And compounding offences only cognizable before magistrates on summary jurisdiction is not within 18 Eliz. c. 5. Corruptly to take reward for helping a person to stolen goods, without bringing the offender to justice, is felony; and to advertise a reward for the return of things stolen, by an advertisement representing that no questions will be asked, etc., incurs a penalty of 50*l.* by the Larceny Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 101, 102, replacing the repealed 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, ss. 58, 59. Penal actions by common informers may be compounded by leave of the Court; this leave of the Court, however, is not necessary in actions by the party grieved. The defendant must have pleaded.

Comprint, a surreptitious printing of another bookseller's copy of a work, to make gain thereby, which was contrary to common law, and is illegal. See COPYRIGHT.

Compromise, an adjustment of claims in dispute by mutual concession; also a mutual promise of two or more parties at difference to refer the ending of their controversy to arbitrators. As to authority of counsel to compromise an action, see Swinfen v. Swinfen, 18 C. B. 485; and as to authority of solicitor, see Fray v. Vowles, 28 L. J. Q. B. 232.

Compromissarii sunt iudices. Jenk. Cent. 128.—(Arbitrators are judges.)

Compromissum, a submission to arbitration.—Can. Law.

Comptroller, one who observes and examines the accounts of collectors of public money; an officer of the royal household.

Comptroller in Bankruptcy, an officer appointed under the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, ss. 55—58, for the purpose of receiving and examining the accounts of trustees.

Comptrollers of the Hanaper, officers of the Court of Chancery; their offices were abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 103.

Compurgator, one who by oath justifies another's innocence. The compurgatores mentioned in Anglo-Saxon records, have been supposed to be the origin of trial by jury. Comyn's Abr.—Du Cange.

Computo, a writ to compel a bailiff, receiver, or accountant, to yield up his accounts, founded on the Statute of Westminster II. c. 12. It also lies against guardians.—Reg. Orig. 135. The rule to compute is abolished by C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 92.

Conacre, the payment of wages in land, the rent being worked out in labour at a money valuation.—Irish Practice.

Conatus quid sit, non definitur in jure. 2 Buls. 277.—(What an attempt is, is not defined in law.)

Concealers, such as were used to find out concealed lands, i.e., such lands as are privily kept from the king by common persons, having nothing to show for their title or estate therein.—39 Eliz. c. 23.

Concealing a birth, a misdemeanour. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 60.

Concealing documents of title to lands or testamentary instruments. These offences are felonies, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 28, 29, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 67, s. 44.

Concealment, i.e., suppressio veri, to the injury or prejudice of another. This must amount, in order to be deemed a fraud, to the suppression or non-disclosure of facts, which one, under the circumstances, is bound, both legally and equitably, to disclose to another, the latter having an undoubted right to be put in possession of such facts.

There is a material distinction between circumstances which are intrinsic, forming the very ingredients of a contract, and circumstances which are extrinsic, forming no part of it, although perhaps offering inducements to enter into it, or affecting the value of the thing contracted for. As to the former, the caution caveat emptor should be heeded, for, unless there be some artifice to disguise the subject of the contract, or some warranty as to its quality, a vendee is bound by the sale although there may exist extrinsic defects in it, known only to the vendor, which greatly affect its worth.

For leading cases, see St. Leonards' Vendors and Purchasers of Estates, Introd. 1—7.

Concessi (I have granted), a word of frequent use in conveyances. By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 4, the word 'grant' in a deed executed after 1st October, 1845, shall not imply any covenant in law, in respect of any tenements or hereditaments, except so far as it may, by force of any act of parliament, imply a covenant.

Concessimus (we have granted).

Concessio per regem fieri debet de certitudine. 9 Co. 46.—(A grant by the king ought to be made from certainty.)

Concessio versus concedentem latam interpretationem habere debet. Jenk. Cent. 279.—(A grant ought to have a liberal interpretation against the grantor.)

Concessit solvere (he granted and agreed to pay), an action of debt upon a simple contract. It lies by custom in the Mayor's Court, London and Bristol city court. See Candy's Mayor's Court Practice.

Concessor, a grantor.

Concilium, a court; a time and place of meeting. Prior to the Reg. Gen. of T. T. 1853 (r. 15), a motion or rule for a concilium was required before the argument of a demurrer.

Concionatores, common-council men, free-men.

Concluded, prevented from.

Conclusion, a binding act; also the end of a pleading or conveyance.

Concord, an agreement between parties, who intend to levy a fine of lands one to the other, how and in what manner the lands shall pass; it was the foundation and substance of the fine taken and acknowledged by the party before one of the judges of the Court of Common Pleas, or before commissioners in the country; also an agreement made between two persons, one of whom has a right of action against the other. It is of two kinds, concord executory, and concord executed.—Plowd. 5, 6, 8.

Concordat, a treaty or public act of agreement between the Pope and any prince, relative to some collation of benefices.

Concordia parve res crescunt et opulentiades. 4 Inst. 74.—(Small means increase by concord and litigations by opulence.)

Concubaria, a fold, pen, or place where cattle lie.—Cowel.

Concubean, lying together.

Concubinage, an exception against a woman suing for dower, on the ground that she was the concubine and not the wife of the man of whose land she seeks to be endowed.—Brit. c. 107.

Concurrent, acting in conjunction; agreeing in the same act; contributing to the same event; contemporaneous. As to concurrent writs of summons, see Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. VI. See WRIT OF SUMMONS.

Concurrent jurisdictions, the jurisdiction of several different tribunals, both authorized to deal with the same subject-matter at the choice of the suitor.

Condescendence, a part of the proceedings in a cause, setting forth the facts of the case on the part of the pursuer or plaintiff.—Scotch Law.

Condition, a repetition.

Condition, a restraint annexed to a thing, so that by the non-performance the party to it shall receive prejudice and loss; and by the performance, commodity, or advantage; or it is that which is referred to an uncertain chance, which may or may not happen.

There are many kinds of conditions, but the following are the most important:—

A condition in a deed, or express, which is joined by express words to a feoffment, lease, or other grant, as if a person make a lease of lands to another, reserving a rent to be paid at a certain day, upon condition that if the lessee fail in payment at the day, then it shall be lawful for the lessor to enter.

A condition in law, or implied, as when a person grants another an office, as that of keeper of a park, steward, bailiff, etc., for a term of life; here, though there be no condition expressed in the grant, yet the law implies one, viz., that if the grantee do not justly execute all things belonging to the office, it shall be lawful for the grantor to discharge him from his office.

A condition precedent is when an estate is granted to one for life, upon condition that if the grantee pay to the grantor a certain sum of money at such a day, then he shall have the fee simple; in this case the condition precedes the estate in fee, and on performance thereof gains the fee simple.

A condition subsequent is when a man grants to another his estate, etc., in fee, upon condition that the grantee shall pay him at such a day a certain sum, or that his estate shall cease: here the condition is subsequent, and following the estate, and upon the performance thereof, continues and preserves the same; so that a condition precedent gets and gains the thing or estate made upon condition, by the performance of it, whereas a condition subsequent keeps and continues the estate by the performance of the condition—Termes de la Ley.

Condition inherent is that which descends to the heir, with the land granted, etc.

Condition collateral is that which is annexed to any collateral act.

Conditions are, likewise, affirmative, which consists of doing an act; negative, which consists of not doing an act; restrictive, for not doing a thing; compulsory, as that the lessee shall pay rent, etc.; single, to do one thing only; copulative, to do divers things; and disjunctive, where one thing of several is required to be done.—Shep. Touch. 117; 2 Com. Dig., tit. 'Condition'; and see CONDITIONS OF SALE.

Conditio beneficiæ, quæ statum construit, benignè secundum verborum intentionem est interpretanda; odiosa autem, quæ statum destruit, strictè secundum verborum proprietatem accipienda. 8 Co. 90.—(A beneficial condition, which creates an estate, ought to be construed favourably, according to the intention of the words; but a condition which destroys an estate is odious, and ought to be construed strictly according to the letter of the words.)

Conditio dicitur, cum quid in casum incertum qui potest tendere ad esse aut non esse, confertur. Co. Litt. 201.—(It is called a condition, when something is given on an uncertain event, which may or may not come into existence.)

Conditio illicita habetur pro non adjecta.—(An unlawful condition is deemed as not annexed.)

Conditio præcedens adimpleri debet priusquam sequatur effectus. Co. Litt. 201.—(A condition precedent must be fulfilled before the effect can follow.)

Conditional fee, an estate restrained to some particular heirs, exclusive of others, as to the heirs of a man's body, by which only his lineal descendants were admitted, in exclusion of collateral; or to the heirs male of his body in exclusion of heirs female, whether lineal or collateral. It was called a conditional fee, by reason of the condition expressed or implied in the donation of it, that if the donee died without such particular heirs, the land should revert to the donor. But on the passing of the Statute of Westminster II., commonly called the Statute De Donis, the judges determined that the donee had no longer a conditional fee-simple, which became absolute the instant issue was born, but they divided the estate into two parts, leaving in the donee a new kind of particular estate, which they denominated a fee-tail, and vesting in the donor the ultimate fee-simple of the land expectant on the failure of issue, which expectant estate is what we now call a reversion. And hence it is that tenancy in fee-tail is by virtue of the Statute De Donis.—2 Bl. Com. 112.

Conditional legacy, a bequest whose existence depends upon the happening or not happening of some uncertain event, by which it is either to take place or to be defeated.—1 Rop. Leg., 3rd ed., 645.

Conditional limitation, partakes of the nature both of a condition and a remainder. At the Common Law, whenever either the whole fee or a particular estate, as an estate for life or in tail, was first limited, no condition or other quality could be annexed to this prior estate, which would have the double effect of defeating the estate, and passing the lands to a stranger, for as a remainder it was void, being an abridgment or defeasance of the estate first granted, and as a condition it was void, as no one but the donor or his heirs could take advantage of a condition broken; and the entry of the donor or his heirs unavoidably defeated the livery upon which the remainder depended. On these principles it was impossible by the old law to limit by deed, if not by will, an estate to a stranger upon any event which might abridge or determine an estate previously limited. But the expediency of such limitations, assisted by the revolution effected by the Statute of Uses, at length established them, in spite of the maxim of law that a stranger cannot take advantage of a condition. These limitations are now become frequent, and their mixed nature has given them the name of conditional limitations; they so far partake of the nature of conditions, as they abridge or defeat the estates previously limited, and they are so far limitations, as upon the contingency taking effect, the estate passes to a stranger. Such is the limitation to A. for life, in tail or in fee, provided that when C. returns from Rome, it shall henceforth remain to the use of B. in fee.—2 Bl. Com. 156.

Conditiones quælibet odiosæ; maxime autem contra nuptrimonium et commercium. Lofft. 644.—(Some conditions are odious; but those chiefly which are against marriage and commerce).

Conditions of sale, the terms set forth in writing, upon which an estate or interest is to be sold by public auction. Conditions of sale will be construed, so as to collect the meaning of the parties, without encumbering them with the technical meaning of words; for, as Lord Hardwicke declared, 'there is no magic in words.' But the conditions should be accurate, for they cannot be contradicted by parol at the sale; 'the babble of the auction room,' as Lord Eldon termed it, being inadmissible as evidence, and this although the purchaser, by the written agreement, bind himself to agree by the conditions and declarations made at the sale. If the conditions require alteration, they should be so altered in writing before the sale.—St. Leon. V. & P. 11; Dart's V. & P. c. iv.

The Conveyancing Act, 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41, s. 3, applies certain conditions of sale to all contracts of sale, unless the contrary appears.

Condonation, a pardoning or remission. In cases of adultery it is forgiveness, legally releasing the injury.—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 30; Keats v. Keats, 28 L. J. P. & M. 57.

Condono, to make condonation of. See last TITLE.

Conduct-money, money paid to a witness for his travelling expenses.

Conductio, a hiring.

Coney [fr. cuniculus, Lat.], a rabbit. See RABBIT.

Confederacy, a combination of two or more persons to do some damage or injury to another, or to commit some unlawful act.

Confederation, a league or compact for mutual support, particularly of princes, nations, or states.

Conference, a species of negotiation between the two Houses of Parliament, conducted by managers appointed on both sides, for the purpose of producing concurrence, in cases where mutual consent is necessary; or for the purpose of reconciling differences which may have arisen. If the conference be upon the subject of a bill depending between the two Houses, it must be demanded by that House which, at the time of asking the conference, is in possession of the bill. It is the sole privilege of the Lords to name the time and place for holding a conference, no matter by which House it may have been demanded. Reasons in writing for the course resolved to be taken are usually furnished to the managers on both sides, in which case it is simply called 'a conference.' Should this proceeding fail, 'a free conference' must be held, which gives an opportunity for the managers individually, and unrestrained by any precise form of argument, to urge such reasons as in their judgment may best tend to influence the House to which they are addressed. A free conference is usually demanded after two conferences have been holden without effect. After one free conference, none other but free conferences can be held touching the same subject. In May, 1851, it was agreed, both by Lords and Commons, that reasons respecting differences of opinion on any bill or other proceeding might be communicated to either House by message from the other, and that no conference need take place unless specially requested. At all conferences the managers, on the part of the Upper House, are seated and wear their hats; those for the Commons stand uncovered. The Speaker quits the chair of the House during the absence of the managers attending a conference.—Dod's Parl. Comp.

Conference, a meeting between a counsel and solicitor to advise on the cause of their client.

Confessing error, the affirmative plea to an assignment of error.

Confessio, facta in judicio, omni probatione major est. Jenk. Cent. 102.—(A confession made in judgment is greater than all proof.)

Confession and avoidance, plea of, a plea in bar, admitting the facts alleged in the declaration to be true, but showing some new facts, tending to obviate their legal effect. These pleas were distinguished (in reference to their subject-matter) as pleas in justification, or excuse, or as pleas in discharge. The former class of pleas showed some justification of or excuse for the matter charged in the declaration: those of the latter some discharge or release. All matters in confession and avoidance must have been specially pleaded.—Reg. Gen. H. T. 1853, r. 8. Pleas in confession and avoidance have technically fallen into desuetude since the passing of the Judicature Acts, 1873, 1875. See STATEMENT OF DEFENCE.

Confession by culprit, the acknowledgment by a criminal of the offence charged against him when called upon to plead to the indictment. The criminal may confess the offence openly in Court, and submit himself to the judgment of the law, so that the confession be of his own accord, without any threats or extremity used; and sometimes he confesses the indictment to be true, and then becomes an approver or accuser of others, who are guilty of the same offence for which he is indicted or of other offences with him. There was a third sort of a confession, formerly made by an offender in felony, not in Court before the judge, but before the coroner in a church or other privileged place, upon which the offender, by the ancient law of the land, was to abjure the land.—3 Inst. 129.

Confession to a priest. The English law does not recognise the duty of a priest (whether Roman Catholic or Anglican) to keep secrets revealed to him in his religious character; but some judges have refused to extort such secrets, and the practice of the law on this subject is very uncertain.

Confession, Judgment by. See COGNOVIT.

Confession of defence. Where defendant alleges a ground of defence arising since the commencement of the action, the plaintiff may deliver confession of such defence and sign judgment for his costs up to the time of such pleading unless it be otherwise ordered. (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XX., r. 3.)

Confession of Plea. A plea containing a defence arising after the commencement of an action, or after the last pleading, might be confessed by the plaintiff.—Reg. Gen. H. T. 1853, rr. 22, 23. See previous title.

Confesso, Bill taken pro, an order which the Court of Chancery made, when the defendant did not file an answer, that the plaintiff might take such a decree as the case made by his bill warranted. For the practice as to taking bills pro confesso, see Consol. Ord. 1860, Ord. XXII.; Smi. Ch. Pr. 266. Now obsolete. See DEFAULT. PLEADING.

Confessus in judicio pro judicato habetur, et quodammodo sua sententiā damnatur. 11 Co. 30.—(A person confessing his guilt when arraigned is deemed to have been found guilty, and is, as it were, condemned by his own sentence.)

Confidential communication. See PRIVILEGED COMMUNICATION.

Confinement, Solitary. See SOLITARY CONFINEMENT.

Confirmatio Chartarum, the 25 Edw. I., A.D. 1297. This statute, being in the form of a charter, was sealed with the King's Great Seal, at Ghent, in Flanders, on Nov. 5th, as appears by a memorandum upon the roll. It re-enacts Magna Charta, with the addition of giving that security to personal property which Magna Charta gave to personal liberty, and must be referred to for the terms of Magna Charta, in the 'Statutes of the Realm' and the 'Revised Statutes.'

Confirmation, a species of conveyance by which a voidable estate is made valid and unavoidable, or by which a particular estate is increased. The operative words are, 'ratified and confirmed'; though, for safety, it is usual and prudent to insert the words, 'given and granted.' Estates which are void cannot be confirmed, but only those which are avoidable.—Watkin's Conv. 321. A confirmation does not strengthen a void estate; for a confirmation may make a voidable or defeasible estate good, but it cannot work upon an estate that is void at law.—Co. Litt. 295 b.

Confirmation, the ratification by the archbishop of the election of a bishop by dean and chapter under the King's letter missive prior to the investment and consecration of the bishop by the archbishop, 25 Hen. VIII. c. 20. It is undecided whether this ceremony be, in theory, ministerial or judicial, i.e., whether the archbishop can refuse to confirm: in practice, it has been only ministerial for two centuries. See The Queen v. the Archbishop of Canterbury, 11 Q. B. 483.

Confirmation and Probate Act, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 56, amended by 22 Vict. c. 30.—Consult Dodd and Brooks, or Coote on Probate.

Confirmare est id firmum facere quod prius infirmum fuit. Co. Litt. 295.—(To confirm is to make firm that which was before infirm.)

Confirmare nemo potest priusquam jus ei acciderit. 10 Co. 48.—(No person can confirm before the right shall fall to him.)

Confirmat usum qui tollit abusum. Moore, 764.—(He confirms a use who removes an abuse.)

Confirmatio est nulla ubi donum præcedens est invalidum. Moore, 764; and Co. Litt. 295.—(There is no confirmation where the proceeding gift is invalid.)

Confirmatio omnes supplet defectus, licet id quod actum est ab initio non valuit. Co. Litt. 295 b.—(Confirmation supplies all defects, though that which had been done was not valid at the beginning.)

Confiscation [fr. confiscor, from fiscus, Lat., which signifies, metonymically, the emperor's treasure], the condemnation and adjudication of goods or effects to the public treasury, as the bodies and effects of criminals, traitors, etc.

Confitens reus, an accused person who admits his guilt.

Conflict of laws. In the case where a suit is brought in one country, and the parties, or one of them (or the subject-matter of the suit), belongs more or less to another, and the laws of the two countries upon the subject are at variance, there is said to be a conflict of laws. See LEX LOCI CONTRACTUS; and also the case of Simonin v. Mallac, 27 L. J. N. S., Prob & Mat. 97, where two French persons came to England for the express purpose of celebrating a marriage which would have been void if celebrated in their own country. 'Either nation may refuse to surrender its laws to those of the other, and if either is guilty of any breach of the comitas or jus gentium, that reproach shall attach to the nation whose laws are least calculated to ensure the common benefit and advantage of all.' See judgment of Sir C. Cresswell in the above case. See Story's Conflict of Laws.

Conformity, Bill of. When an executor or administrator found the affairs of his testator or intestate so much involved that he could not safely administer the estate, except under the direction of the Court of Chancery, he filed this bill against the creditors generally for the purpose of having all their claims adjusted, and a final decree settling the order and payment of the assets. This bill was so called, probably because the executor or administrator in such case undertook to conform to the decree, or the creditors were compelled by the decree to conform thereto.—1 Story's Eq. Jur. 440.

Confrairie, a fraternity, brotherhood, or society.

Confrères, brethren in a religious house, fellows of one and the same society.

Confusion, a mode of extinguishing a debt, in the French law, by the concurrence in the same person of two qualities which mutually destroy one another. This may occur in several ways, as where the creditor becomes the heir of the debtor, or the debtor the heir of the creditor, or either accedes to the title of the other by any other mode of transfer.—Pothier on Oblig. by Evans, n. 606—609.

Confusion of Boundaries, was a jurisdiction of Equity, concurrent with the Common Law. The Civil Law was far more provident than ours upon the subject of boundaries. It considered that there was a tacit agreement or duty between adjacent proprietors to keep up and preserve the boundaries between their respective estates, and it enabled all persons having an interest to bring a suit to have the boundaries between them settled; and this, whether they were tenants for years, usufructuaries, mortgagees, or proprietors. The action was called actio finium regundorum; and if the possession were also in dispute, that might be ascertained and fixed in the same suit, and indeed was incident to it. Equity adopts this general rule, not to entertain jurisdiction in cases of confusion of boundaries upon the ground that the boundaries are in controversy, but to require that there should be some equity superinduced by the act of the parties; such as some particular circumstances of fraud, or some confusion, where one person has ploughed too near another, or some gross negligence, omission, or misconduct on the part of persons whose special duty it is to preserve or perpetuate the boundaries. Where there is an ordinary legal remedy there is certainly no ground for the interference of equity, unless some peculiar equity supervenes which the law does not take notice of or protect.—1 Story's Eq. Jur. 495.

Confusion, Property by. Where goods of two persons are so intermixed that the several portions can no longer be distinguished; if the intermixture be by consent, it is supposed that the proprietors have an interest in common, in proportion to their respective shares; but if one wilfully intermix his money, corn, or hay, with that of another man, without his approbation or knowledge, or cast gold in like manner into another's melting-pot or crucible, our law allows no remedy in such a case, but gives the entire property without any account to him whose original dominion or property is invaded, and endeavoured to be rendered uncertain without his consent.—2 Bl. Com. 405. See also Vin. Abr. Justification (B) and Instit. of Justin. l. ii. tit. 1, ss. 27—34.

The general rule, that, as against an agent, who has mixed the property of his employer with his own, so as to render it undistinguishable, the whole may, both at Law and in Equity, be taken to be the property of the employer, is well settled; but the same rule does not, in all cases, hold against the creditors of such agent: for instance, if an agent pay money belonging to his employer into his own banking-house, and to his general account, this money may not be distinguishable; but should the agent become bankrupt, the whole sum which appears to be due to him from the bankers will go to his assignees, and his employer can only come in as a general creditor under the bankruptcy. So, if the bankers had an account with the agent by way of set-off, that set-off would equally affect the money of his employer paid into the agent's account, as it would the agent's own money, supposing the bankers to have no notice, displacing their equity.—Ex parte Townsend, 15 Ves. 470; Massey v. Banner, 1 Jac. & Walk. 248.

Congeeable [fr. congé, Fr., leave], lawful, doné with permission.

Congé d'Accorder, leave to accord or agree.—8 Edw. I.

Congé d'Eslire, d'Elire (leave to choose). The Queen's license or permission sent to a dean and chapter to proceed to the election of a bishop, when a see becomes vacant.

Congregationalist, a name for the sect formerly called Independents.

Congress, an assembly of envoys, commissioners, deputies, etc., from different courts, who meet to concert measures for their common good, or to adjust their mutual concerns.

Congress of the United States of America, the assembly of senators and representatives of the several states of North America, forming the legislature of the United States. It consists of a Senate and a House of Representatives, each constituting a distinct and independent branch. The House of Representatives is chosen every second year by the people of the several states, and electors are required to have the same qualifications as are requisite for choosing the members of the most numerous branch of the state-legislature of the state in which they vote. Each state, however small its population, is entitled to at least one representative; but upon the whole population there cannot be more than one for every 30,000 persons. No person can be a representative who shall not have attained the age of twenty-five years, and have been seven years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that state for which he shall be chosen. No other qualifications are required. The Senate is composed of two senators from each state, who are chosen by the legislature of the state for six years. They are divided into three classes, so that one-third thereof is or may be changed by a new election every second year. No person can be a senator who is not thirty years of age, and has not been nine years a citizen of the United States, and is not, when elected, an inhabitant of the state for which he is chosen.

The time, place, and manner of holding elections for senators and representatives are appointed by the state legislatures. Each House determines the rules of its own proceedings, and has power to punish its members for disorderly conduct. Neither House, during the session of congress, can, without the consent of the other, adjourn for more than three days, nor to any other place than that in which the two Houses shall be sitting. The senators and representatives are entitled to receive a compensation, provided by law for their services, from the treasury. They are also privileged from arrest for civil causes during the session.

Congressus, the extreme practical test of the truth of a charge of impotence brought against a husband by a wife. It is now disused.—Causes Célèbres, 6, 183.

Conjoints, persons married to each other.

Conjugal rights, the right which husband and wife have to each other's society, comfort, and affection. The suit for restitution of conjugal rights is a matrimonial suit, cognizable in the Divorce Court, which is brought whenever either the husband or wife is guilty of the injury of subtraction, or lives separate from the other without any sufficient reason; in which case the Court will decree restitution of conjugal rights. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 17. As to Scotland see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 86, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 31.

Conjuratio [fr. conjuro, Lat.], an oath.

Conjuration, a compact made by persons combining by oath to do any public harm; it was more especially used for the having personal conference with the devil or some evil spirit to know any secret or effect any purpose. The difference between conjuratio and witchcraft was said to be, that a person using the one endeavoured, by prayers and invocations, to compel the devil to say or do what he commanded him; the other dealt by friendly and voluntary confidence with the devil or familiar, in lieu of blood or other gift offered. Both differed from enchantment or sorcery—the latter were supposed to be personal conferences with the devil, the former were but medicines and ceremonial form of words, usually called charms, without apparition.—Cowel.

Connivance, consent, express or implied, by one spouse to the adultery of the other. If a petitioner be found guilty of connivance, the Court will not decree dissolution of the marriage.—20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, ss. 29, 30.

Conquest [fr. conquerir, Fr., to acquire; conquiro, Lat., to seek for], the feudal term for purchase.

Consanguineo. See COSENAGE.

Consanguineus est quasi eodem sanguine natus. Co. Litt. 157.—(A person related by consanguinity is, as it were, sprung from the same blood.)

Consanguineus frater, a brother by the father's side; in contradistinction to frater uterinus, the son of the same mother.

Consanguinity, or kindred, the connection or relation of persons descended from the same stock or common ancestor. It is either lineal or collateral. Lineal is that which subsists between persons, of whom one is descended in a direct line from the other, as between son, father, grandfather, great grandfather, and so upwards in the direct ascending line; or between son, grandson, great grandson, and so downwards in the direct descending line. Collateral agree with the lineal in this, that they descend from the same stock or ancestor, but differ in this, that they do not descend one from the other.—2 Bl. Com. 202.

Conscience, Courts of, tribunals for the recovery of small debts, constituted by acts of parliament in the city of London and other towns. See 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 94. The ordinary constitution of these courts, which were generally for causes of debt to the amount of 40s. only, but often to the amount of 5l., was to examine in a summary way, and without jury, by the oath of the parties, or other witnesses, and make such order therein as was consonant to equity and good conscience.—7 & 8 Vict. c. 96. The County Courts have superseded them.

Conscientia dicitur a con et scio, quasi scire cum Deo. 1 Co. 100.—(Conscience is called from con and scio, to know, as it were, with God.)

Consecratio est periodus electionis; electio est preambula consecrationis. 2 Rol. R. 102.—(Consecration is the termination of election; election is the preamble of consecration.)

Consecrate, to dedicate to sacred purposes, as a bishop by imposition of hands, or a church or churchyard by prayers, etc. Consecration is performed by a bishop or archbishop. See BISHOP.

Consensus est voluntas plurimum ad quos res pertinet, simul juncta. Lofft. 514.—(Consent is the conjoint will of many persons, to whom the thing belongs.)

Consensus facit matrimonium. (Consent constitutes marriage.)

Consent is absolutely necessary to matrimony, and therefore persons non compotes mentis, cannot enter into this, or indeed any other contract.

Consensus, non concubitus, facit nuptias vel matrimonium, et consentire non possunt ante annos nobiles. 6 Co. 22.—(Consent and not cohabitation, constitutes nuptials or marriage, and persons cannot consent before marriageable years.)—1 Bl. Com. 434.

Consensus tollit errorem. Co. Litt. 126.—(Consent [acquiescence] removes mistake.)

Consent, an act of reason accompanied with deliberations, the mind weighing, as in a balance, the good or evil on either side. Consent supposes three things—a physical power, a mental power, and a free and serious use of them. Hence it is that if consent be obtained by meditated imposition, circumvention, surprise, or undue influence, it is to be treated as a delusion, and not as a deliberate and free act of the mind. For although the law will not generally examine into the wisdom or prudence of men disposing of their property, or in binding themselves by contracts, or by other acts, yet it will not suffer them to be entrapped by the fraudulent contrivances, cunning, or deceitful management of those who purposely mislead them.—1 Story's Eq. Jur. 186.

Consentientes et agentes pari poena puniuntur. 5 Co. 80.—(Those consenting and those perpetrating are embraced in the same punishment.)

Consent-rule, a superseded instrument, in which a defendant in an action of ejectment specified for what purpose he intended to defend, and undertook to confess not only the fictitious lease, entry, and ouster, but that he was in possession.

Consequentia non est consequentia. Bac.—(The consequence of a consequence exists not.)

Consequential damages, those losses or injuries which follow an act, but are not direct and immediate upon it; an illustration of which is afforded by the leading case of Scott v. Shepherd, 1 Sm. L. C., which see. See also DAMAGES.

Conservancy of the Thames. The conservation of the River Thames between Staines, in Middlesex, and Tenleete, in Kent, had from time immemorial been exercised by the Corporation of London; and after being the subject of many statutes (for which see the preamble of the Act 20 & 21 Vict. c. 147), has now been placed by this Act under the control of a body of conservators, forming a body corporate, on whom an extended jurisdiction has been conferred.—27 & 28 Vict. c. 113.

Conservative, the name of a political party, first assumed in 1830.—xliii. Quart. Rev. 276.

Conservator, a protector, preserver, or maintainer; or a standing arbitrator chosen and appointed as a guarantee, to compose and adjust differences that should arise between two parties, etc.

Conservators of the peace, officers appointed by the common law for the maintenance of the public peace. Of these, some had and still have this power annexed to other offices which they hold, others had it merely by itself, and were thence called custodes or conservatores pacis. Those that were so, virtute officii, still continue; but the latter sort are superseded by the modern justices.

Conservators of truce and safe conducts, officers appointed at ports to hear and determine questions relating to the breaking of truce and safe conducts, and the abetting and receiving truce breakers, which offence was, in affirmation and support of the law of nations, declared to be treason. It was enacted by 18 Hen. VI. c. 4, that if any of the King's subjects attempt or offend upon the sea, or in any port within the King's obedience, against any stranger in amity, league, or truce, or under safe conduct, and especially by attacking his person, or spoiling him, or robbing him of his goods, the Lord Chancellor, with any of the justices of either the King's Bench or Common Pleas, should cause full restitution and amends to be made to the party injured.

Cosideratio curiæ, the judgment of the Court.

Consideration, the price, motive, or matter of inducement of a contract, which must be lawful in itself.

The consideration is the very life of a simple contract or parol agreement; while a specialty does not require a consideration to make it obligatory at law, the law always presuming a sufficient consideration, which the parties, except in special cases, are estopped from denying. The law, then, not only requires a consideration in the case of a simple contract (under which term is included all contracts not under seal, whether oral or written), but that it should be valuable—i.e., a legal consideration emanating from some injury or inconvenience to the one party, or from some benefit to the other party. A good consideration, i.e., an equitable consideration, founded upon mere love, affection, or gratitude, will not support a contract.

Considerations divide themselves into (1) valuable; and (2) insufficient. Valuable may be thus classed:—

(a) Benefit and injury. The principal requisite, and that which is the essence of every consideration is, that it should create some benefit to the party promising, or some trouble, prejudice, or inconvenience to the party to whom the promise is made. It is not necessary that the consideration and promise should be equivalent in actual value, for it would be impossible precisely to determine whether, in a given case, the consideration were adequate, without a psychological investigation into the motives of the parties. If the consideration, however, be so insufficient as to 'shock the conscience,' equity would quash the contract, upon the ground that such great inequality betokens fraud or undue advantage on the one side, or mental incompetency on the other.

(β) Forbearance, for a certain unreasonable time to institute a suit upon a well-founded claim, or even upon one which is doubtful, but not upon one utterly unfounded, is sufficient, since it is a benefit to the one party, and a prejudice to the other. If the time of forbearance be stated, it must be a reasonable time, and an agreement to forbear per breve aut paululum tempus, or pro aliquo tempore, will not be sufficient, inasmuch as the party promising may, in such case, sue immediately after the promise is made.

(γ) Assignment of a chose in action, unless it be void on account of maintenance. Assignments of choses in action are void at common law, unless the original debtor expressly promise to pay the assignee, or unless the assignment be made with his assent, in which case the law implies a promise from him to the assignee, the consideration of which is the discharge of liability to the assignor, in respect of the claim. See CHOSSES IN ACTION.

(δ) Mutual promises are concurrent considerations, and will support each other if they be made simultaneously, unless one or the other be void.

Insufficient considerations may be divided into:—

(α) Gratuitous, which are void for want of consideration; for, however obligatory they may be in morals or in honour, inasmuch as they are not founded upon an injury or deprivation to the promisee, or a benefit to the promisor, they are not regarded by the law as legal and valuable considerations.

(β) Illegal and impossible consideration. A contract may be illegal, because it contravenes the principles of the common law, or the special requisitions of a statute. The former illegality exists whenever the consideration is founded upon a transaction which violates public policy or morality:—as a contract to commit, conceal, or compound a crime; a contract for illicit cohabitation; or a contract in fraud of the rights and interests of third parties. The illegality created by statute exists when the act is either expressly prohibited, or when the prohibition is implied from the nature and object of the statute. A contract founded upon an impossible contract is void; for the law will not compel a man to attempt to do that which is not within the limits of human capacity. Lex neminem cogit ad vana aut impossibilia.

(γ) Moral consideration is not alone a sufficient legal consideration to support either an express or implied promise; for the law, although it will not suffer any immorality, cannot undertake to enforce every promise which a man of strict honour and integrity would feel himself bound to fulfil. Attempts have been made to make an exception to this rule in cases where the consideration would be legal but for the interposition of some particular statute (see Atkins v. Hill, Cowp. 288; Flight v. Reed, 9 Jur. N. S. 1016, and the cases referred to therein), but these cases are on the boundary line of the law, and the decisions are of doubtful soundness.

(δ) Executed consideration. A consideration, in regard to the time when it operates, is either—1st, executed, i.e., already performed before the making of the defendant's promise, and this must have been at the request of the promisor, otherwise it will not support a promise; 2nd, executory, or something to be done after the promise; 3rd, concurrent, as in the case of mutual promises; and 4th, continuing, i.e., executed in part only. The three last classes are sufficient to support a contract not void for other reasons.—Story on Contracts, 71.

(ε) Considerations moving from third persons. It is a general rule that in cases of simple contract, if one party make a promise to another for the benefit of a third, as no consideration moves from such third person, it is only the party to whom it is made, and not the party for whose benefit it is made, who may maintain an action upon it.

Consideratum est per curiam (it is considered by the Court), the formal and ordinary commencement of a judgment.—3 Steph. Com.

Consignation [fr. consigno, Lat., to write down], the deposit of a thing owed with a third person, under the authority of the Court.—Civil Law.

Consignment, the sending of goods to another for sale or purchase; also the goods themselves so sent. He who consigns the goods is called the consignor, and the person to whom they are sent is called the consignee.

Consilia multorum quærentur in magnis. 4 Inst. 1.—(The counsels of many are required in great things.)

Consistory Court, the prætorium or tribunal of every diocesan bishop, held in their several cathedrals for the trial of all ecclesiastical causes arising within their jurisdiction. The bishop's chancellor, or his commissary, is the judge, and from his sentence an appeal lies, by virtue of 24 Hen. VIII. c. 12, to the archbishop of each province respectively.—2 Br. & Had. Com. 441.

Consolato del mare, il, a code of sea-laws compiled by order of the ancient kings of Arragon.

Consolidated fund of the United Kingdom, a repository of public money, which now comprises the produce of customs, excise, stamps, and several other taxes, and some small receipts from the royal hereditary revenue, surrendered to the public use; and constitutes almost the whole of the public income of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland. This fund is pledged for the payment of the whole of the interest of the national debt of Great Britain and Ireland; and besides this is liable to several other specific charges imposed upon it at various periods, by act of parliament, such as the civil list, and the salaries of the judges and ambassadors and other high official persons; after payment of which the surplus is to be indiscriminately applied to the service of the United Kingdom, under the direction of parliament.—1 Br. & Had. Com. 391. See 56 Geo. III. c. 98; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 3, s. 101; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 59; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 39, s. 46; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 93; 36 & 37 Vict. cc. 56, 57; and 38 & 39 Vict. c. 78. And see TREASURY CHEST FUND.

Consolidating actions. If several actions between the same parties were brought, and were pending for the same cause, or substantially so, the Court might stay the proceedings in all but one. And if two or more actions were brought by the same plaintiff, at the same time, against the same defendant, for causes of action which might have been joined in the same action, the court or a judge, if they deemed the proceeding vexatious or oppressive, would in general compel the plaintiff to consolidate them. Chitty's Arch. Pr., 12th ed., 1357. Under the Rules of the Supreme Court, actions may be consolidated, by order as before (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. LI., r. 4).

Consolidation, in the civil law, the uniting the possession, occupancy, or profits, etc., of land with the property, and vice versâ; in the ecclesiastical law, the uniting two benefices by assent of the ordinary, patron, and incumbent; in the statute law, the fusing many acts of parliament into one.

Consolidation Acts, 1861 (Criminal law), 24 & 25 Vict. cc. 94, 96, 97, 98, 99, and 100.

Consols, funds formed by the consolidation (of which word it is an abbreviation) of different annuities, which had been severally formed into a capital. Consult Fenn on the Funds. And see FUNDS.

Consortio malorum me quoque malum facit. Moore, 817.—(The company of wicked men makes me also wicked.)

Conspiracy, a combination or agreement between several persons to carry into effect a purpose hurtful to some individual, or to particular classes of the community, or to the public at large; though this is subject to exceptions in the case where the offence is a felonious one and actually accomplished, the offence of conspiracy, which is a misdemeanour only, being then merged in the felony. It is punishable by imprisonment and hard labour.

The law has given a very adequate remedy in damages for preferring malicious indictments or prosecutions against a person, either by an action of conspiracy, which cannot be brought but against two at the least, and is confined to the particular case where the plaintiff has been acquitted by verdict, upon an accusation of treason or felony, or, which is the only way now known in practice, by an action on the case for a false and malicious prosecution, which may be brought either against a single person or against several, with an allegation that they conspired together for the purpose.

A conspiracy to raise the price of wages was unlawful by 6 Geo. IV. c. 129, amended by 22 Vict. c. 34, but both these acts were repealed by s. 7 of 34 & 35 Vict. c. 32, which act was itself repealed by the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86. The third section of this act provides that 'an agreement or combination by two or more persons to do any act in contemplation or furtherance of a trade dispute shall not be indictable as a conspiracy if such act committed by one person would not be punishable as a crime.'

Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 86. By this Act provision is made for amending the law as to conspiracy, so far as relates to trade disputes, and making it no longer criminal to conspire to do an act, not criminal if done by one only, where such conspiracy has not any punishment awarded to it by Act of Parliament, with certain exceptions in the case of workmen employed in the supply of gas and water; and further providing for procedure under the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1871, by indictment and not summarily; and also for penalties for certain acts of intimidation or violence. See Chitty's Statutes, vol. iv., tit. 'Master and Servant.'

Conspiracy to murder. Misdemeanour, by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 4, punishable by penal servitude not exceeding ten years, or by imprisonment.

Conspirations, the writ that lay against conspirators.—Reg. Orig. 134; F. N. B. 114.

Conspirators, those who bind themselves by oath, covenant, or other alliance, that each of them shall aid the other falsely and maliciously to indict persons; or falsely to move and maintain pleas, etc.—33 Edw. I. st. 2. Besides these, there are conspirators in treasonable purposes: as for plotting against the government.

Constable [fr. comes stabuli, Lat., in the Eastern empire a superintendent of the imperial stables, or the emperor's master of the horse, who at length obtained the command of the army], an officer to whom our law commits the duty of maintaining the peace, and bringing to justice those by whom it is infringed.

Constables are of two sorts, high and petty. The former, called also chief constables, were first ordained by the Statute of Winchester, 13 Edw. I. st. 2, c. 6; they were formerly appointed at the courts-leet of the franchise or hundred over which they preside, or in default of that, then by the justices at their special sessions, as directed by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 33, s. 8. The petty constables are inferior officers in every town and parish, subordinate to the high constable of the hundred, and first instituted about the reign of Edward III. These petty constables have two offices united in them—the one ancient, the other modern. Their ancient office is that of head-borough, tithing-man, and bors-holder; their more modern office is that of constable merely. The proper duty of the high constable seems to be to keep the Queen's peace within the hundred, as the petty constable does within the parish or township. He is also, by various statutes, charged with other duties; such as that of serving precepts and warrants on certain occasions, and the returning of lists of jurors.

By 32 & 33 Vict. c. 47, provision is made for the abolition of the office of high constable throughout England and Wales, and for the discharge of the duties theretofore performed by high constables.

An action cannot be brought against a constable for what he does as constable, after the expiration of six months from the commission of the act, and without making a written demand of a perusal and copy of his warrant six days at least before the action is commenced.—24 Geo. II. c. 24, s. 6.

Petty constables, head-boroughs, tithingmen, and bors-holders, were formerly all chosen by the jury at the court-leet; or if no court leet were held, then by two justices of the peace. But by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 109, no petty constable, head-borough, bors-holder, tithing-man, or peace officer of the like description, shall be appointed for any parish, township, or vill, within the limits of that act, at any court-leet or tourn, except for the performance of duties unconnected with the preservation of the peace and with the execution of that act. It is also provided that special sessions of the peace shall be held in each division for the appointment of 'parish constables,' and that on the resolution of the vestry, one or more paid constables may be appointed. This act does not apply to the metropolis, or any borough within the Municipal Act, or any parish which levies rates for the payment of constables under 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 90, or under any local act; and by 35 & 36 Vict. s. 92 parish constables are to be appointed only in cases where the county quarter sessions deem an appointment necessary. By the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, s. 191, in all boroughs to which that Act applies, 'borough constables' are appointed by the watch committee. County and district constables were established by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 93; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 88; and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 89.—Burn's Justice, tit. 'Constable.' See 7 & 8 Vict. c. 52. The Act 19 & 20 Vict. c. 69, makes provision for the consolidation of borough police, and contains various enactments in regard to their powers, duties, etc.

Special constables are appointed on particular occasions, 41 Geo. III. c. 78; 1 & 2

Wm. IV. c. 41; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 43; and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 80. As to private persons acting as constables without special authority, see PEACE, BREACH OF THE; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 20; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 69. For Lord Constable, see HIGH CONSTABLE. See Chitty's Statutes, vol. iv., tit. 'Police.'

Constablewick, the jurisdiction of a constable.

Constat, a certificate which the clerk of the pipe and auditors of the Exchequer made, at the request of any person who intended to plead or move in that Court, for the discharge of anything. The effect of it was the certifying what appears (constat) upon record, touching the matter in question. It was held to be superior to an ordinary certificate, because it did not contain anything but what appeared on record. An exemplification of the enrolment of letters patent under the Great Seal is called a constat.—Co. Litt. 225; Page's case, 5 Rep. 52.

Constat (v.n.), it appears. See NON CONSTAT.

Constituent, (1) one who appoints an agent; particularly (2) one who, by his vote, constitutes or elects a member of parliament.

Constituimus (we constitute or appoint).

Constitution, any regular form or system of government. It is either (1) Democratic, when the fundamental law guarantees to every citizen equal rights, protection, and participation, direct or indirect, in the government; such is the constitution of the United States of America, and of some Cantons of Switzerland. (2) Aristocratic, when the constitution establishes privileged classes, as the nobility, and entrust the government entirely to them, or allows them a very disproportionate share of it, such as, at one time, was that of Venice. (3) Mixed, to which belong some monarchical constitutions which require the existence of a sovereign, whose power is modified by other branches of government, of a more or less popular cast. Of this kind is the British constitution, consisting of the Sovereign, the House of Lords, and the House of Commons.—1 Bl. Com. 51; De Lolme on the Constitution; Hall. Middle Ages and Constit. Hist. Also a particular law, ordinance, or regulation made by the authority of any superior; as the Novel Constitutions of Justinian and his successors; the Constitutions of Clarendon; the Ecclesiastical Constitutions, etc. As to the character of the English constitution, see 3 Hallam's Middle Ages.

Constitutiones tempore posteriores potiores sunt his que ipsas præcesserunt. D. l. 4, 4. —(Later laws prevail over those which preceded them.)

Constitutor, a person who has promised to pay the debt of another.

Constraint, duress.

Constructio legis non facit injuriam. Co. Litt. 183.—(The construction of law does not work an injury).—Br. Max., 5th ed., 603.

Construction, interpretation.

Construction, Court of. A Court of Equity or of Common Law, as the case may be, is called the Court of Construction with regard to wills, as opposed to the Court of Probate, whose duty is to decide whether an instrument be a will at all. Now the Court of Probate may decide that a given instrument is a will, and yet the Court of Construction may decide that it has no operation, by reason of perpetuities, illegality, uncertainty, etc. See PROBATE.

Construction of statutes. See ACT OF PARLIAMENT.

Constructions of wills. See WILLS.

Constructive notice. The knowledge which the law implies a party to have had, whether he actually had it or not;—thus, the law implies that an under lessee has knowledge of the contents of the head lease, whereas he very frequently has not. The Conveyancing Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 39, s. 3, restricts constructive notice as follows:—'A purchaser [including in that term any person taking or dealing for property of any kind whether as lessee or mortgagee] shall not be prejudicially affected by notice of any instrument, fact, or thing, unless it is within his own knowledge, or would have come to his knowledge if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by him; or in the same transaction with respect to which a question of notice to the purchaser arises, it has come to the knowledge of his counsel as such, or of his solicitor, or other agent as such, or would have come to the knowledge of his solicitor or other agents as such, if such inquiries and inspections had been made as ought reasonably to have been made by the solicitor or other agent'; but this section does not exempt a purchaser from liability under any covenant, etc., contained 'in any instrument under which his title is derived.'

Constructive total loss, a term used in the law of marine insurance, to denote a loss which entitles the assured to claim the whole amount of his insurance, on giving to the assurers notice of abandonment. Generally there is a constructive total loss when the subject-matter insured has not actually perished or lost its form or species, but has, by one of the perils insured against, been reduced to such a state or placed in such a position as to make its total destruction, though not inevitable, yet highly imminent, or its ultimate arrival under the terms of the policy, though not utterly hopeless, yet exceedingly doubtful. In such a case the assured, by giving notice within a reasonable time to the assurers of abandonment, i.e., the relinquishment of all his right to whatever may be saved, is entitled to recover against them as for a total loss. See Arnould on Marine Insurance.

Constructive treason, an attempt to establish treason by circumstantiality, and not by the simple genuine letter of the law, and therefore highly dangerous to public freedom.—Erskine's Defence of Lord George Gordon; 3 Hall. Const. Hist. c. xv. p. 151. See TREASON.

Constructive trust, which arises from equitable operation; thus when an estate is subject to a trust or equitable interest or lien, and a person purchases it for value, with either actual or constructive notice of it, the estate will still be subject to the trust or equitable interest in the hands of such a purchaser. To this general rule, however, there is an exception in the case of a disseisor, abator, or intruder, who cannot hold in trust, although he have notice of it, for he is not in in privity of the estate, to which it is annexed, but in the post, which is inconsistent with the trust. And notice of an unenrolled bargain or sale, or of an unregistered deed, will bind a purchaser; but notice of a fraud will not convert the person receiving it into a trustee. So a person acquiring an estate as a voluntary grantee, even without notice, or as a devisee, will take it subject to every equitable interest, for equity will presume notice where no consideration has been paid.

Of course, if a person purchase of a trustee, or from a purchaser affected with notice, for a valuable consideration without notice, he will hold the estate discharged of the trust.

It is not clear how far a purchaser may be affected by notice of a constructive trust; notice of an equitable title, it is to be observed, is very different from notice of a legal title; the result of the authorities appears to be, that where the construction to be put on the words of the instrument on which the equitable title arises may admit of serious doubt, the purchaser will not be bound, though the Court may consider that the words give an equitable title; on a similar principle the Court will not, at least in a doubtful case, rectify a settlement as against a purchaser, though the case might be clear as against a volunteer.—2 Sp. Eq. Jur.

The doctrine of constructive trusts also arises upon the renewal of a lease by a trustee, or executor, or executor de son tort, or person having a limited interest in his own name, even in the absence of a fraud, and upon the refusal of the lessor to grant a new lease to the cestui que trust, or expectant; for such renewed lease is held upon trust for the person beneficially entitled to the old lease or the expectant, in order to prevent persons in fiduciary situations from acting so as to take a benefit for themselves. This doctrine is extended to the renewal of leases by one of several persons, or partners, jointly interested—by an agent, mortgagor, mortgagee, or person jointly interested with an infant—but, if the renewed lease turn out not to be beneficial, the person renewing must sustain the loss; if beneficial, the infant can claim his share of the benefit to be derived from it.

A renewing trustee, and a volunteer claiming under him, as well as a purchaser from him with notice, will be directed to assign the lease free from incumbrances, except a bond fide lease made by him at the best rent, and to account for the mesne rents and profits; but he will be entitled to be indemnified against his covenants with the lessor, and will have a lien upon the estate for the costs of renewal, and the expenses of lasting improvements with interest.—See the leading authority on this subject, Keech v. Sandford, otherwise called the Romford Market Case (1726), 1 White & Tudor, L. C.

Constructive use. See USE.

Consuetudinarius, a ritual or book, containing the rites and forms of divine offices, or the customs of abbeys and monasteries.

Consuetudinibus et serviciis, a writ of right close, which lay against a tenant who deforced his lord of the rent or service due to him.—Reg. Orig. 159; F. N. B. 151; and New Nat. Brev. 330.

Consuetudo, contra rationem introducta, potius usurpatio quam consuetudo appellari debet. Co. Litt. 113.—(A custom introduced against reason ought to be called rather an usurpation than a custom.)

Consuetudo debet esse certa; nam incerta pro nulla habetur. Dav. 33.—(A custom should be certain; for an uncertain custom is considered null.)

Consuetudo est altera lex. 4 Co. 21.—(Custom is another law.)

Consuetudo est optimus interpretes legum. 2 Inst. 18.—(Custom is the best expounder of the laws.)

Consuetudo et communis assuetudo vincit legem non scriptam, si sit specialis; et interpretatur legem scriptam, si lex sit generalis. Jenk. Cent. 273.—(Custom and common usage overcomes the unwritten law, if it be special; and interprets the written law, if the law be general.)

Consuetudo ex certâ causâ rationabili usitata privat communem legem. Litt. s. 169.—(A custom grounded on a certain reasonable cause supersedes the common law.)

Consuetudo licet sit magnæ auctoritatis, nunquam tamen præjudicat manifestæ veritati. 4 Co. 18.—(A custom, though it be of great authority, should never, however, be prejudicial to manifest truth.)

Consuetudo semel reprobata, non potest amplius induci. Dav. 33.—(Custom once disallowed cannot be again produced.)

Consuetudo volentes ducit, lex nolentes trahit. Jenk. Cent. 274.—(Custom leads the willing, law compels the unwilling.)

Consul, an officer appointed by competent authority to reside in foreign countries, to facilitate and extend the commerce carried on between the subjects of the country which appoints him and those of the country or place in which he is to reside. The office appears to have originated in Italy, about the middle of the twelfth century, and was generally established all over Europe in the sixteenth century. British consuls were formerly appointed by the Crown, upon the recommendation of great trading companies, or of merchants engaged in trade with a particular country and place; but they are now directly appointed by Government, without requiring any such recommendation, though it, of course, is always attended to when made. The right of sending consuls to reside in foreign countries depends either upon a tacit or express convention.

The duties of a consul, even in the confined sense in which they are commonly understood, are important and multifarious. It is his business to be always on the spot, to watch over the commercial interests of the subjects of the state whose servant he is; to be ready to assist them with advice on all doubtful occasions; to see that the conditions in commercial treaties are properly observed; that those he is appointed to protect are subjected to no unnecessary or unjustifiable demands in conducting their business; to represent their grievances to the authorities at the place where they reside, or to the ambassador of the sovereign appointing him, at the court on which the consulship depends, or to the government at home; in a word, to exert himself to render the condition of the subjects of the country employing him, within the limits of his consulship, as comfortable, and their transactions as advantageous and secure, as possible.

The consuls and vice-consuls are, by express enactment (46 Geo. III. c. 98, s. 9), empowered to administer oaths in all cases respecting quarantine, in like manner as if they were magistrates of the several towns or places where they respectively reside; and see Geo. IV. c. 87, s. 20. It is also laid down that a consul is to attend, if requested, all arbitrations where property is concerned, between masters of British ships and the freighters, being inhabitants of the place where he resides.—Chitty's Com. Law, Vol I.

Any person, whether he be a subject of the state by which he is appointed, or of another, may be selected to fill the office of consul, provided he be approved and admitted by the government in whose territory he is to reside. In most instances, however, but not always, consuls are the subjects of the state appointing them.—McCull. Com. Dict.

Consular Marriage Act, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 61.

Consulta ecclesia, a church full or provided for.—Cowel.

Consultary response, the opinion of a court of law on a special case.

Consultation, a writ in the nature of a procedendo, whereby a cause, having been removed by prohibition from the ecclesiastical court to the king's court, is returned thither again; for if the judges of the king's court, upon comparing the libel with the suggestion of the party, find the suggestion false or not proved, and therefore the cause to be wrongfully removed from the ecclesiastical court, then, upon this consultation or deliberation they decree it to be returned, whereupon the writ in this case obtained is called a consultation.—24 Edw. I.; Reg. Orig. 44. Also a meeting of two or more counsel and the solicitor instructing them for deliberating or advising.

Consummation, the completion of a thing ; 2, the completion of a marriage between two affianced persons by cohabitation.

Consummation of tendency by the curtesy, is when a husband, upon his wife's death, becomes entitled to hold her lands in fee simple or fee tail, of which she was seised during the marriage, for his own life, provided he has had issue by her, capable of inheriting. His estate becomes initiate upon birth of a child.

Contagious Diseases (Animals). The acts upon this subject have been twice consolidated ; first by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 70 ; and secondly, by the Contagious Diseases Animals Act, 1878, 41 & 42 Vict. c. 74, which contains a number of provisions for preventing the spreading of 'cattle plague, pleuro pneumonia, foot and mouth disease, and sheep pox or sheep scab,' by slaughtering, or restricting the movement of animals, i.e., 'cattle, sheep, and goats, and all other ruminating animals, and swine,' affected with these diseases.

Contagious Diseases Prevention Acts, 29 Vict. c. 35, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 96. These acts have for their object the prevention of 'venereal diseases, including gonorrhoea,' by the medical examination and detention of prostitutes. The acts are in force at certain naval and military stations only. See Amos on the Laws for the regulation of Vice.

Contango. Contracts for shares on the Stock Exchange, London, are made for ready money, or for payment on 'settling' days ; if for ready money, the money is paid immediately ; if for time, it is paid on the settling day. The price at which stock or shares are sold, to be transferred on the next settling day, is called the 'price for account.' In the London share market, the 'account day' is generally twice a month. The 'settling day' is always the day before the account day. On the settling day takes place the business of giving the names of the persons for whom brokers have bought, and that of carrying over transactions to another day, which are called 'continuances,' the commission for which is called 'contango.' Foreign railway shares are subject to the same rules as English shares. And in foreign stocks, the account and settling days are one and the same. See Wilkinson's Law of Public Funds, 155 et seq., and Keyser on the Stock Exchange.

Contemner, one who has committed contempt of court.

Contemporanea expositio est optima et fortissima in lege. 2 Inst. 11.—(A contemporaneous exposition is the best and most powerful in law.)—See Broom's Max.

Contempt of Court. A disobedience to the rules, orders, process, or dignity of a court, which has power to punish for such offence by attachment. Contempts are either direct, which only insult or resist the powers of the court, or the persons of the judges who preside there ; or consequential, which, without such gross insolence or direct opposition, plainly tend to create a universal disregard of their authority. The principal instances of either sort are :—(1) those committed by inferior judges and magistrates by acting unjustly, oppressively, and irregularly in administering those portions of justice which are entrusted to their distribution, or by disobeying any writs issued out from the superior courts, by proceeding in a cause after it is put a stop to or removed by writ of prohibition, certiorari, error, supersedeas, and the like. (2) Those committed by sheriffs, bailiffs, gaolers, and other officers of the court, by abusing the process of the law or deceiving persons, or by any acts of oppression, extortion, collusive behaviour, or culpable neglect of duty. (3) Those committed by attorneys or solicitors, who are officers of their respective courts, by gross instances of fraud or corruption, injustice to their clients, or other dishonest practices. (4) Those committed by jurymen in collateral matters, relating to the discharge of their office, such as making default when summoned, refusing to be sworn, or to give any verdict, eating or drinking without the leave of the court, and especially at the cost of either litigant. (5) Those committed by witnesses, by making default when summoned, refusing to be sworn or examined, or prevaricating in their evidence. (6) Those committed by parties to any suit or proceeding in a court ; as by disobedience to any rule or order made in the progress of a cause, by non-payment of costs, or by non-observance of awards made rules of court. (7) Those committed by any other persons.—4 Bl. Com. 233.—Contempts may be also divided into acts of contempt committed in the court itself and out of court. Among the former are all unseemly behaviour (for which there is an express power to punish by County Court Act, 1846, 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 113), as talking boisterously and obstreperously, serving process, applauding any part of the proceedings, refusing to be sworn, or to answer a question as a witness, interfering with the business of the court on the part of a person who has no right to do so, and refusing to acquiesce in the ruling of the court, or speaking disrespectfully of or to the judge or jury or any other person, on the part of one who has a right to speak properly, i.e., either of the parties or his representative. Among the latter (not mentioned above) is the attempting by intimidation to cause any suitor to discontinue his action, as in Mulock's case; kidnapping or corrupting witnesses or attempting to do so, corrupting or attempting to corrupt jurors, obstructing or attempting to obstruct the officers of the court on their way to their duties, speaking or writing disrespectfully of the authorities of the court.

Every judge of a court of record has power immediately to commit for a contempt committed in his presence, but the power of an inferior Court to commit for contempt does not extend to contempt out of court (Reg v. Lefroy, L. R. 8 Q. B. 134). In the case of contempt committed out of court, the individual is called upon to show cause why he should not be committed, and is allowed to file affidavits in the matter. Contempt is sometimes punished by a fine; more commonly by commitment for an indefinite period. See PURGING CONTEMPT, and R. v. Castro (Onslow & Whalley's Case), L. R. 9 Q. B. 219. Less frequently by a sentence of imprisonment for a definite period, as in Fernandez's case, 7 Jurist, N. S. The Acts 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 36, and 23 & 24 Vict. c. 149, make provision for the relief of prisoners in contempt of the Court of Chancery; and as to the Ecclesiastical Courts, see 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 93, 3 & 4 Vict. c. 93, and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 38. See CONTUMACE CAPIENDO.

Contempt of Parliament. Any violation of the privileges of either House of Parliament may be punished by the House by committal. See 14 East 158; 9 A. & E. 1; and 11 A. & E. 253.

Contempt of the Queen's Person or Government is punishable at common law by fine and imprisonment. See 4 Steph. Com.

Contenement, a man's countenance or credit, which he has together with, and by reason of, his freehold; or, that which is necessary for the support and maintenance of men, agreeably to their several qualities of life.

Contentious business, a term used in the Court of Probate, meaning generally the business of obtaining probate or administration when there is a contest, as opposed to non-contentious business when there is no such contest.

Contest jurisdiction, jurisdiction to hear and determine any matter between party and party in an action or other judicial proceeding.

Contestatio litis, the plea and joinder of issue in the Ecclesiastical Courts.

Contestatio litis eget terminos contradictorios. Jenk. Cent. 117.—(The joinder of issue in a suit needs contradictory terms.)

Contestation, an issue of controversy.

Contingency with a double aspect, when one event only is expressed by the party, and two events are clearly in his contemplation. This is a construction in favour of the intention, that the intention may not be frustrated. The general rule is, that an interest to commence on a contingency shall not take place unless that contingency shall arise. It is in a few cases only that this favour is extended by construction. The exception seems to have been borrowed from the mode in which remainders are limited, and the construction which the limitations of remainders receive; and under which every estate will take place after the preceding estate, without regard to the particular time at which, by the words of the remainder, the estate is to take place. In these cases the court proceeds on the intention that the determination of every prior or intermediate estate shall accelerate the commencement of the more remote estate. It is on similar grounds of intention that the contingency with double aspect is allowed; for it is allowed on the idea that, by the intent of the testator, the estate limited on a contingency referable to one estate, shall also take place in case the contingency should not arise on which the prior gift is to vest an interest, and then, in point of law, the contingency has a double aspect: provided, by expression, for a contingency annexed to the interest previously limited, and also, by inference and construction of law, for the event that the contingency on which the prior interest is to vest shall never arise.

Contingent legacy, one that is bequeathed to a legatee, if he shall attain twenty-one.

Contingent remainder, an executory remainder limited so as to depend on an event or condition, which may never happen or be performed, or which may not happen or be performed till after the determination of the preceding estate.

The judges held (Smith d. Dormer v. Parkhurst, 18 Vin. Abr. 413; 4 Bro. Cas. Par. 353) that, in every case where an estate is given to A. for life, the grantor has an interest remaining in him to enter upon the estate, if it should determine by any act of the tenant amounting to a forfeiture; that this right is inherent in the grantor, from the nature of the estate itself, and may be conveyed to the trustees; and that, when it is conveyed to them, it becomes a legal estate in remainder, and vests in them as such. On this ground, the usual limitation to trustees for preserving contingent remainders is held to confer on them a vested estate.

The interposition of trustees to preserve contingent remainders has been rendered unnecessary in three cases by the 8 & 9 Vict.

c. 106, s. 8, which enacts 'that a contingent remainder existing at any time after the 31st day of December, 1844, shall be, and, if created before the passing of this act, shall be deemed to have been, capable of taking effect, notwithstanding the determination by forfeiture, surrender, or merger of any preceding estate of freehold, in the same manner, in all respects, as if such determination had not happened.—Pres. Conv. 403.

Contingent remainders are not preserved by this statute in all possible cases of the determination of the particular estate; they are only preserved against those destructive acts by or with the concurrence of the owner of the particular estate which prematurely determine it. A contingent remainder still fails of effect, if the particular estate regularly and naturally expire before the contingency happens, upon which the remainder vests; to obviate which, trustees, to preserve the contingent remainder, should, in such a case, be interposed.

In those cases where contingent remainders are interposed between a particular estate and other limitations over, if the contingent remainder be not in fee, but for life or in tail, the subsequent remainder may be vested, provided it be made to a person in esse. So a subsequent contingent remainder may become vested in interest before a preceding one, which will be no obstruction to its so vesting. But where there is a contingent limitation in fee absolute, no estate limited afterwards can be vested (Fearne's Cont. Rem. c. 1. s. 8). But a contingent determinable fee, devised in trust for some special purpose only will not prevent a subsequent limitation to one in esse from being vested. Where estates are subjected to a general power of appointment in the first taker, with remainders over in default of such appointment, the power does not suspend the remainders from vesting.

As to contingent remainders created by any instrument executed after the passing of 40 & 41 Vict. c. 33 [2nd August, 1877], it is enacted by that act that 'every contingent remainder . . . shall in the event of the particular estate determining before the contingent remainder vests, be capable of taking effect in all respects as if the contingent remainder had originally been created as a springing or shifting use or executory devise or other executory limitation.'

Contingent uses. These properly take effect as remainders and in imitation of contingent remainders. Where an estate is limited previously to a future use, and the future use is limited by way of remainder, it is subject to the rules of the common law, which are, that a vested estate of freehold must precede, in order to support, the remainder, and that a remainder must vest either during the existence of such preceding estate or eo instanti that it determines. And herein these contingent or springing uses (for they have been called by both epithets, and without any great inconsistency, although it creates difficulty in regard to their distinctive classification) differ from executory devises, which latter do not require any particular estate to support them; that by them a fee-simple or other less estate may be limited after a fee-simple, and that a remainder may be limited of a chattel interest after a particular estate for life created in the same. The following is an example of a contingent use: A use to the first unborn son of A., after a previous limitation to A. for life or for years, determinable on his life: for this does not answer to the notion of either a shifting or a springing use. To create a good springing use, it must be limited at once, independently of any preceding estate, and not by way of remainder, for if so, it is then a contingent and not a springing use, and subject to the laws governing contingent remainders. Thus springing uses are confined within very narrow limits, and future or contingent uses are placed on exactly the same footing with contingent remainders. Although shifting or secondary uses cannot be classed with future or contingent uses, because of the different modes by which they take effect, yet as a shifting use, when created, may, in point of limitation, be like a contingent remainder, it will, in that case (as well as a strict contingent use which does not take effect in derogation of any other estate), be subject to the same laws.

Continual claim, abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 11.

Continuance, Notice of trial by, when notice of trial had been given, and the plaintiff was not ready to proceed, instead of countermanding his notice, he might continue it to any sitting by notice of trial by continuance (R. 36, H. T. 1853). It could be given only once in a term.—1 Chit. Arch., 12th ed., 316. It is now obsolete, notice of trial not being given now for any particular sittings. (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XXXVI., rr. 11, 12.) See NOTICE OF TRIAL.

Continuances. The entry of them is abolished by Reg. Gen. H. T. 1853, r. 31.

Continuando, a word which was formerly used in a special declaration of trespass when the plaintiff would recover damages for several trespasses in the same action; and, to avoid multiplicity of actions, a man might in one action of trespass, recover damages for many trespasses, laying the first to be done with a continuando to the whole time in which the rest of the trespasses were done; which was in this form, continuando (by continuing) the trespasses aforesaid, etc., from the day aforesaid, etc., until such a day, including the last trespass.—Termes de la Ley.

Contra bonos mores, against good morals.

Contra formam collationis, a writ that issued where lands given in perpetual alms to lay houses of religion, or to an abbot and convent, or to the warden or master of an hospital and his convent, to find certain poor men with necessaries, and do divine service, etc., were alienated, to the disherison of the house and church. By means of this writ the donor or his heirs could recover the lands.—Reg. Orig. 238; F. N. B. 210.

Contra formam feoffamenti, a writ that lay for the heir of a tenant, enfeoffed of certain lands or tenements, by charter of feoffment from a lord, to make certain services and suits to his court, who was afterwards distrained for more services than were mentioned in the charter.—Reg. Orig. 176; Old Nat. Br. 162.

Contra formam statuti (contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided). The usual conclusion of every indictment, etc., brought for an offence created by statute.—7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 20; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 24.

Contra negantem principia non est disputandum. Co. Litt. 43.—(There is no disputing against one who denies first principles.)

Contra non valentem agere nulla currit prescriptio.—(No prescription runs against a person unable to bring an action.)—Broom's Max., 5th ed., 903.

Contra pacem (against the peace). It is generally necessary, in all indictments whatsoever, to allege that the offence was committed against the peace of our Lady the Queen. The omission of these words does not render an indictment, information, inquisition, or presentment insufficient.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 24.

Contra veritatem lex nunquam aliquid permittit. 2 Inst. 252.—(The law never suffers anything contrary to truth.)

Contraband [fr. contra, Lat., against, and bando, Ital., edict], such goods as are prohibited to be imported or exported, bought or sold, either by the laws of a particular state or by special treaties; also a term applied to designate that class of commodities which neutrals are not allowed to carry during war to a belligerent power.

It is a recognised general principle of the law of nations, that ships may sail to and trade with all kingdoms, countries, and states in peace with the princes or authorities whose flags they bear; and that they are not to be molested by the ships of any other power at war with the country with which they are trading, unless they engage in the conveyance of contraband goods. But great difficulty has arisen in deciding as to the goods comprised in this term.

In order to obviate all disputes as to what commodities should be deemed contraband, they have sometimes been specified in treaties or conventions. But this classification is not always respected during hostilities; and it is sufficiently evident that an article which might not be contraband at one time, or under certain circumstances, may become contraband at another time, or under different circumstances. It is admitted on all hands, even by Mr. Hubner, the great advocate for the freedom of neutral commerce, that everything that may be made directly available for hostile purposes is contraband, as arms, ammunition, horses, timber for ship-building, and all sorts of naval stores. The greatest difficulty has occurred in deciding as to provisions, which are sometimes held to be contraband, and sometimes not; so it is doubted whether coal be contraband of war. Lord Stowell has shown that the character of the port to which the provisions are destined is the principal circumstance to be attended to in deciding whether they are to be looked upon as contraband. A cargo of provisions intended for an enemy's port, in which it was known that a warlike armament was in preparation, would be liable to arrest and confiscation; while, if the same cargo were intended for a port where none but merchantmen were fitted out, the most that could be done would be to detain it, paying the neutral the same price for it as he would have got from the enemy.

The right of visitation and search is a right inherent in all belligerents; for it would be absurd to allege that they had a right to prevent the conveyance of contraband goods to an enemy, and to deny them the use of the only means by which they can give effect to such right.—Vattel, b. 3, c. vii., s. 114. The object of the search is twofold: first, to ascertain whether the ship is neutral or an enemy, for the circumstance of his hoisting a neutral flag affords no security that it is really such; and secondly, to ascertain whether it has contraband articles or enemies' property on board.—McCull. Com. Dict.

Contracausator, a criminal; one prosecuted for a crime.

Contract, an agreement between competent parties, upon a legal consideration, to do, or to abstain from doing, some act. In its widest sense it includes contracts of record and specialties, but the term is usually employed to designate only simple or parol obligations, which comprehend not only verbal and unwritten contracts, but all contracts not of record nor under seal.

Contracts are divided into three classes:—1st, contracts of record, such as judgments, recognizances, and statutes staple; 2nd, specialties, which are under seal, such as deeds and bonds; 3rd, simple contracts, or contracts by parol. There is no such fourth class as contracts in writing, distinct from verbal and sealed contracts; both verbal and written contracts are included in the class of simple contracts, and the only distinction between them is in regard to the mode of proof.

Every contract is founded upon the mutual agreement of the parties; when the agreement is formal, and stated either verbally or in writing, it is usually called an expressed contract; when the agreement is matter of inference and deduction, it is called an implied contract.

Contracts are also distinguished into executed and executory; executed, where nothing remains to be done by either party, and where the transaction is completed at the moment that the arrangement is made; as where an article is sold and delivered, and payment therefore is made on the spot; executory, where some future act is to be done; as where an agreement is made to build a house in six months; or to do an act on or before some future day; or to lend money upon a certain interest, payable at a future time.

There is also one other distinction, namely, that between entire and severable contracts. An entire contract is one the consideration of which is entire on both sides. The entire fulfilment of the promise by either is a condition precedent to the fulfilment of any part of the promise by the other. Whenever, therefore, there is a contract to pay the gross sum for a certain and definite consideration, the contract is entire. A severable contract is one the consideration of which is, by its terms, susceptible of apportionment on either side, so as to correspond to the unascertained consideration on the other side, as a contract to pay a person the worth of his services so long as he will do certain work; or to give a certain price for every bushel of so much corn as corresponds to a sample.—See the works on Contracts of Addison, Chitty, or Story; Pothier on Contracts. See also CONSIDERATION.

Contract of benevolence, a contract made for the benefit of one of the contracting parties only, as a mandate or deposit.

Contractus est quasi actus contra actum. 2 Co. 15.—(A contract is, as it were, act against act.)

Contractus ex turpi causa vel contra bonos mores, nullus. Hob. 167.—(A contract arising out of a base consideration, or against morality, is null.)

Contradiction in terms, a phrase of which the parts are expressly inconsistent, as, e.g., 'an innocent murder.' 'A fee simple for life.'

Contrafaction, a counterfeiting.—Blount.

Contramandatio placiti, a respiting or giving a defendant further time to answer, or a countermand of what was formerly ordered.—Leg. Hen. I. c. 59.

Contramandatum, a lawful excuse, which a defendant in a suit by attorney alleges for himself to show that the plaintiff has no cause of complaint.—Blount.

Contrapositio, a plea or answer.

Contrarients, used temp. Edw. II. to signify those who are opposed to the government, but are neither rebels nor traitors.

Contrarium contraria est ratio. Hob. 344.—(The reason of contrary things is contrary.)

Contratinere, to withhold.

Contravention, an act done in violation of a legal condition or obligation; particularly any act by an heir of entail in opposition to the provisions of the deed of entail; also, the action founded on the breach of law-burrows.—Bell's Scotch Dict.

Contractatio rei alienae, animo furandi, est furtum. Jenk. Cent. 132.—(The touching or removing of another's property, with an intention of stealing, is theft.)

Contribution, the performance by each of two or more persons, jointly liable by contract or otherwise, of his share of the liability. It frequently arises between sureties, who are bound for the same principal, when upon his default, one of them is compelled to pay the money, or to perform any other obligation for which they all became bound; the surety, who has paid the whole, being entitled to receive contribution from all the others for what he has done, in relieving them from a common burthen. Contribution amongst sureties may in general be enforced as well at law as in equity; but in some cases the remedy is more extensive in equity than at law. Thus, suppose there are three sureties in a bond for 3,000*l.*, and one of them has been obliged to pay the whole debt, he could at law only sue one of the sureties for his third, viz., 1,000*l.*, although the other surety had become bankrupt; but in equity he might compel the solvent surety to contribute 1,500*l.*, the moiety of the entire sum.—Story's Eq. Jur., s. 496. And the remedy is more complete and effectual in equity when an account and discovery are wanted, or where the number of the parties interested would occasion a multiplicity of actions. If one of the sureties die, the remedy at law lies only against the surviving sureties, whereas in equity it may be enforced against the representative of the deceased surety, who may be compelled to contribute.

The claim of contribution has its foundation in the clearest principles of natural justice; for as all are equally bound, and are equally relieved, it seems but just that in such a case all should contribute, in proportion, towards a benefit obtained by all, according to the maxim, Qui sentit commodum, sentire debet et onus.

By 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 5, a co-surety or co-debtor is entitled on payment of the debt to a transfer of the securities held by the creditor.

Legatees are sometimes compelled to refund and contribute for the payment of debts. In like manner, contribution lies between partners for any excess, which has been paid by one partner beyond his share, if, upon the winding-up of the partnership affairs, such a balance appears in his favour; or if, upon a dissolution, he has been compelled to pay any sum for which he ought to be indemnified. It also lies between joint-tenants, tenants-in-common, and part owners of ships and other chattels, for all charges and expenditures incurred for the common benefit.—1 Story's Equity, 393—415. So there is contribution between co-defendants in contract, if the goods of one be taken by fi. fa. for the whole amount of judgment. There is no contribution among wrong-doers.—8 T. R. 186. In an action in the Supreme Court, where a defendant claims to be entitled to contribution over against any other person, or where the Court or a judge think such question of contribution ought to be determined in the action, they or he may, on notice to be given to the alleged contributor, order the question to be so determined. (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XVI., r. 17. See also as to the mode of procedure, rr. 18—21.

Contributio facienda, a writ that lay where tenants in common were bound to do some act, and one of them was put to the whole burthen, to compel the rest to make contribution.—Reg. Orig. 175; F. N. B. 162.

Contributory, a person liable to contribute to the assets of a joint-stock company in the event of the same being wound up. Two lists of contributors are prepared by the official liquidator, viz., one of those who are shareholders at the time of the winding-up order, and who are primarily liable to contribute, and another of those who have ceased to be shareholders, but have been Contributory Midland within the twelve months previously, and who are liable in a secondary degree.—See Companies Act, 1862, ss. 38—78.

Controller [fr. contrôle, Fr., the copy of a roll of accounts], an overseer or officer appointed to examine and verify the accounts of other officers. See 5 & 6 Vict. c. 103.

Contubernium, the union of slaves with their master's consent; the children of such unions were the property of their parents' owners.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 35.

Contumace capiendo. Excommunication in all cases of contempt in the spiritual courts is discontinued by 53 Geo. III. c. 127, s. 2, and in lieu thereof, where a lawful citation or sentence has not been obeyed, the judge shall have power, after a certain period, to pronounce such person contumacious and in contempt, and to signify the same to the Court of Chancery, whereupon a writ de contumace capiendo shall issue from that court, which shall have the same force and effect as formerly belonged, in case of contempt, to a writ de excommunicato capiendo.—2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 93; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 93. See Dale's Case, 6 Q. B. D. 376; CONTEMPT.

Contumacy (contumacia), a refusal to appear in court when legally summoned; or disobedience to the rules and orders of a court.

Consuance of pleas, a privilege that a city or town has to hold pleas. See COGNIZANCE.

Conusant [fr. connaissant, Fr.], knowing or understanding.

Conusee. See COGNIZEE.

Convent, the fraternity of an abbey or priory, as societas is the number of fellows in a college.

Conventicle, a private assembly or meeting for the exercise of religion; the word was first an appellation of reproach to the religious assemblies of Wycliffe in the reigns of Edward III. and Richard II., and was afterwards applied to a meeting of dissenters from the established church. As this word in strict propriety denotes an unlawful assembly, it cannot be justly applied to the assembling of persons in places of worship licensed according to the requisitions of law. See DISSENTERS.

Conventicle Act, 22 Car. II. c. 1, by which all meetings of five or more persons, exclusive of the family, for nonconforming worship, were prohibited, repealed by 52 Geo. III. c. 155.

Conventio, an agreement or covenant.

Conventio in unum, the agreement between the two parties to a contract upon the sense of the contract proposed. It is an essential part of the contract, following the sollicitation or proposal emanating from the one, and followed by the consension or agreement of the other.—Civil Law. If the second party does not assent to the proposal in the sense in which it is made, he is not bound by his assent unless his mistake is unreasonable.

Conventio privatorum non potest publico juri derogare. Wing. 746.—(An agreement of private persons cannot affect public right.)

Conventio vincit legem. Dig. 2.—(An agreement overcomes law.)—6 Taunt. 430.

Convention, an extraordinary assembly of the Houses of Lords and Commons, without the assent or summons of the Sovereign. It can only be justified ex necessitate rei, as the Parliament which restored Charles II. and that which disposed of the crown and kingdom to William and Mary.

Conventional estates, those freeholds not of inheritance or estates for life, which are created by the express acts of the parties, in contradistinction to those which are legal and arise from the operation of law.

Conventione, a writ for the breach of any covenant in writing, whether real or personal. —Reg. Orig. 115; F. N. B. 145.

Conventions with foreign countries as to the apprehension and extradition of fugitive offenders. See EXTRADITION.

Conventual church, that which consists of regular clerks, professing some order or religion; or of dean and chapter; or other societies of spiritual men.

Conventuals, religious men united in a convent or religious house.—Cowel.

Converse (in logic), the transposition of the subject and predicate in a proposition, as 'Everything is good in its place.' Converse, 'Nothing is good which is not in its place.'

Conversion, the wrongful appropriation of the goods of another. Where a person finding the goods of another, or having them in his possession, applies or converts them to his own use, without the owner's consent, the owner may maintain an action (formerly technically called an action of trover or conversion) against him. Refusal to restore the goods is prima facie sufficient evidence of a conversion, though it does not amount to a conversion.—10 Rep. 56. See TROVER.

Conversion (in logic). See CONVERSE.

Conversion of property. From trusts there is derived an equitable principle relative to the constructive conversion of property, which is this:—That money directed to be employed in the purchase of realty, and realty directed to be sold and turned into money, are considered in equity as that species of property into which they are directed to be converted; and this, in whatever manner the direction is given; whether by will, by contract, marriage articles, settlement, or otherwise; and whether the money is actually deposited, or only covenanted to be paid, or whether the land is actually conveyed, or only agreed to be conveyed (Fletcher v. Ashburner, 1 Bro. C. C. 497). This principle is governed by the doctrine of equity, that that which ought to be done shall be deemed as actually done.

The property thus equitably transmuted by anticipation will possess all the qualities, incidents, and peculiarities of that kind of property into which it is destined to be changed. See 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 71.

But the beneficiary may elect to take the property in the shape it then is, before the actual conversion takes place. Slight evidence of an intention so to elect will be sufficient. When a person entitled to the fee simple of an estate to be purchased with trust money, without requiring the purchase to be completed, causes the securities for the money to be changed in the name of a trustee, in trust for himself, his executors, and administrators (Lingen v. Sowray, 1 P. Wms. 172); and where a person entitled absolutely to the money to arise by the sale of real estate, makes a lease of the estate itself, reserving rent payable to him, his heirs, and assigns (Crabtree v. Bramble, 3 Atk. 380), these circumstances have been considered to amount to an election.

The nature of the fund cannot be altered by the election of a trustee or an infant.

Conveyance, an instrument which transfers property from one person to another, defined for the purposes of the Conveyancing Act, infra, as including 'assignment, appointment, lease, settlement, and other assurance, and covenant to surrender, made by deed on a sale, mortgage, demise, or settlement of any property, or on any other dealing with or for any property.' See CONVEYANCING ACT, DEED, USES, TRUSTS, etc., etc.

Conveyancers, persons who, being neither barristers, nor solicitors, nor proctors, employ themselves solely in the preparation of deeds or assurances of property. They must, by the Stamp Act, 1870, s. 59, take out yearly a certificate upon which a stamp duty of 9*l.* is payable if they reside within ten miles from the General Post Office, or in the city of Dublin, or within three miles thereof, and 6*l.* if they reside elsewhere. A conveyancer (unlike a counsel) may maintain an action for his fees.

Conveyancing, the art of the alienation of property, by means of appropriate instruments or 'conveyances.' See next title.

Conveyancing Act, 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41. An Act, of which the principal object is to shorten contracts of sale, conveyances, mortgages, and trust deeds, by a series of enactments that certain 'general words,' covenants, and conditions, which by the practice of conveyancers have for a long time been inserted at length as 'common forms' in these instruments, shall be implied therein by virtue of the act, unless the parties stipulate to the contrary. The act also provides forms of statutory mortgage, and of transfer and re-conveyance, and short forms of mortgage, further charge, conveyance on sale, and marriage settlement, in connection with which 8 & 9 Vict. c. 119, also providing a short form of conveyance, is repealed, although 8 & 9 Vict. c. 124, providing a short form of lease, is left standing. The Solicitors' Remuneration Act of the same year (see SOLICITORS) brings into force a new mode of remunerating solicitors for conveyancing business. Both acts were originally introduced by Lord Cairns.

The act also contains important provisions as to relief against forfeiture of leases, the powers and duties of mortgagors, mortgagees, trustees, and executors, the management of the property of married women and infants, and the recovery and redemption of rent-charges; and it allows the residue of 'long terms'—i.e., a residue of not less than 200 years of a term originally created for not less than 300 years—to be converted into a fee simple. See FORFEITURE, etc., etc.

The act came into operation on the 1st January, 1882, but the provisions as to relief against forfeiture of leases were retrospective.

Conveyancing Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 39. The principal provisions of this act are: section 2, providing that official certificates of the result of searches for judgments, etc., are to be conclusive in favour of a purchaser; section 3, restricting 'constructive notice'; and sections 8 & 9 relating to irrevocable power, of attorney. See CONSTRUCTIVE NOTICE, POWER OF ATTORNEY, SEARCH.

Conveyancing counsel. The Lord Chancellor may nominate any number of conveyancing counsel in actual practice, not less than six, who have practised as such for ten years at least, to be the conveyancing counsel upon whose opinion the court or any judge thereof may act under the 40th sect. of 15 & 16 Vict. c. 80.—Smi. Ch. Pr. 506. No special provision is made for these counsel by the Jud. Acts, 1873, 1875; except in so far as they can retain their offices as officers of a Court whose jurisdiction is transferred to the Supreme Court. (Jud. Act, 1873, ss. 77 et seq.)

Convicia si irascaris tua divulgata, spreta exolescunt. 3 Inst. 198.—(If you be moved to anger by insults you publish them, if despised, they are forgotten.)

Convicium, anything which publicly insults another.—Civil Law.

Convict, a person found guilty of a crime or offence alleged against him, either by a verdict of a jury or other legal decision. The act for abolishing forfeitures for treason and felony (33 & 34 Vict. c. 23), enables the Crown to appoint administrators of the property of convicts.

Conviction, the act of a legal tribunal adjudging a person guilty of a criminal offence. As to the powers of justices to convict summarily, see Paley on Summary Convictions.

Convivium, the same among the laity as procuratio with the clergy, viz., when a tenant, by reason of his tenure, is bound to provide meat and drink for his lord once or oftener in the year.—Blount.

Convocation, an assembly of the clergy. Its purpose is stated to be the enactment of canon law, subject to the license and authority of the sovereign, and the examination and censure of all heretical and schismatical books and persons. It is held during the session of parliament, and is convened by the sovereign. There are two convocations, one for the province of Canterbury, the other for that of York. It consists of an upper and a lower house in the province of Canterbury; in the upper sit the bishops, and in the lower the inferior clergy, who are represented by their proctors, and all the deans and archdeacons. In York, the convocation consists of one house only. Convocation, by express license from the sovereign, may legislate by making canons; but, except in one instance in the year 1861, it has long ceased to exercise any legislative power. Steph. Com., book 4, c. vi.

Convoy, ships of war which accompany merchantmen in time of war, to protect them from the attacks of the enemy. There are five things essential to sailing with convoy:—viz. (1) It must be with a regular convoy under an officer appointed by government; (2) it must be from the place of rendezvous appointed by government; (3) it must be a convoy for the voyage; (4) the master of the ship must have sailing instructions from the commanding officer of the convoy; (5) the ship must depart and continue with the convoy till the end of the voyage, unless separated by necessity. Abbott on Shipping, pt. 3, c. iii; Marshall on Insurance, book 1, c. ix, s. 5. Also a body of troops, which accompanies provisions, ammunition, or other property for protection.

Coolies, Cooly, porter, labourer.—Indian.

Co-operation, the combined action of numbers. It is of two distinct kinds:—(1) Such co-operation as takes place when several persons help each other in the same employment; (2) such co-operation as takes place when several persons help each other in different employments. These may be termed simple co-operation and complex co-operation—Mill's Pol. Eco. 142.

Coopertio, the head or branches of a tree cut down ; though coopertio arborum is rather the bark of timber trees felled, and the chumps and broken wood.—Cowel.

Coopertura, a thicket or covert of wood.

Co-ordinate and Subordinate are terms often applied as a test to ascertain the doubtful meaning of clauses in an act of parliament. If there be two, one of which is grammatically governed by the other, it is said to be subordinate to it ; but if both are equally governed by some third clause, the two are called co-ordinate.

Coparceners, or Parceners, a tenancy which arises when an inheritable estate descends from the ancestor to several persons possessing an equal title to it. It arises by act of law only, i.e., by descent, which, in relation to this subject, is of two kinds :—(1) Descent by the common law, which takes place where an ancestor dies intestate, leaving two or more females as his co-heiresses ; these, according to the canon of real property inheritance, all take together as coparceners or parceners, the law of primogeniture not obtaining among women in equal relationship to their ancestor ; they are, however, deemed to be one heir ; and (2) Descent by particular custom, as in the case of gavelkind lands, which descend to all the males in equal degree, as the sons, brothers, or uncles of the deceased intestate ancestor ; in default of sons, they descend to all the daughters equally.

Coparcenary relates to the estate—joint tenancy to the person. Hence a man may be coparcener with himself. Suppose two moieties of an estate to descend upon the same individual, one from his father, and the other from his mother, he may fairly be said to possess the estate in coparcenary ; for on his death without lineal descendants, one moiety will descend to his heir on the part of his father, and the other to his heir on the part of his mother.

Coparceners have a unity though not an entirety, or necessarily an equality of interest ; if there be two only, each is properly entitled to the whole of a distinct moiety ; and being seised in moiety there is no jus accrescendi between them, for on the death of one of them intestate, her moiety descends to her heir-at-law, who holds, subject to courtesy (if any), with the surviving parcener in coparcenary, although such heir may be a male, and a collateral. Indeed, their estates are held in coparcenary, so long as they claim by descent. As soon as any part is severed, by conveyance, from the title of the remaining part, the part so severed will be held in common.

Between the alienee and the other coparceners there will be a tenancy in common. The remaining coparceners will, as between themselves, continue to hold in coparcenary.

They are seised both jointly and severally, and possess a unity of title, but the estate may vest in them at different periods.

Coparcenary is like joint-tenancy so far as the same unity of title, and similarity of interest is common to both, but they differ in this, that while coparceners always must claim by descent (for if two sisters purchase an estate to hold to them and their heirs, they are not parceners, but joint-tenants), joint-tenants always claim by act of parties.

Coparcenary is intermediate in its nature between joint-tenancy and tenancy in common. There is a unity of title, but no benefit of survivorship ; for the share of a coparcener dying seised descends to her heir, who holds it also as a coparcener. A joint-tenant cannot convey his share to his companion by feoffment, because each is supposed to be equally seised of the whole : but he may convey it by release. Tenants in common, on the contrary, may convey to one another by feoffment, but not by mere release. But coparceners may adopt either mode.

This estate may be dissolved in any of the following modes :—

(1) By deed of partition, as

(a) Where coparceners agree to divide the estate into equal parts in severalty, each have a determinate portion.

(β) Where they appoint some third person to divide the estate, and after a division by him, each coparcener, according to seniority of age, or as shall be agreed between them, selects her own portion. The privilege of seniority is in this case personal ; for if the eldest sister be dead, her issue shall not choose first, but the next sister. But if an advowson descend in coparcenary, and the sisters cannot agree in the presentation, and the eldest and her issue, nay, her husband, or her assigns, shall present alone, before the younger. And the reason given is, that the former privilege of priority in choice upon a division arises from an act of her own, the agreement to make partition, and therefore is merely personal ; the latter, of presenting to the living, arises from the act of the law, and is annexed not only to her person, but to her estate also.

(γ) Where the eldest coparcener divides the estate, in which case she takes the portion remaining after her sisters have made their choice.

(8) When they agree to cast lots for their shares.

(2) By the alienation of one of the parties which destroys the unity of title.

(3) By all the estate at last descending to one person, which reduces it to a severalty, and

(4) By a compulsory partition under a decree in Chancery.—Co. Lit. 163 et seq.; 1 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 346—7.

Copartnership. See PARTNERSHIP.

Cope, a custom or tribute due to the crown or lord of the soil, out of the lead mines in Derbyshire; also a hill, or the roof and covering of a house; a church vestment.

Copeman, or Copesman, a chapman.

Copesmate [fr. koopman, Du., fr. koop, chaffer, exchange], a merchant, a partner in merchandize.

Copia libelli deliberanda, a writ that lay where a man could not get a copy of a libel at the hands of a spiritual judge, to have the same delivered to him.—Reg. Orig. 51.

Coppa, a crop or cock of grass, hay, or corn, divided into titheable portions, that it may be more fairly and justly tithed.

Copulatio verborum indicat acceptationem in eodem sensu. Bac. Vol. IV. p. 26.—(The coupling of words shows their acceptation in the same sense.) See NOSCITUR A SOCIIS.

Coppice, or Copse [fr. couper, Fr., to cut], a small wood, consisting of underwood, which may be cut at twelve or fifteen years' growth for fuel.

Copula, the corporal consummation of marriage. See PER VERBA DE PRÆSENTI.—Copula (in logic), the link between subject and predicate contained in the verb.

Copy [copia, Lat.], the transcript or double of an original writing; as the copy of a patent, charter, deed, etc. As to when copies certified or examined are admissible in evidence, see Taylor on Evidence, s. 1323 et seq.

Copyhold, a base tenure founded upon immemorial custom and usage; its origin is undiscoverable, but it is said to be the ancient villeinage modified and changed by the commutation of base services into specified rents, either in money or money's worth.

A copyhold estate is a parcel of the demesnes of a manor held at the lord's will, and according to the custom of such manor. The tenant may have the same quantities of interest in this tenure, as he may enjoy in freeholds, as an estate in fee-simple or (by particular custom) fee-tail, or for life, and he may have only a chattel-interest, as an estate for years, in it. By the custom of some manors, the estate devolves upon the heir on the ancestor's death, and is called a copyhold of inheritance. As far as the quantity and modification of interest are concerned, the tenant's estate partakes of the nature of a freehold, but because it is held by a base instead of a free tenure, it is called a copyhold. Viewing his estate, then, through the medium of its holding or tenure, the tenant is merely a tenant-at-will; but it is to be remarked that this tenancy-at-will must be according to custom, which always regulates the copyholder's interest, upon which interest the lord has no power whatever to encroach. Free copyholds or customary freeholds, however, are held according to the custom of the manor, and altogether independently of the will of the lord, while copyholds of base tenure are held merely at the lord's will. The law certainly considers the freehold to be in the lord (except in the case of strict customary freeholds, when the freehold is in the tenant), and the tenant to possess his customary estate according to the quantity of interest it is intended he should possess, but the law will protect the copyholder, and will not permit him to be at the will or wayward caprice of the lord.

There are four circumstances necessary to the existence of a copyhold estate:—(1) A manor; (2) a court; (3) the land must be parcel of the manor; and (4) it must have been demised or demisable by copy of court roll from time immemorial.

A manor is essentially necessary, for all copyholds must be parcels of manors; and so is a court, for a copyholder has no other evidence of his title than the rolls of the court, which he can inspect and take copies of to use as he may think proper; and the Court of Queen's Bench (now the Queen's Bench division of the High Court of Justice) will order the lord to allow such inspection, and if the lord then refuse, he will be attached. There are two courts incident to every manor—a court baron or freeholders' court, and a customary court, which only relates to the copyholders, who form the homage and transact the necessary business, the lord or his steward presiding as judge. Although these courts are essentially distinct, yet they are usually held at the same time, and the same roll serves to record the proceedings of both. In the court baron the suitors are judges. In the customary court the suitors are assistants to the lord, or his steward, who is the judge. It is obvious that the lands granted must be parcel of a manor, seeing that a copyhold is part of the demesnes of a manor, but it is not absolutely necessary that the lands should continue parcel of the manor. And because this tenure derives its whole force from custom, the lands must have been demisable by copy of court roll from time immemorial, for the two pillars, upon which every custom rests, are common usage and existence time out of mind. No copyhold estate can, therefore, be created at the present day.

Copyhold customs are divided into two species:—(1) General, which extend to all manors in which there are copyholders, and are warranted by the common law, and of which the courts of law take judicial notice, without being specially pleaded; and (2) Particular, which prevail in some manors only, and which must be specially pleaded. They are construed strictly, and when they are contrary to reason, morality, or justice, or cannot be reduced to a certainty, the courts will not give effect to them.

The following services and incidents are by general custom annexed to copyholds:—

(1) Fealty, but the oath of fealty is now generally resented.

(2) Suit of court, for every copyholder is bound to attend the lord's court, and be sworn of the homage.

(3) The copyholder is entitled to estovers, i.e., housebote, hedgebote, and ploughbote, unless restrained by particular custom.

(4) He cannot commit any kind of waste, unless there exists a particular custom to warrant it.

(5) Copyholds of inheritance are descendible according to the rules of the common law, unless the custom be otherwise, in which case the custom must prevail. The alterations effected by the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, are applicable to this species of tenure.

(6) Copyholds are alienated by surrender, according to general custom, and they are devisable.

(7) A copyholder, by general custom, may make a lease for a year, and with the lord's license he may lease for any number of years.

(8) Copyholds are liable to all sorts of debts, by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 104, and 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.

(9) The widow of a copyholder, according to a particular custom, is entitled to a certain portion of her husband's lands, which varies in quantity, as a half, a third, a fifth, or the whole. It is called her free-bench. It is generally an estate for life, but is forfeited by a second marriage or incontinency. If the widow is detected in incontinency, she loses her free-bench, but nevertheless, in certain manors, if she come into the manor court riding backwards upon a black ram, with his tail in her hand, and repeating a ribald dog-grel, the steward is bound, by particular custom, to re-admit her to her free-bench.

The widow's free-bench is barred by a jointure, whether legal or equitable; or by the alienation of the copyhold lands by the husband, or even by an agreement to convey, or by forfeiture, or by a grant of the freehold by the lord to the husband, for then the copyhold is destroyed, or by a devise expressed to be in satisfaction of it.

(10) Copyholds, by special custom, are subject to courtesy, and, by the custom of some manors, the husband is entitled to courtesy, though he have no issue by his wife, but is forfeitable on a second marriage.

(11) Upon every descent of a copyhold estate, a sum of money or fine is due to the lord from the heir upon his admission, as a consideration for the renewal of a grant. If the heir refuse to be admitted, the lord may seize the estate to his own use. The lord is also entitled to fines upon all voluntary grants, upon the admission of tenants by the courtesy, the free-bench, and indeed upon alienation generally, the only exception being in case of bankruptcy. No fine is due upon the admission of a remainder-man, unless by special custom, because the admission of the tenant for life is generally deemed the admission of the remainder-man, nor are fines due upon a mere change of the tenant's interest, nor upon a covenant or agreement to surrender, because it is only due upon an actual admittance. Tenants in common pay this fine apportionably, each according to his share. Joint-tenants and coparceners pay a single fine for all. The practice as to the payment of the fine on the admittance of joint-tenants is this: two years' value is paid for the first life, half of that on the second, and a half of that half on the third, and so on, according to the number of the tenants. Joint-tenants succeed each other, by right of survivorship and without a new admittance, and fines are not due but upon admittance; the application, therefore, of the general rule to the case of joint-tenants would be unfair to the lord. By the custom of many manors, fines are due from copyholders on every change of the lord which happens by the act of God. The quantum of all these fines is not to exceed two years' value of the lands, which is recoverable by action of debt. See FINES IN COPYHOLDS.

(12) Besides a fine, a heriot is due to the lord on his tenant's death, though he be only a tenant for life, provided he be a legal and not an equitable tenant. It is usually the best beast or averium; it is sometimes the best chattel, as a jewel or a piece of plate, but it must be a personal chattel. But no heriot is due upon the death of a married woman, because she can have no chattels. Heriots are in some manors commuted to a customary composition in money, but it must be an indisputably ancient custom.

Copyholds were forfeited to the lord of the manor, and not to the Crown, unless by the express words of an act of parliament, by the tenant being attainted of treason or felony; and are still so by his attempting to alienate his estate by any mode which is contrary to custom, or by committing any kind of waste, by disclaiming the tenure, by refusing to perform the services.

Copyholds may be destroyed, suspended, or enfranchised, i.e., converted into free tenure, in several ways.

(1) If the copyholder surrender his estate to the rightful lord, to the use of the lord.

(2) If a copyholder release all his right and interest to the lord.

(3) If the lord convey the freehold of the copyhold to a stranger, and the copyholder release to the stranger.

(4) If the lord convey to the copyholder the land for an estate of freehold, or even for a term of years.

(5) There are several cases in which copyholds are suspended only for a certain time, and not absolutely extinguished; thus, where a copyholder marries the lady of the manor, this suspends the copyhold during the marriage, but does not extinguish it. So where a copyholder becomes king, the copyhold is suspended, for the king could not perform the services, being inconsistent with his royalty; but after his death, the next person entitled to the copyhold, shall, if a subject, hold by copy.

(6) The efforts of the legislature have been of late years directed to these customary estates, which are, in fact, the remains of feudal slavery. Their chief inconveniences, as set forth by the Real Property Commissioners, in their third report, are the multiplicity and uncertainty of the different manorial customs on which the tenure depends—the check to agricultural improvements occasioned by the state of the law with respect to timber and minerals—the liability to arbitrary fines—the numerous payments due to stewards on account of fees, and the vexatious and oppressive character of heriots. It is manifest, then, that where complexity, which must always belong to the legal institutions of a civilized country, is wantonly aggravated by the admission of several concurring systems, serious mischiefs are likely to arise from the ignorance or forgetfulness of practitioners, and even of judges, however carefully selected.

In order to diminish these grievances and to facilitate enfranchisement, the 21 & 22 Vict. c. 94 was passed, which came into operation on the 1st October, 1858 (s. 1).

It repeals (s. 2) the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 57;

the 4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, s. 11, after the words 'substituted, in the place of such lord, tenant, or other person'; the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 51, ss. 2, 11, 27; and 'all the provisions of the copyholds acts which authorize commutations by schedule of apportionment, and commutations by a schedule to be prepared by the steward, and also enfranchisement by schedule of apportionment, and the charging of enfranchisement or compensation of moneys, or the expenses of commutations or enfranchisements upon land' (s. 3).

The copyhold acts are not to extend to ecclesiastical manors, where the tenant has not a right of renewal (s. 4).

There is a copyhold commission, composed of three commissioners, who act as a board, in order to carry the provisions of this act into execution.

By commutation, the most burdensome incidents affecting customary tenure, as rents, fines, and heriots, and the lord's right in timber, and also (if so expressed) in mines and minerals, may be commuted by agreement, for corn rents or fixed fines, or for pieces of land, part of the copyholds commuted.

The effect of enfranchisement is, that the lands become freeholds, but with the saving of all commonable rights and beneficial limitations. Consult Scriven on Copyholds, and Chitty's Statutes, vol. i., tit. 'Copyhold.'

Copyhold Commissioners. The tithe commissioners for England and Wales (the number of whom is never to exceed three) are appointed the commissioners for carrying the provisions of the copyhold acts into execution.

Any two of them form a board to transact business. They have an official seal with which all documents must be stamped, when they are receivable in evidence without any further proof. Their office must be in London or Westminster. The commissioners make an annual report to the Home Secretary of State, which is then laid by him before parliament. They are empowered to appoint and remove assistant commissioners, or secretary, and other servants and officers, as shall be deemed necessary. They cannot sit in parliament, and their salaries and allowances are paid out of the consolidated fund. They make a solemn declaration to act honestly in the discharge of their duties, which however they may delegate to their assistant commissioners, who pledge their impartiality by a like solemnity.—4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, ss. 1—10; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 53; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 51; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 94; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 72; and 31 & 32 Vict. cc. 89, 143.

Copyhold Inclosure and Tithe Commissioners, a board constituted under 8 & 9 Vict.

c. 118. The powers of these commissioners, of the copyhold commissioners, and of the tithe commissioners, are now vested in one board called 'the Land Commissioners.' See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 53; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 31; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 81; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 73, the preceding title, and LAND COMMISSIONERS.

Copyright, an incorporeal right, being the exclusive privilege of printing, reprinting, selling, and publishing his own original work, which the law allows an author. By the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, the copyright of every book, published in the lifetime of its author, endures for his life, and for seven years longer, or (if the seven years shall expire before the end of forty-two years from the publication) for forty-two years; if the work is posthumous, the copyright endures for forty-two years from the publication, and belongs to the proprietor of the manuscript. The remedy given for a book unlawfully printed within the British dominions is an action on the case, to be commenced within twelve calendar months. Equity will also afford relief by special injunction, to restrain the progress of the injury, and to compel an account of the profits arising from the invasion. The title of the work must be entered at Stationers' Hall. As to those unlawfully reprinted in any place out of the British dominions, and imported into the United Kingdom, they may be seized, as forfeited, by any officer of the custom or excise, and the offenders are liable to penalties.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 93. A copyright is assignable by an instrument in writing, which does not require to be under seal. Sections 12 and 31 of the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, provide a mode of statutory assignment by an entry in the register of the assignment, which entry has the same effect as a deed.

The sole liberty of printing and publishing lectures is secured to lecturers by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 75; dramatic pieces and musical performances are protected by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 15; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45, ss. 20, 21; and 38 & 39 Vict. c. 12; engravings, prints, and photographs, by 8 Geo. II. c. 13; 7 Geo. III. c. 38; 17 Geo. III. c. 57; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 59; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 95; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 12; and see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68; sculptures, models, copies, and casts, by 38 Geo. III. c. 71; 54 Geo. III. c. 56; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 104; and see 21 & 22 Vict. c. 70; and designs for articles, whether of ornament or utility, by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 100; amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 70; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 65; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 104; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 8; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 6; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 73; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68; and 38 & 39 Vict. c. 93.

As to International Copyright, see 7 & 8

Vict. c. 12; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 12, amended by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 12; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68; as to Colonial Copyright, see 10 & 11 Vict. c. 95; and (as to Canada) 38 & 39 Vict. c. 53.

See Shorrt on Copyright; Copinger on Copyright.

Corraage, an extraordinary imposition, upon some unusual occasion; it seems to be of certain measures of corn.—Blount.

Coram nobis, before us ourselves [the king, i.e., in the King's or Queen's Bench].

Coram non judice (in presence of a person not a judge). When a suit is brought and determined in a court which has no jurisdiction in the matter, then it is said to be coram non judice, and the judgment is void.

Coram paribus (before his peers).

Cord of wood, a quantity of wood eight feet long, four feet broad, and four feet high.

Cordiner, or Cordwainer [fr., cordonnier, Fr.; fr. cordouan, Old Fr., originally leather from Cordova], a shoemaker.

Co-respondent, the man charged with adultery, and made a party to a suit for dissolution of marriage. See 20 & 21 Vict. c. 81.

Coretes [fr. cored, Brit.], pools, ponds, etc.

Corium forisfacere, to forfeit one's skin, applied to a person condemned to be whipped; anciently the punishment of a servant. Corium perdere, the same. Corium redimere, to compound for a whipping.

Corn-rent. It was created by 18 Eliz. c. 6, by which it was directed that one-third of the whole rent then paid on college leases should for the future be reserved in wheat or malt, reserving a quarter of wheat for each 6s. 8d., or a quarter of malt for every 5s.; or that the lessees should pay the same according to the price that wheat or malt should be sold for in the market next to the respective colleges, on the market day before the rent becomes due.—2 Bl. Com. 609.

Corn Returns. By the Corn Returns Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 37, consolidating with amendments 5 & 6 Vict. c. 14, and 27 & 28 Vict. c. 87, certain towns as named by Order in Council from time to time and being not less than 150 nor more than 200 in number, supply through 'inspectors of corn returns' weekly returns of the purchases of British corn made in such towns. The inspectors make up these returns from the dealers and corn factors, etc., who are bound by s. 11 of the act to supply particulars under a penalty not exceeding 20l. Averages are computed by the Board of Trade from the weekly returns, and published in the London Gazette.

Corn Tax Abolition Act, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 46.

Cornage [fr. cornu, Lat., a horn], a kind of tenure in grand serjeanty, the service of which was to blow a horn when any invasion of the Scots was perceived; and by this tenure many persons held their lands northward about the place commonly called Picts' Wall. This old service of horn-blowing was afterwards paid in money, and the sheriff's accounted for it under the title of Cornagium.—Camd. Brit. 609.

Cornare, to blow on the horn.

Cornwall, Duke of, one of the titles of the eldest son of the reigning sovereign of the United Kingdom. He is Duke of Cornwall by inheritance, and is usually made Prince of Wales and Earl of Chester by special creation and investiture.—1 Bl. Com. 225. Cornwall is a royal duchy, the revenues of which belong to the Prince of Wales for the time being. See STANNARY.

Cornwall Submarine Mines Act, 1858. 21 & 22 Vict. c. 109, explained by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 53.

Corodio habendo, a writ to exact a corody of an abbey or religious house.—Reg. Orig. 264.

Corody, or Corrody [fr. conredium, conredium, conrodium, corrodium, Monk. Lat.; corredare, Ital., to fit out], a sum of money or allowance of meat, drink, and clothing due to the Crown from the abbey or other religious house, whereof it was founder, towards the sustentation of such one of its servants as is thought fit to receive it. It differs from a pension in that it was allowed towards the maintenance of any of the king's servants in an abbey; a pension being given to one of the king's chaplains, for his better maintenance, till he may be provided with a benefice.—F. N. B. 250.

Corollary, a collateral consequence.

Corona mala, the clergy who abuse their character were so called.—Blount.

Coronare filium, to make one's son a priest. Homo Coronatus was one who had received the first tonsure, as preparatory to superior orders, and the tonsure was in form of a corona, or crown of thorns.—Covel.

Coronation oath. At the public ceremony of crowning a sovereign of this kingdom in acknowledgment of his right to govern the kingdom, the sovereign swears to observe the laws, customs, and privileges of the kingdom, and to maintain the Protestant reformed religion. The exact form of the oath is prescribed by 1 W. & M. c. 6.

Coronatore eligendo, the writ issued to the sheriff, commanding him to proceed to the election of a coroner.

Coronatore exonerando, a writ for the removal of a coroner, for a cause which is to be therein assigned, as that he is engaged in other business, or incapacitated by years or sickness, or has not a sufficient estate in the county, or lives in an inconvenient part of it. The 25 Geo. II. c. 29, makes extortion, neglect, or misbehaviour, causes of removal; and see 23 & 24 Vict. c. 116.

Coroner, a very ancient officer at the common law, so called because he has principally to do with pleas of the Crown, or such wherein the sovereign is more immediately concerned. There are usually four or six appointed for every county of England. They are chosen for life by all the freeholders in the county, by virtue of the queen's writ de coronatore eligendo, directed to the sheriff. By 7 & 8 Vict. c. 92, coroners may be appointed for districts within counties, instead of the county at large, and by that act and by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 116, provision is made for the election and remuneration of coroners and their removal for inability or misbehaviour.

In every borough having a separate quarter sessions, a coroner is to be appointed by the Town Council with exclusive jurisdiction within the borough.—Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, ss. 171—174.

The office and power of a coroner are either (1) Judicial, and consist principally in inquiring, when any person is slain or dies suddenly or in prison, concerning the manner of his death. A jury is empaneled, and inquisition must be found with the concurrence of at least twelve of them. Provisions have been made to prevent it from being quashed on account of certain technical defects (6 & 7 Vict. c. 12; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 83). The inquisition must be had super visum corporis, for if the body be not found, the coroner cannot sit, except by virtue of a special commission issued for that purpose. If any be found guilty of murder or other homicide by such inquisition, the coroner is to commit them to prison for further trial, and used also to inquire concerning their lands, goods, and chattels, which were forfeited thereby; and must certify the whole inquisition under the seals of himself and jurors, together with the evidence thereon, to the Court of Queen's Bench or the next assizes. The 22 Vict. c. 33, enables coroners to admit to bail persons charged with manslaughter. Another branch of the coroner's office is to inquire concerning shipwrecks and treasure trove. An idea for some time prevailed that the coroner was authorized to inquire into the origin of fires, but this error has been judicially corrected. (2) Ministerial. He is the sheriff's substitute in executing process, when the sheriff is interested in the suit, or of kindred to either plaintiff or defendant.—Jervis on Coroners; Com. Dig. Officer, 9. Chitty's Statutes, vol i., tit. 'Coroner.' This officer is first mentioned in King Athelstan's charter to Beverley, in 925.

Coroner's court, a tribunal of record, where a coroner holds his inquiries.

Corporal, an epithet for anything that belongs to the body, as corporal punishment. See WHIPPING.

Corporal oath, so called because the party taking it lays his hand on the New Testament.

Corporate name. When a corporation is erected, a name is always given to it, or supposing none to be actually given, will attach to it by implication, and by that name alone it must sue and be sued, and do all legal acts, though a very minute variation therein is not material, and the name is capable of being changed (by competent authority) without affecting the identity or capacity of the corporation. But some name is the very being of its constitution; and though it is the will of the sovereign that erects the corporation, yet the name is the knot of its combination, without which it could not perform its corporate functions. The name of incorporation, says Coke (10 Rep. 28), is as a proper name, or name of baptism, and therefore when a private founder gives his college or hospital a name, he does it only as a godfather, and by the same name the king baptizes it on incorporation. Certain banking and other companies have power to sue and be sued in the name of a public officer. It is provided by the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XVI., r. 10, that any two or more persons claiming or being liable as co-partners may sue or be sued in the name of their respective firms, if any; and any party to an action may in such case apply by summons to a judge for a statement of the names of the persons who are co-partners in any such firm, to be furnished in such manner, and verified on oath or otherwise, as the judge may direct. See PARTNER.

Corporate Office. In the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, by s. 7, means the office of 'mayor, alderman, councillor, elective auditor, or revising assessor.'

Corporation or Body Politic, artificial persons established for preserving in perpetual succession certain rights, which being conferred on natural persons only, would fail in process of time. It is either aggregate, consisting of many members, or sole, consisting of one person only. It is also either spiritual, erected to perpetuate the rights of the church, or lay—subdivided into civil, erected for many temporal purposes, and eleemosynary, to perpetuate founders' charities. It is by virtue of the sovereign's prerogative, exercised by a charter, or of an act of parliament, or of prescription, that the artificial personage called a corporation, whether sole or aggregate, civil or ecclesiastical, is created. The royal charter gives it a legal immortality, and a name by which it acts and becomes known. It has power to make bye-laws for its own government, and transacts its business under the authority of a common seal—its hand and mouthpiece; it has neither soul nor tangible form, so it can neither be outlawed nor arrested; it only enjoys a legal entity, sues, and is sued by its corporate name, and holds and enjoys property by such name. The several members of a corporation and their successors constitute but one person in law. The duty of a corporation is to answer the ends of its institution—to enforce which it may be visited: if spiritual, by the ordinary; if lay, by the founder or his representatives; viz., the civil by the queen (who is the fundator incipiens of all), represented in the Queen's Bench: the eleemosynary, by the endower (who is the fundator perficiens of such), or by his heirs or assigns. The distinction between corporations and trading partnerships is, that in the first the law sees only the body corporate and knows not the individuals, who are not liable for the contracts of the corporation in their private capacity, their share in the capital only being at stake: but in the latter the law looks not to the partnership, but to the individual members of it, who are therefore answerable for the debts of the firm to the full extent of their assets.

It is a general rule that a corporation must contract under its common seal, but whenever the observance of this rule would occasion great inconvenience, or tend to defeat the very purpose of the business, it is not observed: e.g., the retainer of an inferior servant, the acceptance of bills of exchange, or making of promissory notes by companies incorporated for the purpose of trade, or the doing of acts frequently occurring; in these cases, the affixing of the common seal is not necessary. In all matters, however, of importance, and in respect of acts not coming within the sphere of its daily functions, the common seal must be affixed, which the law takes as conclusively evidencing the sense of the whole body corporate. It is the fixing of the seal, and that only, which evidences the assents of the individuals composing it, and makes one joint assent of the whole.

A corporation may be dissolved by statute, by death of all the members, by surrender of its franchise to the Crown, by forfeiture of its charter, and by bankruptcy or insolvency.—1 Bl. Com. c. xviii.; Grant on Corporations. See also JOINT STOCK COMPANIES, post.

Corporation Act, the Act 13 Car. II. s. 2, c. 1, by which it was provided that no person should thereafter be elected to office in any corporate town, who should not within one year previously have taken the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper according to the rites of the Church of England.—4 Bl. Com. 58. An obligation to subscribe a declaration was substituted for the necessity of taking the Sacrament by 9 Geo. IV. c. 17, and the Corporation Act itself, with a body of similar acts, was repealed by 34 & 35 Vict. c. 48.

Corporations, Municipal. The many statutes affecting these bodies are consolidated by the Municipal Corporations Acts, 1882. SEE MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.

Corporeal hereditament, that subject of property which is comprised under the denomination of things real.

Corps diplomatique [Fr.], the body of ambassadors and diplomatic persons.

Corpse. Taking up a corpse for the purpose of dissection, or otherwise, is a misdemeanour at common law, punishable by fine or imprisonment. Refusing to bury dead bodies by those whose duty it is to do so, is punishable by the temporal courts, independently of spiritual censures, on indictment, or information. As to the interment of dead bodies cast on shore from the sea, see 48 Geo. III. c. 75. The Anatomy Act is the 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 75.

A gaoler cannot detain the dead body of a person in his custody under a ca. sa. until the executors of the deceased person satisfy his pecuniary claims upon the deceased.—R. v. Fox, 2 Q. B. 246; see also Jones v. Ashburnham, 4 East, 455.

Corpus Christi Day, a feast instituted in 1264, in honour of the sacrament.—32 Hen. VIII. c. 21.

Corpus cum causâ, a writ issuing out of Chancery to remove both the body and record touching the cause of any man lying in prison.—F. N. B. c. 21.

Corpus humanum non recipit æstimationem. Hob. 59.—(A human body is not susceptible of appraisement.)

Corpus juris canonici. See CANON LAW.

Corpus juris civilis. The three great compilations of Justinian, the Institutes, the Pandects, and the Code, together with the Novellæ, form one body of law, and were considered as such by the glossatores, who divided it into five volumina. The Pandects were distributed into five volumina, under the respective names of Digestum Vetus, Infortiatum, and Digestum Novum. The fourth volume contained the first nine books of the Codex Repetitæ Prælectionis. The fifth volume contained the Institutes, the Inter Authent- ticorum or Novellæ, and the three last books of the Codex. The division into five volumina appears in the oldest editions; but the usual arrangement now is the Institutes, Pandects, the Codex, and Novellæ. The name Corpus Juris Civilis was not given to this collection by Justinian, nor by any of the glossatores. Savigny asserts that the name was used in the twelfth century: at any rate, it became common from the date of the edition of D. Gothofredus of 1604.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Correction, House of, a prison for the reformation of petty offenders.—See HOUSE OF CORRECTION.

Corrector of the staple, a clerk belonging to the staple, to write and record the bargains of merchants there made.—27 Edw. III. cc. 22, 23.

Corregidor, a Spanish magistrate.

Corroboration, evidence in support of principal evidence, e.g., in addition to that of the mother, to charge the father of an illegitimate child under the Bastardy Acts. In an action for breach of promise of marriage the plaintiff may give evidence, but cannot recover a verdict unless corroborated by other material evidence in support of the promise.—32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, s. 2. See 'Unus Nullus Rule.'

Corrupt practices at elections. As to what constitutes such, see the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, continued and amended by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 84; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 87; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 48; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 99; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 109; 26 Vict. c. 29; and the Parliamentary Elections Act, 1868, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125; all applied to Municipal Elections by the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, s. 77.

Corruptio optimi est pessima.—(Corruption of the best is worst.)

Corruption of blood (now abolished, see infra), one of the immediate consequences of attainder for treason or felony. The blood of the attainted person was said to be corrupted or attainted both upwards and downwards, so that he could neither inherit lands nor hereditaments, retain the possession of those in his possession, nor transmit them by descent to any heir, but the same escheated to the lord of the fee, subject to the king's superior right of forfeiture.—4 Bl. Com. 388. By 54 Geo. III. c. 145, it was provided, that no attainder for felony, except for treason or murder, shall extend to the disinheriting of any person, nor to the prejudice of the right or title of any person or persons other than the right or title of the offender, during his natural life only; and that it shall be lawful for every person, to whom the right or interest of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments after the death of such offender, should or might have appertained if no such attainder had been, to enter into the same. By 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, when the person from whom the descent of any land is to be traced, shall have had any relation, who having been attainted shall have died before such descent shall have taken place, such attainder shall not prevent any person from inheriting such land who would have been capable of inheriting the same, by tracing his descent through such relation, if he had not been attainted, unless such land shall have escheated, in consequence of such attainder, before January 1, 1834. By 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, s. 46, no land, chattels, or stock vested in any person upon any trust, or by way of mortgage, or any profits thereof, shall escheat or be forfeited by reason of the attainder or conviction for any offence of such trustee or mortgagee, but shall remain in such trustee or mortgagee, or survive to his co-trustee, or descend or vest in his representative, as if no such attainder or conviction had taken place.

But now, by the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 23, it is provided that conviction for treason or felony shall not cause attainder or corruption of blood or any forfeiture.

Corselet [fr. corpusculum, Lat., a little body], ancient armour which covered the body.

Corsepresent [fr. corps, Fr., body], a mortuary, thus termed, because when a mortuary became due on the death of a man, the best or second-best beast was, according to custom, offered or presented to the priest, and carried with the corpse. In Wales a corsepresent was due upon the death of a clergyman to the bishop of the diocese, till abolished by 12 Anne st. 2, c. 6.—2 Bl. Com. 426.

Corsned bread [fr. corsian, to curse, and snaed, a morsel, A. S.; panis conjuratus, or offu execrata, Lat., the morsel of execration, or ordeal bread]. It was a kind of superstitious trial or ordeal used among the Saxons, to purge themselves of any accusation, by taking a piece of barley bread and eating it with solemn oaths, curses, and execrations, that it might prove poison, or their last morsel, if what they asserted, or denied, were not true.—4 Bl. Com. 345, 414; and see Norton's City of London, 3rd ed., 36, 265.

Cortes, the assembly of the states of Spain or Portugal, answering in some measure to the parliament of Great Britain.

Cortis, a court or yard before a house.—Blount.

Cortularium, or Cortarium, a yard adjoining to a country farm.—Old Records.

Corvee [Fr.], a feudal service, as to repair roads, etc.

Cosduna, custom or tribute.

Cosenage, or Cosinage, kindred, cousinship. Also a writ that lay for the heir where the tresail, i.e., the father of the besail, or great grandfather, was seised of lands in fee at his death, and a stranger entered upon the land and abated.—F. N. B. 221.

Cosening, Cozenage [fr. cozen], cheating, defrauding.

Coshering, a feudal custom, whereby the lords may lie and feast themselves and their followers at their tenants' houses, etc.

Cosmos [fr. κόσμος, Gk.], clean.—Blount.

Coss, a term used by Europeans in India to denote a road-measure of about two miles, but differing in different parts.

Costard, a head.—Shaksp. Also a kind of apple.

Costera, sea coast.

Cost-Book Mining Companies. They are formed thus:—A number of adventurers, who have obtained permission from the landowner to work a lode, assemble; they decide on the number of shares into which their capital is to be divided, and the number to be allotted to each; they appoint an agent, commonly called a purser, for the purpose of managing the affairs of the mine, and enter in a book, called the cost-book, the minutes of their proceedings, which are signed by all present. A license to try for ores, for twelve months, or some short period, is then obtained; followed, if the search be promising, by a sett, that is, a lease of the minerals, or a license to dig, or both, granted by the landowner to the purser, or to one or two of the adventurers, without any declaration or trust on their part for the rest, or for any other person, for a term of years, commonly twenty-one, but with a stipulation for the annual payment to the landowner of some portion of the ore raised.

The cost-book contains the names of all the shareholders, and the number of shares held by each is set opposite to his name. In a cost-book partnership, a shareholder may get rid of his shares, and with them his liabilities, so far as his partners are concerned, without their consent, either by transfer or simple relinquishment, provided the cost-book regulations do not prohibit such a course; in the former case the fact of transfer being entered by the purser in the cost-book, and in the latter notice being given to the purser of his having so relinquished his shares, and all his claims upon the mine.

There being a purser or manager of the mine, all acts are in general done by him, such as ordering the supply of the necessary materials for working the mine, hiring of labour, etc.; and a shareholder has no power to bind his co-shareholders by any contract for materials, etc., not necessary, nor for money lent, nor upon bills of exchange; nor has the pursuer power to make them liable for money lent, or upon bills of exchange.

The rules are simple, and all the transactions of the partnership are entered in the cost-book. All the shareholders meet and order their general affairs, without the assistance of any directing body, and consider and resolve upon the pursuer's reports made to them at their meetings, which are seldom at greater intervals than two months. Sometimes there is a committee of management in a cost-book mine; but they are only appointed from general meeting to general meeting, have no power to make calls or declare dividends, and all their acts are subject to the review of a general meeting.

The mode of transferring shares is simple, and effected with great facility, and in any form, and the mere entry by the pursuer in the cost-book of the fact of transfer is sufficient to bind all parties, and constitutes the introduction of a new partner into the concern.

Although there are several theories of the cost-book principle of working mines, the meaning of which the courts are not bound to take judicial notice of (Re Gt. Cambrian, Hawkins' case, 2 Kay & J. 138), yet it appears clear, that whatever may be the rules and regulations between the adventurers themselves, each shareholder is liable to be sued by a creditor who has furnished the mine with necessaries for its due working, ordered according to the customary course in such concerns, and this whether the creditor knew at the time of crediting the mine that he was a shareholder or not.—See Collier on Mines, 93.

Co-stipulator, a joint promisee.

Costs [expensæ litis, Lat.], expenses incurred in litigation or professional transactions, consisting of money paid for stamps, etc., to the officers of the court, or to the counsel, and solicitors, for their fees, etc. Costs in actions are either between solicitor and client, being what are payable in every case to the solicitor, by his client, whether he ultimately succeed or not; or between party and party, being those only which are allowed in some particular cases to the party succeeding against his adversary, and these are either interlocutory, given on various motions and proceedings in the course of the suit or action, or final, allowed when the matter is determined.

Neither party was entitled to costs at Common Law, but the Statute of Gloucester (6 Edw. I. c. 4) gave costs to a successful plaintiff, and 2 & 3 Hen. VIII. c. 6, and 4 Jac. I. c. 3, gave costs to a victorious defendant.

Proceedings between the Crown and a subject were formerly an exception to this rule, but by 18 & 19 Vict. c. 90, costs are and by either side in suits by the Crown, paid by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 34, in petitions of right.

There were many cases of vexatious proceedings, in which the legislature formerly provided that the party in fault should be punished by the payment to his adversary of double or treble costs; but all such provisions are repealed by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97, and the adversary is entitled only to a full and reasonable indemnity, to be taxed by the proper officer, which taxation is, as in ordinary cases, subject to review.

Several acts have been passed to restrain the bringing vexatious actions, and needless costliness in litigation. See 43 Eliz. c. 6, s. 2; 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 9; 8 & 9 Wm. III. c. 11, s. 4; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 24; enactments superseded by the County Court Act, 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142), which provides by section 5, as amended by 45 & 46 Vict. c. 57, s. 4, that if in any action the plaintiff shall recover a sum less than 20*l.* in contract or 10*l.* in tort, whether by verdict, judgment by default, or on demurrer or otherwise, he shall not be entitled to any costs of suit, unless the judge certify on the record that there was sufficient reason for bringing such action in the superior Court, or unless the Court or a judge at chambers shall by rule or order allow such costs. This last section is expressly applied to actions in the High Court of Justice in which any relief is sought which can be given in a County Court (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 67). See Garnett v. Bradley, 3 App. Cas. 944.

In Equity the person who failed in the suit must have been deemed liable to the costs, yet the costs rested entirely in the discretion of the Court, for the prima facie claim to costs might be rebutted by the particular circumstances of the case, and it was for the Court to decide whether those circumstances were or were not sufficient to rebut the claim. See Morgan and Davey on Costs.

By the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. LV., the practice as to costs in civil matters is thus provided for:—‘Subject to the provisions of the Act, the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the High Court shall be in the discretion of the Court; but nothing herein contained shall deprive a trustee, mortgagee, or other person of any right to costs out of a particular estate or fund to which he would be entitled according to the rules hitherto acted upon in Courts of Equity. Provided that where any action or issue is tried by a jury, the costs shall follow the event, unless upon application made at the trial, for good cause shown, the judge before whom such action or issue is tried, or the Court, shall otherwise order.'

As to costs in criminal cases, see 7 Geo. IV. c. 64; 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 44; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 12; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 76; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 101; 14 & 15 Vict. cc. 11, 19, 55; and 29 & 30 Vict. c. 52. By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35, s. 2, on acquittal of a person indicted, who has not been committed or held to bail, the Court may order the prosecutor to pay costs to the accused, if it think the prosecution unreasonable; and s. 5 gives the Court power to allow the expenses of witnesses for accused persons, where they have been bound by recognizance

In matrimonial suits the wife, whether petitioner or respondent, is generally entitled to her costs from the husband, and they may be taxed de die in diem during the progress of the suit. She can compel the husband to deposit, or give security for a sufficient sum to meet the costs of the hearing, and her proctor or attorney is entitled to her taxed costs to the amount of the sum so deposited, although she fails in the suit; if successful, she is entitled to all her costs, though the amount exceeds the sum deposited or secured. If she does not get a sum deposited or secured, and fails, the Court will not compel the husband to pay the costs after the hearing has taken place. These rules continue in force in the Divorce Branch of the High Court (Jud. Act, 1875, s. 18, and Ord. LXII.).

As to the taxation of solicitors' costs, see 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 127; and 33 & 34 Vict. c. 28. And see also TAXATION.

Costs de incremento, costs of increase, i.e., those extra expenses incurred, which do not appear on the face of the proceedings, such as witnesses' expenses, fees to counsel, attendances, Court fees, etc.

Costs in parliamentary committees are now awarded in certain cases. See 28 & 29 Vict. c. 27.

Cot-surety, a fellow-surety.

Cotarius, a cottager, who held in free socage, and paid a stated fine or rent in provisions or money, with some occasional personal services.

Cote, or Cot [fr. koti, Fin.], cottage.

Cotellus, or Coteria, a small cottage, house, or homestall.—Covel.

Coterellus, a servile tenant, who held in mere villenage; his person, issue, and goods were disposable at the lord's pleasure.

Coterie, a fashionable association; or a knot of persons forming a particular circle. The origin of the term was purely commercial, signifying an association, in which each member furnished his part, and bore his share in the profit and loss.

Coteswold [fr. cote and wold, Sax.], a place where there is no wood.

Cotland, and Cotsethland, land held by a cottager, whether in socage or villenage.

Cotsethla, Consetle, the little seat or mansion belonging to a small farm.

Cotsethus, a cottage-holder, who by servile tenure was bound to work for the lord.—Covel.

Cottage, a small house without lands belonging to it.—Sh. T. 94; 15 Geo. III. c. 32. As to cottage allotments for the benefit of the poor, see 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 42; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 69; and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, ss. 108—112.

Cottier tenure, one where a labourer makes his contract for land without the intervention of a capitalist farmer, and where the conditions of the contract, especially the amount of rent, are determined not by custom, but by competition. Also a class of sub-tenants, who rent a cottage and an acre or two of land from small farmers.—Irish. 1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 383.

Cotuca, coat armour.

Cotuchans, boors, husbandmen.—Domesday.

Couchant, lying down; squatting.

Coucher, or Courcher, a factor who continues abroad for traffic, 37 Ed. III. c. 16; also the general book wherein any corporation, etc., register their acts.—3 & 4 Ed. VI. c. 10.

Council, an assembly of persons for the purposes of concerting measures of state or municipal policy—hence called councillors.

Council of India. See INDIAN COUNCILS Act.

Council of Medical Education. 25 & 26 Vict. c. 91.

Councils of Conciliation Act, 1867, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 105.

Counsel, or Counseller, a person retained by a client to plead his cause in a court of judicature; a barrister; an advocate. See BARRISTER.

Count. The different parts of a declaration, each of which, if it stood alone, would constitute a ground for action, were the counts of the declaration. Used also to signify the several parts of an indictment, each charging a distinct offence.

Countee, or Count [fr. comte, Fr.; comes, Lat.], the most eminent dignity of a subject before the Conquest. He was prefectus or prepositus comitatûs, and had the charge and custody of the county; but this authority is now vested in the sheriff.—9 Rep. 46.

Countenance [fr. contenance, Fr., contineo, Lat., to hold together], credit; estimation.

Counter, the name of two prisons in London, the Poultry Counter, and Wood Street Counter, afterwards consolidated into one new-built prison, for the use of the city, to confine debtors, peace-breakers, etc.

Counterclaim. It is provided by the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XIX., r. 3, that a defendant in an action may set-off, or set up by way of counterclaim, against the claims of the plaintiff, any right or claim, whether such set-off or counterclaim sound in damages or not, and such set-off or counterclaim shall have the same effect as a statement of claim in a cross action, so as to enable the Court to pronounce a final judgment in the same action, both on the original and on the cross claim. But the Court or a judge may, on the application of the plaintiff before trial, if in the opinion of the Court or judge such set-off or counterclaim cannot be conveniently disposed of in the pending action, or ought not to be allowed, refuse permission to the defendant to avail himself thereof. See SET-OFF.

As to counterclaim in an inferior Court involving matters beyond the jurisdiction of the Court, see Jud. Act, 1873, s. 90.

Counter-deed, a secret writing, either before a notary or under a private seal, which destroys, invalidates, or alters a public one.

Counterfeit, an imitation of something made without lawful authority, and with a view to defraud by passing the false for the true. As to counterfeiting coin, see COIN.

Counterfessance [Fr.], the act of forging.

Countermand, the revocation of an act; where a thing done is afterwards, by some act or ceremony, made void by the person who did it, it is either actual, by deed, or implied by law. No notice of trial shall be countermanded except by consent or by leave of the Court or a judge, which leave may be given subject to such terms as to costs or otherwise as may be just (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XXXVI., r. 13). See NOTICE OF TRIAL.

Countermark, a sign put upon goods already marked; also the several marks put upon goods belonging to several persons, to show that they must not be opened, but in the presence of all the owners or their agents.

Counterpart, the corresponding part or duplicate; the key of a cipher. When the several parts of an indenture are interchangeably executed by the several parties, that part or copy which is executed by the grantor is usually called the original, and the rest are counterparts. A counterpart is the best evidence against the party executing it.

Counterplea. When the tenant in any real action, tenant by the curtesy or in dower, in his answer and plea vouched any one to warrant his title, or prayed in aid of another who had a larger estate, as of him in reversion, etc.; or where one who was a stranger to the action came and prayed to be received to save his estate; then that which the demandant alleged against it, why he should not be admitted, was called a counterplea; it was a replication to aid prier, and was called counterplea to the voucher. But when the voucher was allowed, and the vouchee came and demanded what cause the tenant had to vouch him, and the tenant showed his cause, whereupon the vouchee pleaded anything to avoid the warranty, that was termed a counterplea of the warranty.—Termes de la Ley. Obs.

Counter-rolls, the rolls which sheriffs have with the coroners, containing particulars of their proceedings, as well of appeals as of inquests, etc.—3 Edw. I. c. 10.

Counter security, a security given to one who has entered into a bond or become surety for another; a countervailing bond of indemnity.

Counter-sign, the signature of a secretary or other subordinate officer to any writing signed by the principal or superior to vouch for the authenticity of it.

Counting-house of the Queen's Household, usually called the Board of Green Cloth, where sit the lord-steward and treasurer of the Queen's house, the comptroller, master of the household, cofferer, and two clerks of the Green Cloth, etc., for daily taking the accounts of all expenses of the household, making provisions, and ordering payment.—39 Eliz. c. 7.

Countors [fr. contours, Fr.], serjeants-at-law, whom a man retains to defend his cause and speak for him in court, for their fees.—1 Inst. 17.

Count-out. Forty members form a House of Commons; and though there be ever so many at the beginning of a debate, yet, if during the course of it the house should be deserted by the members, till reduced below the number of forty, any one member may have it adjourned upon its being counted; but a debate may be continued when only one member is left in the house, provided no one choose to move an adjournment.

County [fr. comté, Fr.; comitatus, Lat.], a shire or portion of country comprehending a great number of hundreds. England is divided into forty counties or shires, Wales into twelve, and Scotland into thirty. It seems probable that the realm was originally divided into counties with a view to the convenient administration of justice, the judicial business of the kingdom having, in former times, been chiefly despatched in local courts held in each different county, before the sheriff as its principal officer. His duties are now more ministerial than judicial. The larger countries are subdivided, for purposes of parliamentary representation. As to the divisions of counties for holding petty and special sessions, see 9 Geo. IV. c. 43; 10 Geo. IV. c. 46; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 12; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 65.

County Buildings. Acts relating to:— 7 Geo. IV. c. 63; 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 24; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 69; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 28; the 'County Buildings (Loans) Act, 1872,' 35 & 36 Vict. c. 7; and the 'County Debentures Act, 1873,' 36 & 37 Vict. c. 35.

County corporate. To certain cities and towns, the sovereigns of England have, out of special grace and favour, granted the privilege to be counties of themselves, and not to be comprised in any other county, but to be governed by their own sheriffs and other magistrates, so that no officers of the county at large have any power to intermeddle therein. The 3 Geo. I. c. 5, for the regulation of the office of sheriffs, enumerates twelve cities and five towns which are counties of themselves, and which have, consequently, their own sheriffs. The cities are London, Chester, Bristol, Coventry, Canterbury, Exeter, Gloucester, Lichfield, Lincoln, Norwich, Worcester, York. The towns are Kingston-upon-Hull, Nottingham, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Poole, Southampton. As they constitute no part of the counties at large in which they are locally situate, so they had formerly, in general, no share in voting for the members to serve for those counties in parliament. Twelve of the number are now expressly included within their respective counties as far as regards the right of election for knights of the shire. They are Canterbury, Chester, Coventry, Gloucester, Kingston-upon-Hull, Lincoln, London, Newcastle-upon-Tyne, Poole, Worcester, York and Ainsty, and Southampton; to these is added Carmarthen in South Wales.—Schedule G. 2 Wm. IV. c. 45, s. 17.

County Court. The old County Court was a tribunal incident to the jurisdiction of a sheriff, but was not a Court of Record. Proceedings were removable into a superior court, by recordari facias loquelam, or writ of false judgment. Outlawries of absconding offenders are here proclaimed; and also elections of knights of the shire, coroners, etc., take place, but the judicial business has been for the most part transferred to the County Courts, several inferior tribunals which have been established throughout England. They were first established in 1846 by the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and their jurisdiction has gradually been enlarged by subsequent acts, viz., 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 54; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108; 21 & 22 Vict. c. 74; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 57; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 99; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 14; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142; 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51; 33 & 34 Vict. c. 93; 36 & 37 Vict. c. 52; 38 & 39 Vict. c. 50. They have now jurisdiction in common law in matters of contract, and also of tort to the extent of 50%; as also in matters in which the title to corporeal or incorporeal hereditaments comes in question, provided the annual rent or value does not exceed 20%; as also in ejectment where neither the annual value nor rent of the lands exceeds 20%. They also afford a summary mode of recovering small tenements. In all actions on contract in the Supreme Court where the amount endorsed on the writ does not exceed 50%, a judge may order the case to be tried in these courts on application of the defendant within eight days after service, and the same course may be pursued after issue joined. Actions for malicious prosecution, libel, slander, seduction, or breach of promise of marriage, cannot be commenced in the County Courts; but these, as well as all other actions of tort, may, on the application of the defendant, be remitted from the Superior Courts to the County Courts, if the plaintiff has no visible means of paying the costs of the defendant should the verdict be not found for the plaintiff, or such being the case, fail to find security for such costs (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 67). The jurisdiction of these courts is unlimited where the parties consent.

The jurisdiction extends also to the receiving of applications for letters of administration by widows or children of intestates, in certain cases where the estate does not exceed £100, and to contentious business in Probate and Administration, where the personal estate is under 200%, and the real estate is under 300%; and to Bankruptcy, where the debts do not exceed 300%. They have also jurisdiction, specially conferred by different statutes, in a variety of matters connected with friendly and industrial societies, charitable trusts, joint stock companies, etc.

The equitable jurisdiction of the County Courts extends to suits by creditors, legatees, heirs-at-law, or next of kin of a deceased person; suits for execution of trusts; for foreclosure, or redemption, for specific performance, etc.; proceedings under the Trustees Relief Act, etc.; proceedings for the maintenance, etc., of infants, suits for dissolution or winding up of partnership,—where, in any of the above cases, the amount or value in question does not exceed 500*l.*; and to granting injunctions and stay of proceedings at law as auxiliary to any of the foregoing.—28 & 29 Vict. c. 99. See also 29 & 30 Vict. c. 30, and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, ss. 8, 9.

Under the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 71, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 51, jurisdiction in Admiralty causes has also been conferred on the County Courts. As to which see further 38 & 39 Vict. c. 50, ss. 10, 11.

These courts have also a special jurisdiction in the adjustment of differences between employers and workmen by the Employers and Workmen Act, 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 90, and the Employers Liability Act, 1880. As to the power of committal for non-payment of judgment debts, see 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 5.

With regard to the costs of solicitors and fees of counsel, these were originally limited by s. 91 of 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, and s. 36 of 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, to 10*s.* or 15*s.* for the solicitor in proportion to the amount claimed, and 1*l.* 3*s.* 6*d.* for counsel in any case; but this limit was removed so far as costs between party and party are concerned, by the County Courts (Costs and Salaries) Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 57, s. 2.

By the Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 89—91, similar powers, as to deciding on counter-claims, or giving weight to equitable considerations, as are given to the High Courts, are also given to the inferior Courts, provided that they do not enter on any question beyond the limits of their jurisdiction. See too INFERIOR COURT. And by the County Courts Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 50), a plaintiff is allowed to serve a summons for a liquidated demand, which will enable him, if no notice of defence is given within 16 days, to enter judgment by default (s. 1).

Appeals from County Courts are to the High Court (Jud. Act, 1873, ss. 34, 45) by appeal case under 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, or within eight days from judgment by motion, to be ex parte in the first instance (38 & 39 Vict. c. 50, s. 6); such motion may be made to a judge at Chambers when the Court is not sitting. See APPEAL.

County Debentures Act, 1873, 36 & 37 Vict. c. 35, repealed and replaced by the Local Loans Act, 1875.

County Palatine [fr. palatium, Lat., a court]. There were three of these counties—Chester, Durham, and Lancaster. The two former were such by immemorial custom, the last was created by Edward III. The Bishop of Durham and the Duke of Lancaster had royal power within their respective counties. They could pardon treasons, murders, and felonies; they appointed judges and magistrates; all writs and indictments ran in their names.

and offences were said to be done against their peace and not contra pacem domini regis. The 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, abolished the Court of Session of the county palatine of Chester, and subjected the county in all things to the jurisdiction of the superior courts at Westminster. By the Judicature Act, 1873, the jurisdiction of the Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster and of the Court of Pleas at Durham is transferred to the High Court of Justice (s. 16, subs. 9, 10). But the jurisdiction of the Chancery Courts of these counties is retained. By a number of statutes, the practice and proceedings in the Court of Common Pleas and of Chancery, at Lancaster, and at Durham, were respectively regulated and made conformable, in most particulars, to those of the superior courts. See LANCASTER and DURHAM.

The counties palatine are now in the hands of the Crown; the jurisdiction of Durham is vested, as a separate franchise and royalty, in the Crown, by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 19. Lancaster was vested in the Crown by Henry IV., separated indeed from the other possessions of the Crown in order and government, but united in point of inheritance.

County Rate, an imposition levied on the occupiers of lands, and applied to many miscellaneous purposes; among which the most important are those of defraying the expenses connected with prisons, reimbursing to private parties the costs they have incurred in prosecuting public offenders, and defraying the expenses of the county police. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 81.

County Sessions. They are the general quarter sessions of the peace for each county, and are held four times a year, viz., in the first week (on some day fixed by the magistrates) after the 11th of October, the 28th of December, the 31st of March, and the 24th of June, in every year, provision being made to prevent the April sessions clashing with the spring assizes (1 Wm. IV. c. 70; 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 47). The general quarter sessions for the county of Middlesex are remodelled by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 71 (and see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, ss. 14—17, and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 4), which requires two sessions to be held monthly—the general quarter sessions being the first of these, held in the months of January, April, July, and October; and the general sessions being the second or adjourned sessions, held in the months of February, May, August, and November; and such other sessions as shall be fixed by the magistrates at the first sessions held in December. Section 11 abolishes the sessions for the city of Westminster. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55. County general quarter sessions have both a criminal and civil jurisdiction. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 38, has abridged their criminal jurisdiction, prohibiting them from trying any treason, murder, or capital felony; any offence punishable with penal servitude for life; and a long catalogue of offences, specified in the act, such as misprision of treason, political offences, offences against religion, perjury, and subornation of perjury; bribery, forgery, bigamy, abduction; setting fire to growing crops, woods, heaths, etc.; endeavouring to conceal the birth of a child; offences against the insolvent and bankrupt laws (but see now 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, s. 20); administering unlawful oaths; blasphemous and seditious libels; conspiracies and combinations; stealing, injuring, or destroying legal records and documents, testamentary papers, and wills. Their civil business is generally as a court of appeal, extending over convictions for penalties, orders of justices, matters connected with the administration of the poor laws, vagrant laws, the highways, etc.—See SESSIONS; and consult Archbold and Pritchard on Quarter Sessions.

Coupons [fr. couper, Fr., to cut], interest and dividend certificates; also those parts of a commercial instrument which are to be cut, and which are evidence of something connected with the contract mentioned in the instrument. They are generally attached to certificates of loan, where the interest is payable at particular periods, and, when the interest is paid, they are cut off and delivered to the payer. A coupon does not require a stamp; it is nothing more than an I.O.U.

Courier [fr. courir, Fr., to run], an express messenger of haste.

Courracier, a horse courser.—2 Inst. 719.

Court [fr. curia, Lat.; cour, Fr.; keort, Dut.], the person and suite of the sovereign; the place where the sovereign sojourns with his regal retinue, wherever that may be. The English Government is spoken of in diplomacy as the Court of St. James', because the palace of St. James is the official palace. 2. The place where the sovereign administers justice by his judge or a bishop.

In every court there must be at least three constituent parts, the actor, or plaintiff, who complains of an injury done; the reus, or defendant, who is called upon to make satisfaction for it; and the judex, or judicial power, which is to examine the truth of the fact, to determine the law arising upon that act, and if any injury appear to have been done, to ascertain, and by its officers to apply, the remedy. It is usual in the superior courts to have attorneys or solicitors, and advocates or counsel, as assistants. Courts are either of record, where their acts and judicial proceedings are enrolled for a perpetual memorial and testimony, and they have power to fine and imprison, and error may be brought upon their judgments; or not of record, being courts of inferior dignity, and in a less proper sense the King's Courts—and these are not entrusted by law with any power to fine or imprison the subject of the realm, unless by the express provision of some act of parliament. Their proceedings are not enrolled or recorded; but as well their existence as the truth of the matters therein continued, may be tried by a jury.

The High Court of Chancery, with regard to its equity jurisdiction, has been said to be in strictness a court not of record; but the dignity of this court precluded a writ of false judgment, when sitting as a court of equity; and as it was not a court of record, no error could be brought to rectify its degrees, and the proceeding for this purpose was by appeal to the House of Lords. The instances in which this court sat as a court of common law are very rare, but whenever this did occur, as it was then a court of record, error lay from its judgments. For a description of the several courts, public or private, general or special, consult the initial letter of the particular title of every court, e.g., Court of Admiralty, see ADMIRALTY.

The several species, however, of courts of justice may be thus classed:—

(I.) General jurisdiction, comprehending the Court Baron; the Hundred Court; the County Courts; the Court of Exchequer; the Court of Common Pleas; the Court of Queen's Bench; the Court of Chancery, as a court of first instance; the Probate Court; the Divorce Court, and the Courts of Assize and Nisi Prius: all of which are now parts of the High Court of Justice; the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and the Court of Appeal in Chancery, both now merged in the Court of Appeal; the House of Peers; the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council; and the Court of Bankruptcy.

(II.) Ecclesiastical, military, and maritime, comprehending the Archdeacon's Court; the Consistory Court; the Court of Arches; the Court of Peculiars; the Prerogative Court; and the Court of Admiralty, which is now part of the High Court of Justice. See PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT.

(III.) Special jurisdiction, comprehending such ancient courts as the Court of Piepowdre, the Forest Courts, the Court of Sewers, the Court of Policies of Assurance (the Court of Marshalsea), and the Palace Court (both abolished), the Court of the Duchy Chamber of Lancaster, the Chancery Courts of the Counties Palatine, the Courts of the Stannaries, the Borough Courts, the Court of Requests, or Courts of Conscience, the University Courts.

The jurisdiction of such of the inferior courts as are not courts of record, and as had not theretofore become obsolete, was practically taken away by the County Courts Act, 1867, s. 28, which provides that no action which can be brought in any County Court shall hereafter be brought in any such inferior court. For an elaborate list of these inferior courts see the Appendix to Trower's Law of Debtor and Creditor. As to the jurisdiction of the inferior courts since the commencement of the Judicature Acts, see Jud. Act, 1873, ss. 88—91. See now SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE.

Court-Baron, a court which, although not one of record, is incident to every manor, and cannot be severed therefrom. It was ordained for the maintenance of the services and duties stipulated for by lords of manors, and for the purpose of determining actions of a personal nature, where the debt or damage was under forty shillings.

This Court may be held at any place within the manor, giving fifteen days' notice, including three Sundays, of the day when the court will be held; but three or four days' notice have been deemed sufficient. It is frequently held together with the court-leet. It generally assembles but once in the year.

The freehold tenants alone are suitors to the court-baron; and it is essential to the existence of the court that there should be two suitors at the least; for since freemen can only be tried by their peers or equals, should there be but one freeman, he can then have no peer or judge, and consequently he must appeal to the court of the lord paramount. The court is held before the freeholders who owe suit to the manor, the steward being rather the registrar than the judge. Neither the lord nor his steward can fine or imprison.

The tenants of a manor may make bye-laws touching their commons and the like, to bind such tenants as assent thereto, unless they be made by prescription, or under an immemorial custom. These laws can never bind strangers. The penalty for the breach of a bye-law is in the nature of a fine, rather than amercement, and is not affeerable, i.e., assisable.

Courts-baron, not being courts of record, are practically abolished so far as regards their jurisdiction as courts of common law, by the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 28, which provides that no action or suit which can now be brought in any County Court, shall henceforth be commenced or be maintainable in any hundred or other inferior court not being a court of record.

Courtesy, see CURTESY.

Court-Lands, domains or lands kept in the lord's hands to serve his family.

Court-Leet. [Coke says, leet is a Saxon word, and comes from the verb gelathian, or gelethian (y being added euphonic gratia), i.e., convenire, to assemble together; unde conventus. 4 Inst. 261. For other opinions as to the derivation of the word, see Lex Man. 131; Ritson on Courts Leet; and Scriv. on Copyholds.] This Court has long since fallen into desuetude. It is a court of record appointed to be held once a year within a particular hundred, lordship, or manor, before the steward of the leet, being the King's Court granted by charter to the lords of those hundreds or manors. Its original intent was to view the frank pledges, that is the freemen within the liberty who, according to the institution of Alfred, were all mutually pledges for the good behaviour of each other. It was anciently the custom to summon all the king's subjects, as they respectively grew to years of discretion and strength, to come to the Court-leet and there take the oath of allegiance to the king. The other general business is, to present by jury all crimes whatsoever that happen within their jurisdiction; and not only to present, but also to punish all trivial misdemeanours, as all trivial debts were recoverable in the Court-baron and County Court.—Steph. Com., Book vi., Ch. xiv. The lord was compellable to hold a court by mandamus, and a leet was forfeited by non-user and by acts of abuser.

The steward of a Court-leet is an essential officer, and should be indifferent between the lord and the law (see Powell on Courts Leet, p. 43), for he is the judge, and presides in the Court wholly in a judicial character; the ministerial acts of the court, such as empanelling the jury, are executed by the bedell or bailiff, sworn to a due performance of his duty. The steward may fine or imprison, and may take a recognizance of the peace: he cannot appoint a deputy, unless he be so empowered in his patent or deed of appointment, or there exist an established custom for it. All fines are recoverable by action of debt or by distress. A fine is imposed by the Court, but an amercement is generally the act of the jury; it must always be affeered in open court by two or more persons appointed by the steward and duly sworn, and is then recoverable by distress or action.

Bye-laws, embodied in the presentments and verdicts of the jury and homage, may be good by custom.

In some manors, the jury of the Court-leet choose the mayor, port-reeve, or other chief municipal officer of the borough or town to which the leet jurisdiction is appended, while, in others, the jury present in writing the candidate who may have the majority of votes, but have no control over the poll. The bailiff is sometimes chosen by the jury; but the steward or the lord may have the appointment by custom. The right to elect constables, tithing-men, and head-boroughs is vested in the jury. In ancient times, ale-conners and leather-sealers were chosen at the Court-leet. An officer, called the hayward, is now appointed; his duty is to keep the lanes clear, by impounding stray cattle that he may find there.

All offences cognizable in the leet are inquired of and presented by the suitors of the Court, sworn and charged as a jury for that purpose; and all presentments may be removed, by certiorari, into the Queen's Bench, and then traversed. See 2 Scriv. Cop. 730.

Court of Chancery (Funds) Act, 1872, 35 & 36 Vict. c. 44, amended by the Judicature Act, 1875, s. 30.

Courts (Colonial) Jurisdiction Act, 1874, 37 & 38 Vict. c. 27.

Courts-martial, courts for the trial of military offences, under the authority of the Crown, and the Army Act, 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 58, s. 47 et seq. There are general, district, and regimental Courts-Martial. See JUDGE-ADVOCATE. Their jurisdiction does not, however, exempt any officer or soldier from being proceeded against by the ordinary course of law. Consult Simmons or Thring on Courts-Martial. As to Naval Courts-Martial, see 29 & 30 Vict. c. 109, ss. 58—69.

Cousenage, see COSENAGE.

Cousin [fr. cousin, Fr.; cugino, It.; conso-brinus, Lat., whence cusdrin, cusrin; sabrino, Sp.]. A cousin is any collateral relation except brothers and sisters, and their descendants, and the brothers and sisters of any ancestor. The child of A.'s uncle or aunt is called his cousin-german, or first cousin, and the child, grandchild, etc., of such cousin is called his first cousin once, twice, etc., removed. The grandchild of A.'s great uncle is his second cousin, and the child, grandchild, etc., of such cousin is his second cousin, once, twice, etc., removed, and so on. This distinction between first cousins once removed and second cousins is well recognised by the law (see Parker, in re, 17 Ch. D. 262), but in old English 'cousin' often means any collateral relative, and peers have always been and still are styled 'cousins' of the sovereign.

Couthtlaugh [fr. couth, Sax., knowing, and utlaugh, an outlaw], a person who willingly and knowingly received an outlaw, and cherished or concealed him; for which offence he underwent the same punishment as the outlaw himself.—Bract.

Covenable, convenient or suitable.

Covenant [fr. covenant, Fr.], an agreement, convention, or promise of two or more parties, by deed in writing, signed, sealed, and delivered, by which either of the parties pledges himself to the other that something is either done or shall be done, or stipulates for the truth of certain facts. He who thus promises is called the covenantor; and he to whom it is made the covenantee. A covenant being part of a deed is subject to the general rules for the construction of such instruments: as, first, to be always taken most strongly against the covenantor, and most in favour of the covenantee; secondly, to be taken according to the intent of the parties; thirdly, to be construed ut res magis valeat quam pereat; fourthly, when no time is limited for its performance, that it be performed in a reasonable time. If the covenantor covenants for himself and his heirs, it is then a covenant real, and descends upon the heirs, who are bound to perform it provided they have assets by descent; if he covenant also for his executors and administrators, his personal assets, as well as his real, are likewise pledged for the performance of the covenant, but the executors and administrators are bound by every covenant, without being named, unless it is such a covenant as is to be performed personally by the covenantor, and there has been no breach before his death. Covenants for title are frequently termed real covenants; they are usually, that the vendor is seised in fee, has power to convey, for quiet enjoyment by the purchaser his heirs and assigns, that the land shall be holden free from incumbrances, and for further assurance. These five covenants are separate and distinct, but the first and second of them may be synonymous, for if a person be seised in fee, he has a power to sell, but the converse of this proposition is not universally true. No particular technical words are requisite, for any words or form of expression which import an agreement or act will suffice. A covenant to do a thing, which upon the face of it appears to be prejudicial to the public interest, or otherwise contrary to law, is absolutely void, as is an impossible covenant, if the impossibility existed at the time of making it.

A covenant is either express or implied—it subsists either in law or in fact. An express covenant, or one in fact, is expressed in words; an implied covenant, or one in law, is that which the law implies, though not expressed in words. Express covenants are taken more strictly than implied. All covenants for the benefit of the estate run with the land, so that he who has the one is subject to the other; they bind those who come in by act of law, as the personal representatives, as well as those who come in by the act of the parties. As to what covenants shall be construed to be precedent or not, it has been laid down that the dependence or independence of covenants must be collected from the sense and meaning of the parties; and that in whatever order covenants may stand in a deed, their precedency must depend on the order of time which the intent of the transaction requires.

Covenants are inherent, that tend to the support of the land or thing granted, or are collateral to it; affirmative, or negative; executed, or that which is already done; executory, or that which is to be done.—Shep. Touch. 160; Bac. Abr., Covenant (G); Com. Dig., Covenant (F); Vin. Abr., Covenant (O).

Covenant, Action of, a species of the ex contractu actions. It lay where a party claimed damages for breach of a covenant, which is, in fact, a promise under seal. This is no longer a technical expression since the new rules of pleading under the Judicature Act, 1875.—See PLEADING.

Covenant to stand seised to uses, a voluntary assurance, operating under the Statute of Uses, and by non-transmutation of possession, i.e., it does not transfer the seisin to another to raise the use in the covenantee, but that seisin remains in the covenantor, he standing seised to the covenantee. It must be by deed, and not by parol, and made by a person seised of lands or tenements, and consequently cannot embrace an equity, right, or contingency, though it may be of a reversion or vested remainder, for the reversioner or remainderman is in the seisin. It must be in consideration of marriage or blood, for a covenant to stand seised to the use of a stranger would be void. It must not be for a money consideration, for that would be a bargain and sale. But it is not necessary that the consideration of blood be expressed, for if a person covenant to stand seised to the use of his wife, son, and the like, it will be sufficient, as the consideration would be apparent. Love and affection to an illegitimate child are not sufficient considerations to raise a use; à fortiori, long acquaintance, and familiar intercourse, are not. It is not settled what degree of relationship is necessary to support this assurance; the kindred between second cousins would perhaps be sufficient, if the fact were noticed in the instrument. The consideration of this conveyance is the foundation of it; a conveyance in the form of, and void as a grant, feoffment, or release, may still take effect as a covenant to stand seised.

The only essential difference between a covenant to stand seised to uses and a bargain and sale, setting aside the external formalities required to the validity of the latter, consists in the nature of the consideration; and hence the same deed may operate for the benefit of different parties, both as one and the other; as, if 'A. covenant that in consideration that B. is his son, he shall have the land for life, and after his death, in consideration that C. has given him 100*l.* that he shall have it in fee.' The enrolment gives such solemnity to a bargain and sale that it is said to be an estoppel; but this is not to be understood in the same sense in which an operation by estoppel is attributed to a fine or feoffment, so as to affect property afterwards acquired, but merely that the validity of the deed cannot be denied.—2 Sand. on Uses, 96; Wat. Conv. 331.

Covenant, Writ of, abolished by 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 27, s. 36.

Coventry Act, 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 1, by which it was made a capital felony to disable with intent to disfigure, so called because it was passed in consequence of an assault upon Sir John Coventry. Repealed by 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 1.

Covert-baron, said of a wife who is under the protection of her husband.

Coverture, the condition of a woman during marriage, because she is then under the cover, influence, and protection of her husband. The effect of coverture as to the wife's person is that it belongs of right to her husband, though should he abuse this right, the wife may have security of the peace against him.

As to her property, at common law (which has been almost revolutionised by the Act of 1882 after mentioned), all freeholds of which she is seised at the time of marriage, or afterwards, vest in the husband and wife during coverture, in right of the wife, and the husband is entitled to the profits, and has the sole control and management, but cannot convey or charge the lands for any longer period than while his own interest continues. She can convey with her husband's concurrence, by any of the ordinary modes of assurance, duly acknowledged as directed by the Fines and Recoveries Act. As to her inheritable realty, the husband becomes, under certain circumstances, tenant by the courtesy, if he outlive his wife, and he and his wife may together make leases of her lands of inheritance, so as to bind her or her heirs after his interest in the property has determined. As to the wife's term of years, and other chattels real, they belong to the husband, and may be taken in execution for his debts, and should he survive her they are absolutely his; but if he make no disposition of them, and she survive him, they then belong to her. The husband at common law becomes generally the absolute owner of his wife's personal chattels (except her paraphernalia).

But by the Married Women's Property Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 93), it was provided that the earnings of a married woman were to be deemed her own separate property (s. 1); as also deposits by her in savings banks (s. 2); that any married woman or any woman about to be married, and being entitled to or being about to acquire money in the public stocks and funds, shares or stocks in companies, or interests in friendly and benefit societies, might have the same registered in her own name as for her separate use (ss. 3, 4); that personal property coming to her during coverture as next of kin, and any sum of money not exceeding 200*l.* under a deed or will so coming, should belong to her for her separate use (s. 7); as to any freehold, copyhold, or customary-hold property coming to her as heiress or co-heiress of an intestate, the rents and profits thereof should (subject to the trusts of any settlement affecting the same) belong to her for her separate use (s. 8); that she might insure her own life or that of her husband for her own separate use (s. 10); that she might maintain an action in her own name in certain cases (s. 11); and that a husband should not be liable for the debts of his wife contracted before marriage (s. 12). This last section was repealed by the 'Married Women's Property Act (1870) Amendment Act, 1874' (37 & 38 Vict. c. 50), so far as respects marriages after the passing of the last-mentioned Act. But by s. 2 the husband's liability was limited to assets, as to which see s. 5.

And by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 75, repealing both the above acts, and coming into operation on the 1st January, 1883, the disabilities of coverture in respect of property have been almost entirely done away with. See MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY.

The wife, when acting in autre droit, as executrix, was always independent of her husband. Marriage settlements and separate provisions modify, of course, his common law rights, according to the particular agreements of the parties. As a general rule, a married woman is, at common law, incapable of entering into any contracts, except for necessities, and of suing and being sued. Coverture still protects her from criminal prosecution, except in cases of treason, murder, manslaughter, or cases of mere misdemeanour, or crimes committed in her husband's absence. For the statute law, see HUSBAND AND WIFE.

Covin [fr. convenio, Lat., to agree], a secret conspiracy or agreement between two or more persons to injure or defraud another.

Covinous, fraudulent.

Craft, a guild.

Cranage, a liberty to use a crane for landing goods from vessels at creeks or wharves and to make profit of it; also the money paid and taken for the same.

Crassa negligentia, gross neglect.

Crastino, the morrow after.

Crates, an iron gate before a prison.—1 Vent. 304.

Cravare, to impeach.

Craven, or Cravant, a word of disgrace and obloquy, pronounced on either champion, in the ancient trial by battle, proving recreant, i.e., yielding. Glanville calls it infestum et inverecundum verbum. His condemnation was amittere liberam legem, i.e., to become infamous, and not to be accounted liber et legalis homo, being supposed by the event to have been proved forsworn, and not fit to be put upon a jury or admitted as a witness.

Creamer, a foreign merchant, but generally taken for one who has a stall in a fair or market.—Blount.

Creansor, a creditor.—Old Nat. Br. 66; 38 Edw. III. c. 1.

Creast, see CREST.

Credit, a transfer of goods on trust in confidence of future payment.

Creditor [Lat.], one who trusts or gives credit, correlative to debtor. As to the rights of creditors, see NE EXEAT REGNO, SET OFF, FI. FA., CA. SA., ELEGIT, BANKRUPTCY, GARNISHEE, DISTRESS.—A creditor is entitled to take out letters of administration if there be no next of kin or the next of kin will not.

Creditors' bill, a bill in equity filed by one or more creditors, by and on behalf of himself or themselves, and all other creditors who shall come in under the decree, for an account of the assets and a due administration of the estate. These bills were allowed upon the principle that as executors and administrators have great power of preference at law, courts of equity ought, according to the maxim that equality is equity, to interpose, upon the application of any creditor by such a bill, to secure a distribution of the assets without preference to any one or more creditors. The usual decree against the executor or administrator was (as it is commonly phrased) quod computet, that is to say, it directed the chief clerk to take the accounts between the deceased and all his creditors; and to cause the creditors, upon due public notice, to come before him to prove their debts, at a certain place and within a limited period; and it also directed the chief clerk to take an account of all the personal estate of the deceased in the hands of the executor or administrator, and that the same be applied in payment of the debts and other charges in a due course of administration.—Story's Eq. Jurisp. 442. Similar proceedings may now be taken in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice under the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 34; but the title of 'Bill' is abolished, a 'Statement of claim' being substituted for it.

Creditrix, a female creditor.

Crementum comitatûs (the increase of a county). The sheriffs of counties anciently answered in their accounts for the improvement of the king's rents, above the viscontiel rents, under this title.

Crepare oculum, to put out an eye. An offence punishable among the Saxons by a fine of 50s., the highest fine.—Turner's Anglo-Saxons, v. ii., ap. iii., c. ii., p. 515.

Crepusculum [Lat.], the twilight.

Crescente malitiâ crescere debet et pœna. 2 Inst. 479.—(Vice increasing, punishment ought also to increase.)

Crest, in heraldry, signifies the devices set over a coat of arms.

Crelinus, a sudden stream or torrent.

Cretio, the period fixed by a testator within which the heir must have formally declared his intention to accept.—Civil Law.

Crier—Of the Court of Chancery, abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 27. In the Courts of Common Law one of the judge's clerks acted as crier.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 73, s. 8. Continued under Jud. Act, 1873, s. 77.

Crime. A crime is the violation of a right, when considered in reference to the evil tendency of such violation, as regards the community at large.—4 Steph. Com., 7th ed.; 74. Crimes consist either of misdemeanours or felonies. In our law misdemeanour is generally used in contradistinction to felony, and comprehends all indictable offences, which do not amount to felony, as perjury, battery, libels, conspiracies, etc.

It is not very easy in theory, and quite impossible according to the English law, to lay down any single principle by which to distinguish crimes from civil injuries—private from public wrongs. By the English law a distinction exists, but it seems wholly technical; depending sometimes on the situation of the agent; sometimes on the nature or relations of the thing which is the object of the act; sometimes on the manner in which the act is done; sometimes on the consequences of the act, the time of doing it, and other grounds which it would be useless to enumerate, because they can be learned thoroughly only by an acquaintance with the law itself.—4 Bl. Com. 7, n. 3, by Coleridge. See OFFENCE, and consult Russell on Crimes.

Crimen falsi (the offence of forgery).

Crimen falsi dicitur, cum quis illicite, cui non fuerit ad hæc data auctoritas, de sigillo, regis raptio vel invento, brevium, cartasve consignaverit. Fleta, 1, c. xxiii.—(The crime of forgery is when any one illicitly, to whom power has not been given for such purposes, has signed writs or charters with the king's seal, either stolen or found.)

Crimen furti, the offence of theft.

Crimen incendii, the offence of arson.

Crimen læsæ majestatis, the crime of injured majesty; treason.

Crimen læsæ majestatis omnia alia crimina excedit quoad pœnam. 3 Inst. 210.—(The crime of treason exceeds all other crimes in its punishment.)

Crimen raptûs, the offence of rape.

Crimen roberiae, the offence of robbery.

Criminal, a person indicted for a public offence and found guilty.

Criminal Code. See CODE.

Criminal Conversation, adultery. See ADULTERY. The action of crim. con. is nominally abolished by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 59; but the 33rd section gives a husband the right to claim damages from an adulterer, either in a petition for dissolution of marriage or for judicial separation, or in a petition limited to that object, and the damages claimed must be assessed by a jury upon the same principles and subject to the same rules as were formerly applicable to the trial of actions for criminal conversation, and the court has power to direct the mode of their application, and may direct that they be settled for the benefit of the children of the marriage, or as a provision for the wife.

Criminal information, a proceeding in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice at the suit of the Queen, without a previous indictment or presentment by a grand jury. Criminal informations are of two sorts: (1) Ex officio, which is a formal written suggestion of an offence committed, filed by the Attorney-General, or, in the vacancy of that office, by the Solicitor-General, in the court of Queen's Bench, without the intervention of a grand jury. It lies for misdemeanours only, and not for treasons or felonies. The offences against which they are usually directed are seditious or blasphemous libels or words; seditious riots not amounting to treason; libels upon the Queen's ministers, the judges, or other high officers, reflecting upon their conduct in the execution of their official duties; obstructing such officers in the execution of their duties; against officers themselves for bribery, or for other corrupt or oppressive conduct. The information is filed in the Crown Office without the previous leave of the court. (2) Information by the Master of the Crown Office, which is filed at the instance of an individual, with the leave of the court; and usually confined to gross and notorious misdemeanours, riots, batteries, libels, and other immoralities. The application is for a rule to show cause why a criminal information should not be filed against the party complained of, and must be founded upon an affidavit disclosing all the material facts of the case. If the court grant the rule nisi, it is afterwards, upon showing cause, discharged or made absolute. When an information is filed, either thus or ex officio, it must be tried by a petit jury of the county where the offence arose, and for that purpose, unless the case be of such importance as to be tried at bar, it is sent down by writ of Nisi Prius into that county, and tried either by a common or special jury, like a civil action, and if the defendant is found guilty, he must afterwards receive judgment from the Court of Queen's Bench.—4 Bl. Com. 308. The practice on the Crown side of the Queen's Bench is retained by the Judicature Acts (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34; Jud. Act, 1875, s. 19).

Criminal Law. This division of our jurisprudence comprises: (1) The general criminal law administered throughout the kingdom, and (2) The Crown law as administered by the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, consisting principally of a sort of quasi criminal law—as indictments for nuisances, the repair of roads, bridges, etc., informations, quo warranto, mandamus, certiorari, and the judicial decision of questions concerning the poor laws.—Consult Russell on Crimes, and Archbold's Practice of the Crown Office.

Criminal Lunatic Asylum. See 23 & 24 Vict. c. 75; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 29; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 12; and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 78.

Criminal Statutes Consolidation Acts. See 24 & 25 Vict. cc. 94, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100; and see 34 & 35 Vict. c. 32.

Crimp, one who decoys and plunders sailors under cover of harbouring them.

Crocards, a sort of old base money.

Crocica, the crozier, or pastoral staff.

Crociarius, the cross-bearer, who went before the prelate.

Croft [A. S., fr. creaft, Old Eng., handy-craft, or croit, Gael., a hump], a little close adjoining to a dwelling-house or homestead, and enclosed for pasture or arable, or any particular use.

Croises, and Croisado. See CROISES.

Croiteir, a crofter, one holding a croft.

Crop, corn, hay, and such other produce as can be cut and stored up. As to setting fire to crops, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 16.

Crore, ten millions.—Indian.

Cross-bill, answering to the reconventio of the Canon Law, as a mode of defence by cross-examination, was one filed by a defendant against the plaintiff or other defendants in the same suit, either to obtain (1) a necessary discovery of facts in aid of his defence to the original bill; or (2) full relief to all parties, touching the matters of the original bill, as in a suit for the specific performance of a written contract, which the defendant at the same time insisted ought to be delivered up or cancelled, in order to protect him from the plaintiff hereafter bringing an action at law upon such contract, a relief which the defendant must have prayed for by a cross-bill.—Mitf. Pl. 97; Sto. Eq. Plead. s. 389 et seq. This is now obsolete. The analogous proceeding by cross-action may often be now dispensed with, as by the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XIX., r. 3, a defendant may set up any counter-claim in his defence to an action. See COUNTER-CLAIM.

Also, if a bill of exchange or promissory note be given in consideration of another bill or note, it is called a cross or counter-bill or note.

Cross-examination, the examination of a witness on one side by the other, generally after examination in chief, but sometimes not; as in the case of an examination on the voir dire, which is in the nature of a cross-examination (See VOIR DIRE); and if one party calls a witness, and he is sworn, the other party may cross-examine him, although the party who has called him put no question at all to him. Sometimes cross-examination takes place by leave of the judge after re-examination. See RE-EXAMINATION. And if a witness be called to prove some preliminary and collateral matter only, as the handwriting of a document tendered in evidence, he is a witness in the cause, and may be cross-examined as to any of the issues in the cause.

As to the form of the cross-examination, leading questions are allowed, which is not the case in examination in chief.

The questions must be relevant to the issue (see heads in this title infra), but great latitude is allowed, as a question seemingly irrelevant often turns out otherwise

In the case of a witness proving himself hostile from interest or otherwise, the judge will allow the examination to assume the form of cross-examination.

The following are some of the chief heads of cross-examination :—

I. To cause the witness to alter or amend his evidence.

1. (a) by showing—

(1) he has spoken on a misconception of fact; or

(2) misunderstands the meaning of a word; or

(3) has given his idea of the effect of a transaction instead of the details.

(b) by inquiring the causes of his belief.

(c) by appealing to his consciousness of a weak memory [this course is taken with very old people].

(d) reminding him that he has spoken otherwise, or that others have; and other methods of showing his evidence ought not to be believed, which will come more fully under II.

2. To modify the evidence given in chief, by causing the witness to speak to supplementary facts to show

(a) the reason for what was done.

(b) the circumstances surrounding it. See infra II. B.

(c) the manner in which it was treated at the time.

II. To discredit the evidence of the witness.

A. From reasons connected with himself.

(a) that he is of bad character.

(1) generally.

(2) in regard to truthfulness.

(3) in regard to the subject-matter of the issue.

(b) that he is not impartial, as being

(1) a friend of the other side, through

(a) relationship.

(β) favour.

(γ) corruption.

(2) a friend of his cause.

(a) to screen his own character.

(β) to conduce to his profit.

(3) an enemy of the cross-examining party.

(a) presumably, having been punished or unjustly injured by him.

(β) apparently, having spoken revengefully of, or previously injured him.

(4) As under A., (b) 2.

N.B. Greater latitude is allowed in examining (on these heads) a party to a cause, than another witness.

B. (to discredit his evidence continued). From reasons arising out of his evidence, by causing him to give further evidence inconsistent—

(1) with all reason and probability.

(a) absolutely.

(β) under the circumstances [as that he should remember the matter in hand, but nothing else at the same distance of time].

(2) with the evidence of witnesses of indisputable credit.

(3) with parts of the case not in dispute.

(4) with what he himself has previously said,

(a) on a previous occasion.

(b) in the examination in hand.

(a) in chief.

(β) in the prior part of his cross-examination.

(5) with what a witness on the same side has said on the same subject. Now this will show either that the variance is a sign that the whole story is a fiction, or that one of the two speaks true and the other false; and that, as it does not appear which speaks true, it is not safe to believe either, or it should be attempted to cast the discredit on the one whose evidence is more important.

(6) with his own conduct in the transaction, or the conduct of witnesses of undisputed credit.

(7) with his demeanour in court, as (if he deposes he was calm under provocation) to irritate him.

III. To cause him to give evidence to be received as true.

(A) confirming the evidence of the questioner's witnesses.

(B) contradicting that of the opponent's witnesses.

(C) on a region of facts not previously entered upon, but this topic is more in the nature of examination in chief.

Of these, the First is the most generally useful. The Second (A) may not be resorted to without just grounds of suspicion. The propriety of selecting any of the others must depend upon the view suggested at the moment by the air of the witness and the general complexion of the case. It has been well laid down that the cross-examination of each witness should be made subservient to the general conduct of the case.

Cross-remainders, reciprocal contingencies of succession, which may be implied in a will, but must always be expressed in a deed, and should be expressly limited in a will.

The broad rule is, that wherever realty is devised to several persons in tail as tenants-in-common, and it appears to be the testator's intention that no part should go over until the failure of the issue of all the tenants-in-common, they take cross-remainders in tail amongst themselves. See Jarm. on Wills.

Cross-rules. These were rules where each of the opposite litigants obtained a rule nisi, as the plaintiff to increase the damages, and the defendant to enter a nonsuit. Rules to show cause are now abolished by the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. LIII., r. 2. Except in the case of motions for new trials (Ibid., Ord. XXXIX., r. 1) or to set aside judgments as wrongly entered on the findings of fact (Ibid., Ord. XL., rr. 4—6); and it is provided that notices of motion shall be given where the motion is not merely for a rule to show cause (Ibid., Ord. LIII., r. 3).

Crossing-checks. It is very usual for the drawers of bankers' checks to write across them the name of the payee's banker, in which case the banker on whom the check is drawn should only pay to that banker; in other cases, as when the drawer is unaware of the payee's banker, it is usual for him to write merely the words 'and Co.,' leaving it to the payee to add the name of his banker. This serves the purpose of some security in case the check is lost, since it can only be paid through a banker, and moreover post-pones in some measure the payment until the clearing hours in the afternoon. See Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, ss. 76—80, repealing and replacing 'Crossed Cheques Act, 1876,' 39 & 40 Vict. c. 81, which Act itself repealed and replaced 19 & 20 Vict. c. 25, and 21 & 22 Vict. c. 79.

Crown [fr. couronne, Fr.; corona, Lat.], an ornamental badge of regal power worn on the head by sovereign princes. The word is frequently used when speaking of the sovereign herself, or the rights, duties, and prerogatives belonging to her. As to costs for and against the Crown, see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 90. Also a silver coin of the value of five shillings.

Crown cases reserved. Questions of law which arise at criminal trials (except in the case of demurrers and writs of error) are decided by the 'Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases reserved,' sitting under the authority of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78, which declares that the Justices of either Bench and the Barons of the Exchequer shall have full power and authority to hear and finally determine the said question or questions reserved for their consideration, and thereupon to reverse, affirm, or amend any judgment which shall have been given on the indictment or inquisition, on the trial whereof such question or questions have arisen; or to avoid such judgment, and to order an entry to be made on the record that in the judgment of the said justices and barons the party convicted ought not to have been convicted; or to arrest the judgment thereon, or to order judgment to be delivered thereon. The jurisdiction given by this act may now be exercised by the judges of the High Court of Justice, or five of them at the least. The judgment of such Court is final, and without appeal (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 47).

Crown colony. See COLONY.

Crown debts. It is a prerogative of the Crown to claim priority for its debts before all other creditors, and to recover them by a summary process called an extent, because thesaurus regince est pacis vinculum et bellorum nervi. See 33 Hen. VIII. c. 39.

Every person having money belonging to the Crown is a crown-debtor. When upon inquisition a person is found to be a crown-debtor by simple contract, the debt immediately becomes a specialty; but a person giving to the Crown a bond on condition is not a bond-debtor before the condition is broken.

The places to be searched to ascertain the existence of any Crown debts created or secured before the 4th of June, 1839, are the Exchequer Office and the Tax Office, among the receiver-general's bonds; since that date, at the Common Pleas Office, pursuant to 2 Vict. c. 11. See 18 Vict. c. 15. After 31st Dec., 1859, the provisions as to re-registry contained in 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 15, apply to Crown debts.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 22; and see 23 & 24 Vict. c. 115, s. 1. It is provided by the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104, that future Crown debts shall not affect lands until writ of execution has been issued and registered (ss. 48—9); and see 28 & 29 Vict. c. 45, and title EXTENT.

Crown-lands. The demesne lands of the Crown, which it is now usual for the sovereign to surrender at the commencement of his reign for its whole duration, in consideration of the Civil List settled upon him. They are placed under Commissioners, and the revenues go to the Consolidated Fund. See 1 & 2 Vict. c. 2. See LAND REVENUES OF THE CROWN, and the CROWN LANDS ACT, 29 & 30 Vict. c. 62; and the CROWN LANDS ACT, 1873, 36 & 37 Vict. c. 36.

Crown matrimonial. See MATRIMONIAL CROWN.

Crown office, a department formerly belonging to the Court of Queen's Bench. The 6 & 7 Vict. c. 20 abolished the clerks in this Court, and the monopoly of their practice, throwing it open to all persons admitted or admissible to practice as attorneys of the Court of Queen's Bench; it also abolished several ancient offices, and many burthensome fees, and made the office subject to the direct control of the Lord Chief Justice. The office of Assistant Master was abolished by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 54. The Supreme Court of Judicature (Officers) Act, 1879, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 78, amalgamated the Crown Office with the Central Office of the Supreme Court, and transferred to such Central Office the 'Queen's Coroner and Attorney' and the 'Master of the Crown Office.'

The business of this office may be thus stated:—

1st. Original proceedings which consist of (a) indictments for assaults and batteries, libels, nuisances, perjuries, conspiracies, non-repair of roads, bridges, etc.; (β) informations.

2nd. Proceedings by way of supervision or appeal, exercised by means of (a) certiorari; (β) proceedings in error; (γ) mandamus.

3rd. Collateral proceedings, consisting of (a) articles of the peace; (β) attachments; (γ) habeas corpus.

Crown Office Act, 1877, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 41, provides for the authentication, etc., of documents issued from the office of the Crown in Chancery.

Crown Private Estates Acts, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 37; explained and amended by 36 & 37 Vict. c. 61.

Crown solicitor. In Ireland there are officers called Crown solicitors attached to each circuit, whose duty it is to get up every case for the Crown in criminal prosecutions. They are paid by salaries. In Scotland the still better plan exists of a Crown prosecutor (called the procurator-fiscal, and being a subordinate of the Lord-Advocate) in every county, who prepares every criminal prosecution. As to England, see PUBLIC PROSECUTION.

Crown suits—prosecutions in, see 28 & 29 Vict. c. 105; costs in, see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 90.

Croy, marsh land.—Blount.

Croyses, pilgrims, because they wore the sign of the cross upon their garments.—Bract. l. 5, pt. 2, c. ii.

Cruelty. Such conduct on the part of a husband (or wife) as entitles the other party to a judicial separation by reason of danger to life or health. It is a discretionary bar to a divorce (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85).

Cruelty to Animals Prevention Acts

12 & 13 Vict. c. 92; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 40, 41. See ANIMALS.

Crustum, a purple garment mixed with many colours.

Cry de pais, or Cri de pais, hue and cry.

Cryer, an officer of a court, whose duty it is to make proclamation. See CRIER.

Crypta [Ital., fr. κρύπτω, Gk., to hide, being first used by the early Christians for the performance of religious services in safety], a chapel or oratory underground, or under a church or cathedral.—Du Cange.

Cshatriya, Kshatriya, Chetterie, Khetery, a man of second or military caste.—Indian.

Cucking-stool. A chair on which females for certain offences were fastened and ducked in a pond. 'The chair was sometimes in the form of a close-stool, which contributed to increase the degradation.'—Hallivell. It was also called goging-stool. Goughstole, A.-Sax., a close-stool.—Wedg. 'A common scold, communis rixatrix (for our Law-Latin confines it to the feminine gender), is a public nuisance to her neighbourhood; for which offence she may be indicted, and if convicted, shall be sentenced to be placed on a certain engine of correction, called the trebucket, castigatory or cucking-stool.'—4 Bl. Com. 168.

Cude, a chrysom or face-cloth for a child baptised.

Cui ante divortium (to whom before divorce). A writ for a woman divorced from her husband to recover her lands and tenements which she had in fee-simple or in tail, or for life, from him to whom her husband alienated them during the marriage, when she could not gainsay it.—Reg. Orig. 233.

Cui bono. To whose advantage.

Cui in vitâ (to whom in life). A writ of entry for a widow against him to whom her husband aliened her lands or tenements in his lifetime; which must contain in it, that during his life she could not withstand it.—Reg. Orig. 232; F. N. B. 193.

Cui licet quod majus non debet quod minus est non licere. 4 Rep. 23.—(He who has authority to do the more important act shall not be debarred from doing that of less importance.)

Cuiusque aliquis quid concedit concedere videtur et id, sine quo res ipsa esse non potuit. 11 Co. 52.—(Whoever grants anything to another is supposed to grant that also without which the thing itself would be of no effect.)

Cuilibet in arte suâ perito est credendum. Co. Litt. 125.—(Every one who is skilled in his own art is to be believed.)

Cujus est commodum ejus debet esse incommodum.—(Whose is the advantage, his also should be the disadvantage.)

Cujus est dare ejus est disponere. Wing. Max. 53.—(Whose it is to give, his it is to dispose.) See illustrations of this maxim, Broom's Max., 5th ed., 459.

Cujus est divisio alterius est electio. Co. Litt. 166.—(When one has the division, the other has the choice.)

Cujus est instituere ejus est abrogare.—(He that institutes may also abrogate.)—Broom's Max., 5th ed., 878 n.

Cujus est solum ejus est usque ad cælum et ad inferos, or more succinctly, Cujus est solum ejus est altum. Co. Litt. 4.—(Whose is the soil, his it is even to heaven and to the middle of the earth.)

Cujus juris (i.e., jurisdictionis) est principale, ejusdem juris erit accessorium. 2 Inst. 493.—(An accessory matter is subject to the same jurisdiction as its principal.)

Culagium, the laying up of a ship in a dock for repair.

Culpa, an act of neglect, causing damage, but not implying an intent to injure, of which the Roman jurists recognized two; (1) Culpa lata, culpa lator, magna culpa, gross neglect treated very much like fraud; culpa magna dolus est, dolo proxima. (2) Culpa, without any epithet, or omnis culpa, culpa levis, levior; or levissima, slight neglect.—Cum. Civ. Law. 279; Sand. Just., 5th ed., 318.

Culpâ caret, qui scit, sed prohibere non potest. D. 50, 17, 50.—(He is free from fault who knows but cannot prevent.)

Culpa est immiscere se rei ad se non pertinenti. 2 Inst. 208.—(It is a fault for any one to meddle in a matter not pertaining to him.)

Culpa lata dolo æquiparatur.—(Gross negligence is held equivalent to intentional wrong.)

Culpa tenet suos auctores.—(A fault binds its own authors.)

Culpe pena par esto. Poena ad mensuram delicti statuenda est. Jur. Civ.—(Let the punishment be proportioned to the crime. Punishment is to be measured by the extent of the offence.)

Culprit [(thus derived by Donaldson), the clerk asks the prisoner, 'Are you guilty, or not guilty?' Prisoner, 'Not guilty.' Clerk, 'qu'il paroît : (may it prove so), how will you be tried?' Prisoner, 'By God and my country.' These words being hurried over came to sound, 'Culprit, how will you be tried?' The ordinary derivation is from culpa], one who is indicted for a criminal offence; popularly mistaken for the legal denomination of a criminal.

Cultura, a parcel of arable land.—Blount.

Culvertage [fr. culus and verto, Lat., to turn tail], base slavery, the confiscation of an estate.—Mat. Par. 1212.

Culward and Culverd, a coward.

Cum adsunt testimonia rerum quid opus est verbis. 2 Buls. 53.—(Where the testimony of facts is present, what need is there of words?)

Cum confitente sponte mitius est agendum. 4 Inst. 66.—(One confessing willingly should be dealt with more leniently.)

Cum duo inter se pugnantia reperiuntur in testamento ultimum ratum est. Co. Litt. 112.—(Where two things repugnant to each other are found in a will, the last prevails.)

Cum grano salis (with a grain of salt), with allowance for exaggeration.

Cum in testamento ambigue aut etiam perperam scriptum est benigne interpretari et secundum id quod credibile est cogitatum credendum est. D. 34, 5, 24.—(Where an ambiguous, or even an erroneous, expression occurs in a will, it should be construed liberally and in accordance with the testator's probable meaning.)—Broom's Max.

Cum par delictum est duorum, semper oneratur petitor et melior habetur possessoris causa. D. 50, 17, 154.—(When both parties are in fault the plaintiff must always fail, and the cause of the person in possession be preferred.)—Broom's Max.

Cum privilegio, the expression of the monopoly of Oxford, Cambridge, and the Royal Printers to publish the Bible.

Cum testamento annexo [Lat.], (with the will annexed). See ADMINISTRATOR.

Cumulative legacies, legacies so called to distinguish them from legacies which are merely repeated. In the construction of testamentary instruments, the question often arises whether, where a testator has twice bequeathed a legacy to the same person, the legatee is entitled to both, or only to one of them; in other words, whether the second legacy must be considered as a mere repetition of the first, or as cumulative, i.e., additional. In determining this question, the intention of the testator, if it appears on the face of the instrument, prevails; but if it does not so appear the following rules have been laid down:—

(I.) If the same specific thing be bequeathed twice to a legatee, whether by the same instrument or not, he is entitled to one legacy only.

(II.) If the legacies be not of a specific thing, but of quantity, e.g., a sum of money:—

(1) If they are bequeathed by the same instrument, and are of equal amount, the second legacy is not cumulative, but the legatee is entitled to one legacy only.

(2) If they are bequeathed by the same instrument, but are of unequal amount, the second legacy is cumulative.

(3) If they are bequeathed by different instruments, whether they are equal or unequal in amount, the second legacy is cumulative. See 2 Williams on Executors, 7th ed., 1289.

Cumulative remedy, a second mode of procedure in addition to one already available, opposed to alternative remedy.

Cuna cervisiæ, a tub of ale.—Domesday.

Cuneus, a mint or place to coin money; from this word coin is derived.

Cuntesy-cuntesy, a kind of trial as appears from Bracton, lib. 4, tract 3, ca. 18, and tract 4, ca. 2, where it seems to mean, one by the ordinary jury.

Curagulos, one who takes care of a thing.

Curate [fr. curator, Lat.], one who has the cure of souls, the lowest degree in the church, being an officiating temporary minister, regularly employed by the spiritual rector or vicar, either to serve in his absence or as his assistant. All curates ought, before they enter on their duties, to be licensed by the bishop of the diocese, and the law on the other hand has made several provisions for their proper maintenance.—28 Hen. VIII. c. 11; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 106, ss. 75—103; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 49; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, s. 12; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 70; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 122.

Curator, a protector of property. His duty was to see that the person under his care did not waste his goods.—Civil Law, Sand. Just., 5th ed., xl., 71, 83.

Curatores viarum, surveyors of the high ways.

Curatus non habet titulum. 3 Buls. 310.—(A curate has not a title.)

Curfen, Curfew [fr. couvrir, to cover, and feu, Fr., fire], a bell which rang at eight o'clock in the evening, in the time of William the Conqueror, whereupon everyone was obliged by law to put out his fire and light. The law was abolished by Henry I. in 1100. It was called in the Law-Latin of the middle ages, ignitegium or pyritegium.

Curia, a court of justice. Also the class from which in the Roman provincial towns the magistrates were eligible.

Curia advisari vult (the court desires to consider), a deliberation which a court of judicature sometimes takes, where there is any point of difficulty, before they give judgment in a cause. Abbreviated in our reports thus, cur. adv. vult, or c. a. v.

Curia Cancellariæ officina justitiæ. 2 Inst. 552.—(The Court of Chancery is the workshop of justice.)

Curia claudenda, an obsolete writ to compel another to make a fence or wall, which he was bound to make between his land and the plaintiff's.—Reg. Orig. 155.

Curia cursûs aquæ, a court held by the lord of the manor of Gravesend for the better management of barges and boats plying on the river Thames between Gravesend and Windsor, and also at Gravesend Bridge, etc.—2 Geo. II. c. 26.

Curia domini, the lord's house, hall, or court, where all the tenants meet at the time of keeping courts.—Cowel.

Curia palatii, the Palace Court. It was abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 101.

Curia Parliamenti suis propriis legibus substituit. 4 Inst. 50.—(The Court of Parliament is governed by its own peculiar laws.)

Curia penticiarum, a court held by the sheriff of Chester, in a place there called the Pendice or Pentice; probably it was so called from being originally held under a pent-house, or open shed covered with boards.—Blount.

Curia Regis. See AULA REGIS.

Curiality, the privileges, prerogatives, or, perhaps, retinue, of a court.—Bacon.

Curia Christianitatis, Courts of Christianity; ecclesiastical courts.

Curiosa et captiosa interpretatio in lege reprobatur. 1 Buls. 6.—(A nice and captious construction is reprobated in law.)

Curnock, a measure containing four bushels, or half a quarter.

Currency, coin; bank notes, or other paper money issued by authority, and which are continually passing as and for coin. See 56 Geo. III. c. 68; 6 Geo. IV. c. 79; 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 34, s. 1; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 41, s. 1; and 33 Vict. c. 10. See COIN and TENDER.

Curriculum, the year, of the course of a year; 2, the set of studies for a particular period, appointed by an university.

Currit tempus contra desides et sui juris contemptores.—(Time runs against the slothful, and those who slight their own rights.)

Cursing. Profane swearing or cursing is punishable by fine. See 19 Geo. II. c. 21, and SWEARING.

Cursitor Baron of the Exchequer, an officer whose business it was to pass the accounts of the sheriffs, etc. See Manning's Exchequer Practice, p. 322 and note. The office was abolished by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 86, 'the duties thereof having for the most part ceased.'

Cursitors [fr. clerici de cursu, Lat.], clerks of the Court of Chancery, who made out original writs, and were called clerks of course.—18 Edw. III. st. 5. Their office was abolished by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 82, ss. 10, 11, and 12, and their duties were transferred to the Petty Bag Office. See PETTY BAG OFFICE.

Cursones terræ, ridges of land.

Cursor, an inferior officer of the Papal court.

Cursus curiæ est lex curiæ. 3 Buls. 53.—(The practice of the court is the law of the court.) See Broom's Max., 5th ed., 133.

Curtsey of England [ius curialitatis

Anglicæ, Lat.], an estate which by favour of the law of England arises by act of law, and is that interest which a husband has for his life in his wife's fee-simple or fee-tail estates, general or special, after her death.

There are four circumstances necessary to the existence of this estate (which appears to be unaffected by the Married Women's Property Act, 1882):—

(1) A canonical or legal marriage.

(2) Seisin of the wife; as to corporeal hereditaments, it must be a seisin in deed, either actual or virtual (Co. Litt. 29 a, n. 3; 8 Co. 96 a), but as to incorporeal hereditaments, a seisin in law is sufficient, where a seisin in deed is impossible.

(3) Birth of issue, alive and during the mother's existence (Paine's case, 8 Co. 34). It is immaterial whether the issue live or die, or whether it be born before or after the wife's seisin. If a woman inheritably marries, has issue, her husband dies, and she takes another husband, and has issue, which dies, and then the wife dies, the second husband shall be tenant by the curtesy, though the issue by the first husband be living.

(4) Death of the wife. The husband's title to the curtesy is initiated at the birth of issue, and consummated at the death of his wife.

It is to be observed that by the custom of gavelkind, a husband may be tenant by the curtesy, without having had any issue by his wife. This curtesy is only of a moiety of the wife's lands, and ceases if the husband marry again.

All persons capable of taking freehold estates may be tenants by the curtesy; but aliens cannot (but see 33 & 34 Vict. c. 14, s. 2), nor a person attainted of felony, unless he have issue by his wife after pardon (Co. Litt. 30 b, n. 7). A condition to restrain the husband of a feme-donee in tail from curtesy is repugnant and void.—Co. Litt. 224 a.

A husband may be tenant by the curtesy in a fee-simple or fee-tail estate, which is held in coparcenary or in common, for in each of these the inheritance is executed in possession; also in trusts and other interests, which, though in law mere rights and titles, are deemed estates in equity; and also in advowsons, rents, and commons. But there cannot be a tenant by the curtesy in the following interests:—

At the common law, if lands had been given to husband and wife, and to the heirs of their two bodies begotten, and they had issue, and the husband died, and she took another husband, and had issue, the nature of the gift was so far changed by their having issue, that the land then became descendible to all the heirs of the body of the wife by any other husband, and liable to the curtesy of such husband. To prevent this, it was provided by the statute De Donis, that where lands were given in this manner, a second husband should not be tenant by the curtesy, nor his issue inheritable.

If lands be given to a woman and to the heirs male of her body, and she marries and has issue a daughter only, and dies, her husband shall not be tenant by the curtesy; because the daughter by no possibility could inherit the mother's estate in the land.

As no estates in land are subject to curtesy but those of inheritance, wherever the inheritance is held to have never vested in the wife, the husband cannot be tenant by the curtesy. For it is the rule in the case of a tenancy by the curtesy, as well as in a tenancy in dower, that the estate shall come out of the inheritance, and not out of the freehold. Estates held in joint-tenancy are not subject to curtesy. Where an estate is given to two sisters, and the heirs of their bodies, and one marries and has issue and dies, her husband shall not be tenant by the curtesy, because the estate of the surviving sister intervenes, and the estate tail was never executed in possession. A man cannot be tenant by the curtesy of lands which are assigned to a woman for her dower. This follows from dower not being an estate of inheritance. For the same reason a woman cannot have dower of lands of which a man is tenant by the curtesy. Lord Coke says, 'A man shall not be tenant by the curtesy of a reversion or remainder expectant upon any estate or freehold, unless the particular estate be determined or ended during the coverture. The reason is, that there was no seisin of the freehold. It would be otherwise of a reversion in remainder expectant upon a lease for years, because there the wife is seised of the freehold. Copyhold estates are not liable to curtesy, unless there be an express custom to warrant it.'

The husband from the moment of the child's birth, or of the acquisition of the property by his wife (whichever last happens), is enabled to convey an estate for his own life; before the birth of a child, he can convey a good estate for the joint lives only of himself and his wife. If he make a lease for years, reserving rent, and die, the lease is absolutely determined, so that no acceptance of rent by the heir or those in reversion can make it good, for though his estate is quodam modo a continuance of the wife's estate, yet it is a continuance of it only for life, and he has no power to contract for or intermeddle with the inheritance; and, consequently, his lease determines with the estate whence it is derived, and the lessee becomes tenant at sufferance if he continues in possession. An estate by the curtesy, in respect of the estate tail, or of any prior estate created by the settlement, as well as a resulting use or trust to or for the settlor, is to be deemed a prior estate under the settlement within the contemplation of the Fines and Recoveries Act (3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 22) appointing a protector; the husband would therefore be the protector of the settlement. See Bisset on Life Estates, c. iii.

Some English writers (Mirror, c. i. s. 3) ascribe the law of curtesy to Henry I.; but Nathaniel Bacon (Government, 4to, 1647, p. 105) calls it a law of counter-tenure to that of dower, and yet supposes it as ancient as the time of the Saxons, and that it was therefore rather restored by Henry I., than introduced by him. But there is no trace of this curtesy among the laws of the Saxons, nor among those we have of Henry I.—1 Reeve 298; Cham. on Est. c. iii. p. 92.

Curteyn, the name of King Edward the Confessor's sword; it is said that the point of it was broken as an emblem of mercy.—Mat. Par. in Hen. III.

Curtilage [fr. coar, Fr., court; and leagh, Sax., place], a court-yard, backside, or piece of ground lying near and belonging to a dwelling-house; the limit of the premises in which housebreaking can be committed. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 53.

Curtiles terræ, court lands.—Spel. on Feuds.

Cussore, a term used in Hindostan for the discount of allowance made in the exchange of rupees, in contradistinction to batta, which is the sum deducted.—Encyc. Lond.

Custalorum, a ridiculous confusion of custos rotulorum.—Shakespeare.

Custantia, costs.

Custode admittendo, Custode amovendo, writs for the admitting and removing of guardians.

Custodes Libertatis Angliæ auctoritate Parliamenti, the style in which writs and all judicial processes were made out during the great revolution from the execution of King Charles I. till Oliver Cromwell was declared Protector.—12 Car II. c. 3.

Custodia legis. Custody of the law. See IN CUSTODIA LEGIS.

Custodiam lease, a grant from the Crown under the Exchequer seal, by which the custody of lands, etc., seised in the king's hands, is demised or committed to some person as custodee or lessee thereof.

Custody of Infants. See INFANTS.

Custom [fr. costume, It.; coutume, courume, Fr.; costumbre, Sp.; consuetudo, Lat.], an unwritten law established by long usage and the consent of our ancestors. If it be universal, it is common law; if particular, it is then properly custom. The requisites to make a particular custom good are these: (1) It must have been used so long that the memory of man runs not to the contrary; (2) it must have been continued; and (3) peaceable; also (4) reasonable; and (5) certain; (6) compulsory, and not left to the option of every person, whether he will use it or not; and (7) consistent with other customs, for one custom cannot be set up in opposition to another. Customs are of different kinds, as customs of merchants, customs of a certain district, customs of a particular manor, etc. If there be an invariable certain and general usage or custom of any particular trade or place, the law will imply that a party contracting upon a matter to which the same has reference, intended to import such usage or custom into his contract.

Custom-house, the house or office where commodities are entered for importation or exportation; where the duties, bounties, or drawbacks payable or receivable upon such importation or exportation are paid or received; and where ships are cleared out, etc. The principal British custom-house is in London, but there are custom-houses subordinate to it in all the considerable seaports.

Custom-house brokers, persons authorized by the Commissioners of Customs to act for parties at their option in the entry or clearance of ships, and the transaction of general business. They give a bond to the commissioners in a sum of 1000*l.* conditioned for their good conduct, and for the purpose of enabling restitution to be made of any loss accruing by their negligence or misconduct.

Custom of Merchants [lex mercatoria, Lat.]. See COMMERCE, and also CUSTOM.

Customary Court-Baron, a court which should be kept within the manor for which it is held. It may be held anywhere within the manor, at the pleasure of the person holding it, unless some ancient custom require it to be held in a certain place.

The court-baron was to be held from three weeks to three weeks, or, as some think, as often as the lord chose. And it should seem clear, that the lord may hold a customary court as frequently as he pleases, and compel the attendance of his tenants who hold by villein or base services.—2 Wat. Cop. c. i., p. 9 is lost, yet still there may be a customary court; for as these two courts are distinct (though frequently held at the same time, the same roll serving to record the proceedings of both), the want of freeholders does not preclude the lord from holding a customary court for his copyholders.—1 Cruise's Dig., tit. x. c. i., s. 19. See COURT-BARON.

Customary freeholds, or, as they are also denominated, PRIVILEGED COPYHOLDS, or copyholders of frank tenure, were known in ancient times as estates in privileged villenage or villein socage, and are estates held by custom, but not at the lord's will, in which they differ from copyholds: yet now the will of the lord in copyhold is, as we have seen, reduced to a mere fiction. These lands are of such singular nature that when they are compared with mere copyholds, they may be called freeholds, and when compared with absolute freeholds, they may be denominated copyholds. While the freehold interest or estate rests with the tenant, the freehold tenure is in the lord. (Mr. Serjeant Scriven dissents from this proposition in his work on Copyholds, Vol. II., p. 572 et seq.) They are usually transferred, by surrender into the hands of the lord and admittance of the new tenant. Their customs, incidents, and services are similar to those already noticed as relating to copyholds properly so called.

Mr. Cruise divides customary freeholds into two kinds: (1) Those of which the freehold is in the lord, more properly called free copyholds; and (2) those of which the freehold is in the tenant, strictly called customary freeholds. The former pass by surrender and admittance, the latter by a conveyance which passes from the grantor-tenant his freehold, followed by an admittance (or as the custom is, in some manors, by surrender and admittance), which marks the change of tenancy—Cruise's Dig., tit. x. c. i., s. 9.

Customs, duties charged upon commodities on their importation into, or exportation out of, a country. They seem to have existed in England before the Conquest, but the King's claim to them was first established by 3 Edw. I. These duties were, at first, principally laid on wool, woolfells (sheep skins), and leather, when exported. They were also extraordinary duties paid by aliens, which were denominated parva costuma, to distinguish them from the former, or magna costuma. The duties of tonnage and poundage, of which mention is so frequently made in English history, were custom duties; the first being made on wine by the ton, and the latter being an ad valorem duty of so much a pound on all other merchandise.—3 Steph. Com., 6th ed., 597. When these duties were granted to the Crown, they were denominated subsidies, and as the duty of poundage had continued for a lengthened period at the rate of 1s. a pound, or five per cent., a subsidy came, in the language of the customs, to denote an ad valorem duty of five per cent. The new subsidy granted in the reign of Wm. III. was an addition of five per cent. to the duties on most imported commodities. The various custom duties were collected for the first time in a book of rates published in the reign of Charles II.: a new book of rates being again published in the reign of Geo. I. But exclusive of the duties entered in these two books, many more had been imposed at different times; so that the accumulation of the duties, and the complicated regulations to which they gave rise, were productive of the greatest embarrassment. The Customs Consolidation Act, 27 Geo. III. c. 13, introduced by Mr. Pitt, in 1787, did much to remedy these, among other inconveniences. The method adopted was, to abolish the existing duties on all articles, and to substitute in their stead one single duty on each article, equivalent to the aggregate of the various duties by which it had previously been loaded. The resolutions on which the act was founded amounted to about 3000. A more simple and uniform system was, at the same time, introduced into the business of the custom-house. These alterations were productive of the very best effects, and several similar consolidations have since been effected, particularly in 1853, when the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, consolidated the several acts then in force for the management and regulation of customs, the prevention of smuggling, the encouragement of British shipping and navigation, the warehousing of goods, the granting of drawbacks and allowances of customs, the regulation of the trade of the British possessions abroad and of the Isle of Man; and lastly, in 1876, by the Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, 39 & 40 Vict. c. 36, the Customs Tariff Act, 1876, 39 & 40 Vict. c. 35, consolidating the duties in the same year. The 'Customs and Inland Revenue Acts' of subsequent years will be found to contain divers small amendments.

The principal articles now (1883) subject to customs duties are beer, wine, spirits, tea, coffee, plate, tobacco, and raisins. For a detail of all the acts relating to the Customs, see Biddle's Table of Reference to the Statutes, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 16. As to the Australian Colonies, see 36 & 37 Vict. c. 22. As to offences against the Customs, see 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 269 et seq.

Customs Inland Bonding Act, 1860.—23 & 24 Vict. c. 36.

Custos brevium (the keeper of the writs), a principal clerk belonging to the Courts of Queen's Bench and Common Pleas, whose office it was to keep the writs returnable into those courts. Abolished by 1 Wm. IV. c. 5.

Custos morum, the guardian of morals. The Court of Queen's Bench has been so styled.—4 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 377.

Custos placitorum coronæ (the keeper of the pleas of the crown). The custos rotulorum.

Custos rotulorum (the keeper of the rolls or records of the county). A principal justice of the peace within the county, by whom the clerk of the peace is appointed, Harding v. Pollock, 6 Bing. 25.

Custos spiritualium, he that exercises the spiritual jurisdiction of a diocese, during the vacancy of any see, which, by the canon law, belongs to the dean and chapter, but, at present, in England, to the archbishop of the province by prescription.—Encyc. Lond.

Custos statum hæredis in custodiâ existentis meliorem, non deteriorem, facere potest. 7 Co. 7.—(A guardian can make the estate of an existing heir under his guardianship better, not worse.)

Custos temporalium, the person to whom a vacant see or abbey was given by the king, as supreme lord. His office was, as steward of the goods and profits, to give an account to the escheator, who did the like to the exchequer.—Encyc. Lond.

Custuma antiqua sive magna, the old export duties on wool, sheepskins or woelfels, and leather.

Custuma parva et nova, the alien's duty on imported and exported commodities.

Cutcherry, corrupted from Kachari, 'A court, a hall, an office, the place where any public business is transacted' (Wilson's Glossary).—Indian.

Cuthred, a knowing or skilful counsellor.

Cutpurse, one who steals by the method of cutting purses; a common practice when men wore their purses at their girdles, as was once the custom.

Cutter of the tallies, an officer in the Exchequer, to whom it belonged to provide wood for the tallies, and to cut the sum paid upon them, etc.

Cutwal, Katwal, the chief officer of police or superintendent of markets in a large town or city in India.

Cycle [fr. κύκλος, Gk.], a measure of time; a space in which the same revolutions begin again; a periodical space of time.—Encyc. Lond.

Cygnets belong equally to the owners of the cock and hen.—7 Rep. 17.

Cyne-bot, or Cyne-gild, the portion belonging to the nation of the mulct for slaying the king, the other portion or 'wêr' being due to his family.—Blount.

Cyning [fr. cyn., Sax.; gens, natio, Lat.], a king; a son or child of the people. It is manifestly a patronymic, like Æscing, son of Æsc; Uffing, son of Uffa; Elling, son of Elle; Cerdicing, son of Cerdic; Iding, son of Ida; Cryding, son of Cryda; Ætheling, son of the Æthel, or noble.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Cyphonism. That kind of punishment used by the ancients, and still used by the Chinese, called by Sir George Staunton the wooden collar, by which the neck of the malefactor is bent or weighed down.—Encyc. Lond.

Cy-près (near to it). The principle of this doctrine is, that where a testator has two objects, one primary or general, and the other secondary or particular, which are incompatible, the particular must be sacrificed in order that effect may be given to the general object, as near as may be to the testator's intention, according to law. Thus, if a testator manifest a general intention that a particular unborn devisee and his issue should take certain property, but in consequence of the interests of the issue being limited by purchase, the particular mode adopted by the testator of carrying into effect his primary intent be contrary to law, the courts have, in support of the testator's general intention to provide for the issue of the devisee, sometimes held that the issue shall take derivatively through the ancestor, by vesting an estate tail in him, which is conformable to the rules of law.

It is also applied to charitable bequests, and was formerly pushed to a most extravagant length. But this sensible distinction now prevails, that the court will not decree the execution of a charitable trust in a manner different from that intended, except so far as it is seen that the intention cannot be literally executed. In that case another mode will be adopted consistent with the general intention, so as to execute it, though not in mode, yet in substance. If the mode should become by subsequent circumstances impossible, the general rule is not to be defeated, if it can in any other way be obtained. Where there are no objects remaining to take the benefit of a charitable corporation, the court will dispose of its revenues by a new scheme upon the principles of the original charities, cy-près.

There is also a modification of the strictness of the common law, as to conditions precedent in regard to personal legacies, which is at once rational and convenient, and tends to carry into effect the intention of the testator. It is, that where a literal compliance with the condition becomes impossible from unavoidable circumstances, and without any default of the party, it is sufficient that it is complied with as nearly as it practically can be, i.e., cy-près. This modification is derived from the civil law, and stands upon the presumption that the donor could not have intended to require impossibilities, but only a substantial compliance with his directions, as far as they should admit of being fairly carried into execution. It is upon this ground that courts of equity constantly hold in cases of personal legacies, that a substantial compliance with the condition satisfies it, although not literally fulfilled. Thus, if a legacy upon a condition precedent shall require the consent of three persons to a marriage, and one or more of them should die, the consent of the survivor or survivors would be deemed a sufficient compliance with the condition. And, à fortiori, this doctrine would be applied to conditions subsequent.—Sugd. Powers, 549; 1 Story's Eq. Jur., 235, and Vol. II., 386, 390. And see now Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 24, 25, as to the equitable jurisdiction of all branches of the Supreme Court.

Cyrce, a church.

Cyricbryce, a breaking into a church.

Cyrogaphum, an Anglo-Saxon charter, this word being written in capital letters at the top or bottom of the charter and cut through by a knife.—1 Reeve, 10; Co. Litt. 229.

Czar [written more properly Tzar, Slav.], the title of the Emperor of Russia, first assumed by Basil, the son of Basilides, under whom the Russian power began to appear, about 1740.

Czarina, the title of the Empress of Russia.

Czarowitz, the title of the eldest son of the czar and czarina.

D.

Da tua dum tua sunt, post mortem tunc tua non sunt. 3 Buls. 18.—(Give the things which are yours whilst they are yours; after death they are not yours.)

Dagus, or Dais [fr. dais or daiz, Fr., a canopy or cloth of state], the raised floor at the upper end of a hall.

Daker, or Diker, ten hides.—Blount.

Dalus, Dailus, Dailia, a certain measure of land: such narrow slips of pasture as are left between the ploughed furrows in arable land.—Cowel.

Dam [fr. dam, Dan.; dammer, Icel.], a boundary or confinement; a mole.

Damage [fr. damnum agere, Lat.; dommage, Fr.], a loss or injury by the fault of another, e.g., by an unlawful act or omission.

Damages. The compensation, as fixed by the jury, or judge if the case be tried without a jury, payable to a successful plaintiff.

In real actions no damages are recoverable. In the mixed action of ejectment the damages were ordinarily nominal (unless under 1 Geo. IV. c. 87), the actual damages sustained by the detention of the property, etc., being usually recovered in an action of trespass for mesne profits. But they can be recovered in the ejectment since the C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 214. Damages are recoverable in all personal actions, and in the actions called under the former practice, assumpsit, covenant, case, trover, and trespass, they were the sole object of the action, whilst in debt and detinue they were nominal; in replevin, if the action were in the detinet, the damages were measured by the actual injury sustained; but if in the detinuit the damages were given for the injury the plaintiff had sustained by the taking only, which is usually the expenses of the replevin bond. See MEASURE OF DAMAGES. Though the names of these actions are no longer technical since the coming into force of the Judicature Acts, the actions in substance will continue, and the rules as to damages remain the same. (See note at head of sched. 1 of Jud. Act, 1875.)

By the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 28, it is enacted 'that upon all debts or sums certain, payable at a certain time or otherwise, the jury on the trial of any issue, or on any inquisition of damages, may, if they shall think fit, allow interest to the creditor, at a rate not exceeding the current rate of interest from the time when such debts or sums certain were payable, if such debts or sums be payable by virtue of some written instrument at a certain time, or if payable otherwise, then from the time when demand of payment shall have been made in writing so as such demand shall give notice to the debtor that interest will be claimed from the date of such demand until the time of payment; provided that interest shall be payable in all cases in which it is now payable by law.' By s. 29, 'the jury on the trial of any issue, or on any inquisition of damages, may, if they shall think fit, give damages in the nature of interest, over and above the value of the goods at the time of the conversion or seizure, in all actions of trover or trespass de bonis asportatis, and over and above the money recoverable in all actions on policies of assurance made after the passing of this act.' See C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 95; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 2.

Double and treble damages are in some cases given by particular statutes, but at common law the damages are always single. Damages may be limited, increased, or reduced, according to circumstances.—1 Reeve, 14; 2 Turner's Anglo-Sax. v. ii. app. iii. c. ii.; Sedgwick or Mayne on Damages.

Courts of Equity long laboured under the infirmity of not being able to award damages by way of compensation for a fraud, or for the non-performance of a contract relating to the sale and purchase of realty. This was amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27, 'Cairns' Act,' which provided that 'In all cases in which the Court of Chancery has jurisdiction to entertain an application for an injunction against a breach of any covenant, contract, or agreement, or against the commission or continuance of any wrongful act, or for the specific performance of any covenant, contract, or agreement, it shall be lawful for the same court, if it shall think fit, to award damages to the party injured, either in addition to, or in substitution for such injunction or specific performance, and such damages may be assessed in such a manner as the court shall direct' (s. 2).

This Act is not repealed; it is in substance re-enacted by s. 24 of the Judicature Act, 1873, but may still be resorted to for supplying details omitted by that section.

The Judicature Acts allow matters to be set up by a defendant by way of counter-claim, which must formerly have been the subject of a separate action; and, therefore, a defendant may in effect recover damages in an action brought against him. (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XXII., r. 10.) And see COUNTER-CLAIM.

Damages ultra, additional damages claimed by a plaintiff not satisfied with those paid into court by the defendant.

Damage-cleer [fr. damna clericorum, Lat.], a fee assessed of the tenth part in the Common Pleas, and the twentieth part in the Queen's Bench and Exchequer, out of all damages exceeding five marks recovered in those courts, in actions upon the case, covenant, trespass, etc., wherein the damages were uncertain; which the plaintiff was obliged to pay to the prothonotary or the officer of the court wherein he recovered, before he could have execution for the damages. This was originally a gratuity given to the prothonotaries and their clerks, for drawing special writs and pleadings; but it was taken away by statute, since which, if any officer in these courts took any money in the name of damage-cleer, or anything in lieu thereof, he forfeited treble the value.—17 Car. II. c. 6.

Damage-feasant, or faisant (doing damage). If a stranger's beasts are found on another person's land without his leave or license, and without the fault of the possessor of the close (which may happen from his not repairing his fences), and there doing damage by feeding, or otherwise, to the grass, corn, wood, etc., the person damaged may distrain and impound them, as well by night as in the day, lest the beasts escape before taken; but they cannot be sold for the damage done. By 6 & 7 Vict. c. 30, if any person shall release or attempt to release, cattle lawfully seized by way of such distress, from the pound or place where they shall be pounded, or on the way to or from such pound or place, or shall destroy such pound or place or any part thereof, or any lock or bolt thereof, he shall on conviction, before two justices of the peace, be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5*l.*, and to payment of the reasonable charges and expenses. By 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, repealing 5 & 6 Vict. c. 59, persons impounding cattle are bound under a penalty of 40*s.* to supply them with food and water.

Dame [fr. dame, Fr.; dama, Sp.], the legal designation of the wife of a knight or baronet.

Damnification, that which causes damage or loss.

Damnify, to endamage, to injure, to cause loss to any person.

Damnosa hæreditas, a disadvantageous, or unprofitable inheritance.

Dammum absque injuriâ (a loss without a wrongful act). This is not actionable. Thus, if I have a mill, and a neighbour builds another mill upon his own land, per quod, the profit of my mill is diminished, yet no action lies against him, for every one may lawfully erect a mill upon his own ground. But if I have a mill by prescription on my own land, and another erects a new mill, which draws away some portion of the stream from mine, so as to diminish its former power, an action of trespass on the case will lie against him. Consult Broom's Com., 4th ed., 75 et seq.

Dammum fatale, fatal damage, for which bailees are not liable. Among fatal damages were included by the civilians losses by shipwreck, by lightning, or other casualty, by pirates, and by superior force. Losses by fire, burglary, and robbery seem also to have been included. But theft was not numbered among such casualties.—Story on Bailments, 471.

Dammum sine injuriâ esse potest. Lofft. 112.—(There may be damage or injury inflicted without any act of injustice.)

Damsel [fr. demoiselle, Fr.; damigella, Ital., dimin.; fr. domina, Lat.], a young single gentlewoman.

Dan (disused) [fr. dominus, Lat.], anciently the better sort of men in this kingdom had this title; so the Spanish Don.

The old term of honour for men, as we now say Master or Mister.

Dancing. Places kept for public music or dancing in London or Westminster, or within twenty miles thereof, must be annually licensed by justices of the peace under 25 Geo. II. c. 36, amended by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 21, which allowed them to be open after noon, whereas under 25 Geo. II. c. 36, they might not be open till after 5 p.m.

Danegelt, Danegeld, or Danegold [fr. denegeldum, dane, and gelt, tribute], a tribute of 1s. and afterwards of 2s. upon every hide of land through the realm, levied by the Anglo-Saxons, for maintaining such a number of forces as were thought sufficient to clear the British seas of Danish pirates, who greatly annoyed our coasts. It continued a tax until the time of Stephen, and was one of the rights of the Crown.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Dane-lage, the Danish Law, which was principally maintained in the midland counties, and the eastern coast (the parts most exposed to the visits of that piratical people) while the Danes had sway in this country.

Dangeria, a money payment made by forest-tenants, that they might have liberty to plough and sow in time of pannage, or mast feeding.—Manw. For. Laws.

Dangerous goods, act as to the carriage and deposit of, 29 & 30 Vict. c. 69, repealed by the Explosives Act, 1875. See EXPLOSIVE SUBSTANCES.

Danism [fr. δάνεισμα, Gk., a loan], the act of lending money on usury.

Dar, keeper, holder. This word is often joined with another to denote the holder of a particular employment or office, as Chob-dar, staff-holder; Zemin-dar, landholder. This compound word with i, ee, y, added to it, denotes the office, as Zemindar-ee.—Indian.

Dardus, a dart.

Dare, to transfer property. When this transfer is made in order to discharge a debt, it is datio solvendi animo; when in order to receive an equivalent, to create an obligation, it is datio contrahendi animo; lastly, when made donandi animo, from mere liberality, it is a gift, donatio.—Civil Law.

Dare ad remanentiam, to give away in fee, or for ever.

Darogah, the chief native officer at a police custom or excise station.—Indian.

Darraign [fr. derationio, Med. Lat.; desrenner, Fr.], to clear a legal account, to answer an accusation, to settle a controversy.

Darrein, a corruption of the Fr. dernier, the last.

Darrein presentment, assize of, lay only where a man had an advowson by descent from his ancestors; it is abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36.

Data, grounds whereon to proceed; facts from which to draw a conclusion.

Date [fr. datum, Lat.], that part of a deed, writing, or letter which expresses the day of the month and year in which it was made. Dates began to be inserted in deeds in the reigns of Edward II. & III. A deed, however, is good, although it mentions no date, or has a false or impossible date, provided the real date of its delivery can be proved.

Dative or Datif, that which may be given or disposed of at will and pleasure.

Datum, a first principle, a thing given.

Daughter-in-law [nurus, Lat.], the wife of one's son.

Daum, Dam, a copper coin, the 40th part of a rupee.—Indian.

Dauphin, the title of the eldest sons of the kings of France. Disused since 1830.

Day [fr. dies, Lat.; tag, Germ.], in its largest sense the time of a whole apparent revolution of the sun round the earth, but, in its popular acceptation, that part of the twenty-four hours when it is light, or the space of time between the rising and the setting of the sun. By the Roman Calendar the day commenced at midnight; and most European nations reckon in the same manner.

In the space of a day all the twenty-four hours are usually reckoned. Therefore, in general, if I am bound to pay money on any certain day, I discharge the obligation if I pay it before twelve o'clock at night; after which the following day commences.

If anything is to be done within a certain time of, from, or after the doing or occurrence of something else, the day on which the first act or occurrence takes place is to be excluded from the computation.—Williams v. Burgess, 12 A. & E. 635. See further HOLIDAY and FRACTION OF A DAY.

Day in banc, was the return day of writs.

Day-book, a tradesman's journal; a book in which all the occurrences of the day are set down.

Day-rule, or Day-writ, a permission granted to a prisoner to go out of prison, for the purpose of transacting his business, as to hear a case in which he is concerned at the assizes, etc. Abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22, s. 12.

Days of Grace. See GRACE, DAYS OF.

Day-were of land [fr. diurnalis, diuturna, Lat.], as much arable land as would be ploughed up in one day's work.

Dayeria, a dairy.—Cowel.

Daysman, an arbitrator, an elected judge.

Deacon [fr. diacre, Fr.; diacono, It., Span., and Port.; diaconus, Lat.; διάκονος, Gk.], a minister or servant in the church, whose office is to assist the priest in divine service, and the distribution of the sacrament, etc. He may now perform any of the divine offices which a priest may, except only pronouncing the absolution and consecrating the sacrament of the Lord's Supper. By 13 Eliz. c. 12, and 44 Geo. III. c. 43, it is provided (conformably to the canons) that none shall be ordained deacon under twenty-three years, nor priest under twenty-four years of age; though as to deacons the Archbishop of Canterbury has the privilege of admitting them (by faculty or dispensation) at an earlier age. By 24 Geo. III. c. 35, the Bishop of London, or other bishop by him appointed, may ordain aliens to exercise the office of deacon or priest out of the dominions of the Crown, without the oath of allegiance. A deacon is not capable of any ecclesiastical promotion; yet he may be chaplain to a family, curate to a beneficed clergyman, or lecturer to a parish church. See further under the title CLERGY, and see Phill. Eccl. Law.

(2) A lay office among dissenters.

Dead bodies. See CORPSE.

Dead freight, the unsupplied part of a cargo, or the freight payable by a merchant where he has not shipped a full cargo for the part not shipped.

Dead man's part, the remainder of an intestate's moveables, besides that which of right belongs to his wife and children. This was formerly made use of in masses for the soul of the deceased; subsequently, the administrators applied it to their own use and benefit, until the 1 Jac. II. c. 17 subjected it to distribution amongst the next of kin. In Scotland the 'dead's part' of a man's personality is that part of which he is entitled to dispose by will.

Dead pledge [mortuum vadium], a mortgage of lands or goods.

Dead Rent. A rent payable on a mining lease in addition to a royalty, so called because it is payable although the mine may not be worked.

Deadly feud, a profession of irreconcilable hatred till a person is revenged even by the death of his enemy.

Dead use, a future use.

Deaf and dumb, A man that is born deaf, dumb, and blind, is looked upon by the law as in the same state with an idiot he being supposed incapable of any understanding (1 Bl. 304). Nevertheless, a deaf and dumb person may be tried for felony if the prisoner can be made to understand by means of signs (1 Leach, C. L. 102). As to when he is a competent witness, see Tayl. on Evld. s. 1248.

Deafforested, or Disafforested, discharged from being a forest, or freed and exempted from the forest-laws.—17 Car. I. c. 16.

De ambitu, of obtaining a place by bribery.

Dean [fr. δέκα, Gk., ten], an ecclesiastical governor or dignitary, so called, as he is supposed to have originally presided over ten canons or prebendaries at the least. In cathedrals of the old foundation in England, the dean is the principal of the four chief dignitaries, exercising a general supervision over the other members of the capitular body, with special reference to the cure of souls. In cathedrals of the new foundation, the duties of the deans are defined by the statutes of each chapter.

Considered in respect of the differences of office, deans are of six kinds:—(1) Deans of Chapters, who are either of cathedral or collegiate churches. (2) Deans of Peculiars, who have sometimes both jurisdiction and cure of souls, and sometimes jurisdiction only. (3) Rural Deans, deputies of the bishop, planted all round his diocese, the better to inspect the conduct of the parochial clergy, to inquire into and report dilapidations, and to examine the candidates for confirmation; and armed, in minuter matters, with an inferior degree of judicial and coercive authority. (4) Deans in the Colleges of our Universities, who are officers appointed to superintend the behaviour of the members, and to enforce discipline. (5) Honorary Deans, as the Dean of the Chapel Royal, St. James's. (6) Deans of Provinces or Deans of Bishops. Thus the Bishop of London is Dean of the Province of Canterbury, and to him, as such, the archbishop sends his mandate for summoning the bishops of his province when a convocation is to be assembled.

Another division, arising from the nature of their office, is into deans of spiritual promotions, and deans of lay promotions. Of the former kind are deans of peculiars, with cure of souls, deans of the royal chapels and of chapters, and rural deans; of the latter kind are deans of peculiars without cure of souls, who therefore may be, and frequently are, persons not in holy orders.

Their appointments are either elective, as deans of chapters of the old foundation, though the Crown has, in fact, the real patronage; and donative, as those deans of chapters of the new foundation, who are appointed by the royal letters patent. The 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113, provides that the old deaneries (except in Wales) shall thenceforth be in the direct patronage of Her Majesty, who may, on the vacancy thereof, appoint by letters patent a spiritual person to be dean; and that no person shall hereafter be capable of receiving the appointment of dean, archdeacon, or canon, until he shall have been six complete years in priest's orders, and that the dean shall reside for at least eight months in the year.

By 37 & 38 Vict. c. 63, provision is made for the re-arrangement of the boundaries of Archdeaconries and rural deaneries. The 35 & 36 Vict. c. 8, provides for the resignation of deans.

Dean of the Arches, the lay judge of the Court of Arches. See ARCHES, and PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT.

Dean, Forest of. As to the royal mines therein, see 1 & 2 Vict. c. 43, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 40.

De arbitracione factâ, Writ of, issued when an action was brought for a cause already settled by arbitration.

Death [Sax.], the extinction of life; the departure of the soul from the body; defined by physicians as a total stoppage of the circulation of the blood, and a cessation of the animal and vital functions consequent thereon, such as respiration, pulsation, etc.

In legal contemplation, it is of two kinds: (1) natural, i.e., the extinction of life; (2) civil, where a person is not actually dead, but is adjudged so by the law, as when a person is banished or abjures the realm, or enters into a monastery. Civil death also occurs where a man, by act of parliament or judgment of law, is attainted of treason or felony; for immediately upon such attainder he loses (subject indeed to some exceptions) his civil rights and capacities, and becomes, as it were, civilitur mortuus. But now, by the 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, forfeiture for treason or felony has been abolished, but the person convicted is disqualified for offices, etc.

As to the registration of a death, see 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 86, and 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 22; and as to an action brought for damages arising from death by accident, neglect, etc., see 9 & 10 Vict. c. 93. See ABATEMENT, PRESUMPTION OF SURVIVORSHIP.

Deathbed or Dying Declarations are constantly admitted in evidence. The principle of this exception to the general rule is founded partly on the awful situation of the dying person, which is considered to be as powerful over his conscience as the obligation of an oath, and partly on a supposed absence of interest in a person on the verge of the next world, which dispenses with the necessity of cross-examination. But before such declarations can be admitted in evidence against a prisoner, it must be satisfactorily proved that the deceased, at the time of making them, was conscious of his danger, and had given up all hope of recovery, and this may be collected from the nature and circumstances of the case, although the declarant did not express such an apprehension. It is not essential that the party should apprehend immediate dissolution; it is sufficient if he apprehend it to be impending. See Taylor on Evid., s. 644 et seq. The Act 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35, ss. 6, 7, makes provision for taking the depositions of persons dangerously ill, and making the same evidence after death, and for prisoners being present at the taking of such depositions. By the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 108, provision is made for the depositions of witnesses being received in evidence after their death.

As the declarations of a dying man are admitted on a supposition that in his awful situation, on the confines of a future world, he had no motive to misrepresent, but, on the contrary, the strongest motive to speak without disguise and without malice, it necessarily follows that the party against whom they are produced in evidence may enter into the particulars of his state of mind, and of his behaviour in his last moments, or may be allowed to show that the deceased was one not likely to be impressed by a religious sense of his approaching dissolution.—Phil. Evid.; Starkie's Evid.; Taylor on Evidence.

Deathsmán, executioner, hangman; he that executes the extreme penalty of the law.

De bene esse [Lat., conditionally], to accept or allow a thing to be well done for the present; but when it comes to be more fully examined or tried, to stand or fall according to the merit of the thing in its own nature.

There was an examination in Chancery which must not be confounded with a suit to perpetuate testimony, its purpose being to examine witnesses de bene esse, i.e., conditionally before issue joined. It was resorted to for the purpose of aiding a plaintiff or a defendant in a suit actually pending, in order to take the testimony of witnesses who were aged, infirm, or about to leave the country, so as to prevent its being lost to the litigant. At common law, by 1 Wm. IV. c. 22, s. 4, the evidence of witnesses might in like manner be taken before the trial; but s. 10 provided that such evidence should not be read at the trial without the consent of the opposite party, unless it should appear to the satisfaction of the judge that the witness was beyond the jurisdiction of the court, or dead, or unable from permanent sickness, or other permanent infirmity, to attend the trial. Now by the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XXXVII., r. 4, the court or a judge may, in any cause or matter where it shall appear necessary for the purposes of justice, make any order for the examination upon oath before any officer of the court, or any other person or persons, and at any place, of any witness or person, and may order any deposition so taken to be filed in the court, and may empower any party to any such cause or matter to give such deposition in evidence therein on such terms, if any, as the court or a judge may direct.

Debenture [fr. debeo, Lat., to owe], a deed-poll, charging certain property with the repayment at a time fixed of money lent by a person therein named at a given interest. It is frequently resorted to by public companies to raise money for the prosecution of their undertakings. The period fixed for repayment is usually 3, 5, or 7 years, and the amount borrowed of each creditor is usually 50*l.* or 100*l.* or 500*l.*, or some other amount divisible by ten.

The terminability and fixity in amount of debentures, being inconvenient to lenders, has led to their being superseded in many cases by debenture stock, which is frequently irredeemable, and usually transferable in any amounts.

The issue of debenture stock in the case of companies incorporated by act of parliament is regulated either by their special acts, or by the 'Companies Clauses Act, 1863' (26 & 27 Vict. c. 118), which provides that the same shall be a prior charge, and the interest a primary charge, and contains provisions for the enforcement of payment of arrears by the appointment of a receiver.

Also, a term used at the custom house for a kind of certificate, signed by the officers of the customs, which entitles a merchant exporting goods to the receipt of a bounty or drawback. See 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 52.

Debentures may now be issued charged on land in Ireland, by permission of the Landed Estates Court.

See also 28 & 29 Vict. c. 78, and MORTGAGE.

Asto Debentures by County authorities, see Local Loans Act, 1875.

Debet esse finis litium. Jenk. Cent. 61.—(There ought to be an end of law suits.)

Debet et detinet (he oweth and detaineth).

An action shall be always in the debet et detinet, when he who makes a bargain or contract, or lends money to another, or he to whom a bond is made, brings the action against him who is bounden, or party to the contract and bargain, or unto the lending of the money, etc., as by the obligee against the obligor. But if it be brought by or against an executor for a debt due to or from the testator, this, not being his own debt, must be sued for in the detinet only.—New. N. B. 119.

Debet et solet. If a person sue to recover any right, whereof his ancestor was disseised by the tenant of his ancestor, the he uses the word debet alone in his writ, because his ancestor only was disseised, and the estate discontinued; but if he sue for any thing that is now first of all denied him, the he uses debet et solet, by reason his ancestor before him, and he himself usually enjoyed the thing sued for, until the present refusal of the tenant.—Reg. Orig. 140; F. N. B. 98.

Debet quis juri subjacere, ubi delinquit. Inst. 34.—(Everyone ought to be amenable to the law of the place where he commits an offence.)

Debile fundamentum fallit opus. 3 Co 231.—(A bad foundation ruins the work.)

Debit, the left-hand page of a ledger, to which all items are carried that are charged to an account.

Debita sequuntur personam debitoris (Debts follow the person of the debtor.)

Debitor non presumitur donare. Jur. Civ.—(A debtor is not presumed to give.)

Debitorum pactionibus creditorum petitio nec tolli nec minui potest. Broom's Leg. Max.—(The rights of creditors can neither be taken away nor diminished by agreements among the debtors.)

Debitum et contractus sunt nullius loci. 7 Co. 3.—(Debt and contract are of no place.)

Debitum in presenti, solvendum in futuro. (A debt due at present to be paid at a future time.)

Debitum recuperatum. (A debt recovered.)

De bonis non, of the goods of a deceased person not administered. See EXECUTORS.

De bonis propriis, of a person's own goods.

De bonis testatoris, of a testator's goods.

De bono et malo, Writs of. It was anciently the course to issue special writs of gaol delivery for each particular prisoner, which were called writs de bono et malo; but these being found inconvenient or oppressive, a general commission for all the prisoners has long been established in their stead.—4 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 315.

Debt [fr. debitum, Lat.; dette, Fr.], a sum of money due from one person to another. An action of debt lay where a person claimed the recovery of a liquidated or certain sum of money affirmed to be due to him; and it was generally founded on some contract alleged to have taken place between the parties, or on some matter of fact from which the law would imply a contract between them. This was debt in the debet, which was the principal and only common form. There is another species mentioned in the books, called debt in the detinet, which lay for the specific recovery of goods, under a contract to deliver them.—1 Ch. Pl. 109. An action of debt as a technical term is now obsolete. See PLEADING.

The order of the payment of debts and expenses out of legal assets in an ordinary administration action in the Chancery Division of the High Court (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34), is as follows:—

1st. Funeral expenses, which, in the case of an insolvent estate, must be strictly reasonable and necessary only, the executor or administrator being personally liable for any excessive expenditure.

What is a strictly reasonable and necessary sum varies with the circumstances of each particular estate, and the price of the requisite articles at the particular place.

2nd. Testamentary expenses about the probate of the will, or the letters of administration in intestacy.

3rd. The costs of the creditor's suit.

4th. Crown-debts by record and specialty.

5th. Debts which have priority by statute, e.g., money due to a parish from an overseer of the poor, by virtue of his office (17 Geo. II. c. 38, s. 3).

6th. Judgments according to their priority of time.

7th. Recognizances enrolled in a court of record.

8th. Debts as well by special contract, as by simple contract.

Prior to the passing of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 46, special contract debts, as by bonds, covenants, and other instruments under seal, took priority over debts by simple contract; but this act abolished that distinction as to priority.

By the Judicature Act, 1875, s. 10, repealing the Act of 1873, s. 25 (1), it is provided that 'in the administration of the insolvent estate of a deceased person, and in the winding up of an insolvent company the same rule shall prevail 'as to the rights of secured and unsecured creditors, and as to debts and liabilities provable, and as to the valuation of annuities and future and contingent liabilities respectively, as may be in force for the time being under the Law of Bankruptcy with respect to the estates of persons adjudged bankrupt.'

As to what debts are proveable in Bankruptcy, see 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 31.

As to attachment of debts, see that title.

Debts are now assignable at law, if the assignment is absolute, and in writing, where express notice of the assignment is given to the debtor, trustee, or other person from whom the assignor would have been entitled to claim such debt (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 25 (6)). See CHOSSES.

Debtee-Executor. If a person indebted to another make his creditor or debtee his executor, or if such creditor obtain letters of administration to his debtor, he may retain sufficient to pay himself before any other creditors whose debts are of equal degree.—Plowd. 543.

To secure the general body of creditors when the estate is insufficient, a creditor to whom administration is granted may be compelled to give a bond conditioned to pay pro rata each creditor according to his degree.

Debtor, he that owes something to another. See CREDITOR and BANKRUPT.

Debtor-Executor. At law, if a testator appoints his debtor executor, the debt is released. In equity, however, the executor is accountable for the amount of his debt, as assets of the testator.

Debtor Summons. By the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 7, it is provided that a debtor's summons may be granted by the Court of Bankruptcy on a creditor proving to its satisfaction that a debt sufficient to support a petition in bankruptcy (see BANKRUPTCY) is due to him from the person against whom the summons is sought, and that the creditor has failed to obtain payment of his debt, after using reasonable efforts to do so. The summons shall state that, in the event of the debtor failing to pay the sum specified in the summons, or to compound for the same to the satisfaction of the creditor, a petition may be presented against him, praying that he may be adjudged a bankrupt (See ACT OF BANKRUPTCY). Upon the hearing the court may either dismiss the summons, or, upon security being given, stay proceedings until the trial of the question relating to such debt.

Debtors' Act, 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 62).—This act abolishes imprisonment for debt except in case of default of payment of penalties, default by trustees or solicitors, and certain other cases (see s. 4), and provides for committal of debtors in default of payment of judgment debts which the debtor can but will not pay, and in certain other cases (s. 5). It also provides for the punishment of fraudulent debtors. The Debtors' Act, 1878, 41 & 42 Vict. c. 54, gives a judicial discretion in the case of default by trustees or solicitors. As to Ireland see 35 & 36 Vict. c. 57.

Decalogue [fr. δεκάλογος, Gk.], the ten commandments given by God to Moses. The Jews called them the ten words, hence the name.

De cætero, henceforth.

Decanal, pertaining to a deanery.

Decanus, a dean.

Decapitation, the act of beheading.

Decedent, a deceased person.

Deceit [fr. deceptio, Lat.], fraud, cheat, craft, or collusion used to deceive and defraud another.

There was formerly a writ of deceit, which was an action brought in the Common Pleas, to reverse a judgment obtained in any real action, by fraud or collusion between the parties to the prejudice of the right of a third person. It was abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36.

By the civil law every person is bound to warrant a thing that he sells or conveys, although there be no express warranty; but the common law binds him not, unless there be a warranty, either express or by implication of law; for caveat emptor.—1 Inst. 10, n, a.

An action on the case, in nature of deceit, may be maintained for the breach of an implied warranty, as if a merchant sell cloth to another (who has not seen it, and who relies on the merchant's skill), knowing it to be badly fulled; although there be not any express warranty, yet an action on the case in nature of deceit will lie against him, because it is a warranty in law. In cases of this kind, however, which are grounded merely on the deceit, it is essentially necessary that the knowledge of the party, or, as it is technically termed, the scienter, should be averred, and also proved.

Decem tales (ten such). If, when a trial at bar is called on, a sufficient number of jurors do not attend, the trial must be adjourned, and a decem or octo tales, according to the number deficient, awarded, as at common law; for the 6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 37, which allows the tales de circumstantibus, is expressly confined to trials at Nisi Prius and the assizes.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac.

Decennary, a town or tithing, consisting originally of ten families of freeholders. Ten tithings composed a hundred.—1 Bl. Com. 114.

Decet tamen principem servare leges, quibus ipse servatus est. (It behoves indeed the prince to keep the laws by which he himself is preserved.)

Decies tantum, a writ which lay against a juror, who had taken money of either party for giving his verdict, to recover ten times as much as the sum taken.—38 Edw. III. c. 12, repealed by 6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 62.

Decimation. The punishing every tenth soldier by lot for mutiny or other failure of duty was termed decimatio legionis by the Romans. Sometimes only the twentieth man was punished (vicesimatio), or the hundredth (centesimatio); also tithing or tenth part.

Decimæ, tenths or tithes. See TITHES.

Decimæ debentur parochio. (Tithes are due to the parish priest.)

Decimæ de decimatis solvi non debent.

Tithes are not to be paid from that which is given for tithes.)

Decimæ de jure divino et canonica institutione pertinent ad personam. Dal. 50.—(Tithes belong to the parson by divine right and canonical institution.)

Decimæ non debent solvi, ubi non est annua renovatio; et ex annuatis renovantibus simul semel. Cro. Jac. 42.—(Tithes ought not to be paid where there is not an annual renovation, and from annual renovations once only.)

Deciners, Decenniers, or Doziners, such as were wont to have the oversight of the Friburghs or views of frankpledge for the maintenance of the public peace. The limit and compass of their jurisdiction was called decenna, because it commonly consisted of ten households; as every person, bound for himself and his neighbours to keep the peace, was styled decennier.—Bract. l. 3, t. 2, c. xv.

Decision, a judgment.

Decisive oath [sacramentum decisionis, Lat.], in the Civil Law, where one of the parties to a suit, not being able to prove his charge, offered to refer the decision of the cause to the oath of his adversary; which the adversary was bound to accept, or tender the same proposal back again, otherwise the whole was taken as confessed by him.—Cod. 4, l. 12.

Declarant, a person who makes a declaration.

Declaration, a proclamation or affirmation, open expression or publication.

In law, it was a statement on the plaintiff's part of his cause of action. It followed after service of the writ of summons. The plaintiff must have declared in a personal action, before the end of the term next after the defendant's appearance, otherwise a judgment of non pros. might be signed by the defendant. But if no such non pros. were obtained then he might declare at any time within a year next after the appearance of the defendant, unless otherwise ordered by the Court or a judge; but if he did not declare within that period, he would be deemed out of court.

Declarations are no longer used in actions, but in their place is substituted a statement of claim (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XIX., rr. 1, 2). See STATEMENT OF CLAIM.

Declaration in lieu of oath. By 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 62, 'the Statutory Declarations Act, 1835,' for the abolition of unnecessary oaths, any justice of the peace, notary public, or other officer authorized to administer an oath, is empowered to take voluntary declarations in the form specified in the act; and any person wilfully making such declaration false in any material particular is guilty of a misdemeanour. See AFFIRMATION.

Declaration of insolvency. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 134, s. 72, it was provided, 'If any debtor, whether a trader or not, shall file in the office of the chief registrar, or with the registrar of a District Court of Bankruptcy, or of a County Court having jurisdiction in bankruptcy, a declaration in writing and signed by such debtor and attested by a registrar of the Court or by an attorney or solicitor, that he is unable to meet his engagements, every such debtor shall be deemed thereby to have committed an act of bankruptcy at the time of filing such declaration, provided a petition for adjudication of bankruptcy shall be filed for or against him within two months from the filing of such declaration.' This enactment is now superseded by a similar provision in the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 6, which, however, extends the period within which the petition for adjudication may be presented from two to six months: See also Gen. Rules under Act of 1869, r. 16.

Declaration of Paris, a state paper agreed upon at the conclusion of the Crimean war, by the representatives of Great Britain, France, Austria, Russia, Sardinia, and Turkey (Feb. 26, 1856), in which the following agreements on maritime law were come to:—

Privateering is abolished.

The neutral flag covers enemy's goods save contraband of war.

Neutral goods save contraband of war are not liable to capture under enemy's flag.

Blockades to be binding must be real.—(See also LETTERS OF MARQUE and PAPER BLOCKADES.)

Declaration of right. See BILL OF RIGHTS.

Declaration of title, an act for obtaining a, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 67. This act, after reciting that it is expedient to enable persons having interest in land, to obtain a judicial declaration of their title to the same, so as to enable them to make an indefeasible title to persons claiming under them, as purchasers, for a valuable consideration, enacts: That every person claiming to be entitled to, or to have a power of disposing of, for his own benefit, land (not of copyhold or customary tenure) for an estate of fee-simple in possession absolutely or subject to incumbrances, estates, etc., or entitled to apply for the registration of an indefeasible title, under the Transfer of Land Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 53), may petition the Court of Chancery (now the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice,—see Judicature Act, 1873, s. 34 (2), for a declaration of title.

This act, which was little used, is still in force, although further and new provisions, also little used, for the declaration of title to land, and the registration of titles, are now made by the Land Transfer Act, 1875, as to which see LAND TRANSFER.

For title conferred by the Landed Estates Court in Ireland, see 28 & 29 Vict. c. 88, and LANDED ESTATES COURT (IRELAND).

Declaration of trust. To prevent the inconvenience which arose from parol declarations and secret transfers of uses, the 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 7, requires that all declarations or creations of trusts or confidences of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, shall be manifested and proved by some writing signed by the party who is by law enabled to declare such trust, or by his last will in writing. By the eighth section, where any conveyance shall be made of any lands or tenements, by which a trust or confidence shall arise or result by implication of law, or be transferred or extinguished by act or operation of law, such trust or confidence shall be of the like effect as if this statute had not been made. And by the ninth section, all grants and assignments of any trust or confidence shall likewise be in writing, signed by the party granting or assigning the same, or by last will or devise.

It appears that this statute does not extend to the declaration or creation of trusts of mere personalty. But in practice, a parol declaration should never be relied on, for the intention to declare a trust should be irrevocably expressed. There is no form or particular set of words, or mode of expression, prescribed for the purpose of raising a trust. Intention will create a trust, provided the object of the gift, and the gift itself, can be correctly ascertained.—1 Sand. Uses, 344.

Declaration of uses must be in writing.—29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 7.

The conveyances by bargain and sale and covenant to stand seised are in fact nothing more than declarations of uses; for the use being served out of the seisin of the bargainer and covenantor in those conveyances, they merely serve to declare the use to the bargainee and covenantee. But upon such conveyances as transmute the possession, the use may be declared by a deed or writing distinct from the conveyance by which the possession is transferred. It is now universally the practice to declare the use in the same deed immediately after the habendum.—1 Sand. Uses, 219. See APPOINTMENT.

Declarator, an action whereby it is sought to have some right of property, or of status, or other right judicially ascertained and declared.—Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Declarator of property, when the complainant, narrating his right to lands, desires he should be declared sole proprietor, and all others discharged to molest him in any way.—Ibid.

Declarator of trust, is resorted to against a trustee who holds property upon titles ex facie for his own benefit.—Ibid.

Declaratory actions, those wherein the right of the pursuer is craved to be declared ; but nothing claimed to be done by the defender.—Ibid.

Declaratory decree, a binding declaration of right in equity without consequential relief. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, ss. 50, 51.—Sm. Eq. Pr. 173.

Declaratory part of a law, that which clearly defines rights to be observed and wrongs to be eschewed.

Declaratory statutes, those which declare what the common law is and ever has been.

Declinatory plea, a plea of sanctuary, also pleading of benefit of clergy before trial or conviction. Abolished by 6 & 7 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 6.

Decotor, a bankrupt.

Decoity, corrupted from Dakaiti, gang-robbery.—Indian.

Decollation, the act of beheading.

De consuetudinibus et servitiis, a real writ to recover rent in arrear. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

De contumace capiendo. A writ issued out of the Court of Chancery for the commitment of a person pronounced by an ecclesiastical court to be contumacious and guilty of contempt. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

De corpore comitatûs (from the body of the county).

Decoy [probably from kooy, Du., a cage], a place made for catching wild water-fowl. As to the rights of an owner of such a place, see 11 Mod. 74.

Decree [decretum, Lat.], an edict, a law. The term was also used for the judgment of a Court of Equity. (See 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110.) But now, by the Judicature Acts, 1873 & 1875, the expression judgment, which was formerly used only in Courts of Common Law, is adopted in reference to the decisions of all Divisions of the Supreme Court ; and (Act of 1873, s. 100) includes decree. SEE JUDGMENT, and consult Sexton on Decrees.

Decree nisi, the order made by the Court for divorce, on satisfactory proof being given in support of a petition, for dissolution of marriage ; it remains imperfect for at least six months (which period may be shortened by the Court down to three), and then, unless sufficient cause be shown, it is made absolute on motion, and the dissolution takes effect, subject to appeal. See Pritchard on Divorce ; Browne on Divorce ; Chitty's Statutes, vol. iv., tit. Matrimonial Causes.

Decreet arbitral, the award of an arbitrator.—Scotch phrase.

Decreet cognitionis causâ, when a creditor brings his action against the heir of his debtor in order to constitute the debt against him and attach the lands, and the heir appears and renounces the succession, the Court then pronounces a decree cognitionis causâ.—Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Decreet of exoneration, discharging trustees, executors, factors, tutors, and others.—Ib.

Decreet of locality, dividing and proportioning among the heritors, a stipend modified to a minister.—Ib.

Decreet of modification, that which modifies a stipend to a minister, but does not divide or apportion it among the heritors.—Ib.

Decreet of valuation of teinds, a sentence of the Court of Sessions (who are now in the place of the Commissioners for the Valuation of Teinds) determining the extent and value of teinds.—Ib.

Decreta, judicial sentences given by the emperor as supreme judge.—Roman Law.

Decreta conciliorum non ligant reges nostros. Mo. 906.—(The decrees of councils bind not our kings.)

Decretal order, a chancery order in the nature of a decree. See DECREE.

Decretals, a volume of the canon law, forming the second part, so called as containing the decrees of sundry Popes ; or a digest of the canons of all the councils that pertained to one matter under one head.

Decretum est sententia lata super legem. (A decree is a sentence made upon the law.)

Decrowning, the act of depriving of a crown.

Decuriae, to bring into order.

Dedbana, an actual homicide or manslaughter.

Dedi et concessi (I have given and granted), the operative words in grants, etc. The word 'give' or the word 'grant' in a deed, executed after the 1st day of October, 1845, shall not imply any covenant in law in respect of any tenements or hereditaments, except so far as the word 'give' or the word 'grant' may, by force of any act of parliament, imply a covenant.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 4.

Dedicate, to make a private way public by acts evincing an intention to do so.

Dedication, the act of dedicating a highway.

Dedication-day [festum dedicationis, Lat.], the feast of dedication of churches, or rather the feast day of the saint and patron of a church, which was celebrated not only by the inhabitants of the place, but by those of all the neighbouring villages who usually came thither ; and such assemblies were allowed as lawful. It was usual for the people to feast and to drink on those days.—Cowel.

De die in diem (from day to day.)

Dedimus potestatem (we have given the power), a writ or commission to one or more private persons for the speeding of some act appertaining to a judge, or a Court. It is granted most commonly upon suggestion that the party who is to do something before a judge, or in Court, is so weak that he cannot travel.

On renewing the commission of the peace there issues a writ of dedimus potestatem out of Chancery, directed to some justice, to take the oath of him who is newly inserted.

Formerly the judges would not suffer litigants to appoint attorneys in any action or suit without this writ; but it has since been provided by statute, that the plaintiff or defendant may appoint attorneys without such process.

Dedition, the act of yielding up anything; surrendry.

De donis, Statute (13 Ed. I. c. 1), called also the Statute of Westminster the second. See TAIL.

Deed [fr. daed, Sax.; dêd, gadêd, Goth.; daed, Dut.], a formal document on paper or parchment duly signed, sealed, and delivered. It is either an indenture (factum inter partes) needing no actual indentation (8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 5), made between two or more persons in different interests, or a deed-poll (charta de una parte) made by a single person or by two or more persons having similar interests.

The requisites of a deed are these:—

(1) Sufficient parties and a proper subject of assurance.

(2) The deed must not rest on an illegal consideration; and to hold good against creditors it must rest on a valuable consideration.

(3) It must be written, engrossed, printed, or lithographed, or partly written or engrossed, and partly printed or lithographed in any character or in any language, on paper, vellum, or parchment, since these materials best unite the two qualities of durability and difficulty of concealing alteration or erasure.

(4) The language employed should be sufficient in point of law, intelligible without punctuation, and clear without the aid of stops or parentheses.

The several species of deeds are the following:—

(I.) Those which wholly operate by virtue of the Common Law, subdivided into

(a) Primary or original, which create or divide estates, being

- (1) Feoffment.
- (2) Bargain and sale improper.
- (3) Gift.
- (4) Grant.
- (5) Bill of sale.
- (6) Lease.
- (7) Exchange.
- (8) Partition.

(b) Secondary or derivative, which enlarge, extinguish, delegate the dealing with, or renounce estates already created, being

- (9) Release.
- (10) Confirmation.
- (11) Surrender.
- (12) Assignment.
- (13) Under-lease.
- (14) Power or letter of attorney.
- (15) Defeazance.
- (16) Disclaimer.

(II.) Those which wholly operate by virtue of the Statute of Uses, as

- (17) Appointment in exercise of a power concerning uses.
- (18) Revocation and new appointment.
- (19) Bargain and sale proper.
- (20) Covenant to stand seised.

(III.) Those which operate partly by the Common Law and partly by the Statute Law, as

- (21) Grant to uses.
- (22) Statutory release.
- (23) Feoffment to uses.

(IV.) Those which operate by special custom, as

- (24) Surrender to a lord.
- (25) Admittance of a new tenant.

(V.) Those which operate by matter of record, as

- (26) Private act of parliament.
- (27) Royal grants.
- (28) Vesting orders.

(VI.) Those which charge, discharge, or enlarge, or affect or concern estates, as

- (29) Bond.
- (30) Warrant of attorney and cognovit actionem.
- (31) Debenture.
- (32) Recognizance.
- (33) Deed of covenant.
- (34) Declaration of trust.
- (35) Appointment of new trustees.

Usage has arranged the text of a conveyance inter partes, in a formal and well-understood sequence; and although it is not absolutely necessary that a deed should be drawn in accordance with the generally received formulary, provided it exhibit the intention of the parties, yet it is not advisable to deviate from it unless in a matter of urgent necessity. A properly prepared deed, then, is arranged in the following parts.

(a) Commencement or exordium, date and parties.

The commencement sets forth its style or character. The date follows in indentures and contracts, but is generally placed in the last or peroration-clause in a deed-poll. If there be no date, or an impossible date, the deed takes effect from its actual delivery. The date, however, should always be filled in before execution. The parties are described by their several names, their rank, profession, or calling, and their places of abode, except in the case of a peer. The assumption of any additional name should be stated so as to preserve identity on the face of the title. A mistake will not vitiate the instrument, if the party can be identified by extraneous evidence.—Nihil facit error nominis cum de corpore constat.

Every person who conveys any estate or interest, or enters into a covenant, or is to be bound by the deed, should be made a party to it.

Parties are classified in parts according to their several interests. Persons having joint-interests except in a deed of partition should be of the same part, but those having distinct though undivided interests should be of several successive parts. Those who are to transfer any interest or relinquish any right should come first, and amongst them, those having legal estates before those having equitable only, and the larger interests should precede the lesser. Then consenting parties and covenantors. After these, those who take any estate or interest, and, amongst these, trustees follow real owners. Lastly, those who are inserted to fix them with notice of the deed, as creditors, legatees, trustees, and executors.

When a person acts in two or more capacities, he should be named in distinct parts according to such several capacities.

Husband and wife are generally of the same part except in separation deeds.

The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 5, enacts that under an indenture executed after the 1st day of October, 1845, an immediate estate or interest in any tenements or hereditaments, and the benefit of a condition or covenant respecting any tenements or hereditaments, may be taken, although the taker thereof be not named a party to the same indenture.

Before this statute, however, a person not named in an indenture could and still can take a remainder, or a use, or the benefit of a trust, or any authority by a letter of attorney.

(b) Recitals. These are either narratives of past facts, or a statement of the purpose of the deed. They are not a necessary part of an assurance, yet they frequently become material as an aid to collect the intention of the parties to the instrument, and a key to its construction. Thus a recital may restrain the effects of general phraseology in the operative part of a deed, and although it is not evidence as against strangers, yet it is conclusive as to the facts which it sets forth between the parties to it, and those claiming under them.

(c) Testatum, witnessing, or operative clause, comprehending—

1. The consideration and its receipt. When a deed contains more than one testatum, the whole consideration should generally be stated in the first, unless it can be apportioned amongst the different testata. Nominal considerations are for the most part useless.

2. The name of the grantor. When he is a trustee, it should be stated at whose request he makes the deed, and if any particular mode of execution or attestation be prescribed, it should be set forth. The omission of the grantor's name may be constructively supplied, when the context shows who is intended to be the grantor.

3. The operative verbs of transfer.

4. The name of the grantee, with appropriate words of limitation.

(d) The Parcels, i.e., the description of the property affected, with any savings or exceptions.

There are three points to be attended to in describing the parcels:—(1) That the description be clear and comprehensive; (2) that it be sufficient to identify the property; and (3) that it be so connected with the description in the former deeds as to exhibit an identification of the property throughout the title.

(e) General words with the sweeping clauses.

Prior to the Conveyancing Act, a conveyance in 'general words' enumerated all the particulars intended to pass to the grantee. But s. 6 of that act enacts that a conveyance of land shall operate to convey all 'buildings, erections, fixtures, commons,' etc., etc., and so dispenses with the enumerations of such particulars in the conveyance itself; and s. 63 in like manner dispenses with the 'estate clause' or clause conveying all the estate right, etc., of the conveying parties.

All the parts which have been enumerated are as a whole technically denominated the premises (premissa) or the matters which precede. The premises should name all the parties, as well active as passive, i.e., both grantors and grantees, and set forth with certainty the thing granted, with any exceptions reserved. This word has also a popular sense, meaning the thing granted by the deed.

(f) Habendum, limiting and defining the interest.

This part is a non-essential formality, expressing the extent of the grantee's interest in the thing granted. The grantee should be named, and he would take although not mentioned in the former part of the deed. While nothing can be limited in the habendum which has not been given in the premises, yet it may abridge, qualify, or enlarge the premises, but where they are repugnant, the premises will operate, in preference to the habendum.

There is not any habendum in an appointment under a power, a covenant to stand seised, or a simple declaration of uses, because such deeds themselves fulfil that office by limiting the estate to be created.

(g) Tenendum. This is usually joined with the habendum, but it is unnecessary, since the tenure is never expressed, except upon a sub-grant or lease reserving rent.

Where there is a declaration of uses, the words 'and assigns for ever' are omitted. In annuity-deeds, and money-assignments, the phrase 'To have, hold, receive, and take,' is the common form of habendum.

(h) Declaration of uses in deeds operating by virtue of the Statute of Uses (27 Hen. VIII. c. 10). A person may take an estate under this declaration, although not a party to the deed.

(i) Declaration of trusts, when necessary, is usually combined with the declaration of uses.

(j) Declaration against dower in purchase-deeds succeeds the limitation of the estate.

A purchaser has lately contended that a conveyance in fee must be executed by the grantee, in order that the declaration against dower be effectual, and also that such declaration must follow the language of the Dower Act, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 105, s. 6, which is, 'shall not be entitled to dower'; but the court overruled both points, the first, because purchasers rarely executed conveyances to themselves unless they contained any covenants on their part; the second, because the word 'dowable' which was used, meant substantially the same as 'entitled to dower.'—Fairley v. Tuck (V.-C. K.), 6 W. R. 9 (1857). See Collard v. Roe (V.-C. S.), Id. 348 (1858), as to purchaser's right to the estate of a dower-trustee, when the tenant for life has not any power of appointment.

(k) Reddendum in leases, which reserves something to the grantor out of the estate transferred, such as rent.

The phrase 'yielding and paying' in a lease by indenture executed by the lessee will imply after entry a covenant to pay rent in the absence of one expressed. (Platt on Covenants, 50 et seq. It is generally advisable, except in leases pursuant to statute, to reserve the rent at large, not specifying to whom made, since the rent will be annexed to the reversion and belong to the person for the time being entitled to the latter.

(l) Conditions, conditional limitations, provisos for cesser of interests, clauses of restraint, and for redemption, and special agreements, are generally here inserted, when stipulated for between the parties.

(m) Powers; e.g., a power to lease.

(n) Covenants. The Touchstone (Vol. I., p. 160, c. vii.) describes a covenant to be 'the agreement or consent by two or more by deed in writing, sealed and delivered, whereby either or one of the parties doth promise to the other that something is done already, or shall be done afterwards. And he that makes the covenant is called the covenantor; and he to whom it is made, the covenantee.' Covenants for title; e.g., that the person conveying has a right to convey, are implied by virtue of s. 7 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

(o) The conclusion, peroration, or testimonium, connecting the contents of the deed with its signatures and seals.

All these several parts, then, thus arranged, make up a formally prepared deed.

(5) The deed being engrossed, the next step is its execution, which consists of three acts, viz. :—

(a) Signing (which, perhaps, is not necessary. See Aveline v. Whisson, 4 M. & G. 801).

(b) Sealing, which is a Norman usage, and makes the assurance a specialty. It is, however, but a simple formality. There should be a distinct seal for every signature; and it is so usual to state on the face of the deed, in express terms, that the seal of each person signing is that opposite his signature, that it has been insisted on in some cases that it should be so done before the deed is stamped.

(c) Delivery, which completes the efficacy of the deed, and whence it takes effect, if, as we have already seen, there be a false, or impossible, or no date.

(6) A deed must be read before execution, if any of the parties request it, otherwise it will be void, so far as the requestor is concerned; and a false reading will avoid it so far as it was misread (1 Touch., p. 56). Seeing that the draft of a deed is usually submitted to the legal advisers of the several parties, to be approved of by them on their client's behalf, the request of reading seldom occurs. In strict practice, the engrossment is examined with the draft by the solicitors of the parties before an appointment for its execution is fixed.

(7) The attestation is not essential, unless it be required by a particular statute, or by the express terms of a power. See POWER. In practice, however, every deed is attested, in order to render it more easy of proof. One witness is enough (unless more are expressly required), since it renders the proof less difficult after death (read 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 26). A witness need not see the party execute the deed, for if such party request him to attest his signature after it has been written, and he do so, it will be sufficient.

(8) The endorsed receipt-clause acknowledging the payment of the consideration-money, signed by the recipient, should never be omitted, for although the receipt in the body of the deed is conclusive at law, between the parties themselves, equity regards the endorsed receipt as the effectual discharge, since a future purchaser is not then required, unless he have notice to the contrary, to ascertain whether in fact the money was paid, while its absence is implied or presumptive notice of non-payment, thus charging the lands in equity with its liquidation, and imposing on a future purchaser the necessity of requiring proof of its discharge, or, that wanting, a proper receipt from the person entitled to it (see 3 Prest. on Abstracts, 15), when its wants may be disregarded.

(9) Extrinsic and occasional ceremonies.

These are enrolment in Chancery of grants by the Crown, bargains and sales of freeholds, pursuant to 27 Hen. VIII. c. 16, or under the Land-Tax Acts, gifts of land to charities under 9 Geo. II. c. 36, and disentailing assurances according to 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74; and registration of assurances affecting property in Yorkshire, Middlesex, Kingston-upon-Hull, and the Bedford Levels, and annuity-deeds in the Common Pleas under 18 Vict. c. 15, s. 12.

Whilst enrolment authenticates the transaction by giving a full transcript of the assurance, registration only affords a clue to it, since it generally discloses the date, names of the parties, the parcels, and subscribing witnesses only.

(10) The stamp does not strengthen the efficacy of a deed, but simply renders it admissible in evidence. A deed may be stamped before or after execution. As a general rule, where deeds are to be stamped after execution, a penalty of 10*l.*, together with interest on the ad valorem duty at the rate of five per cent., if over 10*l.*, will be imposed; but the Commissioners of Inland Revenue have power to remit penalties within twelve months from execution of the deed. See Stamp Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 97), s. 16 of which, replacing the Common Law Procedure Act, 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, ss. 22, 31), cures an objection to the production in evidence of an unstamped or deficiently stamped document, by allowing payment to the officer of the court of the amount of stamp duty, and penalty, and also 1*l.* additional penalty.

Though a deed may be good in point of form, as apparently possessing the external and internal circumstances necessary to its validity, yet it may be rendered invalid from many causes, which may be thus classified:—

(I.) Those making it void ab initio, when it can never take effect; as

(a) Where it is wanting in any of the essentials, for it is then absolutely null against all persons.

(b) Where a party has made it under threat, for then it is void as to him.

(II.) Those making it voidable, not being void from its beginning; as

(a) By dissent of parties, for instance the repudiation of an infant or wife's deed, after majority or upon widowhood.

(b) By dissent of strangers, as the grantee of a deed-poll or an indenture not executed by him, disclaiming the estate thereby given to him, or a husband repudiating his wife's purchase.

(III.) Those making it void by something ex post facto; as

(a) By an extra-judicial act, as a rasure or interlineation, or breaking off the seal, with the assent of the parties, or delivering up the deed to be cancelled. The act of a spoliator will not avoid a deed. To prevent any after-dispute, any alteration or interlineation made in a deed before execution should be particularised in the attestation clause. If a freehold estate have already passed by the deed, its cancellation will not divest such estate so as to re-vest it in the original owner; there must be a re-transfer to this effect.

(b) By a judicial act, as where by a decision of a court a deed is declared void (technically called a vacat of the instrument), by reason of fraud, or an illegal consideration, or that it attempts to derogate a prior and superior right.

The rectification or setting aside or cancellation of deeds or other written instruments, formerly part of the jurisdiction of the High Court of Chancery, is continued to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 34.

Deed of covenant. Covenants are frequently entered into by a separate deed, for title, or for the indemnity of a purchaser or mortgagee, or for the production of title-deeds. A covenant with a penalty is sometimes taken for the payment of a debt, instead of a bond with a condition, but the legal remedy is the same in either case.

Deed-poll, a single deed in the form of a manifesto or declaration to all the world of the grantor's act and intention. If there be no recital it usually speaks in the first person, but where recitals are introduced it speaks in the third person.

Deeds of composition. See COMPOSITION.

Deemsters [fr. dema, Sax., a judge or umpire], Judges in the Isle of Man and in Jersey, who, without process or any charge to the parties, decide all controversies in those islands; they are chosen from among the parties themselves.—Cam. Brit.; and 4 Inst. 284. See DEMPSTER.

Deer. As to the right of property in deer, see Davies v. Powell, 7 Mod. 249. The statute 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, contains many provisions as to killing and stealing deer, and otherwise for their protection (ss. 11—16), and see also 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, s. 26.

Deer-fald, a park or fold for deer.

Deer hayes, engines or great nets made of cord to catch deer.—19 Hen. VIII. c. 11.

De essendo quietem de tolonio, a writ which lay for those who were by privilege free from the payment of toll, on their being molested therein.—F. N. B. 226.

De expensis civium et burgensium, an obsolete writ addressed to the sheriff to levy the expenses of every citizen and burgess of parliament.—4 Inst. 46.

De expensis militum, a similar writ to the last, to levy the expenses of the knights of the shire for attendance in parliament.

De facto, in fact, opposed to de jure, of right.

The 11 Hen. VII. c. 1 (A.D. 1494), was made for the protection of all subjects who assist and obey a king de facto.

Defamation, scandalous words spoken concerning another, tending to the injury of his reputation, for which an action on the case for damages would lie; the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 41, abolished the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts in suits for defamation as grievous and oppressive. See LIBEL and SLANDER.

Default, omission of that which a man ought to do; neglect.

When a defendant neglects to take certain steps in an action, which are required by the rules of Court, the Court may thereupon give judgment against him by default. The defendant allows judgment by default either intentionally or through mistake or neglect; intentionally, where he has no merits, or where he does so according to a previous agreement with the plaintiff; through mistake, when he delivers a pleading so defective that it is treated as a nullity; and through neglect, when perhaps he has no merits, but omits to appear, plead, etc., within the time limited by the rules of the court for that purpose. This is an implied confession of the action. See the titles JUDGMENT, APPEARANCE, and PLEADING.

As to what was the effect of default in a cause in Equity, see Consol. Ord. 1860, XXIII., r. 44.

Defaulter, one who makes default.

Defeasible [fr. défaire, Fr., to make void], that which may be annulled or abrogated.

Defeazance [fr. défaire, Fr., to undo], a collateral deed accompanying another, providing that upon the performance of certain matters, an estate or interest created by such other deed shall be defeated and determined. It is of three kinds:—(1) As applicable to freeholds. This is now seldom used, as it is preferable to set forth the conditions in the deed creating the freehold, so as to be complete in itself; (2) as applicable to chattels, real and executory interests, such as covenants, rents, and annuities; and (3) as applicable to bonds, recognizances, and warrants of attorney. The first kind, when it is adopted, must be made at the same time with the assurance to which it relates, and form a part of the same transaction. The second and third kinds may be made either at the time of, or at any time after, the execution of the principal assurance.

A defeazance should recite the deed to be defeated and its date, and must be made between the same parties as are interested in the recited deed or their representatives, and with the same formalities as the deed which created the estate to be defeated; it must be of a thing defeasible, and all the conditions must be strictly performed before the defeazance can be consummated.

So long as it was the law that a condition in a lease not to aliene without license was determined by the first license granted (Dumppor's case, 1 Sm. L. C.), a defeazance was frequently adopted in order to revive the condition, and so virtually to limit the license to the particular assignment; but the 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, provides that where any license to do any act which without such license would create a forfeiture, or give a right to re-enter, under a condition in lease, shall be given to any lessee or his assigns, every such license shall, unless otherwise expressed, extend only to the permission actually given, etc.

Defectum, challenge propter. See CHALLENGE.

Defectus sanguinis, failure of issue.

Defence [fr. defensio, Lat.], popularly a justification, protection, or guard: in law, a denial by the defendant of the truth or validity of the plaintiff's complaint.

At Common Law, a defendant, after a plaintiff had declared, must have either demurred or pleaded, if he meant to maintain his defence.

In Equity, the matters of defence which might be relied on were in their nature susceptible of two divisions, viz.: (1) into those which were dilatory, which merely delayed or suspended, or obstructed the suit without touching the merits, until the impediment or obstacle insisted on was removed: and (2) into those which were peremptory and permanent, and went to the entire merits of the suit.

The modes of defence were four, viz.: (1) by demurrer, by which the defendant demanded the judgment of the Court, whether he should be compelled to answer the bill or not; (2) by plea, whereby he showed some cause why the suit should be dismissed, delayed, or barred; (3) by answer, which, controverting the case stated by the bill, confessed and avoided it; or traversed and denied the material allegations in the bill, or admitting the case made by the bill, submitted to the judgment of the Court upon it; or relied upon a new case, or upon new matter stated in the answer, or upon both; (4) by disclaimer, which sought at once a determination of a suit, by the defendant's disowning all right and interest in the matter sought by the bill. All or any of these modes of defence might be joined.—Story's Eq. Plead. 345.

The modes of defence in civil matters are now completely governed by the rules in the Schedule to the Judicature Act, 1875. There are two modes: (1) by statement of defence, which may be a denial of the plaintiff's right, or may be an allegation of a set-off or counterclaim by the defendant which will cover wholly or in part the claim of the plaintiff (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XIX., rr. 2, 3, and Ord. XXII.); or (2) by demurrer (Ibid., Ord. XXVIII.), which seeks to defeat the plaintiff's claim by showing that the facts alleged on his behalf do not show any cause of action to which effect can be given by the Court as against the defendant so demurring. See STATEMENT OF DEFENCE. DEMURRER.

Where the plaintiff's claim is for a liquidated sum only, he may specially indorse his writ, and in such case leave must be obtained to defend (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. III., r. 7; Ord. XIV.)

In Criminal matters, when a prisoner is brought to the bar and arraigned, he either confesses the charge, stands mute of malice, or does not answer directly to the charge, which may be entered as a plea of not guilty, or pleads to the jurisdiction, or in abatement, or demurs, or pleads specially in bar, or generally, that he is not guilty. In addition to these several modes of defence, there were formerly what were called declinatory pleas—the plea of sanctuary and the plea of clergy—both now abolished.

The defence in Ecclesiastical Courts may be called the answer, in which the defendant denies, extenuates, or justifies.

The defence of one's self, and the mutual and reciprocal defence of such as stand in the relations of husband and wife, parent and child, master and servant, is a right which belongs to every person. If a man, or one standing in any of these relations to him, be forcibly attacked in his person or property, it is lawful for him to repel force by force; and the breach of the peace which happens is chargeable upon him only who began the affray. Self-defence, therefore, is justly called the primary law of nature, and it is not, neither can it be, in fact, taken away by the law of society. In the English law it is held an excuse for breaches of the peace, nay even for homicide itself; but care must be taken that the resistance does not exceed the bounds of mere defence and prevention; for then the defender would himself become an aggressor.

Defence Acts. These Acts, 5 & 6 Vict. c. 94; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 112; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 89; and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 72, allow compulsory purchases by the Board of Ordnance of land required for the defence of the country, as for the erection of fortifications, etc., and regulate the mode of ascertaining compensation.

Defence, Statement of. See STATEMENT OF DEFENCE.

Defend, to forbid or deny.

Defendant [Def. abbrev.], the person sued in an action, or indicted for a misdemeanour.

Defendant in person. See PLAINTIFF IN PERSON.

Defendamus, a word used in grants and donations, which binds the donor and his heirs to defend the donee, if any one go about to lay any incumbrance on the thing given other than what is contained in the deed of donation.—Bract l. 2, c. xvi.

Defender, Scotch term for defendant.

Defender of the Faith [fidei defensor, Lat.], a peculiar title, belonging to the Sovereign of England, as that of Catholic to the King of Spain, and that of Most Christian to the King of France. These titles were originally given by the Popes of Rome; and that of Defensor Fidei was first conferred in 1521 by Pope Leo. X. on our King Henry VIII. as a reward for writing against Martin Luther. The Pope, on King Henry's suppressing the monasteries, not only sentenced him to be deprived of this title, but to be deposed also from his crown; but in the thirty-fifth year of his reign, this title was confirmed by parliament, and has continued to be used by all succeeding sovereigns to this day.—Encyc. Lond.

Defendere se per corpus suum, to offer duel or combat as a legal trial and appeal. Abolished by 59 Geo. III. s. 46. See BATTEL.

Defendere unicâ manu, to wage law; a denial of an accusation upon oath. See WAGER OF LAW.

Defeneration [fr. de, of, and foenero, Lat., to lend upon usury], the act of lending money on usury.

Defensa, a park or place fenced in for deer.

Defensiva, a lord or earl of the marches, who was the warden and defender of his country.—Cowel.

Defensive allegation, the mode of propounding facts relied upon as a defence by a defendant in the spiritual courts. He is entitled to the plaintiff's answer upon oath, and may thence proceed to proofs as well as his antagonist.—3 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 315.

Defenso. That part of any open field or place that was allotted for corn or hay, and upon which there was no common or feeding, was anciently said to be in defenso: so of any meadow ground that was laid in for hay only. The same term was applied to a wood where part was enclosed or fenced, to secure the growth of the underwood from the injury of cattle.—Cowel.

Defensum, an enclosure of land, any fenced ground.

Deferred Life Annuities, annuities for the life of the purchaser, but not commencing until a date subsequent to the date of buying them, so that if the purchaser die before that date, the purchase money is lost. Granted by the Commissioners for Reduction of the National Debt. See 16 & 17 Vict. c. 45, s. 2.

Deficiente uno sanguine non potest esse hæres. 3 Co. 41.—(One blood being wanting, he cannot be heir.) But see 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, s. 9, and 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, s. 1.

Deficit, something wanting.

De fide et officio judicis non recipitur questio; sed de scientiâ, sive error sit juris aut facti. Bacon.—(A question cannot be admitted as to the good faith and honesty of a judge; but otherwise concerning his knowledge, whether he be mistaken as to the law or the fact.)

It is an ancient rule that a judge of record is not liable to an action for anything done by him in his judicial character. This immunity is given for the public good and the advancement of justice; for it is obvious that to administer law properly, the judge should be free in thought and independent in character. A judge, however, is not excused for neglect of duty or misconduct, or à fortiori for corruption.

Definitive sentence, the final judgment of a spiritual court, in opposition to provisional or interlocutory judgment.

Deforcement, the holding of lands or tenements to which another person has a right; so that this includes as well an abatement, an intrusion, or a disseisin, as any other species of wrong by which he that has a right to a freehold is kept out of possession. It is such a detainer of the freehold from him having the right of property, but not the possession under that right, as falls within none of the injuries of abatement, intrusion, disseisin, or discontinuance.—3 Steph. Com.

Deforceor, or Deforcior, he that overcomes and casts out by force.—Blount.

Deforciant, the person against whom the fictitious action of fine was brought. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

Deforciare, to withhold property from the right owner.

Deforciatio, a distress; a holding of goods for satisfaction of a debt.—Paroch. Antiq. 239.

De frangentibus prisonam, Statute of, 1 Ed. II., st. 2, which enacts that no person shall have judgment of life or member for breaking prison, unless committed for some capital offence.

Defraudation, privation by fraud.

Defunct, one that is deceased; a dead man or woman.—Encyc. Lond.

Degradation, a deprivation of dignity; dismissal from office. An ecclesiastical censure, whereby a clergyman is divested of his holy orders. There are two sorts by the canon law: one, summary, by word only; the other solemn, by stripping the party degraded of those ornaments and rights which are the ensigns of his decree. Degradation is otherwise called deposition, but the canonists have distinguished between these two terms, deeming the former as the greater punishment of the two. There is likewise a degradation of a lord or knight at common law, and also by act of parliament.—13 Car. II. c. 16.

Degradations, a term for waste in the French law.

De gratiâ speciali certâ scientiâ et mero motu, talis clausula non valet in his in quibus præsumitur principem esse ignorantem. 1 Co. 53.—(The clause 'Of our special grace, certain knowledge, and mere motion,' is of no avail in those things in which it is presumed that the prince was ignorant.)

Degree [fr. degré, Fr.; degrat, O. Fr.; gradus, Lat.], a step; the distance between relations; the state or condition of a person, as to be barrister-at-law, or to be a Bachelor or Master of Arts of a University. To be a Queen's Counsel is both an office and a degree.

Degree (question of), a question of degree is used in contradistinction to a question of principle or kind.

De grossis arboribus decimæ non dabuntur, sed de sylvâ ceduâ decimæ dabuntur. 2 R. R. 123.—(Of whole trees, tithes are not given; but of wood cut to be used, tithes are given.)

Dehors [Fr.], foreign to, outside, out of the point in question.

De idiotâ inquirendo, a common law writ to inquire whether a man be an idiot or not. It was tried by a jury of twelve men; and if they found him purus idiota, the profits of his lands and the custody of his person might have been granted by the sovereign to some subject who had interest enough to obtain them. Obsolete.—F. N. B. 232.

Dei judicium, the old Saxon trial by ordeal, so called because it was thought to be an appeal to God for the justice of a cause, and it was believed that the decision was according to the will and pleasure of Divine Providence. See ORDEAL.

De incremento (of increase).

De injuriâ suâ propriâ absque tali causâ (more compendiously called the traverse de injuriâ), a species of traverse by replication in pleading, now obsolete, which varied from the common form, and which, though confined to particular actions, and to a particular stage of the pleadings, was of frequent occurrence. It always tendered issue; but, on the other hand, differed (like many of the general issues) from the common form of a traverse, by denying in general and summary terms, and not in the words of the allegation traversed.

This species of traverse occurred in the replication in actions of trespass, trespass on the case (including a species of assumption), and in the plea in bar in replevin, but was not used in any other stages of the pleadings.

All the advantages of this replication were obtained in every case by joining issue, as provided by the C. L. P. Act, 1852, p. 79. And joinder of issue is still used under the Judicature Act, 1875. (Ord. XIX., rr. 20, 21.)

Deis, or Dais. See DAGUS.

Dejeration [fr. dejero, Lat.], a taking of a solemn oath.

De jure [Lat.] (by right), opposed to de facto. The most striking instance of the recognition by our law of the distinction between things de jure and de facto is found in the statute-book, which entitles the first Act of Parliament passed in the reign of Charles the Second, as of the twelfth year of his reign, the previous years having been spent by him in exile, and the affairs of the kingdom having been conducted by the Protector. See DE FACTO, and 11 Hen. VII. c. 1.

De jure decimarum, originem ducens de jure patronatûs, tunc cognitio spectat ad legem civilem, i.e., communem. Godb. 63.—(With regard to the right of tithes, deducing its origin from the right of the patron, then the cognizance of them belongs to the civil law—that is, the common law.)

De jure judices, de facto juratores, respondent. (The judges answer to the law, the jury to the fact.)

A fundamental rule of the common law, upon which the whole system of pleading was built. 'It is of the greatest consequence,' said Lord Hardwicke, 'to the law of England, and also to the subject, that the power of the judge and jury be kept distinct; that the judge determine the law, and the jury the fact; if ever they come to be confounded, it will prove the confusion and destruction of the law of England.'

Delamere, Forest of. See 19 & 20 Vict. c. 13, and see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 16.

De la plus Belle, Dower, where a wife was endowed with the fairest part of her husband's estate. Being a consequence of the tenure by knight's service, it is virtually abolished by the statute 12 Car. II. c. 24, which converts those tenures into socage.

Delator [Lat.], an accuser, an informer, a sycophant.

Delatura, an accusation, also the reward of an informer.

Del credere [a phrase borrowed from the Italians, equivalent to our word guaranty or warranty, or the Scotch term warrandice], an agreement by which a factor, when he sells goods on credit, for an additional commission (called a del credere commission), guarantees the solvency of the purchaser and his performance of the contract. Such a factor is called a del credere agent. He is a mere surety liable only to his principal in case the purchaser makes default.—Story on Agency, 28; Smith's Merc. Law.

Delectus personæ (the choice of a person). It is an established principle of the common law, that, as a partnership can commence only by the voluntary contract of the parties, so, when it is once formed, no third person can be afterwards introduced into the firm without the concurrence of all the partners who compose the original firm. It is not sufficient to constitute the new relation that one or more of the firm shall have assented to his introduction; for the dissent of a single partner will exclude him, since it would, in effect, otherwise amount to a right of one or more of the partners to change the nature, and terms, and obligations of the original contract, and to take away the delectus personae, which is essential to the constitution of a partnership. So stubborn, indeed, is this rule, that even the executors and other personal representatives of a partner do not, in that capacity, succeed to the state and condition of that partner. The Roman law is direct to the same purpose. It even pressed the rule to a still further extent, and held that a positive stipulation between the partners at the commencement of the partnership, that the heir or personal representative of a partner should succeed him in the partnership, was inoperative and incapable of being enforced. The common law, however, treats such a stipulation as valid and obligatory. This also, according to Pothier, was the doctrine of the old French law; and the modern code of France has expressly adopted it, in opposition to the Roman law. Such also is the law of Scotland.—Story on Partnership, 6.

Delegata potestas non potest delegari. 2 Inst. 597.—(A delegated power cannot be delegated.)

Delegates, the High Court of, formerly the court of appeal from the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts. Abolished, upon the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council being constituted the court of appeal in such cases. See 2 & 3 Will. IV. c. 92; 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 41; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 38.

Delegation, a sending away; a putting into commission; the assignment of a debt to another; the entrusting another with a general power to act for the good of those who depute him.

Delegatus non potest delegare. (A delegate cannot delegate.)

The person to whom an office or a duty is delegated cannot lawfully devolve the duty upon another, unless he be expressly authorised so to do.—Broom's Max., 5th ed., 840.

Delf, a quarry or mine.—31 Eliz. c. 7.

Deliberandum est diu quod statuendum est semel. 12 Co. 74.—(That which is to be resolved once for all, should be long deliberated upon)

Der us debitor est odiosus in lege. (A luxurious debtor is odious in law.) Consult 2 Bulstr. 148. Imprisonment for debt has now, however, been abolished, save only in certain exceptional cases, as to which see IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

Delictum, challenge propter. See CHALLENGE.

Delinquens per iram provocatus puniri debet mitius. 3 Inst. 55.—(A delinquent provoked by anger ought to be punished more mildly.)

Deliverance, second, writ of. The judgment of non pros. in replevin at common law is, that the defendant shall have a return of the goods replevied, and his costs. The plaintiff, however, is not prevented by this judgment from proceeding, for he may sue out the judicial writ of second deliverance, in execution of which the sheriff must again take the goods from the defendant and deliver them to the plaintiff, or the writ will operate in the sheriff's hand as a supersedeas of the writ de retorno habendo, if the latter writ has not as yet been executed. The proceedings upon this writ are the same as in ordinary cases of replevin, and if the defendant have judgment either upon verdict, demurrer, or of non pros., it is for a return irreplevisable, and he shall have a writ de retorno habendo, which being executed, the plaintiff cannot have any further writ of deliverance.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac.

Delivery of a deed, a requisite to a good deed. Deeds take precedence according to the time of their delivery, except in the register districts, where their precedence is according to their time of registration.

The delivery may be effected either by acts or by words, i.e., by doing something and saying nothing, as merely handing it to the grantee or his agent; or by doing nothing and saying something, as 'I deliver this writing as my act and deed,' or language of a similar import; or by doing and saying something.

Delivery is of two kinds:—

(a) Absolute, when the execution perfects the deed, and nothing is left to be done; or

(b) Conditional, which is the handing of the writing to some third person, to be delivered by him as the act and deed of the grantor, when certain specified conditions shall be performed. Until the conditions are performed the instrument is called an escrow, scrowl, or writing.

Delivery of deeds. Where a bill in equity, seeking a discovery of deeds and writings, prayed relief founded on the deeds or writings, of which the discovery was sought; if the relief so prayed were such as might be obtained at law (if the deeds or writings were in the custody of the plaintiff), he must have annexed to his bill an affidavit that they were not in his custody or power, and that he knew not where they were, unless they were in the hands of the defendant; otherwise the bill would have been demurrable.—Story's Eq. Plead. 375. See BILL IN CHANCERY.

Delivery, Writ of. See EXECUTION.

De lunatico inquirendo, writ, a process issued to inquire into the condition of a person's mind. Those Judges (see Jud. Act, 1873, s. 17; Jud. Act, 1875, s. 7) to whom, by special authority from the sovereign, the custody of idiots and lunatics is intrusted, may, upon petition or information, grant a commission in the nature of the writ de lunatico inquirendo (which is analogous to the obsolete de idiotâ inquirendo), to inquire into the party's state of mind. If the party be found non compos, the care of his person, with a suitable allowance for his maintenance, is usually committed to one of his relations or friends, then called his committee.

The practice in lunacy cases has been amended by the Lunacy Regulation Acts, 1853 and 1855, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, and 18 Vict. c. 13, and the General Orders of the 7th November, 1853, promulgated pursuant thereto; and by the 25 & 26 Vict. c. 86. See IDIOTS and LUNATICS.

Dem. E.g., Doe dem. Smith, Doe, on the demise of Smith. See EJECTMENT.

Demand [fr. demando, from mando, Lat., manudare, to hand-give; mander, Fr., at bid], a claim, a challenging, the asking of anything with authority, a calling upon a person for anything due. It is either in deed, written or verbal, as a demand for rent, or an application for payment of a debt; or in law, as an entry on land, distraining for rent, bringing an action.

Demandant, he who is actor or plaintiff in a real action, because he demands lands.—Co. Litt. 127.

Demandress, a female demandant.

Demease, death.

De medietate linguæ (of a moiety of tongue), Jury. The 6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 47, enacted that, on the prayer of any alien indicted for felony or misdemeanour, the sheriff or other proper minister should, by command of the court, return for one-half of the jury a competent number of aliens, if so many there were in the town or place where the trial was had; and if not, then so many aliens as should be found in the same town or place, if any, but by the 33 & 34 Vict. c. 14 (Naturalization Act), s. 5, an alien is no longer entitled to be tried by a jury de medietate linguæ.

Indictments against scholars or privileged persons, belonging to the University of Oxford, were tried by a jury de medietate, half of freeholders and half of matriculated persons, before the High Steward of the University, or his deputy, in pursuance of the charter 7th June, 2 Hen. IV., confirmed by the statute 13 Eliz. c. 29.—2 Reeve, 461.

Demeine, Demain, or Demesne [fr. demaine, Fr.], that part of the lands of a manor which the lord has not granted out in tenancy, but which is reserved for his own use and occupation.

De melioribus damnis, judgment. Where the jury, by mistake, severed the damages between several defendants in an action of trespass, the plaintiff might cure the defect by taking judgment de melioribus damnis against one, and entering a nolle prosequi as to the other.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac., 12th ed.

Demesnial, pertaining to a demesne.

Demidietas, a half or moiety.

De minimis non curat lex. Cro. Eliz. 353.—(The law cares not about very trifling matters.) See Broom's Max., 5th ed., 142.

Demise, a grant by lease; it is applied to an estate either in fee or for term of life or years, but most commonly to the latter; it is used in writs for any estate.—2 Inst. 483.

The operative word 'demise' in a lease implies an absolute covenant on the part of the lessor, or person leasing, for the lessee's quiet enjoyment during the term, which, however, may be, and usually is, qualified by a more limited express covenant.

Also the death of the sovereign, demissio regis vel coronæ, an expression which signifies merely a transfer of property; for when we say the demise of the Crown, we mean only that in consequence of the disunion of the Sovereign's natural body from his body politic, the kingdom is transferred or demised to his successor, and so the royal dignity remains perpetual.—Plowd. 177. See 7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 31, as to continuance of military commissions, and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 51, as to continuance of parliament on demise of the Crown.

Demise and Redemise, mutual leases of the same land, or something out of it. It is properly used upon the grant of a rent-charge, etc.

Demi-official, partly official or authorised.

Demi-vill, a town consisting of five free-men, or frank-pledges.—Spelman.

Democracy [fr. democratie, Fr.; democrazia, Ital.; democracia, Sp.; democratia, Lat.; δημοκρατία, fr. δῆμος, the people, and κρατέω, Gk., to exercise power over], one of the three forms of government; that in which the sovereign power is neither lodged in one man, as in a monarchy, nor in the nobles, as in an oligarchy, but in the collective body of the people.

De molendino de novo erecto non jacet prohibitio. Cro. Jac. 429.—(A prohibition lies not against a newly-erected mill.)

Demonstrative legacy. A legacy of quantity is ordinarily a general legacy; but there are legacies of quantity in the nature of specific legacies, as of so much money, with reference to a particular fund for payment. This kind of legacy is called by the civilians a demonstrative legacy, and it is so far general and differs so much in effect from one properly specific, that if the fund be called in or fail, the legatee will not be deprived of his legacy, but be permitted to receive it out of the general assets; yet the legacy is so far specific that it will not be liable to abate with general legacies upon a deficiency of assets.—2 Wms. Exors.

De morte hominis nulla est cunctatio longa. Co. Litt. 134.—(Concerning the death of a man no delay is long.)

Dempster, the Chief Judge of a Tinwald Court in the Isle of Man. See Scott's Pe-veril of the Peak, c. V. See DEEMSTERS.

Demurrage, a term used in commercial navigation, signifying an allowance made to the owners of a ship by the freighter, for detaining her in port longer than the period agreed upon for her sailing. It is usually stipulated in charter parties and bills of lading, that a certain number of days, called running or working or lay days, shall be allowed for receiving or discharging the cargo, and that the freighter may detain the vessel for a further specified time, or as long as he pleases, on payment of so much per diem for such overtime. When the contract of affreightment expressly stipulates that so many days shall be allowed for discharging or receiving the cargo, and so many more for overtime, such limitation is interpreted as an express stipulation on the part of the freighter that the vessel shall in no event be detained longer, and that if detained he will be liable for demurrage. This holds even in cases where the delay is not occasioned by any fault on the freighter's part, but is inevitable. If, for example, a ship be detained, owing to the crowded state of the port, for a longer time than is allowed by the contract, demurrage is due; and it is no defence to an action for demurrage that it arose from port regulations, or even from the unlawful acts of the custom-house officers. Demurrage is not, however, claimable for a delay occasioned by the hostile detention of the ship, or the hostile occupation of the intended port; nor is it claimable for any delay wilfully occasioned by the master, or owners, or crew of the vessel. The claim for demurrage ceases as soon as the ship is cleared out and ready for sailing, though she should be detained by adverse winds or tempestuous weather.—Maude & Pollock on Shipping, & MacLachlan on Shipping.

Demurrer [fr. demoror, Lat.; or demorrer, Fr., to wait or stay], a pleading which admits the facts as stated in the pleading of the opponent, and referring the law arising thereon to the judgment of the Court, waits until by such judgment the Court decides whether he is bound to answer.

Before the Common Law Procedure Act, the party demurring to a pleading, judgment being given against him on the demurrer, had judgment against him on the whole cause, and this is still the case in criminal trials, whether a prisoner demur to the indictment or information or to the evidence. The prisoner, therefore, should plead to the indictment; and if the issue be found against him, should move in arrest of judgment.

In civil causes any party may demur to any pleading of the opposite party or any part of it setting up a distinct cause of action, or ground of defence, set off, counterclaim, or reply, on the ground that the pleading objected to does not show any matter to which the Court can give effect against the party demurring. A demurrer must state the ground in law on which it is based, and may be struck out by a judge if frivolous. A party cannot plead and demur to the same matter without leave, which may be given in the form of a reservation of leave to plead if the demurrer be overruled. Either party may set down the demurrer for argument, and must give notice thereof the same day. If within ten days the demurrer is not entered, nor leave to amend obtained, the demurrer shall be treated as affirmed on argument, which involves payment of costs. While a demurrer is pending no amendment can be allowed except by order and on payment of the costs of the demurrer. If the demurrer be to the whole statement of claim, the plaintiff must, if it be allowed, pay to the demurring defendant his costs of the action, unless an amendment be allowed, or other order made. When a demurrer is overruled it shall be with costs, unless otherwise ordered. When a demurrer is overruled, leave may be given to plead to the matter demurred to. See Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XXVIII.; and Appendix C., forms 28, 29.

As to Evidence, demurrers have long been almost entirely superseded at Common Law by motions for new trials or bills of exceptions, and in Equity they will probably disappear under the new rule that evidence is ordinarily to be taken viva voce in Court. (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XXXVII., r. 1.)

In criminal prosecutions, a demurrer may be resorted to, when the fact as alleged is allowed to be true, but the defendant takes exception in point of law to the sufficiency of the indictment or information on the face of it, as if he insist that the fact as stated is no felony, treason, or whatever the crime is alleged to be. It is seldom resorted to.—7 Geo. IV. c. 64, ss. 20, 21; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 25; 4 Bl. Com. 333.

Demy-sangué, half-blood.

Den, a valley.—Blount.

Den and Strond, a liberty for ships or vessels to run or come ashore.—Pla. tem. Ed. I.; Cowel.

Dena terræ, a hollow place between two hills; a little portion of woody ground; a coppice.—Cowel.

Denariate, as much land as is worth one penny per annum.

Denarii, a sort of ready money.

Denarii de caritate, customary oblations made to a cathedral church at Pentecost.

Denarii S. Petri (commonly called Peter's pence), an annual payment on St. Peter's feast of a penny from every family to the Pope, during the time that the Roman Catholic religion was established in this kingdom.

Denarius, the chief silver coin among the Romans, worth 8d.; it was the seventh part of a Roman ounce; also an English penny. The denarius was first coined five years before the first Punic war, B.C. 269. In later times a copper coin was called denarius.—Smith's Dict. Antiq.

Denarius Dei, God's penny, or earnest given and received by parties to contract, etc., paid in former times to the church or poor.

Denarius tertius comitatûs, a third part or penny of the county paid to its earl, the other two parts being reserved to the Crown.—Paroch. Antiq. 418.

Denbara or Denber [fr. den, Sax., a vale, and berg, a barrow or hog], a pen for hogs; a swine-court.—Cowel.

Denelage [Dane], the laws which the Danes enacted whilst they had the dominion in England.

Denial. See TRAVERSE.

Denization, the act of enfranchising or making free.

Denizen [fr. donaison, donison, O. Fr., a gift], an alien born, but who has obtained, ex donatione regis, letters patent to make him (either permanently or for a time) an English subject. He is in a kind of middle state between an alien and natural-born subject, and partakes of both of them. He might hold lands by purchase or devise, which an alien might not, but could not take by inheritance; for his parent, through whom he must claim, being an alien, had no heritable blood, and therefore could convey none to his son.—2 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 438; and see Sugden's Concise View, 540. But it is now provided, by the 33 Vict. c. 14, that 'real and personal property of every description may be taken, acquired, held, and disposed of by an alien in the same manner in all respects as by a natural-born British subject, and a title to real and personal property of every description may be derived through, from, or in succession to an alien in the same manner in all respects as through, from, or in succession to a natural-born British subject.' No denizen can be of the Privy Council, or either House of Parliament, or have any office of trust, civil or military.

Denman's (Lord) Act (for the amendment of the law of evidence), 6 & 7 Vict. c. 85; which provides that no person offered as a witness shall thereafter be excluded by reason of incapacity from crime or interest from giving evidence.

Denman's (Mr.) Act (for amendment of procedure in criminal trials), 28 & 29 Vict. c. 18, allowing counsel to sum up the evidence in criminal as in civil trials, provided the prisoner be defended by counsel.

Denominatio fieri debet à dignioribus.—(Denomination should be deduced from the more worthy.)

De nomine proprio non est curandum cum in substantiâ non erretur; quia nomina mutabilia sunt, res autem immobiles. 6 Co. 66.—(As to the proper name, it is not to be regarded where it errs not in substance; because names are changeable, but things immutable.)

De non apparentibus, et non existentibus, eadem est ratio. 5 Rep. 6.—(As to things not apparent, and those not existing, the rule is the same.)

De non residentiâ clerici regis, an ancient writ where a parson was employed in the royal service, etc., to excuse and discharge him of non-residence.—2 Inst. 264.

De novo (afresh; anew).

De nullo, quod est suâ naturâ indivisibile, et divisionem non patitur, nullam partem habebit vidua, sed satisfaciât ei ad valentiam. Co. Litt. 32.—(A widow shall have no part of that which in its own nature is indivisible, and is not susceptible of division; but let the heir satisfy her with an equivalent.)

Denshiring of land (otherwise called burn-beating), a method of improving land by casting parings of earth, turf, and stubble into heaps, which when dried are burned into ashes for a compost.—Cowel.

Dentist. The 21 & 22 Vict. c. 90, s. 48, enables Her Majesty, by charter, to grant to the Royal College of Surgeons of England power to institute examinations, etc., for dentists, and the Dentists Act, 1878, 41 & 42 Vict. c. 33, provides for the registration of dentists, imposes a penalty on unregistered persons using the title of dentist, and disables such persons from recovering fees.

Denumeration, the act of present payment.—Scott.

Deodand [fr. deo dandum, Lat.], a personal chattel which had been the immediate occasion of the death of any reasonable creature, was forfeited to the Crown, to be applied to pious uses, and distributed in alms by the high almoner; but the right to deodands had been for the most part granted out to the lords of manors or other liberties to the perversion of their original design. The law made the following extraordinary distinction, that no deodand was due where an infant under the age of discretion was killed by a fall from a cart, or horse, or the like, not being in motion, whereas if an adult person fell thence, and was killed, the thing was certainly forfeited. In all indictments for homicide, the instrument of death and the value were presented and found by the grand jury (as that the blow was given by a certain bludgeon, value 9d.), that the Crown or the grantee might claim the deodand; for it was no deodand unless it was presented as such by a jury of twelve men.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 99; 1 Bl. Com. 300. It was abolished by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 62.

De odio et atia, an obsolete writ which commanded the sheriff to inquire whether a prisoner charged with murder was committed on general cause of suspicion, or merely propter odium et atiam, for hatred and ill-will, with a view, if the latter were found to be the case, of afterwards issuing another writ to admit him to bail.—1 Reeves, 252.

De onerando pro ratâ portionis, an ancient writ, where a person was distrained for rent, which ought to be paid by others proportionably with him.—F. N. B. 234; New Nat. Br. 586.

Deor hedge, the hedge enclosing a deer park.

Departure [fr. decessus, Lat.], in pleading, when a party deserted the ground that he took in his last antecedent pleading, and resorted to another. It could never take place till the replication, and it occurred more frequently in the rejoinder.

The rule against departure was evidently necessary to prevent the retardation of the issue. For while the parties were respectively confined to the grounds they first took, the process of pleading would exhaust, after a few alternations of statement, the whole facts involved in the cause, and thereby develop the question in dispute. But if a new ground were taken in any part of the series, a new state of facts being introduced, the result was consequently postponed. Besides, if one departure were allowed, the parties might, on the same principal, have shifted their ground as often as they pleased; and an almost indefinite length of altercation might, in some cases, have been the consequence.—3 Steph. Plead., 7th ed., 507 et seq.

By the Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XIX., r. 19, it is ordered that 'no pleading, not being a petition or summons, shall, except by way of amendment, raise any new ground of claim or contain any allegation of fact inconsistent with the previous pleadings of the party pleading the same.'

Depreculation, a robbing of the prince or commonwealth; an embezzling of the public treasure.

Deponent [fr. depono, Lat., to lay down], a person who makes an affidavit; a witness; one who gives his testimony in a court of justice. The person who made an affidavit used formerly to speak of himself throughout the affidavit as the deponent: 'this deponent saith,' etc.; but according to the more modern practice all affidavits must be made in the first person. See title DEPOSITION.

Depopulatio agrorum, destroying and ravaging a country.—3 Inst. 204.

Deportation, transportation, exile into a remote part of the kingdom, with prohibition to change the place of residence; exile, an abjuration, which is a deportation for ever into a foreign land, was anciently with us a civil death.—Ayliffe.

Depose, to lay down; to lodge; to degrade from a throne or high station; to affirm in a deposition.

Deposit, money paid to a person as an earnest or security for the performance of some contract, especially a contract for the sale of real estate. Also a naked bailment of goods to be kept for the bailor without recompense, and to be returned when the bailor shall require it. The appellation and the definition are both derived from the civil law, Depositum est, quod custodiendum alicui datum est. It is, in the civil law, divisible into two kinds: (1) necessary, made upon some sudden emergency, and from some pressing necessity; as, for instance, in case of a fire, a shipwreck, or other overwhelming calamity, when property is confided to any person whom the depositor may meet without proper opportunity for reflection or choice, and thence it is called miserabile depositum; (2) voluntary, which arises from the mere consent and agreement of the parties. The common law has made no such division.

There is another class of deposits, called involuntary, which may be without the assent or even knowledge of the depositor; as lumber, etc., left upon another's land by the subsidence of a flood.

The civilians again divide deposits into simple deposits, made by one or more persons having a common interest, and sequestrations, made by one or more persons, each of whom has a different and adverse interest in controversy touching it; and these last are of two sorts, conventional, or such as are made by the mere agreement of the parties, without any judicial act; and judicial, or such as are made by order of a court in the course of some proceeding.

There is another class of deposits called irregular, as when a person, having a sum of money which he does not think safe in his own hands, confides it to another, who is to return to him, not the same money, but a like sum when he shall demand it. There is also a quasi deposit, as where a person comes lawfully to the possession of another person's property by finding it; and a special deposit of money, or bills in a bank, where the specific money, the very silver or gold coin, or bills deposited, are to be restored, and not an equivalent.—Story on Bailments, tit. 'On Deposits,' chap. ii.

A deposit of title-deeds as a security for the repayment of a borrowed sum of money, constitutes an equitable mortgage. See EQUITABLE MORTGAGE.

Deposit account, an account of sums lodged with a bank not to be drawn upon by cheques, and usually not to be withdrawn except after a fixed notice.

Deposit of wills of living persons at the offices of the Court of Probate. See Probate Court Act, 1857, s. 91.

Depositary, one with whom anything is lodged in trust, as 'depository' is the place where it is put. The obligation on the part of the depositary is, that he keep the thing with reasonable care, and, upon request, restore it to the depositor, or otherwise deliver it, according to the original trust.

Deposition, depriving of a dignity, etc.

2. The act of giving public testimony; technically, the evidence put down in writing by way of answer to interrogatories. It is an incontrovertible rule at common law, that when the witness himself may be produced, his deposition cannot be read, for it is not the best evidence. But it may be read not only where it appears that the witness is actually dead, but in all cases where he is dead for all purposes of evidence: as where diligent search has been made for the witness and he cannot be found, &c.

he resides in a place beyond the jurisdiction of the court; or where he has become lunatic or attainted. See now, however, Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XXXVII., rr. 1, 4; and AFFIDAVIT; DE BENE ESSE; EVIDENCE; PERPETUATE TESTIMONY, BILLS TO. As to deposition in criminal proceedings see 7 Geo. IV. c. 65; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 42; and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35, ss. 6, 7, which makes provision for taking the depositions of persons dangerously ill, and making the same evidence after death, and for persons being present at the taking of such depositions. The Bankruptcy Act, 1869, s. 108, provides for the depositions of witnesses being received in evidence after their death.

Depositor, one who makes a deposit.

De prerogativâ regis, the statute 17 Edward II. st. 1, which enacts, in affirmation of the common law, that the King shall have ward of the lands of natural fools, taking the profits, without waste or destruction, and shall find them necessaries; and after the death of such idiots, he shall render the estate to the heirs. This was in order to prevent such idiots from aliening their lands, and their heirs from being disinherited.

Deprivation, taking away from a clergyman his patronage, vicarage, or other spiritual promotion or dignity, either, first, by sentence declaratory in the proper court for fit and sufficient causes; such as attainder for treason or felony (now obsolete), or conviction of other infamous crime; for heresy, infidelity, gross immorality, and the like, or for farming or trading contrary to law, after two former convictions for the same offence; or, secondly, in pursuance of divers penal statutes, which declare the benefice void, for some nonfeasance or neglect, or else some malfeasance or crime, as for simony; for maintaining any doctrines in derogation of the sovereign's supremacy, or of the Thirty-nine Articles, or of the Book of Common Prayer; for neglecting to read the liturgy and articles in the church, and to declare assent to the same within two months after induction; or for using any other form of prayer than the liturgy of the Church of England; or for continued neglect, after order of the bishop followed by sequestration, to reside on the benefice; in which cases the benefice is ipso facto void, without any formal sentence of deprivation.—2 Steph. Com.

Deputy [fr. député, Fr.; from deputatus, Lat.], one who governs and acts instead of another, or who exercises an office, etc., in another man's right. A deputy cannot be appointed unless the grant of the office authorises such appointment, as where it is to one to execute by deputy, etc. By 3 & 4 Vict. c. 42, every sheriff is directed to appoint a sufficient deputy, having an office within a mile of the Inner Temple Hall, for the receipt of writs, granting warrants thereon, making returns thereto, and accepting all rules and orders made as to the execution of any process or writ directed to the sheriff. Judges cannot act by deputy; but the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50, s. 166, enables recorders to appoint deputies, and county court judges have a like power under the 9 & 10 Vict. c. 95, s. 20, and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 20.

A deputy differs from an assignee, in that an assignee has an interest in the office itself, and does all things in his own name, for whom his grantor shall not answer, except in special cases; but a deputy has not any interest in the office, and is only the shadow of the officer in whose name he acts. A deputy cannot make a deputy.—9 Rep. 49.

Deputy Lieutenant, the deputy of a lord lieutenant of a county. Each lord lieutenant has several deputies.

Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, see 18 & 19 Vict. c. 84.

Deputy Steward, a steward of a manor may deputise or authorise another to hold a court; and the acts done in a court so holden will be as legal as if the court had been holden by the chief steward in person. So an under steward or deputy may authorise another as sub-deputy, pro hac vice, to hold a court for him; such limited authority not being inconsistent with the rule delegatus non potest delegare.

This deputy or under-steward may be appointed either in writing or by parol, although the appointment of the chief steward should not contain an express authority for that purpose.

De quibus sur disseisin, a writ of entry now abolished.

Der [fr. dar, Brit.], water.

Deraign, or Dereyn [fr. derationare, Lat.; deraigner, or deragner, Fr.], to confound, to displace, also to prove.—Glanv. 1, 2, c. iii. Also to justify, or refuse to clear one from an accusation.

De rationabili honorum parte, a writ, anciently given to the wife and children of a man, to recover their reasonable parts of his goods, which he could not bequeath away from them; a custom now utterly abolished, for a man has a full power of disposition over his goods and chattels.

Derelict, a vessel forsaken at sea.

Derelict lands, those suddenly left by the sea, as when the sea shrinks back below the usual water-mark. This use of the word is analogous to the last TITLE.

Derivativa potestas non potest esse major primitiva. Noy; Wing, 66.—(The derivative power cannot be greater than the primitive.)

Derivative conveyances, secondary deeds, which presuppose some other conveyance primary or precedent, and only serve to enlarge, confirm, alter, restrain, restore, or transfer the interest granted by such original conveyance. See DEED.

Derogation, the act of weakening or restraining a former law or contract.

Derogatory clause in a person's will, a sentence or secret character inserted by the testator, of which he reserves the knowledge to himself, with a condition that no will he may make thereafter should be valid, unless this clause be inserted word for word. This is done as a precaution to guard against later wills being extorted by violence, or otherwise improperly obtained. By the law of England such a clause would be void, as tending to make the will irrevocable.

Descender, writ of formedon in, an abolished process.—F. N. B. 21; 1 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 567.

Descent, one of the two chief methods of acquiring an estate in lands. It is the hereditary succession of property vested in a person by the operation of law, i.e., by his right of representation as heir-at-law. It is defined in the interpretation clause of the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, as 'the title to inherit lands by reason of consanguinity, as well where the heir shall be an ancestor or collateral relation as where he shall be a child or other issue.' See CANONS OF INHERITANCE.

Descent cast, the devolving of realty upon the heir on the death of his ancestor intestate. It does not take away or defeat a right of entry or action after 31st December, 1833.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Deserted premises. Landlords are enabled to recover possession of such premises by 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 16; 57 Geo. III. c. 52; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 84, s. 13; and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, ss. 33—4. See further JUDICATURE ACT, 1875, Ord. IX., r. 8, and title EJECTMENT.

Desertion, the criminal offence of abandoning the naval or military service without license. See s. 12 et seq. of the Army Act, 1881, replacing similar sections of the annual Marine Mutiny Acts.

Also (2) an abandonment of a wife, a matrimonial offence, for which the remedy is under the 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 16, by which a sentence of judicial separation may be obtained either by the husband or wife on the ground of desertion, without cause, for two years and upwards; and see s. 21, as to orders for the protection of the property of wives deserted by their husbands.

Designatio justiciariorum est à rege ; jurisdictio vero ordinaria à lege. 4 Inst. 74.—(The appointment of justices is by the King, but their ordinary jurisdiction by the law.)

Designatio personæ, the description of a person or a party to a deed or contract.

Designatio unius est exclusio alterius, et expressum facit cessare tacitum. Co. Litt. 210.—(The specifying of one is the exclusion of another, and that which is expressed makes that which is understood to cease.)

Designs, Copyright in. These productions of genius, whether ornamental or useful, are protected by statute. See COPYRIGHT.

De similibus ad similia eadem ratione procedendum est.—(From like to like we are to proceed by the same rule.)

De similibus idem est judicium. 7 Co. 18.—(In like cases the judgment is the same.)

De son tort (of his own wrong), executor, a stranger who takes upon himself to act as executor. See EXECUTOR DE SON TORT.

Despacheurs, persons appointed to settle cases of average.

Desperate debt, a hopeless debt; an irrecoverable obligation.

Despitus, a contemptible person.

Desponsation, the act of betrothing persons to each other.

Despot [fr. δεσπότης, Gk., a governor, a ruler], an absolute prince: one who governs with unlimited authority. The word in its origin signified the same with the Latin herus, and the English master. The Emperor Alexius, surnamed the Angel, created the dignity of despot, and it made the first after that of emperor, above that of Augustus, Sebastocrator, or Cæsar. The despots were usually the emperor's sons or sons-in-law, and their colleagues or co-partners in the empire, as well as their presumptive heirs. Under the successors of Constantine the Great, the title of Despot of Sparta was given to the emperor's son or brother, who had the city of Sparta, or Lacedæmon, by way of appanage. Despot is at present a title of quality given to the princes of Wallachia, Servia, and some of the neighbouring countries.—Encyc. Lond.

Despotism, absolute power.

Desrenable [Fr.], unreasonable.

Destitute wayfarers, as to relief of, see 11 & 12 Vict. c. 110, ss. 1, 10; and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103, s. 2; and Burns' Justice, 'Poor.'

Destructive insects. See COLORADO BEETLE.

Desuetude, disuse.

Detachiare, to seize or to take into custody another person's goods, etc., by attachment or other process of law.—Cowel.

Detainer, forcible. See FORCIBLE ENTRY.

Detainer, unlawful. The wrongful keeping of a person's goods, although the original taking may have been lawful. As if I detain another's cattle, damage feasant, and before they are impounded he tenders me sufficient amends; now, though the original taking was lawful, my subsequent detention of them, after tender of amends, is not lawful, and he shall have an action of replevin against me to recover them, in which he shall recover damages for the detention, and not for the caption, because the original taking was lawful.—3 Steph. Com.

Detainer, writ of, one of the five forms of process prescribed by the 2 Wm. IV. c. 39, s. 1, for the commencement of a personal action against a person already in the prison of one of the courts. Superseded by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, ss. 1, 2.

A process lodged with the sheriff against a person in his custody was called a detainer; the officer, therefore, always searched the sheriff's office to see if there were any detainers lodged there against a person in his custody, before he discharged him.

De tallagio non concedendo, 34 Edw. I. st. 4. See 2 Reeves, 104.

Determinable freeholds, estates for life, which may determine upon future contingencies before the life for which they are created expires. As if an estate be granted to a woman during her widowhood, or to a man until he be promoted to a benefice; in these and similar cases, whenever the contingency happens—when the widow marries, or when the grantee obtains the benefice—the respective estates are absolutely determined and gone. Yet, while they subsist, they are reckoned estates for life; because they may by possibility last for life, if the contingencies upon which they are to determine do not sooner happen.—2 Bl. Com. 121.

Detinet (he detains), a species of action of debt, which lay for the specific recovery of goods, under a contract to deliver them.—1 Reeves, 159. No longer a technical expression.

Detinue, a personal action at law founded on tort (Bryant v. Herbert, 3 C. P. D. 389). It might be maintained by one who had either an absolute or a special property in goods against another, who was in actual possession, and refused to re-deliver them. The plaintiff sought to recover the goods in specie, or on failure thereof the value, and also damages for the detention. The grounds of the action are: (1) a property in the plaintiff, either absolute or special (at the time of action brought), in personal goods, which are capable of being ascertained; (2) a possession in the defendant by bailment, finding, etc.; (3) an unjust detention on the part of the defendant. As to the actual recovery of a chattel detained, see C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 78; and of goods sold, see 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, s. 2. An action now lies, for detention of goods, in the High Court, the judgment in which is enforceable by writ of delivery (see EXECUTION). As to the effect of default in appearance in such action, see Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XIII., r. 6; as to default in pleading, see Ord. XXIX., r. 4; and as to the deposit in court of money when a lien is claimed, see Ord. LII., r. 6. See also PLEADING.

Detinuit (he detained).

Detractari, to be torn in pieces by horses. —Fleta, l. 1, c. xxxvii.

Detunicari, to discover or lay open to the world. —Matt. Westm. 1240.

Deus solus hæredem facere potest, non homo. Co. Litt. 7.—(God alone, and not man, can make an heir.)

Deuterogamy [fr. δεύτερος, Gk., second, and γάμος, marriage], a second marriage.

Devadiatus, or Divadiatus, an offender without sureties or pledges. —Cowel.

Devastavit (he has wasted), a devastation or waste of the property of a deceased person, by an executor or administrator by extravagance or misapplication of the assets, for which he is liable. —2 Wms. Exors., 7th ed., 1796 et seq.

Devenerunt, an obsolete writ, heretofore directed to the escheator on the death of the heir of the king's tenant, under age and in custody, commanding the escheator that, by the oaths of good and lawful men, he inquire what lands and tenements, by the death of the tenant, came to the king. —Dyer, 860.

De ventre inspiendo, writ, an original process which issued out of Chancery on petition, for the security of the next heir (i.e., verus, not hæres apparens), or on behalf of a tenant-in-tail, or hæres factus as a devisee in fee, in tail, or for life, to guard them against supposititious births. Obsolete.

Devest, or Divest [fr. de and vestis, Lat.], to deprive, to take away; opposite to invest, which is to deliver possession of anything to another.

Devil on the neck, an instrument of torture, formerly used to extort confessions, etc. It was made of several irons, which were fastened to the neck and legs, and wrenched together so as to break the back. —Cowel.

Devisavit vel non, an issue sent from the Court of Chancery to a court of law, to try the validity of a paper asserted to be a will disposing of real estate, to ascertain whether or not the testator did devise, or whether or not that paper was his will. Obsolete.

Devise [fr. deviser, Fr., to sort into parcels], a gift, etc., by a last will and testament. The giver is called the devisor, the person to whom it is given the devisee. This word is properly only applied to real property, but, in wills, it transmits personal property as well as the word bequeath—the proper term; and vice versâ.

Devoire [Law Fr.], a duty; a tax of custom.—34 Ed. III. c. 18.

Devonshiring. See DENSHIRING.

Dewan, Duam, place of assembly; native minister of the revenue department; and chief justice in civil causes, within his jurisdiction; receiver-general of a province. This term is also used to designate the principal revenue servant under a European collector, and even of a Zemindar. By this title the East India Company were receivers-general of the revenues of Bengal under a grant from the Great Mogul.—Indian.

Dewanny, Duannee, the office or jurisdiction of a Dewan.

Dewanny Adawlut, a court for trying revenue and other civil cases.—Indian. The 'Sudder Dewanny Adawlut' (corrupted from Sadr-Divani-Adalat) is the Court of Final Decision for each Presidency in India, from which there is an appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England.

Dextrarius, one at the right hand of another.

Dextras dare, to shake hands in token of friendship; or to give up oneself to the power of another person.—Wals. 332.

Diaconate, the office of a deacon.

Diagnosis (Med.), the discovery of the source of a patient's illness.

Dialectis, that branch of logic which teaches the rules and modes of reasoning.

Diallage [fr. διαλλαγή, Gk., interchange], a rhetorical figure in which arguments are placed in various points of view, and then turned to one point.—Encyc. Lond.

Dialogus de Scaccario. This has generally passed as the work of Gervase of Tilbury; but Mr. Madox thinks it was written by Richard Fitz-Nigel, Bishop of London, who succeeded his father in the office of treasurer, in the reign of Richard I., and was therefore qualified for such an undertaking. This book treats, in the way of dialogue, of the whole establishment of the exchequer, as a court and an office of revenue; giving an exact and satisfactory account of the officers and their duties, with all matters concerning that court, during its highest grandeur, in the reign of Henry II. This is done in a style somewhat superior to the Law-Latinity of those days.—1 Reeves, 220.

Dianatic, a logical reasoning in a progressive manner, proceeding from one subject to another.—Encyc. Lond.

Diarium, daily food, or as much as will suffice for the day.—Du Cange.

Dica [fr. δεκα, Gk., ten], a tally for accounts.

Dicast [fr. δικαστής, Gk.], an officer in ancient Greece answering nearly to a jurymen.

Dice, all games played with dice, except backgammon, are unlawful by 13 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 9.

Dictores, arbitrators.

Dictum, an arbitrament; an award.

Diem clausit extremum, a special writ of extent (see EXTENT), issued in the event of the death of a crown debtor. By this writ the sheriff is commanded to inquire by a jury when and where the crown debtor died, and what chattels, debts, and lands he had at the time of his decease, and to take and seize them into the crown's hands.

Dies amoris (the day of love), the appearance day of the Term on the fourth day, or quarto die post. It was the day given by the favour and indulgence of the court to the defendant for his appearance, when all parties appeared in court, and had their appearance recorded by the proper officer.

Dies cedit, the day begins; dies venit, the day has come. Two expressions in Roman law which signify the vesting or fixing of an interest, and the interest becoming a present one.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 225, 232; and see Ulpian, D. L. 16, 213.

Dies datus, the day of respite given to a defendant.

Dies dominicus non est juridicus. Co. Litt. 35.—(A dominical day, i.e., a Sunday, is not a court day.) See SUNDAY.

Dies fasti, nefasti, et intercali (business days, holidays, and half-holidays).

For the purpose of the administration of justice all days were divided by the Romans into fasti and nefasti. Dies fasti were the days on which the prætor was allowed to administer justice in the public courts; they derived their name from fari (fari tria verba, do, dico, addico, Ovid, Fast i. 45, etc.; Varro, De Ling. Lat. vi. 29, 30, edit. Müller; Macrob. Sat. i. 16). On some of the dies fasti comitia could be held, but not on all.—Cic. pro Sect. 15, with the note of Manutius.

Dies nefasti were days on which neither courts of justice nor comitia were allowed to be held, and which were dedicated to other purposes. According to the ancient legends, they were said to have been fixed by Numa Pompilius, Liv. i. 19. One part of a day might be fastus, while another was nefastus.—Ovid, Fast. i. 50.

Dies inceptus pro completo habetur.—(A day begun is held as complete.)

Dies incertus pro conditione habetur.—(An uncertain day is held as a condition.)

Dies juridicus, a court-day.

Dies marchie, the day of meeting of English and Scotch, which was annually held on the marches or borders to adjust their differences and preserve peace.

Dies non juridicus, not a court-day.

Diet [fr. dies, Lat., an appointed day, Skinner; or diet, an old German word, meaning a multitude, Junius], a deliberative assembly of princes or estates.

II.—Food. The statute of Nottingham, 10 Edw. III. s. 3, relating to excess in diet (de cibariis utendis) was repealed by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 64.

Dieta, a day's journey; a day's work.

Dieu et mon droit (God and my right), the motto of the royal arms, first assumed by Richard I.

Dieu et son acte (the visitation of God), words often used in our law. It is a maxim that the act of God, or inevitable accident, shall prejudice no man, actus Dei nemini facit injuriam.

Diffacere, to destroy.

Difficile est ut unus homo vicem duorum sustineat. 4 Co. 118.—(It is difficult that one man should sustain the place of two.)

Difforciare rectum (to take away or deny justice).

Digama, or Digamy [fr. δυγάμια, Gk.], second marriage; marriage to a second wife after the death of the first; as bigamy in law is having two wives at once.

Digest, generally a compilation or distribution of a subject into various classes or departments; particularly the Pandects of Justinian in fifty books, containing the opinions and writings of eminent lawyers, digested in a systematical method. See PANDECTS.

Dignitary [fr. dignus, Lat., worthy], a clergyman advanced to be a bishop, dean, archdeacon, prebendary, etc. But there are prebendaries without cure or jurisdiction, who are not dignitaries.—3 Inst. 155.

Dignities, a species of incorporeal hereditament, in which a man may have a property or estate. They were originally annexed to the possession of certain estates in land, and created by a grant of those estates; or, at all events, that was the most usual course. And although they are become little more than personal distinctions, they are still classed under the head of real property; and as having relation to land, in theory at least, may be entailed by the crown, within the Statute de Donis; or limited in remainder, to commence after the determination of a preceding estate-tail in the same dignity. See PEOPLE, PRECEDENCE.

Dijudication, judicial distinction.

Dilapidation, decay; a kind of ecclesiastical waste, either voluntary, by pulling down, or, permissive, by suffering the chancel, parsonage house, and other buildings thereunto belonging to decay. An action for dilapidations lies, either in the spiritual court by the canon law, or in the courts of common law, and it may be brought by the successor against the predecessor if living, or if dead, then against his executors; and against an alienee, if it were made over to him to defeat the remedy for dilapidations.—13 Eliz. c. 10; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 108, s. 19. See 3 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 313, 408; as also the Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 43, and 35 & 36 Vict. c. 96).

Dilationes in lege sunt odiosæ. (Delays in law are hateful.)

Dilatory pleas, a class of defence at common law, founded on some matter of fact not connected with the merits of the case, but such as might exist without impeaching the right of action itself. They were either pleas to the jurisdiction, showing that by reason of some matter therein stated, the case was not within the jurisdiction of the court, or pleas in suspension, showing some matter of temporary incapacity to proceed with the suit; or pleas in abatement, showing some matter for abatement or quashing the declaration. These pleas must have been verified by affidavit or otherwise, and pleaded within four days from delivery of declaration.—4 Anne c. 16. They were in general not allowable after a plea in bar. All dilatory pleas, including those in suspension, as well as pleas to the jurisdiction, have been sometimes inaccurately classed as pleas in abatement.—Steph. Plead. 50. Pleas in Abatement are now abolished by the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XIX., r. 13. See ABATEMENT.

All declinatory and dilatory pleas in equity were, if not pleas in abatement, at least in the nature of pleas in abatement; and, therefore, in general, the objections founded thereon must have been taken, ante litem contestatam by plea, and were not available by way of answer or at the hearing. And it has been said that pleas of these kinds might be successively pleaded, one after another, in their proper order; that is to say, first, declinatory pleas; secondly, dilatory pleas; and thirdly, pleas in bar. For it has been said, that though no man shall be permitted to plead two dilatories at separate times, nor several bars, because he may plead them all at once, yet, after a plea to the jurisdiction, he may be admitted to plead in bar, because it is consistent with those pleas to plead in bar at the same time.—Story's Eq. Plead. 549.

For pleas either at Common Law or in Equity, a STATEMENT OF DEFENCE has now been substituted; see that title.

In criminal cases, a plea in abatement or dilatory plea, is founded on some matter of fact extraneous to the indictment, tending to show that it is defective in point of form; and has principally occurred in the case of a misnomer, i.e., a wrong name or a false addition to the defendant. But see the powers of amendment given to the judges by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, ss. 1, 2, 25.

Diligence, care, of which there are infinite shades, from the slightest momentary thought to the most vigilant anxiety; but the law recognises only three degrees of diligence:—(1) Common or ordinary, which men, in general, exert in respect of their own concerns; the standard is necessarily variable with respect to the facts, although it may be uniform with respect to the principle. (2) High or great, which is extraordinary diligence, or that which very prudent persons take of their own concerns. (3) Low or slight, which is that which persons, of less than common prudence, or indeed of no prudence at all, take of their own concerns.

The Civil Law is in perfect conformity with the Common Law. It lays down three degrees of diligence, ordinary (diligentia), extraordinary (exactissima diligentia), slight (levissima diligentia).—Story on Bailments, 19. See NEGLIGENCE.

Diligiatus [fr. de lege ejectus, Lat.], outlawed.

Dilligrout, pottage formerly made for the king's table on the coronation day. There was a tenure in serjeantry, by which lands were held of the king by the service of finding this pottage at that solemnity.—39 Hen. III.

Dimetæ, the ancient Latin name of the people who inhabited Carmarthenshire, Pembrokeshire, and Cardiganshire.

Dimidiatas, the moiety or half of a thing.

Diminution, the act of making less, opposed to augmentation. In proceedings for reversal of judgment, if the whole record be not certified, or not truly certified by the inferior court, the party injured thereby, in both civil and criminal cases, may allege a diminution of the record, and cause it to be rectified.

Dimissory letters. Where a candidate for holy orders has a title in one diocese, and is to be ordained in another, the proper diocesan sends his letter dimissory directed to some other ordained bishop, giving leave that the bearer may be ordained, and have such a cure within his district.—Cowel.

Dinarchy [fr. δύς, Gk., and ἀρχή, dominion], a government of two persons.

Diocesan, belonging to a diocese; a bishop, as he stands related to his own clergy or flock.

Diocesan courts, the consistorial courts of each diocese, exercising general jurisdiction of all matters arising locally within their respective limits, with the exception of places subject to peculiar jurisdiction: deciding all matters of spiritual discipline—suspending or depriving clergymen—and administering the other branches of the ecclesiastical law.—2 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 672.

Diocese, or Diocess [fr. diocese, Fr.; diocesi, Ital. and Span.; διοίκησις, fr. διοικέω, to govern, Gk.; diœcesis, Lat.], the circuit of every bishop's jurisdiction; it is divided into archdeaconries, each archdeaconry into rural deaneries, and rural deaneries into parishes.—Co. Litt. 94. The 37 & 38 Vict. c. 63, was passed for facilitating the re-arrangement of the boundaries of archdeaconries and rural deaneries.

Diocichia, the district over which a bishop exercised his spiritual functions.

Diploma [fr. διπλόω, Gk., to fold double, consisting of two leaves], a royal charter or prince's letters patent. An instrument given by colleges and societies, on commencement of any degrees. A license for a clergyman to exercise the ministerial function, or a physician, etc., to practise his art.

Diplomacy, the conducting of negotiations between nations by means of ambassadors, envoys, and the like, or by correspondence. Persons holding diplomatic pensions under 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 116, may be elected members of the House of Commons.—22 & 23 Vict. c. 5. The Act 32 & 33 Vict. c. 43, provides for the payment of diplomatic salaries, allowances, and pensions.

Diplomatics (should not be confounded with diplomacy), the art of judging of ancient charters, public documents, or diplomas, etc., and discriminating the true from the false.

Direct, an epithet for the line of ascendants and descendants in genealogical succession, opposed to collateral. Collateral relationship, is relationship though another branch, as cousins, etc.

Direct (v.a.), of a judge, to give the rule of law to a jury. See Jud. Act, 1875, s. 22.

Direct evidence, opposed to circumstantial evidence. See that title.

Direction (n. s.), the rule of law in a case given to a jury. See DIRECT.

Director, a superintendent; one who has the general management of a scheme, design, or speculation.

Directors, persons appointed or elected according to law, authorized to manage and direct the affairs of a corporation or company. The whole of the directors collectively form the board of directors. Their powers, if their company be incorporated by act of parliament, are derived from their special acts and ss. 90—100 of the Companies Clauses Act, 1845; if their company be incorporated under the Companies Act, 1862, by 'articles of association,' as to which see s. 14 and Table A of that act. They may receive a salary, but may make no personal profit from their company, being trustees; but they are under no personal liability except for fraud, as to which see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 81 et seq.

Directors of convict prisons. See 13 & 14 Vict. c. 39; 20 & 21 Vict. c. 3.

Directory statute. The term directory, when applied to a statute (or part of a statute) which enjoins or forbids the doing of certain acts, is used in two different senses:—

(I.) As opposed to declaratory, i.e., a statute which merely declares what the common law is.—1 Bl. Com. 54 & 86.

(II.) As opposed to imperative. When a statute directs that an act should be done in a specific manner, or authorizes it upon certain conditions, if a strict compliance with its provisions is not essential to the validity of the act, it is said to be directory, although the performance might be enforced by mandamus, but if such compliance is essential, it is said to be imperative. See per Lord Mansfield, in R. v. Loxdale, 1 Burr. 477; Dwarris on Statutes, 606.

Diriment impediments, absolute bars to marriage, which would make it null ab initio.

Disability, incapacity to do any legal act. It is divided into two classes: (1) absolute, which, while it continues, wholly disables the person; such were outlawry, excommunication, attainder (but see the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 23, s. 1, abolishing attainder on conviction for treason or felony); (2) partial, as infancy, coverture, lunacy, and drunkenness. As to which see the various titles relating thereto. The compulsory purchase, by railway and other companies, of the lands of parties under disability is regulated by the Lands Clauses Acts.

Disabling statutes, acts of parliament, restraining and regulating the exercise of a right or the power of alienation; the term is specially applied to 1 Eliz. c. 19 and similar acts restraining the power of ecclesiastical corporations to make leases.

Disadvocate, to deny a thing.

Disafforest, to throw open; to reduce from the privileges of a forest to the state of common ground.

Disagreement, the refusal by a grantee lessee, etc., to accept an estate, lease, etc., made to him; the annulling of a thing that had essence before. No estate can be vested in a person against his will, consequently no one can become a grantee, etc., without his agreement: the law implies such an agreement until the contrary is shown, but his disagreement renders the grant, etc., inoperative. If an infant purchase an estate, he may, on coming to full age, disagree thereto; and if he do not agree thereto, his heirs, after his death, may waive it. If a person of unsound mind purchase an estate, he cannot afterwards disagree thereto himself; but if he does not recover, or after recovery dies without agreement, his heir may disagree to it. If a femme covert purchase an estate, her husband may disagree thereto; and if he neither agrees nor disagrees, the purchase is good during the coverture, but after his death, notwithstanding his agreement, the wife may disagree thereto, and so after her death may her heirs, if she does not herself agree thereto. Persons who purchase an estate under duress may disagree thereto when the duress ceases.—See Co. Litt. 2 b, 3 a, 380 b; 3 Preston's Abstracts, 104; Vin Abr. 'Disagreement.

Disalt, to disable a person.—Litt.

Disappropriation. See APPROPRIATION.

Disbarring, expelling a barrister from the bar, a power vested in the benches of each of the four Inns of Court, subject to an appeal to the fifteen judges.

Disboscatio, a turning wooded ground into arable or pasture.

Discarcare, to unlade a ship.—Cowel.

Disceit. See DECEIT.

Discent. See DESCENT.

Discharge (v. a.), to relieve of a duty. A sheriff is said to be discharged of his prisoner; a prisoner discharged from custody; a jury discharged from the cause. See next title.

Discharge (v. a.), a rule nisi is discharged when the Court decides that it shall not be made absolute, i.e., that the party who obtained the rule nisi shall take nothing, and the suit remain in statu quo. See RULE.

Discharge of a jury, takes place (1) either by the act of God, as the death of one of the jury; or (2) in due course on the termination of the trial by verdict (or sentence); or by the discretion of the judge determining that they are so exhausted as to be incapable of continuing their deliberations, or so divided as to be unable ever to agree, or that there is other sufficient cause. After such discharge there may be a further trial by another jury. See R. v. Winsor, L. R., 1 Q. B. 289, 390.

Discharge, Order of. See ORDER OF DISCHARGE.

Discharged Prisoners Aid Act, 25 & 26

Vict. c. 44, amended by 28 & 29 Vict. c. 126, ss. 41—3, 73.

Disclaimer, a renunciation, or a denial by a tenant of his landlord's title, either by refusing to pay rent, denying any obligation to pay, or by setting up a title in himself or a third person, and this is a distinct ground of forfeiture of the lease or other tenancy, whether of land or tithe. See Vivian v. Moat, 16 Ch. D. 730.

A devisee in fee may, by deed, without matter of record, disclaim the estate devised, and after such disclaimer has no interest in the estate.

An executor may, before probate, 'disclaim,' or, as it is more commonly called, 'renounce' the executorship, and the executor of an executor may, before probate of the will of his own testator, disclaim to be the executor of the first testator, but he cannot so disclaim after he has proved the will of his own testator; for he thereby becomes his complete executor, and consequently the executor of the first testator. When an executor is, by the will, appointed trustee of any portion of the testator's personal effects, he cannot, after probate, disclaim the trusts: but where the executor is by the will made trustee of real estate devised to him alone, or to him and other persons in trust, it is considered doubtful whether even after probate he may not disclaim the office of trustee of the real estate.—Watkin's Conv. 438.

A trustee who has not accepted may disclaim, but a conveyance by him of the trust-estate to a co-trustee would amount to an acceptance of the trusts. An estate of freehold may be disclaimed as well by deed as by matter of record, and even by conduct; but a deed is the best evidence of disclaimer.—1 Sanders' Uses, 426; 2 Hayes's Introd. 72. The word 'disclaim' is introduced in the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, s. 77, to obviate a question whether a married woman may disclaim.—7 Cru. Dig. App. 12.

A trustee in bankruptcy may disclaim an onerous lease or contract under s. 23 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869.

It was also a mode of defence in equity where the defendant renounced all claim to the subject of the demand made by the plaintiff's bill. But it could seldom be put in without an answer; for if the defendant had been made a party by mistake, having had an interest which he might have parted with, the plaintiff might require an answer sufficient to ascertain whether that was the fact or not; and if, in truth, it was so, an answer seemed necessary to enable the plaintiff to make the proper person a party, instead of the defendant disclaiming. A mere disclaimer, therefore, was scarcely to be deemed sufficient or proper, except where the bill simply alleged that the defendant claimed an interest in the property in dispute, without more; for under such circumstances, if he claimed no interest, that was a sufficient answer to the allegation.—Story's Eq. Plead., 642.

As to disclaimer of patent, see 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 83, s. 1; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 69, ss. 5, 6; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 83, s. 39; and 2 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 34.

Disclosure. Every solicitor whose name is on a writ must on demand in writing by the defendant, declare whether the writ was issued with his privity, and if he declare it was not so issued, all proceedings on it will be stayed, unless by leave (Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. VII., r. 1).

When a writ is sued out by partners in the name of their firm, they or their solicitor may be compelled to disclose the names and residences of the various partners (Ibid., r. 2).

Discontinuance, an interruption or breaking off. This happened when he who had an estate-tail made a larger estate of the land than by law he was entitled to do; in which case the estate was good, so far as his power extended to make it, but no further.—Finch L. 190; 1 Rep. 44. The learning relative to discontinuances has now become of no account, as far as future transactions are concerned, not merely in consequence of the abolition of fines, but by the effect of the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, which provides (s. 39) that no discontinuance shall thereafter avail to take away the right of entry.

Discontinuance in an action in the Supreme Court is governed by the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XXIII.

Discontinuare nihil aliud significat quam intermittere, desuescere interrumpere. Co. Litt. 325.—(To discontinue signifies nothing else than to intermit, to disuse, to interrupt.)

Discount [fr. dis and conté, Fr.], abatement; a sum of money deducted from a debt in consideration of its payment before the stipulated time. The creditor, by receiving his money before it is due, is able to put it out at interest during the interval, and he should therefore only receive such a sum as if put out at interest would produce the amount of the debt when it would become due. It is usually said to be of two kinds; viz., discount of bills, and discount of goods; but they are essentially the same. The rule for calculating discount on correct principles is as follows:—

As the amount of 100*l.*, together with interest on it at the given rate for the given time,

So is 100*l.* to the present worth; or

So is the interest of 100*l.* for the given time, to the discount of the given sum.—McCull. Com. Dict.

The usual method of allowing discount, by deducting from the amount of the debt the interest which it would produce at the given rate during the given time, is inaccurate. The true discount for any given sum, for any given time, is such a sum as would, if put out at interest in that time, amount to the interest of the sum to be discounted; the proper discount, therefore, to be received for the immediate advance of 100*l.* at 5 per cent., due twelve months hence, is not 5*l.*, but 4*l.* 15*s.* 2½*d.*, for this sum will, at the end of the year, amount to 5*l.*, which is what the 100*l.* would have produced.

Discover, a widow; a woman unmarried; one not within the bonds of matrimony.

Discovery, revealing or disclosing a matter. The Courts of Common Law were originally unable to compel a litigant to disclose any fact resting merely within his knowledge, or discover any document in his power, which would aid in the enforcement of a right, the repelling of an unjust demand, or the redress of a wrong; an infirmity which the equity judges cured, by compelling such a party to disclose the fact, or discover the document, upon his oath, in his answer to a bill of complaint, filed by the opposite party, called a bill of discovery, which was an original bill.

The late V. C. Wigram, in his work, entitled 'Points in the Law of Discovery,' epitomised the two cardinal principles on this subject in the two following propositions:—

(1) It is the right, as a general rule, of a plaintiff in equity to exact from the defendant a discovery upon oath as to all matters of fact which, being well pleaded in the bill, are material to the plaintiff's case about to come on for trial, and which the defendant does not by his form of pleading admit.

(2) The right of a plaintiff in equity to the benefit of the defendant's oath is limited to a discovery of such material facts as relate to the 'plaintiff's case,' and does not extend to a discovery of the manner in which the 'defendant's case' is to be exclusively established, or to evidence which relates exclusively to his case.

As to the grounds on which discovery might be obtained by bill in equity, see further Wigram on Discovery, and Daniel Ch. Pr., 5th ed., 1408.

The Common Law Courts obtained a power of discovery by Statutes 14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 6, and C. L. P. Act, 1854, 17 & 18 Vict.

By the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XXXI., it is provided that any party may, without filing any affidavit, apply to a judge for an order directing any other party to the action to make discovery on oath of the documents which are or have been in his possession or power, relating to any matter in question in the action (r. 12). The affidavit to be made by a party against whom such order as is mentioned in the last preceding rule has been made, shall specify which, if any, of the documents therein mentioned he objects to produce, and it may be in the Form No. 9 in Appendix B. to the Act, with such variations as circumstances may require (r. 13). Any party failing to comply with an order for discovery shall be liable to attachment, and dismissal of his suit, or striking out of his defence (r. 20). For further details of the practice on this head, the whole of the rules in Ord. XXXI. should be consulted. As to discovery by means of interrogatories, see INTERROGATORIES; INSPECTION.

The circumstances which justified the defendant in Equity in resisting the discovery sought by the bill were these :

The defendant might file a demurrer to the bill, when it disclosed a defect or informality, on these grounds :—

(1) That the case made by the bill was not such as Equity assumed a jurisdiction over to compel a discovery ; since it disclosed :

(a) Proceedings not of a purely civil nature, but of a criminal character.

(b) Proceedings not in controversy in any Court, but only before arbitrators.

(c) Proceedings depending in a Court, having the power to compel the discovery sought ; or

(d) Proceedings against public policy, or barred by a statute of limitations.

(2) That the discovery was in aid of a non-sustainable action.

(3) That the bill omitted to state whether the action was commenced, or intended so to be.

(4) That the discovery was wholly or partially immaterial.

(5) That the bill was filed by or against persons not being parties to the action to be aided.

(6) That the defendant had no interest in the controversy, but was simply a disinterested witness.

(7) That there was a want of that privity which alone entitled the plaintiff to the discovery sought from the defendant.

(8) That the discovery sought would disclose the defendant's title ; and this was a conclusive objection, since to sift the titles of others, from curiosity or malice, cannot be endured, as it would tend to shake the general security of property, 'by which method all purchases might be blown up.'

(9) That the discovery might perhaps expose the defendant to a criminal charge, ecclesiastical censure, penalty, or forfeiture, or compel him to self-crimination.

(10) That the discovery sought the disclosure of facts confided to the defendant in his character of counsel, attorney, solicitor, or arbitrator.

(11) That the defendant had equal equity with the plaintiff, and was, therefore, entitled to be protected from a discovery which might endanger, disturb, or delay his present rights, as a purchaser for value without notice of the plaintiff's claim.

(12) That the discovery was sought of official governmental communications or state documents.

The Legislature, seeing how many transactions are effected by the parties alone, no other persons being present, and, therefore, no disinterested testimony relating to it being producible, has very properly exploded the unreasonable maxim, nemo testis esse debet in propria causa, which frequently amounted to a positive denial of justice, and has enacted, that the parties to an action at law shall be 'competent and compellable to give evidence on the trial of such action'—thus admitting litigants to give evidence, the credibility of which is to be decided by a jury.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 99, s. 2, amended by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 83 ; and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, as to the husbands and wives of the parties giving testimony with certain exceptions.

Discredit (v. a.), to show to be unworthy of credit. See HOSTILE WITNESS. As to discrediting a witness, see C. L. P. Act, 1854, ss. 22—25, and (as to criminal cases) 28 & 29 Vict. c. 18, s. 3.

Discretion (judicial). See JUDICIAL DISCRETION.

Discussion. By the Roman law sureties were not primarily liable to pay the debt for which they became bound as sureties ; but were liable only after the creditor had sought payment from the principal debtor, and he had failed to pay. This was called the benefit or right of discussion. Under those systems of jurisprudence which adopt the Roman law, and under the present law of France, the rule is similar ; and the obligation contracted by the surety with the creditor is, that the latter shall not proceed against him until he has first discussed the principal debtor, if he is solvent. This right the surety enjoys, as the beneficium ordinis vel excussionis. And, again, if other persons are joined with him in the obligation as sureties, he is not in the first instance to be proceeded against for the whole debt, but only for his share of it, if his co-sureties and co-obligees are solvent. This is commonly known as the benefit of division, or beneficium divisionis. If the suit should be brought in a different country from that where the contract or obligation is made, the right of discussion or division would still belong to the surety, as an incident to his contract, although it did not exist by the law of the place where the suit was brought (lex fori). The converse proposition would be equally true. The same rule as to the lex loci contractus applies to the lien of a vendor upon a real estate sold for the payment of the purchase money, according to the law of England; the lien given for the purchase money upon goods or merchandise sold, by the civil law and by the law of some modern countries; the right to stoppage in transitu of the vendor of goods, in case of the insolvency of the purchaser in the course of the transit; the lien of the holder of a bottomry bond on the thing pledged; the lien of mariners on the ship for their wages; the priority of payment in rem, which the law sometimes attaches to peculiar debts or to particular persons. In these and like cases, where the lien or privilege is created by the lex loci contractus, it will generally, although not universally, be respected and enforced in all places where the property is found or where the right can be beneficially enforced by the lex fori. On the other hand, where the lien or privilege does not exist in the place of the contract, it will not be allowed in another country, although the local law, where the suit is brought, would otherwise sustain it.—Story's Conf. of Laws, 456.

Disease among Cattle. See CATTLE.

Diseases Prevention Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 116; amended by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 77; and replaced, except as to the metropolis, by the Public Health Act, 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, s. 120 et seq. See also CONTAGIOUS DISEASES.

Disenfranchise. See DISFRANCHISEMENT.

Disentailing deed, an enrolled assurance barring an entail, pursuant to 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

Disforest. See DISAFFOREST.

Disfranchisement, the act of depriving of a franchise, immunity, or privilege.

Disgavel, to exempt from the rules of the tenure of gavelkind.

Disgrading, the act of degrading.

Disherison, the act of debarring from inheritance.

Disheritor, one who puts another out of his inheritance.

Dishonour, to refuse or neglect to accept or pay when duly presented for payment a bill of exchange or promissory note, or draft on a banker. See Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 61, s. 47.

Disincarcerate, to set at liberty, to free from prison.

Disinherison. See DISHERISON.

Disme [fr. decime, Lat.], a tenth, the tenth part, tithes due to the clergy, the tenth of all spiritual livings.—2 & 3 Edw. III. c. 35.

Dismissal of Action. This may take place upon default in delivery of statement of claim, non-appearance at trial, disobedience to a judge's order for discovery, etc.—Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XXIX., XXXI., & XXXVI.

Dismissal of bill. A bill in Equity might be dismissed by the Court at the hearing, or by the plaintiff before decree, when unable to prosecute his suit. After decree the bill could only be dismissed upon re-hearing or appeal; and by the defendant either for want of prosecution, or upon an abatement by the death of the plaintiff or otherwise.—Dan. Ch. Pr., 4th ed., 731—742. See now NONSUIT.

Dismortgage, to redeem from mortgage.

Disorderly houses. See 25 Geo. II. c. 36; 58 Geo. III. c. 70, ss. 7, 8; and see Burn's Justice, voce Disorderly House.

Disparagement [fr. dis, apart, and par, Lat., equal], the matching an heir in marriage under his degree or against decency.—Co. Litt. 107.

Dispark, to throw open a park.

Dispatches, or Despatches [fr. despercher, Fr., to send away quickly, to discharge], a message, letter, or order sent with speed on affairs of state.

Dispauper, when a person by reason of his poverty is admitted to sue in forma pauperis, and afterwards, before the suit be ended, acquires any lands or personal estate, or is guilty of anything whereby he is liable to have this privilege taken from him, then he loses the right to sue in forma pauperis, and is said to be dispaupered.

Dispensatio est mali prohibiti provida relaxatio, utilitate seu necessitate pensata; et est de jure domino regi concessa, propter impossibilitatem praevidendi de omnibus particularibus. 10 Co. 88.—(A dispensation is the provident relaxation of a malum prohibitum weighed from utility or necessity; and it is conceded by law to the king on account of the impossibility of foreknowledge concerning all particulars.)

Dispensatio est vulnus, quod vulnerat jus commune. Dav. 69.—(A dispensation is a wound, which wounds common law.)

Dispensation, an exemption from some laws, a permission to do something forbidden, an allowance to omit something commanded, the canonistic name for a license.

Dispersonare, to scandalize or disparage.—Blount.

Dispone, to transfer or alienate.—Scotch Law.

Dispunishable, without penal restraint.

Disrationare, or Dirationare, to justify; to clear one's self of a fault; to traverse an indictment; to disprove.—Encyc. Lond.

Dissection, the anatomical examination of a dead body. It is regulated by 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 75, 'An Act for regulating Schools of Anatomy,' and by 34 Vict. c. 16. The 16th section of the first-mentioned act repeals so much of 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, as authorised the dissection after execution of the body of a person convicted of murder.

Disseise, to dispossess, to deprive.

Disseisin [fr. dissaisin, Fr.], a wrongful putting out of him that is seised of the freehold, not, as in abatement or intrusion, a wrongful entry, where the possession was vacant; but an attack upon him who is in actual possession, and turning him out; it is an ouster from a freehold in deed, as abatement and intrusion are ousters in law.—3 Steph. Com., 386. A title by disseisin is a good title against all but the rightful owner.

Disseisinam satis facit, qui uti non permittit possessorem, vel minus commode, licet omnino non expellat. Co. Litt. 331.—(He makes disseisin enough who does not permit the possessor to enjoy, or makes his enjoyment less beneficial, although he does not expel him altogether.)

Disseisor, a person who unlawfully puts another out of his land.

Disseissor, a woman who unlawfully puts another out of his land.

Disseissee, a person turned out of possession.

Dissenters, Protestant seceders from the Established Church. They are of many denominations, principally Presbyterians, Independents, Methodists, and Baptists; but as to Church government, the Baptists are Independents. With respect to the penal laws, for the enforcement of legal uniformity, they are either abrogated or relaxed. The Toleration Act, 1 W. & M. st. 1, c. 18, allowed dissenters to assemble for religious worship according to their own forms in places of meeting duly certified (as to such places see now the 18 & 19 Vict. c. 81, and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 119, ss. 17, 27). The 19 Geo. III. c. 44, provided that any dissenting preachers or teachers may keep schools or instruct youth; the 9 Geo. IV. c. 17, repealed the Corporation and Test Acts, and substituted a new form of declaration in lieu of taking the sacrament. As to the marriage of dissenters see 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 85. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 45, provided for meeting-houses or chapels founded for dissenters; and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 59, protected them from molestation. The Act 13 & 14 Vict. c. 28, amended by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 49, provides for facilities in regard to the title to lands purchased for religious or educational purposes. The 18 & 19 Vict. c. 81, provides for the certifying and registering of dissenters' places of worship. See also 19 & 20 Vict. c. 119, ss. 17, 27. Consult 2 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 706 et seq.; and title QUAKERS. See further BURIAL.

The 35 & 36 Vict. c. 26, has now abolished the University Tests, and dissenters are now enabled to take any degree (other than a divinity degree) in any of the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, or Durham.

Dissignare, to break open a seal.

Dissimilium dissimilis est ratio. Co. Litt. 191.—(Of dissimilars the rule is dissimilar.)

Dissolution, the act of breaking up. A partnership may be dissolved either by a proper notice, or effluxion of time as agreed upon in the articles of partnership, or by death, marriage, lunacy, bankruptcy, insolvency, or decree in equity, etc.—Story on Partnership, 383. As to dissolution of railway companies, see 9 & 10 Vict. c. 28, and 13 & 14 Vict. c. 83.

A dissolution is the civil death of the parliament, and is effected in two ways:—(1) By the Sovereign's will, expressed either in person or by representation. (2) By length of time, i.e., seven years. By the 30 & 31 Vict. c. 102, s. 51, it is provided that parliament shall not be determined or dissolved by the demise of the Crown.—1 Geo. I. st. 2, c. 38.

Dissolution of marriage. See DIVORCE.

Dissolve, to put an end to, cancel, abrogate, annul; applied to an injunction in Chancery; as discharge is to a rule nisi in Common Law. Dissolvo is the Latin for both verbs. If an injunction has been obtained by a misrepresentation of facts it will be dissolved, although, on the merits, it is called for.

Distinguenda sunt tempora; aliud est facere, aliud perficere. (Times are to be distinguished; it is one thing to do, another to complete.)

Distinguenda sunt tempora; distingue tempora, et concordabis leges. 1 Co. 24.—(Times are to be distinguished; distinguish times, and you will make laws agree.)

Distinguish (v. a.), to point out an essential difference; to prove a case, cited as applicable, inapplicable.

Distrain, to make seizure of goods or chattels by way of distress. See DISTRESS.

Distrainer, or Distrainor, he who seizes a distress.

Distrain, seizure.

Distress [fr. distringo, Lat., to bind fast; districtio, Med. Lat., whence distraindre, Fr.], a taking, without legal process, of a personal chattel from the possession of a wrong-doer into the hands of a party grieved, as a pledge for the redressing an injury, the performance of a duty, or the satisfaction of a demand. The power of distress is derived either: (1) from common right—as where a person seised in fee grants out a lesser estate with the reversion to himself, and a reservation of rent or other certain services, the law gives him this remedy for such rent or services without any express provision; (2) from special powers—as where one not being the reversioner, and consequently not able to distrain of common right, may, on granting a lease, reserve to himself by express stipulation the power of distraining. A distress may be made of common right for all rent-service, and by particular reservation for rent-charges, and also for rent-sec-t, since the 4 Geo. II. c. 28, s. 5, extended the same remedy to rents-seck, rents of assize, and chief-rents, and thereby in effect abolished all material distinction between them. With respect to fee-farm rents, it has been held that distress is not incident to them, unless the case be brought within the 4 Geo. II. c. 28, s. 5.—Bradbury v. Wright, 2 Dougl. 624.

Distress may also be made on cattle damage feasant, and also for annuities and rent-charges, rates and taxes, amerciaments in a court-baron, penalties and tolls imposed by by-laws, and under the Tithe Commutation Act, 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 71.

Accepting security for the rent, as a bill of exchange, or promissory note, will not take away the right to distrain, for the rent is of a higher nature, and the acceptance of a security of an unequal degree is no extinguishment of the claim. It may be generally stated that so long as the rent is in arrear the landlord has the power of distraining for it, and nothing but payment or tender will take away such power.

All persons seised in fee, who have granted out a lesser estate with a reservation of rent, may distrain for rent in arrear. A mortgagee, after giving notice of the mortgage to the tenant in possession under a lease prior to the mortgage, may distrain for the rent in arrear at the time of the notice, as well as for rent which may accrue after such notice, although he was not in the actual seisin of the premises, nor in the receipt of the rents and profits at the time it became due; but he may not distrain for rent due upon a lease made by the mortgagor after the mortgage, unless he has accepted rent from the tenant, or has given him notice to pay rent, and the tenant has acquiesced. See Moss v. Gallimore, 1 Smith, L. C.

Executors before probate and administrators may distrain, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, ss. 37, 38. Receivers appointed by order of the Court can distrain, and need not apply first to the Court for a particular order for that purpose. By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 9, it is enacted, 'that when the reversion expectant on a lease made either before or after the passing of this act, of any tenements or hereditaments of any tenure, shall, after the said first day of October 1845, be surrendered or merged, the estate which shall for the time being confer as against the tenant under the same lease, the next vested right to the same tenements or hereditaments shall, to the extent and for the purpose of preserving such incidents to, and obligations on, the same reversion, as, but for the surrender or merger thereof, would have subsisted, be deemed the reversion expectant on the same lease.'

All chattels and personal effects found upon the premises may be distrained, whether they belong to the tenant or a stranger, except goods of third persons which happen to be upon the tenant's premises in the way of his trade; goods in the hands of a factor; beasts of the plough; goods and utensils of trade, while there is any other property on the premises, or whilst they are in actual use; cattle and goods of a temporary guest at an inn, etc.; fixtures being part of the freehold; goods in the custody of the law; wearing apparel, if in actual use; and animals ferce nature. The goods of a lodger are specially protected from distress by 34 & 35 Vict. c. 79, and the rolling stock of railways by 35 & 36 Vict. c. 50, when 'in a work,' as to the meaning of which see s. 2 of the act.

A distress cannot be made in the night, i.e., after sunset and before sunrise (except in the case of cattle damage feasant, otherwise they might escape), nor on the same day on which the rent becomes due; but must be made within six years from its becoming due. The 8 Anne c. 14, ss. 6, 7, gives a landlord power to distrain, within six calendar months, after determination of the lease, but it must be made during the continuance of the landlord's title or interest, and also during the possession of the tenant. By the Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, s. 1, distresses for the recovery of any rent may be made at any time within twelve years next after the time at which the right to make them shall have first accrued ; but (by s. 42 of 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27) no arrears of rent can be recovered by distress but within six years next after the same shall have become due, etc. It must be made upon the land whence the rent issues, and the whole of what is due should be distrained for at one time. The outer door of the house can in no case be broken open ; but if the outer door be open the person distraining may justify breaking open an inner door or lock to find any goods distrainable. The distress may be made either by the landlord himself, or by an authorised agent, who is called a bailiff, under a warrant of distress. An inventory of as many goods as are judged sufficient to cover the rent distrained for, and also the charges of the distress, must then be made, which is served personally on the tenant, together with a notice of the fact of the distress having been made, and the time when the rent and charges must be paid, or the goods replevied. When the distress has been thus made, it is always the safer way to remove the goods immediately, and in the notice to acquaint the tenant whither they are removed. In many cases, however, the tenant, for his own convenience, requests the landlord to permit them to remain on the premises, and consents to allow him to retain possession beyond the five days given for replevying ; in such cases a written consent should be procured, and some person left in possession of the goods upon the premises. As to the landlord's right of following for thirty days goods fraudulently removed, see 11 Geo. II. c. 19.

The landlord (who had no right to sell at common law, the goods being at common law taken by way of pledge only) cannot sell the goods distrained before the expiration of the five days, i.e., five times twenty-four hours allowed by the statute 2 W. & M. sess. 1, c. 5, which five days are inclusive of the day of the sale ; but exclusive of the time of the sale ; therefore the distress may be removed on the sixth day. Before sale an appraisalment must be made by two appraisers ; and the sheriff's office should be searched to see if the goods have been replevied. If there be any surplus from the sale, it must be handed over to the tenant.

The expenses of distresses for less than 20*l.* are regulated by 57 Geo. III. c. 93.

The remedies for a wrongful distress are replevin ; an action of trespass de bonis asportatis, or quare clausum fregit, for damages ; an action of detinue for the thing distrained itself, or trover for its value. The remedy for an irregular distress is an action of trespass, or on the case, for the special damage.—11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 19. The proper remedy for an excessive distress is a special action on the case founded upon the Statute of Marlborough, 52 Hen. III. c. 21.—Woodfall's Land. and Tenant, 10th ed., 373 et seq. See the titles of the above-named actions.

2. As to the animal or other thing distrained, the distrainer cannot use it for his profit, though he may do so to keep it in a good state (as if it be a horse) of health ; if he use it for his profit the distrainee may interfere. Neither may he enjoy the increment thereof (as the eggs laid by a hen), but it must be kept or accounted for to the distrainee.

Distress infinite, one that has no bounds with regard to its quantity, and may be repeated from time to time, until the stubbornness of the party is conquered. Such are distresses for fealty or suit of Court, and for compelling jurors to attend.—3 Bl. Com. 231.

Distribution, the act of dealing out to others ; dispensation.

Distributions, Statute of, 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 10, explained by 29 Car. II. c. 3, enacts, that the surplusage of intestates' personal estate (except of femes covert, the administration and enjoyment of whose estates belonged, at Common Law, to their husbands—but see MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY) shall, after the expiration of one full year from the death of the intestate, be distributed in the following manner : one-third shall go to the widow of the intestate, and the residue in equal proportions to his children, or, if dead, to their representatives, that is, their lineal descendants ; if there be no children or legal representative subsisting, then a moiety shall go to the widow, and a moiety to the next of kindred in equal degree, and their representatives ; if no widow, the whole shall go to the children ; if neither widow nor children, the whole shall be distributed amongst the next of kin, in equal degree, and their representatives ; but no representatives are admitted among collaterals farther than the children of the intestate's brothers and sisters. The following relations are considered as of the same degree of kindred :—(1) parents and children ; (2) grandfather, grandson, and brother ; (3) great-grandfather, great-grandson, uncle, and nephew ; (4) great-great-grandfather, great-great-grandson, great-uncle, great-nephew, and first cousin. The half-blood take equally with the whole blood in the same degree. The 19 & 20 Vict. c. 94, abolishes all special local customs concerning the distribution of personal estates of intestates.

Distributive finding of the issue. The jury are bound to give their verdict for that party who, upon the evidence, appears to them to have succeeded in establishing his side of the issue. But there are cases in which an issue may be found distributively; i.e., in part for plaintiff and in part for defendant. Thus, in an action for goods sold and work done, if the defendant pleaded that he never was indebted, on which issue was joined, a verdict might be found for the plaintiff as to the goods, and for the defendant as to the work. (Steph. Plead., 7th ed., 77 (d), and see C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 75.)

District [fr. districtus, Lat.], the circuit or territory within which a person may be compelled to appear.—Cowel. Circuit of authority; province.—Encyc. Lond.

District parishes, ecclesiastical divisions of parishes for all purposes of worship, and for the celebration of marriages, christenings, churchings, and burials; formed at the instance of Her Majesty's Commissioners for Building New Churches, and regulated by the 'New Parishes Acts,' 1843 & 1844, 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, and 7 & 8 Vict. c. 94.

District Registrars. See next title.

District Registry. By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 60, it is provided that to facilitate proceedings in country districts the Crown may, from time to time, by Order in Council, create district registries and appoint district registrars for the purpose of issuing writs of summons and for other purposes. Documents sealed in any such district registry shall be received in evidence without further proof (s. 61); and the district registrars may administer oaths or do other things as provided by rules or a special order of the Court (s. 62). Power, however, is given to a judge to remove proceedings from a district registry to the office of the High Court (s. 65); and see generally ss. 60—66. Powers in reference to issuing summonses are given by the Judicature Act, 1875, Orders V., VIII. With regard to entering appearances in district registries, see Ord. XII., and for proceedings generally in those registries, see Ord. XXXV., by which (r. 4) district registrars are given similar powers to those exercised by a master in chambers, as to which see Ord. LIV. By Order in Council of 12th of August, 1875, a number of district registries have been established in the places mentioned in that order; and the prothonotaries in Liverpool, Manchester, and Preston, the district registrar of the Court of Admiralty at Liverpool, and the county court registrars in the other places named, have been appointed district registrars. See CHAMBERS; REMOVAL OF CAUSES.

Districtio, a distress; a distraint.—Cowel.

Districtione scaccarii. The 51 Hen. III.

st. 5, relating to distresses in the Exchequer for the King's debts.

Distringas (that you distrain), anciently called constringas, a writ addressed to the sheriff, and issued to effect various purposes. The cases in which it was used in Common Law proceedings may be thus stated:—

(1) A distringas to compel appearance, where defendant has a place of residence within England or Wales. This writ was abolished by the C.L.P. Act, 1852, s. 24, and the practice provided for by s. 17 substituted in its stead.

(2) A distringas nuper vicecomitem, to compel the late sheriff to sell goods, etc., or to bring in the body. See Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XLIII., r. 2.

(3) A distringas in detinue, a special writ of execution to compel defendant to deliver the goods by repeated distresses of his chattels; or a scire facias might be issued against a third person in whose hands they might happen to be, to show cause why they should not be delivered; and if the defendant still continued obstinate, then (if the judgment had been by default or on demurrer) the sheriff summoned an inquest to ascertain the value of the goods and the plaintiff's damages, which (being either so assessed, or by the verdict in case of an issue) were levied on the goods or person of the defendant.—1 Roll. Ab. 737. See DETINUE. As to Distringas in quare impedit, see QUARE IMPEDIT.

(4) A distringas juratores, a jury process, abolished by C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 104.

In equity a distringas was issued in these two cases:—

(1) Against a corporation aggregate; the first process to compel appearance was distringas, and on its return, an alias distringas, and then a pluries were issued, and upon the return of the latter, if default were made, an order nisi for a sequestration was obtained as of course, and if no cause was shown, the order would be made absolute.—11 Geo. IV. & 1 Wm. IV. c. 36.

(2) When a transfer of stock, or the payment of dividends by the Bank of England is sought to be immediately restrained, then instead of moving or petitioning the Court of Chancery for a restraining order a distringas was, by 5 Vict. c. 5, s. 5, allowed to be issued.

As to the mode of obtaining this writ, see the Consol. Ord. 1860, Ord. XXVIII.

The effect of this writ is temporary; if, therefore, the person who obtained it wish to continue the restraint upon the transfer, he must either obtain a restraining order, or bring an action against the party interested in the fund, and move for a writ of injunction against the bank, pursuant to 40 Geo. III. c. 36.

By the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XLVI., r. 2, it was provided that any person claiming to be interested in any stock transferable at the Bank of England standing in the name of any other person, might sue out a writ of distringas, pursuant to the statute 5 Vict. c. 5, as before, but that rule was repealed by a rule of April, 1880, and the practice is now regulated by Rules 3—11 of the same Order.

Disturbance, annoyance; also the wrongful obstruction of the owner of an incorporeal hereditament in its exercise or enjoyment. There are five sorts of this injury, viz., disturbance of (1) franchise, (2) common, (3) ways, (4) tenure, and (5) patronage.—3 Steph. Com.

Disturbance of Divine worship, an offence against the public peace.—See BRAWLING.

Disturber. If a bishop refuse or neglect to examine or admit a patron's clerk, without reason assigned or notice given, he is styled a disturber by the law, and shall not have any title to present by lapse; for no man shall take advantage of his own wrong.—2 Bl. Com. 278.

Dittay, the matter of charge or ground of indictment against a person accused of a crime.

Divan [an Arabic or Turkish word], a council-room, a state-chamber, a raised bench or cushion.

Diversité des Courtes, a law treatise supposed to be written in the early part of the 16th century.

Diversity, a plea by the prisoner in bar of execution, alleging that he is not the same who was attainted, upon which a jury is immediately empaneled to try the collateral issue thus raised, viz., the identity of the person; and not whether he is guilty or innocent, for that has been already decided.—4 Bl. Com. 396. See also 1 Hale's Pleas of the Crown, 370.

Divest. See DEVEST.

Divide et impera cum radix et vertex imperii in obedientium consensu rata sunt. 4 Inst. 35.—(Divide and govern, since the foundation and crown of empire are established in the consent of the obedient.)

Dividend, a share, the part allotted in division; the interest paid on the public funds; the division of a bankrupt's or insolvent's effects.

Dividenda, an indenture; one part of an indenture.—Old Records.

Divinatio, non interpretatio, est que omnino recedit à litera. Bacon.—(It is guessing, not interpretation, which altogether departs from the letter.)

Divine right. The right whereby, in the seventeenth century, the English sovereigns were by some persons held to reign. See NON-RESISTANCE.

Divine service, tenure by, an obsolete holding, in which the tenants were obliged to perform some special divine services, as to sing so many masses, etc.—Litt. s. 137.

Divisa, a device, award, or decree; also a devise; also bounds or limits of division of a parish or farm, etc.—Cowel. Also a court held on the boundary, in order to settle disputes of the tenants.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Divisional Court. A Court (which takes, under the Jud. Act, the place of the Court "in banc"; see BANC), constituted of two judges of the High Court or as many more judges as the President of a Division, with the concurrence of the judges of the Division or a majority thereof, may think expedient, for the transaction of such business as may be ordered by Rules of Court (see Order LVII. A.) to be heard by a Divisional Court (App. Jur. Act, 1876, s. 17). Much of the business of the Queen's Bench Division, but none of that of the other Divisions, is transacted by Divisional Courts, consisting usually of two judges. Five judges have twice sat. See PRECEDENTS.

Divisions of the High Court. The High Court of Justice, created by the Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), was by section 31 of that Act, for the more convenient despatch of business, divided into five Divisions which were called the Chancery, the Queen's Bench, the Common Pleas, the Exchequer, and the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Divisions, the judges of these Divisions being for the most part those who sat in the Courts, whose jurisdiction is transferred to the High Court (ss. 5, 16); but s. 32 of the same act gives the Sovereign in Council power to reduce or increase the number of Divisions or the number of Judges attached to each Division; and an Order in Council under this section, which came into force on the 26th February, 1881, united in one 'Queen's Bench Division' the judges attached to the Common Pleas and Exchequer Divisions; so that there are now three Divisions.

Divorce [fr. divortium, Lat.], the dissolution of the marriage contract. See next title.

Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, Court for, a tribunal which was established by 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 108, 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 144, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 81, 27 & 28 Vict. c. 44, 29 & 30 Vict. c. 32, and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 77; and see 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68.

In January 1858, the Divorce Act (20 & 21 Vict. c. 85) came into operation, and the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical Courts in England in respect of all suits and matters matrimonial, except so far as relates to the granting of marriage licenses, was transferred to the Court of Divorce and Matrimonial Causes. The jurisdiction of this Court is now assigned to a Division of the High Court of Justice called the Probate, Divorce, and Admiralty Division (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34); but the former rules of practice and procedure are retained (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. LXII.). As to Appeals from this Court, see APPEAL.

The Divorce Act above-mentioned also gave the Court a jurisdiction to dissolve marriages and to deal with the property of persons whose marriage was dissolved, and with the custody of their children. Any husband may obtain a dissolution of his marriage upon proving to the satisfaction of the Court that his wife has been guilty of adultery; and any wife may obtain a dissolution who can prove that her husband has been guilty of incestuous adultery, or bigamy with adultery, or of rape, or of sodomy, or of bestiality, or of adultery, coupled with cruelty, or with desertion without reasonable excuse for two years and upwards (ss. 27 & 31). But if the petitioner has been accessory to, or has connived at the adultery of the other party to the marriage, or has condoned the adultery complained of, or has presented or prosecuted the petition in collusion with the other parties to the suit, the Court is bound to dismiss the petition (s. 30). And if the petitioner has been guilty of unreasonable delay in presenting or prosecuting the petition, or of cruelty towards the other party to the marriage, or of having deserted or wilfully separated himself or herself from the other party before the adultery complained of and without reasonable excuse, or of such wilful neglect or misconduct as has conduced to the adultery, the Court has a discretionary power either to pronounce or to refuse a decree (s. 31).

As to other consequences of dissolution of marriage, see MARRIAGE SETTLEMENTS.

Divorces a mensâ et thoro are abolished by the act, and judicial separations are substituted (ss. 6, 7). A sentence of judicial separation may be obtained either by a husband or wife on the ground of adultery, or cruelty, or desertion without cause for two years and upwards. A sentence of judicial separation has the same force and effect as a divorce a mensâ et thoro formerly had (ss. 7 & 16). It also places the wife in the position of a feme sole, with respect to property, from the date of the sentence, as long as the separation continues, and in the event of her dying intestate, her property is dealt with as if her husband were dead (s. 25). She is also considered as a feme sole for the purposes of contracts, wrongs, and injuries, and suing and being sued in any civil proceeding (s. 26). Her husband is in no way liable for her contracts or torts, except in cases where he has neglected to obey an order for the payment of alimony to her, when he is liable for necessaries (s. 26). See RESTITUTION OF CONJUGAL RIGHTS; JACTITATION OF MARRIAGE. The parties to any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery, and the husbands and wives of such parties, are now competent to give evidence in such proceeding.—32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, s. 3. See MARRIAGE, ALIMONY, CONDONATION, RESTITUTION OF CONJUGAL RIGHTS, NULLITY OF MARRIAGE, JACTITATION OF MARRIAGE, and DECREE NISI.

Divortium dicitur à divertendo, quia vir divertitur ab uxore. Co. Litt. 235.—(Divorce is called from divertendo, because a man is diverted from his wife.)

Doab, Doowab, any tract of country included between two rivers.—Indian.

Do, ut des (I give, that you may give).

Do, ut facias (I give, that you may perform).

Dock [fr. docke, Fle., a bird-cage], the place or cage in a court of criminal law in which a prisoner is placed during his trial.

Dock warrants. These have been held to be negotiable, and to pass from hand to hand, so as to vest the property in the goods mentioned in them in the holders.

Docket, Docquet [fr. tocyn, W., a slip or ticket], or Dogged, a list; a brief writing on a small piece of paper or parchment, containing the effect of a greater writing; a register. As to the docket of a decree in Chancery, see Smith's Ch. Pr. 469.

Doctor and Student. Saint Germain is an author who gained considerable note in the reign of Henry VIII. by this famous book. The first dialogue of this work came out in 1518, in Latin, with the following title, 'Dialogus de Fundamentis Legum Angliæ et de Conscientiâ.' The second dialogue was printed in English, in 1530, and the next year there appeared a translation of the first dialogue. Both afterwards passed several editions, under the title of 'Doctor and Student.' The 'Doctor and Student' consists of two dialogues between a doctor of divinity and a student of the common law. These contain discussions on the grounds of our law, and where objections had been stated to some of its rules and maxims, it is endeavoured to reconcile them with reason and good conscience. The whole is treated in a popular way, with the freedom and language of conversation, conveying, by means of objections and their answers, not an unsatisfactory account of many principles and points of the common law.—4 Reeves, c. xxx., pp. 416, 418.

Doctor's Commons, an institution near St. Paul's Cathedral where the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts were held. In 1768, a royal charter was obtained, by virtue of which the members of the society and their successors were incorporated under the name and title of 'The College of Doctors of Laws exercent in the Ecclesiastical and Admiralty Courts.' The college consists of a president (the Dean of Arches for the time being), and of those doctors of laws who, having regularly taken that degree in either of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and having been admitted advocates in pursuance of the rescript of the Archbishop of Canterbury, shall have been elected fellows of the college in the manner prescribed by the charter. By 20 & 21 Vict. c. 77, ss. 116, 117, power is given to the college to sell their real and personal property, and to surrender their charter of incorporation, and upon surrender the college is to be dissolved.

Documents, records, writings, precepts, instructions, or directions.

Doe, John, the fictitious plaintiff in ejectment, whose services have been dispensed with since the abolition of the fiction by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76. See EJECTMENT.

Dæd-bana, the actual perpetrator of a homicide.

Dog. The Metropolitan Police Act, 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, extended to all parts of the United Kingdom by 17 & 18 Vict. c. 60, s. 2, prohibits, under a penalty, the use of any dog for the purposes of draught.

As to dog licenses, see 30 & 31 Vict. c. 5, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, s. 38. For police regulations as to dogs, see 'The Dogs Act, 1871,' 34 & 35 Vict. c. 56. The Act 28 & 29 Vict. c. 60, provides that the owner of every dog shall be liable in damages for injuries done to any cattle and sheep by his dog, and that it shall not be necessary for the party seeking such damages to show a previous mischievous propensity in such dog, or the owner's knowledge of such propensity, or that the injury was attributable to neglect on the part of such owner. See ANIMALS; and DOG STEALING.

Dog-draw, the manifest apprehension of an offender against venison in a forest, when he was found drawing after a deer by the scent of a hound led in his hand; or where a person had wounded a deer or wild beast, by shooting at him, or otherwise, and was caught with a dog drawing after him to receive the same.—Manwood, 2, c. viii.

Dog-Latin, the Latin of illiterate persons; Latin words put together on the English grammatical system.

Dog stealing is punishable on summary conviction, for the first offence, by six months' imprisonment and hard labour, or fine not exceeding 20*l.* beyond the value of the dog. A second offence is, however, an indictable misdemeanour, punishable by fine or imprisonment, and hard labour not exceeding eighteen months, or by both. Similar punishment is provided for persons found in possession of dogs or their skins, knowing them to have been stolen, and a justice may order the restoration of the stolen property to the owner. Corruptly taking money or reward, to aid in the recovery of a stolen dog, is punishable by imprisonment and hard labour for eighteen months. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 18, 19, 20, and 21.

Dogger, a light ship or vessel; dogger-fish, fish brought in ships.—Cowel.

Dogger-men, fishermen that belong to dogger-ships.

Dogma, an ordinance of the senate; a theological doctrine promulgated by ecclesiastical authority.—Law.

Doitkin, or Doit [fr. dutt, Du.; daoto, Venet.; da otto soldi, a piece of eight soldi], a base coin of small value, prohibited by 3 Hen. V. c. 1.

Dole, the act of distribution or dealing; a portion or lot; a boundary mark; e.g., a post or mound of earth.

Dole-fish, the share of fish which the fishermen employed in the north seas customarily received for their allowance.—35 Hen. VIII. c. 7.

Dole-meadow, one wherein the shares of divers persons are marked by doles or landmarks.

Doles, or Dools, slips of pasture left between the furrows of ploughed land.

Dolg-bote [fr. dolg., Sax., wound, and bote, recompense], a recompense for a scar or wound.—Cowel.

Doli capax (capable of crime).

Doli incapax (incapable of crime).

Dolo facit qui petit quod redditurus est. Phillimore's Jurisprudence; Inst. 173.—(He acts with guile who demands that which he will have to return.)

Dolo malo pactum se non servaturum. D. 2, 14, 7, s. 9.—(An agreement induced by fraud cannot stand.)

Dolosus versatur in generalibus. 2 Co. 34.—(A deceiver deals in generalities.)

Dolus auctoris non nocet successori. (The fraud of a predecessor prejudices not his successor.)

Dolus circuitu non purgatur. Bacon.—(Fraud is not purged by circuitry.)

Dolus est machinatio cum aliud dissimulat aliud agit. Lane, 47.—(Deceit is an artifice, since it pretends one thing and does another.)

Dolus malus (opposed to dolus bonus, artifice which the law considers honestly employed) means fraud.—Sand Just., 5th ed., 318, 433, 471.

Domboc, or Dombec [Sax.], dome-book.

Dome, or Doom [Sax.], a judgment, sentence, or decree.

Dome-book [liber judicialis, Lat.], a book composed under the direction of Alfred, for the general use of the whole kingdom, containing the local customs of the several provinces of the kingdom. This book is said to have been extant so late as the reign of Edward IV., but it is now lost. It probably contained the principal maxims of the common law, the penalties for misdemeanours, and the forms of judicial proceedings. This much at least may be collected from the injunctions to preserve it which were found in the laws of Edward the Elder, son of Alfred.—1 Bl. Com. 64.

Alfred has generally been styled the legum Anglicanarum conditor, as Edward the Confessor is the restitutor; but Palgrave says, 'the authentic code of the legislature does not support these assertions. The laws of Alfred abound in valuable regulations of criminal jurisprudence, but they are entirely silent with respect to those institutions which, according to later historians, are to be ascribed to his sound policy and wisdom.'—Rise and Prog. of Eng. Commonwealth, 46. And see 2 Hallam's Mid. Ages, 402.

Domesday, or Domesday-book [liber iudicialis vel censualis Angliæ, Lat.], a most ancient record made in the time of William the Conqueror, and now remaining in the Exchequer fair and legible, consisting of two volumes, a greater and lesser; the greater containing a survey of all the lands in England, except the counties of Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, Durham, and part of Lancashire, which, it is said, were never surveyed; and excepting Essex, Suffolk, and Norfolk, which three last are comprehended in the lesser volume. There is also a third book, which differs from the others in form more than in matter, made by command of the same king. And there is a fourth book kept in the Exchequer, which is called Domesday, and, though a very large volume, is only an abridgment of the others. Likewise a fifth book is kept in the Remembrancer's Office in the Exchequer, which has the name of Domesday, and is the same as the fourth above mentioned. Our ancestors had many dome-books. The question whether lands are ancient demesne or not is to be decided by the Domesday of Wm. I., whence there is no appeal. The addition of day to this Dome-book, was not meant for an allusion to the final day of judgment, as most persons have conceived, but was to strengthen and confirm it, and signifies the judicial decisive record or book of dooming justice and judgment.—Spelman; 1 Reeves, 219.

Domesmen [hence, Æg deme, I judge], judges or men appointed to doom and determine suits and controversies. See DAYS MEN.

Domestics, menial servants (so called from being intra mœnia domûs, within the walls of a house). The contract between them and their masters arises upon the hiring. In this country it is usual to engage domestic servants at a fixed amount of wages per annum. But there is generally no express stipulation as to the time that the service is to last; and when the terms are not otherwise defined the contract is thus understood, that either party may determine the service at pleasure, upon a month's warning or upon payment of a month's wages. See MASTER AND SERVANT.

Domicellus, a better sort of servant in monasteries; also an appellation of a king's bastard.—Encyc. Lond.

Domicile, the place where a person has his home.

By the term 'domicile,' in its ordinary acceptance, is meant the place where a person lives or has his home. In this sense, the place where a person has his actual residence, inhabitancy, or commorancy, is sometimes called his domicile. In a strict and legal sense, that is properly the domicile of a person where he has his true fixed permanent home and principal establishment, and to which, whenever he is absent, he has the intention of returning (animus revertendi).

Two things, then, must concur to constitute domicile: first, residence; and secondly, the intention of making it the home of the party. There must be the fact and the intent; for, as Pothier has truly observed, a person cannot establish a domicile in a place, except it be animo et facto.

From these considerations and rules the general conclusion may be deduced, that domicile is of three sorts; domicile by birth, domicile by choice, and domicile by operation of law. The first is the common case of the place of birth, domicilium originis; the second is that which is voluntarily acquired by a party, proprio Marte; the last is consequential, as that of the wife arising from marriage.—Story's Conf. of Laws, s. 46. The best definition, as applied to an acquired domicile, is—that place in which a man has voluntarily fixed the habitation of himself and family, not for a mere special or temporary purpose, but with the present intention of making a permanent home, until some unexpected event shall occur to induce him to adopt some other permanent home.—Lord v. Colvin, 4 Drew. 366.

If a person leave his own country with the intention of remaining abroad till death, he, nevertheless, retains his domicile of origin until he fix his domicile in some particular place.

It is a clearly established rule that the validity of a will, disposing of personal estate, as regards form, is regulated by the law of the country in which the deceased was domiciled at the time of his death. The application of this rule to the cases of British subjects dying abroad, and of foreigners dying in this country leaving wills, gave rise to great inconvenience, to remove which two statutes have been passed.

By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 114, 'An Act to Amend the Laws with respect to Wills of Personal Estate made by British subjects,' it is enacted that every will, etc., made out of the United Kingdom by a British subject (whatever may be the domicile of such person at the time of making the same, or at the time of his or her death) shall, as regards personal estate, be held to be well executed, for the purpose of being admitted in England or Ireland to probate, and in Scotland to confirmation, if the same be made according to the forms required either by the law of the place where it was made, or by the law of the place where the deceased was domiciled when it was made, or by the laws then in force in that part of Her Majesty's dominions where he had his domicile of origin (s. 1). Every will, etc., made within the United Kingdom by any British subject (whatever may be the domicile of such person at the time of making the same, or at the time of his or her death), shall, as regards personal estate, be held to be well executed, and shall be admitted in England and Ireland to Probate, and in Scotland to confirmation, if it be executed according to the forms required by the laws for the time being in force in that part of the United Kingdom where the same is made (s. 2). No will, etc., shall be held to be revoked, or to have become invalid, nor shall the construction thereof be altered by reason of any subsequent change of domicile of the person making the same (s. 3). Nothing in this act shall invalidate any will or other testamentary instrument, as regards personal estate, which would have been valid if the Act had not been passed, except as such will, etc., may be revoked, or altered by any subsequent will, etc., made valid by the act (s. 4). This act shall extend only to wills, etc., made by persons who die after the passing of the act (s. 5). See Dicey on Domicil.

Domigerium, power over another; also danger.—Bract. l. 4, t. 1, c. x.

Domina (Dame), a title given to honourable women, who, anciently, in their own right of inheritance, held a barony.—Cowel.

Dominant tenement, a term used in the civil and Scotch law, and thence in ours, relating to servitudes, meaning the tenement or subject in favour of which the service is constituted; as the tenement over which the servitude extends is called the servient tenement. See Bell; Smith's Dict. of Antig., tit. 'Servitudes'; and Gale on Easements, 4th ed., 5, 14.

Dominica. An island in the West Indies. See 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 125; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 57; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 57; and 30 & 31 Vict. c. 91. As to Court of Appeal in Dominica see 13 & 14 Vict. c. 15, s. 1.

Dominica in ramis palmarum, Palm Sunday.—Cowel.

Dominical, that which denotes the Lord's Day, or Sunday.

Dominicide [fr. dominus, Lat., master, and cædo, to kill], the act of killing one's lord or master.

Dominium directum, in the feudal law, the interest vested in the superior; the superiority. See Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Dominium non potest esse in pendent.—(Lordship cannot be in suspense.)

Dominium utile, the possessory or vassal's title to the soil, or the right to its use and profits. See Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Dominus. This word, prefixed to a man's name, in ancient times, usually denoted him a knight or a clergyman, a gentleman or a lord of the manor; also a principal in the Roman Law.

Dominus aliquando non potest alienare.—(A lord sometimes cannot alienate.)

Dominus capitalis loco heredis habetur, quoties per defectum vel delictum extinguitur sanguis sui tenentis. Co. Litt. 18.—(The supreme lord takes the place of the heir, as often as the blood of the tenant is extinct through deficiency or crime.)

Dominus litis, the controller of a suit or litigation; also an advocate who, after the death of his client, prosecuted a suit to sentence for the executor's use.—Civ. Law.

Dominus navis, the absolute owner of a ship.

Dominus non maritabit pupillum nisi semel. Co. Litt. 9.—(A lord cannot give a ward in marriage but once.)

Dominus rex nullum habere potest parem multo minus superiorem. (The king cannot have an equal, much less a superior.)—1 Reeves, 115.

Domitæ naturæ animalia, tame and domestic animals, as horses, kine, sheep, poultry, etc.

Domitellus, a title anciently given to the French king's natural sons. See DOMICELLUS.

Dommages interets [Fr.], damages.

Domo reparandâ, a writ that lay for one against his neighbour, by the anticipated fall of whose house he feared a damage and injury to his own.—Reg. Orig. 153.

Domus conversorum, an ancient house built or appointed by King Henry III., for such Jews as were converted to the Christian faith; but King Edward III., who expelled the Jews from this kingdom, deputed the place for the custody of the rolls and records of the Chancery.

Domus Dei, the House of God, applied to many hospitals and religious houses.

Domus Procerum, the House of Lords, abbreviated into Dom Proc., or D. P.

Domus sua cuique est tutissimum refugium. 5 Rep. 92.—(To every one his own house is the safest refuge.)

Dona clandestina sunt semper suspiciosa. 3 Co. 81.—(Clandestine gifts are always suspicious.)

Donari videtur, quod nullo jure cogente conceditur. D. 50, 17, 82.—(A thing is said to be given when it is yielded otherwise than by virtue of a right.)

Donary, a thing given to sacred uses.

Donatory, the person on whom the king bestows his right to any forfeiture that has fallen to the Crown.—Scotch Law.

Donatio mortis causâ, a gift of personal property in prospect of death; a death-bed disposition; an initiate gift of personalty consummated by the giver's death.

It is derived from the civil law: Justinian's Inst. lib. 2, tit. 7, shows its nature. To render this kind of gift valid, it (1) must be made by the giver, when ill, in anticipation of his death; (2) must be intended to take effect only upon his death by his existing illness, for his recovery from that illness, or his subsequent personal revocation of the gift, as by resuming its possession, will defeat it; and (3) a traditio or delivery, either actual or symbolical, of the subject of the gift, or of the instrument which represents it; must be made to the donee, either for his own use, or upon trust for another person, or for a particular person. It is to be observed that the gift of a cheque upon a banker is not good as donatio mortis causâ, because it is a gift which can only be made effectual by obtaining payment of it in the donor's lifetime, and is revoked by his death. See Tate v. Hilbert, 2 Ves. Jun. iii. (1793). And so a promissory note not payable to bearer.

For a critical case upon this subject see Bouts v. Ellis, 4 De G. M. & G. 249; 17 Beav. 121. This kind of gift resembles a legacy, but differs from a gift inter vivos, inasmuch as it is ambulatory, incomplete, and revocable during the donor's life; is liable to his debts upon a deficiency of assets; may be made to his wife, and is subject to legacy duty under 8 & 9 Vict. c. 76, and to account duty under the Customs and Inland Revenue Act, 1881. It, however, differs from a legacy in that it does not need probate, for the donee's title being directly derived from the giver in his lifetime, it is not a testamentary act; and it is taken against, and not from the executor, whose assent to its enjoyment is not necessary. It is so vested in the donee, that he has a right, in case of personal estate, to compel the donor's executor or administrator to carry into effect the intention manifested by the person whom he represents; as, for example, if the donation be a bond, to compel the executor or administrator to allow the donee to use his name in suing upon the bond, he being indemnified, for it has become a trust for the donee.

Donatio non presumitur (a gift is not presumed).

Donatio perficitur possessione accipientis. Jenk. Cent. 109.—(A gift is perfected by possession of the receiver.)

Donatio principis intelligitur sine præjudicio tertii. Davis, 75 b.—(A gift of the prince is understood without prejudice to a third party.)

Donationum alia perfecta, alia incepta et non perfecta; ut si donatio lecta fuit et concessa, ac traditio nondum fuerit subsequuta. Co. Litt. 56.—(Some gifts are perfect, others incipient or not perfect; as if a gift were read and agreed to, but delivery had not then followed.)

Donative, a species of advowson, when the Queen, or any subject by her license, founds a church or chapel, and ordains that it shall be merely in the gift or disposal of the patron; subject to her visitation only, and not to that of the ordinary; and vested absolutely in the clerk by the patron's deed of donation without presentation, institution, or induction. This is said to have been anciently the only way of conferring ecclesiastical benefices in England. If the patron once waive the privilege of donation and present to the bishop, and his clerk is admitted and instituted, the advowson becomes presentative, and shall never be donative any more.—2 Bl. Com. 23. See ADVOWSON.

Donator nunquam desinit possidere antiquam donatarius incipiat possidere. Dyer, 281.—(He who gives never ceases to possess before that the receiver begins to possess.)

Donatrix, a female giver. See DONOR.

Donee [fr. doneo, Lat.], one to whom a gift is made.

Don grant et render, a fine sur, was a double fine, comprehending the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, etc., and the fine sur concessit, and might have been used to create particular limitations of estates; whereas the fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, etc., conveyed nothing but an absolute estate, either of inheritance or at least of freehold.—1 Steph. Com.

Donis conditionalibus, Statute de, 13 Edward I. c. 1, A.D. 1226, otherwise called Westminster the Second. At the date of this statute a gift to a man and the heirs of his body, provided that if he had no heirs the lands should revert, was construed to give the donee a conditional fee, which enabled him, after issue begotten, to alien the land, and thereby to disinherit the issue, and to deprive the donor of his right of reverter. This interpretation is declared by this statute to be 'contrary to the minds of the givers, and the form expressed in the gift': wherefore it is ordained that the 'will of the giver, according to the form in the deed of gift manifestly expressed, be henceforth observed; so that they to whom the land is given under such condition, shall have no power to alien the land so given, but that it shall remain unto the issue of them to whom it is given after their death, or shall revert to the giver or his heirs if issue fail, or there is no issue at all. And if a fine be levied hereafter upon lands so given, it shall be void in law.' The intolerable mischief introduced by this statute was got rid of by the fictitious proceedings of common recoveries, which were abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, an act that has completely unfettered these estates.

Donor, a giver, a bestower, one who gives lands to another in tail, etc.

Doom [fr. dom, A. S., judgment; fr. deman, to deem or form a judgment], judicial sentence; judgment.

Doomsday-book. See DOMESDAY-BOOK.

Doorkeeper of the Court of Chancery. His office is abolished by 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 27.

Dormant claim, a claim in abeyance.

Dormant partners, those whose names are not known or do not appear as partners, but who nevertheless are silent partners, and partake of the profits, and thereby become partners, either absolutely to all intents and purposes, or at all events in respect to third parties. Dormant partners, in strictness of language, mean those who are merely passive in the firm, whether known or unknown, in contradistinction to those who are active and conduct the business of the firm, as principals.

Unknown partners are properly secret partners; but in common parlance they are usually designated by the appellation of dormant partners. They are held responsible as partners, until retirement, to third parties, although they may not be so chargeable inter sese. See 28 & 29 Vict. c. 86; and see DISCLOSURE; and PARTNERSHIP.

Dormiunt aliquando leges, nunquam moriuntur. 2 Inst. 161.—(The laws sometimes sleep, never die.)

Dorture [contracted from dormiture], a dormitory of a convent; a place to sleep in.

Dos de dote peti non debet. 4 Co. 122.—(Dower from dower ought not to be sought.)

Dos rationabilis vel legitima est cujuslibet mulieris de quocunque tenemento tertia pars omnium terrarum et tenementorum, quæ vir suus tenuit in dominio suo ut de feodo, etc. Co. Litt. 336.—(Reasonable or legitimate dower belongs to every woman of a third part of all the lands and tenements of which her husband was seised in his demesne, as of fee, etc.)

Dossale, hangings of tapestry.—Mat. Par.

Dotal, relating to the portion of a woman: constituting her portion; comprised in her portion.

Dotation, the act of giving a dowry or portion; endowment in general.

Dote assignandâ, a writ that lay for a widow, where it was found by office that the king's tenant was seised of lands in fee, or fee-tail, at his death, and that he held of the king in chief, etc.—F. N. B. 26; Reg. Orig. 297.

Dote unde nihil habet, a writ of dower that lies for the widow, against the tenant of lands whereof he was solely seised in fee-simple, or fee-tail, and of which she is dowable.—F. N. B. 147.

Doti lex favet; præmium pudoris est, ideò parcat. Co. Litt. 31.—(The law favours dower; it is the reward of chastity, therefore let it be preserved.)

Dotis administratio, admeasurement of dower, where the widow holds more than her share, etc.

Double avail of marriage, the double of the value of the vassal's wife's tocher, formerly due to the superior, when the vassal refused a wife equal to him and offered by the superior; but this was modified to three years' rent of the vassal's free estate.—Old Scotch Law.

Double complaint, or Double quarrel, a grievance made known by a clerk or other person, to the archbishop of the province, against the ordinary, for delaying or refusing to do justice in some cause ecclesiastical, as to give sentence, institute a clerk, etc. It is termed a double complaint, because it is most commonly made against both the judge and him at whose suit justice is denied or delayed; the effect whereof is, that the archbishop taking notice of the delay, directs his letters, under his authentical seal, to all clerks of his province, commanding them to admonish the ordinary, within a certain number of days, to do the justice required, or otherwise to appear before him or his official, and there allege the cause of his delay; and to signify to the ordinary that if he neither perform the thing enjoined, nor appear nor show cause against it, he himself, in his court of audience, will forthwith proceed to do the justice that is due.—Cowel.

Double or treble costs. The true mode of estimating the amount of double costs was, first to allow the successful party the single costs, including the expenses of witnesses, counsel's fees, etc., and then allow him one-half of the amount of the single costs, without deducting counsel's fees, etc. Treble costs consisted of the single costs, half the single costs, and half of that half. But the law as to these costs is repealed by the 5 & 6 Vict. c. 97, which enacts that the successful party shall be entitled only to full and reasonable costs, to be taxed by the proper officer, which taxation shall, as in ordinary cases, be subject to review.

By 13 & 14 Vict. c. 61, s. 18, 'if any party shall sue another in any county court for any debt or other cause of action for which he hath already sued him, and obtained judgment, in any other court, the proof of such former suit having been brought and judgment obtained may be given, and the party so suing shall not be entitled to recover in such second suit, and shall be adjudged to pay three times the costs of such second suit to the opposite party.'

Double or treble Damages are given, in some cases, by particular statutes; see, e.g., 2 Wm. & M. sess. 1, c. 5, ss. 4 & 5, which give double and treble damages for pound breach and wrongful sale upon a distress respectively, but at common law the damages are always single. They are not reckoned in the same manner as double and treble costs, but arithmetically.

Double entry, a term among merchants to signify that books of account are kept in such a manner that they present the debit and credit of every transaction. It is used in contradistinction to single entry.

Double insurance, where a person, being fully insured by one policy, effects another on the same subject with other insurers, he may recover the amount of his actual loss against either set of insurers. But as insurance is a contract of indemnity only, the law will not allow him to recover beyond that amount; and if he obtain full satisfaction upon either of his policies, the under-writers upon this are entitled to contribution from the under-writers upon the other. If the policies are of the same date, all the under-writers on the several policies are equally bound to return to the assured the premiums paid by him for the sum insured above the value of the subject-matter of insurance in proportion to their subscription, but if of different dates, and the amount insured in the first set of policies is not equal to the value of the subject-matter, the under-writers on the last set of policies are alone liable for a return of the premium.—1 Arnould on Insurance, 4th ed., 309 et seq.

Double pleading. This was not allowed either in the declaration or subsequent pleadings. Its meaning with respect to the former was, that the declaration must not, in support of a single demand, allege several distinct matters, by any one of which that demand is sufficiently supported. With respect to the subsequent pleadings, the meaning was that none of them was to contain several distinct answers to that which preceded it; and the reason of the rule in each case was, that such pleading tended to several issues in respect of a single claim. See Steph. Plead., 313 et seq. The form of pleading is now altered by Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XIX. See DUPLICITY—PLEADING.

Double rent. This is a penalty on a tenant holding over after his own notice to quit has expired. By 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 13, it is enacted, that in case any tenant give notice to quit, and shall not deliver up possession of at the time in such notice contained, the said tenant shall, from thenceforward, pay to the landlord double the rent or sum which he should otherwise have paid.

Double value. This is a penalty on a tenant holding over after his landlord's notice to quit. By 4 Geo. II. c. 28, s. 1, it is enacted, that if any tenant for life or years hold over any lands, etc., after the determination of his estate, after demand made, and notice in writing given, for delivering the possession thereof, by the landlord, or the person having the reversion or remainder therein, or his agent thereunto lawfully authorized, such tenant so holding over shall pay to the person so kept out of possession, at the rate of double the yearly value of the lands, etc., so detained, for so long a time as the same are detained. See Woodfall's Landlord and Tenant, 12th ed., 717 et seq.

Double voucher, when a recovery was had, and an estate of freehold was first conveyed to any indifferent person against whom the præcipe was brought, and then he vouched the tenant-in-tail, who vouched over the common vouchee. For if a recovery were had immediately against a tenant-in-tail, it barred only the estate in the premises of which he was then actually seised, whereas, if the recovery were had against another person, and the tenant-in-tail were vouchee, it barred every latent right and interest which he might have in the lands recovered. 2 Bl. Com. 349. Recoveries were abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

Double waste. When a tenant, bound to repair, suffers a house to be wasted, and then unlawfully fells timber to repair it, he is said to commit double waste.

Doubles, letters-patent.—Cowel.

Doubtful sex. The ancients have several fables founded on the idea of the union of the qualities of the male and female in the same individual. See Ovid's Metam., L. iv.

Modern anatomists have completely set at rest the long-debated question of hermaphroditism, in the vulgar acceptance of the word. It is anatomically and physiologically impossible. Yet it is equally well established that many cases of extraordinary malformation have occurred, but they are either males, with some unusual organization or position of the urinary or generative organs, or females with an enlarged clitoris, or prolapsed uterus; or individuals in whom the generative organs have not produced their usual effect in influencing the development of the body. Thus it is evident that instead of combining the powers of both sexes, they are for the most part incapable of exerting any sexual function.

Our common law on this subject is thus laid down: a monster having deformity in any part of its body, yet if it have human shape, may inherit. And every heir is either a male or a female, or an hermaphrodite, that is, both male and female. And an hermaphrodite, who is also called androgynus, shall be heir either as a male or female, according to that kind of sex which prevails, and accordingly it ought to be baptised. The same rule—hermaphroditus tam masculo quam femine comparatur secundum prævalentiam sexus incalescentis—guides in cases concerning tenants by the courtesy.—2 Bl. Com. 247.

Dow [fr. do, Lat.], to give or endow.

Dowable, entitled to dower.

Dowager, a widow endowed.

Dowager-queen, the widow of the king. As such she enjoys most of the privileges belonging to her as queen consort. It is not treason to conspire her death or to attempt chastity, because the succession to the crown is not thereby endangered. No man, however, can marry her without a special license from the sovereign, on pain of forfeiting his lands or goods.—1 Bl. Com. 233.

Dower [fr. dos dotis, Lat., a marriage gift; dotare dower, Fr., endow, to furnish with a marriage portion. Dotarium, M. Lat., dotaire, Prov.; douaire, Fr., a dowry or marriage provision; douairière, a widow in possession of her portion, a dowager], the right which a wife has in the third part of the lands and tenements of which her husband dies possessed in fee-simple, fee-tail general, or as heir in special tail, which she holds from and after his decease, in severalty by metes and bounds, for her life, whether she have issue by her husband or not, and of what age soever she may be at her husband's decease, provided she be past the age of nine years.

The original law of dower became among our ancestors, with the increase of alienation, highly inconvenient and obtrusive of the free course of conveyances. The legislature, by the 27 Hen. VIII. c. 10 (the Statute of Uses), set about a method of diminishing the evil by providing a jointure in lieu of dower. By effect of this statute no widow can claim both jointure and dower. See JOINTURE.

But this statutable bar was found highly inconvenient, and recourse was had to many ingenious devices to prevent or defeat dower; but they were all more or less imperfect, and at length gave way to the universal practice of making an artificial form of conveyance, which obtained the name of a conveyance to uses to bar dower. The land was conveyed to such uses as the owner should appoint, and, in default of appointment to him for life, and on the determination of his estate in his lifetime, to a trustee and his heirs for the life of the owner in trust for him, and on the determination of the estate of the trustee, to the owner and his heirs.

An equitable bar of dower was deemed sufficient as between vendor and purchaser; as if a wife contract before marriage to relinquish her dower, either in consideration of a substituted provision, or of marriage, which is valuable in itself, and the highest consideration known to the law.

The report of the Real Property Commissioners led the way to the passing of the Dower Act, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 105, which places a wife's right to dower entirely at the mercy of her husband. In this act the word 'Land' extends to manors, advowsons, messuages, and all other hereditaments, whether corporeal or incorporeal (except such as are to dower).

When a husband dies beneficially entitled to any land for an interest not dowerable at law, and such interest, whether wholly equitable or partly legal and partly equitable, is an estate of inheritance in possession, or equal thereto (other than estate in joint-tenancy), his widow is entitled, in equity, to dower out of the same land (s. 1).'

This section has abolished a great anomaly. Dower is considered as a mere legal right, and did not attach unless the husband was, during the coverture, solely seised in possession of the legal inheritance; it was held, therefore, that equity ought not to create the right where it did not subsist at law, and that a wife was not dowerable of a trust estate. Yet a man might then, as now, be tenant by the courtesy of his deceased wife's trust estate; a seemingly partial diversity, for which Lord Chancellor Talbot said he could see no reason, but which, as he found it settled, he did not feel himself at liberty to correct (3 P. Wms. 234). This distinction is abolished, and dower is made to attach, in equity, upon the beneficial interest in possession of a sole owner of the inheritance, whether the ownership be exclusively equitable, or be in part composed of a legal estate enjoyed beneficially.

The widow is not entitled to dower out of the estates of joint-tenants, because of the right of survivorship.

When a husband shall have been entitled to a right of entry or action in any land, and his widow would be entitled to dower out of the same if he had recovered possession thereof, she shall be entitled to dower out of the same, although her husband have not recovered possession thereof, provided the dower be sued for or obtained within the period during which such right of entry or action might be enforced (s. 3).

Before this act a seisin was necessary, but a seisin in law was sufficient, i.e., where the inheritance in lands and hereditaments, of which a man died seised or possessed, descends upon his heir, who dies before entry or possession; if the heir had left a widow she would have had dower.

No widow shall be entitled to dower out of any land which shall have been absolutely disposed of by her husband in his lifetime or by his will (s. 4). All partial estates and interests, and all charges created by any disposition or will of a husband, and all debts, incumbrances, contracts, and engagements to which his land shall be subject or liable, are valid and effectual as against the right of his widow to dower (s. 5). A widow shall not be entitled to dower out of any land of her husband when, in the deed by which it was conveyed to him, or by any deed executed by him, it shall be declared that his widow shall not be entitled to dower out of such land (s. 6). A widow shall not be entitled to dower out of any land of which her husband shall die wholly or partially intestate, when by his will he declares his intention that she shall not be entitled to dower out of such land, or out of any of his land (s. 7). The widow's right to dower shall be subject to any conditions, restrictions, or directions which shall be declared by her husband's will (s. 8). Where a husband devises any land out of which his widow would be entitled to dower if the same were not so devised, or any estate or interest therein, to or for the benefit of his widow, she shall not be entitled to dower out of or in any land of her husband, unless a contrary intention appear by the will (s. 9).

These sections contain the essential alterations made by this act, and put the widow's dower altogether in the husband's power. It used to be a principle, that, after a title to dower had once attached, it was not in the power of the husband alone to defeat it by any act in the nature of alienation, or charge, whether voluntary, as by deed or will, or involuntary, as by bankruptcy, etc.; and that, therefore, all interests created by the husband after the attachment of title to dower, were voidable as to that part of the land which was recovered in dower.

The act does not extend to the dower of any woman married on or before the 1st January, 1834, and does not give to any will, deed, contract, engagement, or charge executed, entered into, or created before this day, the effect of defeating any right to dower.

The tenth section enacts, that no gift or bequest made by any husband to or for the benefit of his widow, of or out of his personal estate, or of or out of any of his land not liable to dower, shall defeat or prejudice her right to dower, unless a contrary intention be declared by his will.

Acceptance of a bequest of personalty neither did, nor, since this act, does, operate in bar of dower, unless an intention to that effect can be unequivocally established. See Ayres v. Wilson, 1 Ves. sen. 230.

Nothing in the act prevents any Court of Equity enforcing any covenant or agreement entered into by or on the part of the husband not to bar his widow's right to dower out of his lands, or any of them (s. 11); so that it should be ascertained by the purchaser of an estate free of dower, under this act, that the vendor has not entered into any agreement not to bar his widow's dower.

Nothing in the act is to interfere with any rule of equity by which legacies bequeathed to widows, in satisfaction of dower, are entitled to priority over other legacies (s. 12).

The principle alluded to in this clause is, that where a general legacy is given in consideration of a debt owing to the legatee, or of his relinquishing any right or interest, inasmuch as such a bequest cannot be treated as a bounty, like other bequests, but as the purchase-money for such right or interest, payment of it will be preferred to any other general legacies, which are merely voluntary, and, therefore, a legacy given to a widow in satisfaction of dower does not, in the event of a deficiency of assets, abate in proportion to the other legacies. The principle, however, only applies to cases where, on the testator's death, his widow is entitled to dower.

No widow is now entitled to dower ad ostium ecclesie, or ex assensu patris (s. 13).

The right to dower is consummated upon the husband's death, but the widow has no estate in the lands until the heir assigns the dower, unless the precise portion of land has been particularly specified. If the property be capable of division, and held by the husband in severalty, dower must be assigned by metes and bounds, but if otherwise, it must be done in a special and certain manner. If the heir or terre-tenant refused to assign the dower, the widow had several remedies for recovering it. Where no dower had been assigned, and writ of dower unde nihil habet lay, but if any part had been assigned, the writ of dower lay. By the C. L. P. Act, 1860, ss. 26, 27, it is provided that no writ of right of dower or writ of dower unde nihil habet, and no plaint for free-bench or dower in the nature of any such writ, and no quare impedit, shall be brought in any Court thereafter; but where any such writ, action, or plaint would then lie, an action may be commenced by ordinary writ of summons in the Court of Common Pleas; and now, therefore, an action may be brought in the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice. See DOWER UNDE NIHIL HABET.

No arrears of dower, nor any damages on account thereof, are recoverable by action or suit, for more than six years next before the commencement of such action or suit, by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 41.

Dower unde nihil habet, writ of, the remedy for a widow to whom no dower had been assigned within the time limited by law.—3 Bl. Com. 183. Abolished by C. L. P. Act, 1860.

Dower, Writ of right of, the remedy for a widow who had been deforced of part of her dower.—2 Bl. Com. 183. Abolished by C. L. P. Act, 1860, s. 26.

Dowl and deal [fr. dal, Brit., divisio, from daelan, Sax., whence dealing], a division.

Dowle stones, stones dividing lands, etc.—Cowel.

Downing Street Public Offices Extension Act, 18 & 19 Vict. c. 95, extended by 22 Vict. c. 19, and 29 & 30 Vict. c. 114.

Dowress, a widow entitled to dower.

Dowry [dos mulieris, Lat.], otherwise called maritagium, or marriage goods, that which the wife brings the husband in marriage. This word should not be confounded with dower.—Co. Litt. 31.

Dozen peers, twelve peers assembled at the instance of the barons, in the reign of Henry III., to be privy counsellors, or rather conservators of the kingdom.

Dozien, a territory or jurisdiction. See DECINERS.

Draft, or Draught, a bill drawn by one person upon another for a sum of money; an order in writing to pay money; also a rough copy of a legal document, etc., to be settled previously to engrossment; the property of the client, in business within the Solicitors' Remuneration Order (see SOLICITOR) by rule 3 of that Order.

Dragoman, an interpreter in the East.

Drainage. Drainage for sanitary purposes is regulated by the Public Health Act, 1875, which provides (s. 23) that local authorities may enforce drainage of undrained houses, etc., etc. Drainage for agricultural purposes is provided for by the following statutes:—By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 56, it is provided that the owners of limited interests in settled estates may apply to the Court of Chancery by petition for leave to make permanent improvements therein, 'by draining the same with tiles, stones, or other durable materials; or by warping, irrigation, or embankment in a permanent manner, or by erecting any buildings thereon of a permanent kind, incidental or consequential to such draining, warping, irrigation, or embankment, and immediately connected therewith'; and that the Court of Chancery, upon such an application, and proof that the money advanced has been duly expended, may make a charge on the inheritance, to be repaid by equal annual instalments, not less than twelve nor more than eighteen in number, with interest thereon, in the meantime, payable half-yearly; or in the case of buildings, by equal annual instalments, not less than fifteen, nor more than twenty-five in number. See SETTLED LAND.

By the Public Money Drainage Acts, tenants for life and other owners of land may obtain advances from government for works of drainage, which may be completed within five years: such advances to be repaid by a rent-charge on the land, after the rate of 6l. 10s. rent-charge for every 100l. advanced, and to be payable for the term of twenty-two years. See 9 & 10 Vict. c. 101, explained and amended by 10 Vict. c. 11; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 38; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 119; 13 Vict. c. 31; and 19 Vict. c. 9.

By the Private Money Drainage Act, 1849, 12 & 13 Vict. c. 100, amended by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 9, the owner of any land in Great Britain or Ireland might, with the sanction of the Inclosure Commissioners for England and Wales, borrow money for the improvement of such land by works of drainage, such money, with interest not exceeding five per cent. per annum, to be charged on the inheritance of the land, by way of a rent-charge, which is to be personal estate, for the term of twenty-two years. This act is now repealed by the 27 & 28 Vict. c. 114 ('The Improvement of Land Act, 1864'), whereby the commissioners are empowered to sanction improvements, of which improvements, if executed to their satisfaction, the expense may be charged on the fee or the inheritance.

In addition to these acts, the Land Drainage Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 133, provides for the constitution of 'elective drainage districts' to be managed by 'drainage boards' elected by persons rated to the sewers rates of the district. See Chitty's Statutes, vol. iii., tit. 'Land Improvement.'

The powers of the Court of Chancery under the above acts are exercised by the Chancery Division of the High Court (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34).

Dramatic Copyright Acts. See 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 15; 5 & 6 Vict. c. 45; 38 & 39 Vict. c. 12. See COPYRIGHT.

Drana, or Drecca, a drain or water-course. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 133.

Drapery [pannaria, Lat.], used as a head in our old statute books, and extended to the making and manufacturing of all sorts of woollen cloths.

Drawback, a term used in commerce to signify the remitting or paying back upon the exportation of a commodity of the duties previously paid on it.

A drawback is a device resorted to for enabling a commodity affected by taxes to be exported and sold in the foreign market on the same terms as if it had not been taxed at all. It differs in this from a bounty, that the latter enables a commodity to be sold for less than its natural cost, whereas a drawback enables it to be sold exactly at its natural cost. Were it not for the system of drawbacks it would be impossible, unless when a country enjoyed some very peculiar facilities of production, to export any commodity that was more heavily taxed at home than abroad. But the drawback obviates this difficulty, and enables merchants to export commodities loaded at home with heavy duties, and to sell them in the foreign market on the same terms as those fetched from countries where they are not taxed.

Most foreign articles imported into this country may be warehoused for subsequent exportation. In this case they pay no duties on being imported; and, of course, get no drawback on their subsequent exportation.

Sometimes a drawback exceeds the duty or duties laid on the article; and in such cases the excess forms a real bounty of that amount, and should be so considered.

See 26 & 27 Vict. c. 33, ss. 16 & 17; and Customs Consolidation Act, 1876, 39 & 40 Vict. c. 36, ss. 100, 104, & 117 et seq.

Drawings Copyright Act. 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68. See COPYRIGHT.

Draw-latches, thieves, robbers, wasters, and roberdsmen.—5 Edw. III. c. 14; 7 Rich. II. c. 5.

Drawee, the person on whom a bill of exchange is drawn, who is called, after acceptance, the acceptor. He must be named or otherwise indicated in the bill with reasonable certainty.—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 61, s. 6. See BILL OF EXCHANGE.

Drawer, the person making a bill of exchange and addressing it to the drawee.

By the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, s. 21, capacity to draw is co-extensive with capacity to contract (except that a corporation is not, by virtue of that section, capable), and by s. 23 signature is essential to liability.

Dreit. Drort, which see.

Drenches, or Drenges, tenants in capite. They are said to be such as, at the coming of William the Conqueror, being put out of their estates, were afterwards restored to them, on their making it appear that they were the true owners thereof, and neither in auxilio or consilio against him.—Spelm.

Drengage, the tenure by which the drenches or drenges hold their hands. See preceding title.

Drifts of the Forest [agitatio animalium in forestâ, Lat.], a view or examination of what cattle are in a forest, chase, etc., that it may be known whether it be surcharged or not; and whose the beasts are, and whether they are commonable. These drifts are made at certain times in the year by the officers of the forest; when all cattle are driven into some pound or place enclosed, for the before-mentioned purposes, and also to discover whether any cattle of strangers be there, which ought not to be common.—Mamwood, p. 2, c. xv.

Drift-land, Drofland, or Dryfland, a yearly rent paid by some tenants for driving cattle through a manor.—Encyc Lond.

Drince-lean, or drink-lean, a contribution from tenants in the time of the Saxons towards a potation of ale, provided to entertain the lord or his steward.

Drinking-Fountains. See 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 70.

Drivers, etc., of public carriages. As to misconduct by them, see 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 120; 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 50, s. 78; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, s. 54; 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, s. 35; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 89, s. 37 et seq.; and 12 & 13 Vict. c. 92, s. 22; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 33, s. 17; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 35; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 89, s. 17; and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 115, s. 8.

Drofden, a grove or woody place where cattle were kept.

Droit [Fr.], right, justice, equity. There were many writs of droit or right used in our law, but they were all abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, except a writ of dower, or writ of dower unde nihil habet, which were in their turn abolished by the C. L. P. Act, 1860, s. 26.

Droits of Admiralty, the perquisites attached to the Office of Admiral of England (or Lord High Admiral). Prince George of Denmark, the husband of Queen Anne and Lord High Admiral, resigned the rights to these droits to the Crown, for a salary, as Lord High Admiral, of 7000*l.* a year. When the office was vacant, they belonged of right to the Crown. Of these perquisites, the most valuable is the right to the property of an enemy seized on the breaking out of hostilities. Large sums were obtained by the Crown on various occasions in the course of the last great war for the seizure of the enemy's property, most of which, however, were eventually given up to the public service. In the arrangement of the Civil List during the last two reigns, it was settled that whatever droits of Admiralty accrued were to be paid into the Exchequer for the use of the public. The Lord High Admiral's right to the tenth part of the property captured on the seas has been relinquished in favour of the captors.

Droit d'aubaine [jus albinatus, Lat., i.e., alibi natus, born elsewhere], in old French law, a right of the king, entitling him, at the death of an alien, to all such alien was worth, unless he had a peculiar exemption.—Spelm.

Droit-droit, or jus duplicatum, a double right, i.e., the right of possession joined with the right of property, which makes a complete title to lands, tenements, and hereditaments. And when to this double right the actual possession is also united, when there is, according to the expression in Fleta, juris et seisinæ conjunctio, then, and then only, is the title to property completely legal.—2 Bl. Com. 199.

Droit ne done plus que soit demaunde.—2 Inst. 286.—(Justice gives no more than is demanded.)

Droit ne poit pas morier.—Jenk. Cent. 100.—(Right cannot die.)

Droitural, relating to right.

Dromoes, dromos, dromunda, ships of great burden; men-of-war.—Walsing. 1292.

Droog, a fortified hill or rock.—Indian.

Drop (v. n.), when the members of a Court are equally divided on the argument showing cause against a rule nisi, no order is made, i.e., the rule is neither discharged nor made absolute, and the rule is said to drop. In practice, there being a right to appeal, it has been usual to make an order in one way, the junior judge withdrawing his judgment.

Drovers, those that buy cattle in one place to sell in another.—Willis, 590. See 5 Eliz. c. 12, repealed by 12 Geo. III. c. 71, s. 1.

Dru, a thicket or wood.—Domesday Book.

Drugs, adulteration of, see The Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 63; and ADULTERATION.

Drunkennes, intoxication with strong liquor; habitual inebriety. Mere drunkenness was punishable by statutes 4 Jac. I. c. 5, and 21 Jac. I. c. 7, ss. 1, 3, by a fine of five shillings and confinement in the stocks in default of distress. Under the Licensing Act, 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), which repeals various previous enactments, drunkenness in a public place or licensed house is punishable by fine (s. 12); disorderly drunkenness is punishable by fine or imprisonment (Ib.), and refusal by drunken persons to quit licensed premises is punishable by fine which may be enforced by imprisonment with hard labour, s. 18. See Lely and Foulkes on the Licensing Acts, 2nd ed., p. 89. By the law of England drunkenness is no excuse for a crime. 'A drunkard,' says Sir Edward Coke (1 Inst. 247), 'who is voluntarius daemon, has no privilege thereby; but what hurt or ill soever he doth, his drunkenness doth aggravate it; nam crimen ebrietas et incendit et detegit.' Nevertheless, 'although drunkenness is no excuse for any crime whatever, yet it is often of very great importance in cases where it is a question of intention. A person may be so drunk as to be utterly unable to form any intention at all, and yet he may be guilty of very great violence.'—Per Patteson, J., in R. v. Cruse, 8 C. & P. 541.

But although drunkenness is no excuse for crime, a contract made by a person when so drunk as to be unable to understand what he is doing, is voidable if the person with whom the contract was made was aware of the fact, but it is not void, and may be ratified when he becomes sober.—Matthews v. Baxter, L. R. 8 Ex. 312.

The confinement of habitual drunkards, voluntarily submitting themselves thereto in the first instance, is regulated by the Habitual Drunkards' Act, 1879, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 19. This act, which is limited to expire in the year 1889 or 1890, defines an habitual drunkard as 'a person who, not being amenable to any jurisdiction in lunacy, is, notwithstanding, by reason of habitual intemperate drinking of intoxicating liquor, at times dangerous to himself or herself, or to others, or incapable of managing himself or herself, and his or her affairs.' It allows 'retreats' for the reception of such drunkards to be licensed by local authorities, such retreats not to be kept by any licensed keeper of a lunatic asylum, and to be subject to inspection by an 'inspector of retreats' appointed and paid by the Government. The term of confinement is to be as mentioned in the application to be admitted, but is in no case to exceed 12 months. The drunkard, if he escape from the retreat, may be apprehended and sent back by order of a justice of the peace. The act has as yet (Jan. 1883) been but little used.

Dry-craft [Celt. dravi, magician; draoid-headh, magic; hence also druid], witchcraft; magic.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Dry exchange [cambium siccum, Lat.], a term invented in former times for the disguising and covering of usury, in which something was intended to pass on both sides, whereas nothing passed but on one side, in which respect it was called dry; punished by 3 Hen. VII. c. 5.

Dry-mulctures, corn paid to the owner of a mill, whether the payers grind or not.—Scotch Law.

Dry-rent, a rent reserved without clause of distress. See RENT-SECK.

Duarchy [fr. duo, and ἀρχή, Gk.], a form of government where two reign jointly.

Duces tecum (you shall bring with you) subpœna. If a person, even if he be a party to a cause, have in his possession any written instrument, etc., which it is desired to put in evidence at the trial, instead of the common subpœna, he is served with a subpœna duces tecum, commanding him to bring it with him and produce it at the trial. Upon being served with a copy of this subpœna, he must attend at the trial with the instrument required, and produce it in evidence, unless he have some lawful or reasonable excuse for withholding it, of the validity of which excuse the Court and not the witness is to judge.

It is no excuse that the legal custody of the instrument belongs to another, if it be in the actual possession of the witness; but if it tend to criminate himself or his client (if the witness be a solicitor), or if it be his title-deed, the Court will not compel him to produce it.

If the witness, instead of bringing the papers, etc., required, deliver them to the opposite party, by whom they are withheld, the Court will allow secondary evidence of the contents of them to be given, without a notice to produce the originals. A witness, producing papers under a subpœna duces tecum, need not be sworn unless he be examined.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac., 12th ed., 353.

No subpœna for the production of an original record shall be issued unless a rule of Court or the order of a judge shall be produced to the officer issuing the same, and filed with him, and unless the writ shall be made conformable to the description of the document mentioned in such rule or order.—Rule 32 H. T. 1853. As to the former practice under this writ in Chancery, see Dan. Ch. Pr., 5th ed.

Duces tecum licet languidus, a writ directed to the sheriff upon a return that he cannot bring his prisoner without danger of death, he being aded languidus; whereupon the Court grants a habeas corpus in the nature of a duces tecum licet languidus. But this has long since been out of use; and where the person's life would be endangered by removal, the law will not permit it to be done.

Duchy Court of Lancaster, a tribunal of special jurisdiction, held before the chancellor of the duchy, or his deputy, concerning all matters of equity relating to lands holden of the Crown in right of the Duchy of Lancaster; which is a thing very distinct from the County Palatine (which has also its separate chancery, for sealing of writs, and the like), and comprises much territory which lies at a vast distance from it; as particularly a very large district surrounded by the city of Westminster. The proceedings in this Court are the same as were those on the Equity side of the Court of Chancery, so that it seems not to be a Court of Record; and, indeed, it has been holden that the Court of Chancery has a concurrent jurisdiction with the Duchy Court, and may take cognizance of the same causes. The appeal from this Court lies to the Court of Appeal, Jud. Act, 1873, s. 18.—3 Bl. Com. 78. See COUNTY PALATINE.

Duchy of Cornwall. As to the limitation of actions and suits by the Duke of Cornwall, see 23 & 24 Vict. c. 53, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 62, s. 2. As to leases of the possessions of the duchy, see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 50, s. 49, and 26 & 27 Vict. c. 49. The acts for the management of the duchy are 7 & 8 Vict. c. 65, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 49, and 31 & 32 Vict. c. 35. See STANNARY COURTS.

Ducking-stool. See CASTIGATORY.

Dueroire [Fr.], guaranty; equivalent to DEL CREDERE, which see.

Due [fr. dû, Fr.], anything owing. That which one contracts to pay or perform to another; that which law or justice requires to be paid or done.

It should be observed that a debt is said to be due the instant that it has existence as a debt; it may be payable at a future time.

Duel, in our ancient law, a legal combat between persons in a doubtful case for the trial of the truth, long since disused. In modern times a duel is a combat with weapons between two persons upon some quarrel precedent, wherein, if one of them is killed, the other and the seconds are guilty of murder whether the seconds fight or not.—Hawk. Pl. 47; Beccaria, 38, 39. An unpremeditated sudden fight is a rencontre. It is a misdemeanour to challenge another to fight, or to provoke another to send a challenge.—R. v. Phillips, 6 East, 464.

Dues, certain payments; rates or taxes.

Duke [fr. dux, Lat.; duc, Fr.], the highest title of honour next to the Prince of Wales. His consort is called a duchess. It is a mere title of dignity, without giving any domain, territory, or jurisdiction over the place whence the title is taken.

It was originally a Roman dignity, denominated à ducendo, leading or commanding. Accordingly, the first dukes (duces) were the ductores exercituum, commanders of armies. Under the emperors, the governors of provinces in war times were styled duces. In after times the same denomination was also given to the governors of provinces in time of peace.—Encyc. Lond.

Duke of Exeter's Daughter, a rack in the Tower, so called after a minister of Henry VI., who sought to introduce it into this country.

Dulocracy [fr. δούλος, Gk., a servant, and κράτος, power], a government where servants and slaves have so much license and privilege that they domineer.

Dum-barge, a barge without sails or oars.

Dum bene se gesserit (while he shall conduct himself well).

Dum bidding, in sales at auctions, when the amount which the owner of the thing sold was willing to take for the article was written, and placed by the owner under a candlestick, or other thing, and it was agreed that no bidding should avail unless equal to that.

Dum casta vixerit (so long as she shall live chaste). In deeds of separation of husband and wife, it is not uncommonly provided that the allowance thereby insured by the husband to the wife shall continue only so long as she shall live a chaste life. This proviso is termed the 'dum casta clause.'

Dum fuit infra ætatem (while he was within age), an abolished writ whereby one who had made a feoffment of his lands while an infant, might, when he came of full age, recover them. Within age, he might enter into the land, and take it back again, and by his entry he was remitted to his ancestor's right.—F.N.B. 192.

Dum fuit in prisonâ (while he was in prison), an abolished writ of entry to restore a man to lands which he had aliened under duress of imprisonment.—2 Inst. 482.

Dum non fuit compos mentis (while he was not of sound mind), an abolished writ that lay, when a man, not of sound mind, had aliened any lands or tenements, to recover them from the alienee.—F.N.B. 499.

Dum sola, whilst single or unmarried.

Dun, a mountain or high open place. The names of places ending in dun or don were either built on hills, or near them in open places.

Duna, a bank of earth thrown out of a ditch.—Old Records.

Dungeon [fr. donjon, originally the principal building of a district, or fortress, which from its position or structure had the command of the rest; fr. dominio, domnio, Lat. (as domnus for dominus), domgio, dongeo (as Fr. songer from somniare), donjon. Donjon in fortification is generally taken for a large tower or redoubt of a fortress where the garrison may retreat in case of necessity.—Bail. The name of dungeon has finally been bequeathed to such an underground prison as was formerly placed in the strongest part of a fortress.—Wedgw. The tower in which prisoners were kept, whence all prisons eminently strong were called dungeons], a close prison, dark or subterraneous.

Dunio, a double, a kind of base coin less than a farthing.—Old Records.

Dunnage, pieces of wood or other material placed against the sides and bottom of the hold of a vessel, to stow the cargo.

Dunsets, people that dwell on hilly places.—Old Records.

Dunum, or Duna [fr. dannarium, Lat.], a down or hill.

Duo non possunt in solido unam rem possidere. Co. Litt. 368.—(Two cannot possess the whole of one thing in specie.)

Duo sunt instrumenta ad omnes res aut confirmandas aut impugnandas—ratio et auctoritas. 8 Co. 16.—(There are two instruments either to confirm or impugn all things—reason and authority.)

Duodena, a jury of twelve men.—Cowel.

Duodenâ manu, twelve witnesses to purge a criminal of an offence.

Duplex querela (a double plaint), a process ecclesiastical, which is in the nature of an appeal from the refusal of an ordinary to institute, to his next immediate superior, as from a bishop to the archbishop; and if the Superior Court adjudge the cause of refusal to be insufficient, it will grant institution to the appellant.—Phil. Eccl. Law, 440. See DOUBLE COMPLAINT.

Duplicate, second letters-patent, granted by the Lord Chancellor in the same terms as the first when the latter were void; a copy or transcript of a deed, or other writing; the ticket given by a pawnbroker to the pawnner of a chattel.

Duplicate Will, where a testator executes two copies of his will, one to keep himself, and the other to be deposited with another person. Upon application for probate of a duplicate will, both copies must be deposited in the registry of the Court of Probate.

Duplicatio, the Roman pleading, answering to our rejoinder.

Duplicationem possibilitatis lex non patitur. 1 R. R. 321.—(The Law does not allow a duplication of possibility).

Duplicity. See DOUBLE PLEADING.

It was a general rule in Equity that a plea ought not to contain more defences than one, and that a double plea was informal and multifarious, and therefore improper. For if two matters of defence might be thus offered, the same reason would justify the making of any number of defences in the same way, by which the ends intended by a plea would not be obtained, and the Court would be compelled to give instant judgment upon a variety of defences, with all their circumstances, as alleged by the plea, before they were made out in proof; and, consequently, would decide upon a complicated case, which might not exist.—Story's Eq. Plead. 498. See now Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XXVII., r. 1. See PLEADING.

Durante, during; as durante bene placito, during pleasure; durante minore etate, during minority; durante viduitate, during widowhood; durante vidd, during life.

Durbar, a court, a hall of audience, a levee.—Indian.

Durden, a copse, a thicket in a valley.

Duress [fr. duressse, Fr.; durities, Lat., constraint], imprisonment, compulsion.

Duress is either by imprisonment or by threats. In order to constitute duress by imprisonment, either the imprisonment or the duress consequent upon it must be tortious and unlawful. Duress by threat has been thus divided: Through fear (1) of loss of life; (2) of loss of member; (3) of mayhem; (4) of imprisonment.

By the Common Law, a contract made during duress is not void, but voidable; and the person upon whom it is practised may avail himself of the duress, as a special defence to an action thereupon at any time. But the person who has employed the force cannot allege it is a defence, if the contract be insisted upon by the other.

The rule in Equity is, that where a person is not a free agent, and is not able to protect himself, the Court will protect him. The maxim of the Common Law is—Quod alias bonum et justum est, si per vim vel fraudem petatur, malum et injustum efficitur.—(What otherwise is good and just, if sought by force or fraud, becomes bad and unjust.) On this account, Courts of Equity watch with extreme jealousy all contracts made by a person while under imprisonment; and if there is the slightest ground to suspect oppression or imposition in such cases, they will set the contract aside. Circumstances also of extreme necessity and distress of the party, although not accompanied by any direct restraint or duress, may, in like manner, so entirely overcome his free agency as to justify the Court in setting aside a contract made by him on account of some oppression or fraudulent advantage, or imposition, attendant upon it.—Story's Eq. Jurisp., Vol. i., 201.

Duress by threat (per minas) is also an excuse for some crimes, though not all, for although a man be violently assaulted and has no other possible means of escaping death but by killing an innocent person, this fear or force shall not acquit him of murder; for he ought rather to die himself than escape by the murder of an innocent person. But in such a case he is permitted to kill the assailant; for there the law of nature and self-defence, its primary canon, have made him his own protector. It is to be observed, too, that the compulsion which takes away guilt must be the fear of no less than present death, or grievous bodily harm; for the mere apprehension of having houses burned, or goods destroyed or injured, is not sufficient.—Steph. Com., Vols. i. and iv.

Durham, County Palatine of. The jurisdiction, which was, for a long time, vested in the Bishop of Durham for the time being, was taken from him by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 19, which is amended by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 45, and vested as a separate franchise and royalty in the Crown. As to the jurisdiction of the Durham Court of Chancery, see these acts; and as to the Durham Court of Pleas, see 33 Geo. III. c. 68; 2 & 3

Vict. c. 16, ss. 4—37; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, ss. 102—3, 121—2, 229—236; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, ss. 100—3; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, ss. 12, 40—2. The latter Court is now abolished and its jurisdiction transferred to the High Court of Justice (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 16). See COUNTY PALATINE.

Dursley, blows without wounding or bloodshed; dry blows.—Blount.

Dustuck, a term used in Hindostan for a passport, permit, or order from the English East Indian Company. It generally meant a permit under their seal, exempting goods from the payment of duties.—Encyc. Lond.

Dusty-foot. See PIEPOUDRE.

Dutch auction, the setting up of property for sale by auction above its value, and gradually lowering the price till some person takes it.

Duty [fr. debere, Lat.; dovere, Ital.; deuere, O. Fr., of which last the participle at one time was properly deuté, corresponding to dovuto, Ital., duty, right, equity, and afterwards contracted to deu and mod. du, due.—Wedg.], a tax, an impost, or imposition; also an obligation. See PENSION.

Dwelling-houses for the Labouring Classes. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 34; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 132; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 28; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 28; 31 & 32 Vict. c. 120; and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 59. See LABOURERS' DWELLINGS.

Dwindled, dwindled; consumed.—Jacob.

Dyeing and bleaching works, are 'non-textile factories' within the Factory and Workshop Act, 1878. See FACTORY.

Dying declarations. See DEATH-BED DECLARATIONS.

Dyke-reed, or Dyke-reve, an officer who has the care and oversight of the dykes and drains in fenny countries.

Dynamite. The storage and carriage of dynamite is regulated by the Explosives Act, 1875. The use of it in public fisheries is prohibited by the Fisheries Dynamite Act, 1877, 40 & 41 Vict. c. 65, extended by the Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1878, 41 & 42 Vict. c. 39, s. 12, to private fisheries.

Dynasty [fr. δυναστεία, Gk., power], a race or succession of kings of the same line or family. Such were the dynasties of Egypt, China, etc.

Dysnomy [fr. δύς, Gk., and νομος, law], the act of making bad laws.

Dyvour (otherwise Bare-man), a Scotch term for a person involved in debt, and unable to pay his creditors; synonymous with the word bankrupt.—Skene.

E

Ea [Sax.], the water or river; also the mouth of a river on the shore between high and low watermark.

Ealder, or Ealding, an elder or chief. See ADELING.

Ealderman, or Ealdorman, the name of a Saxon magistrate; alderman, analogous to earl among the Danes; and senator among the Romans. See ALDERMAN.

Ealdor-biscop, an archbishop.

Ealdorburg [Sax.], the metropolis; the chief city. Obsolete.

Ealehus [fr. eale, Sax., ale, and hus, house], an alehouse.

Ealhorda [Sax.], the privilege of assizing and selling beer. Obsolete.

Earl [fr. eorl, Sax.; eoryl, Erse; comes, Lat.], a title of nobility, formerly the highest in England, now the third, ranking between a marquis and a viscount, and corresponding with the French Comte and the German Graf. The title originated with the Saxons, and is the most ancient of the English peerage. William the Conqueror first made this title hereditary, giving it in fee to his nobles; and allotting them for the support of their state the third penny out of the sheriff's court, issuing out of all pleas of the shire, whence they had their ancient title shiremen. At present the title is accompanied by no territory, private or judicial rights, but merely confers nobility and an hereditary seat in the House of Lords. In official instruments they are called by the sovereign 'trusty and well-beloved cousins,' an appellation as ancient as the reign of Henry IV., who was, as a fact, related to the greater part of the nobles (see Shakespeare's Henry IV., Part 2, Act 2, sc. 2), and took this public notice of it as a means of popularity. For some time after the Norman conquest they were called counts, and their wives are still called countesses.—Encyc. Lond.; 1 Bl. Com. 398. Earl meant originally a man of noble birth, as opposed to Ceorl.

Earl Marshal of England, a great officer of state who had anciently several Courts under his jurisdiction, as the Court of Chivalry and the Court of Honour. Under him is the herald's office, or college of arms. He was also a judge of the Marshalsea Court, now abolished. This office is of great antiquity, and has been for several ages hereditary in the family of the Howards.—3 Bl. Com. 68, 103; 3 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 335 n.

Earldom, the seigniorship of an earl; the title and dignity of an earl.

Earles-penny, money given in part payment. See EARNEST.

Earmark, a mark for identification. Money has no earmark, but it is an ordinary term for a privy mark made by any one on a coin.

Earnest [fr. earnest, Sax.], the sum paid by the buyer of goods in order to bind the seller to the terms of the agreement. It is enacted by the 17th section of the Statute of Frauds, 29 Ch. II. c. 3, that 'no contract for the sale of any goods, wares, and merchandize, for the price of 10*l.* sterling, or upwards, shall be allowed to be good, except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold, and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the bargain, or in part payment, or that some note or memorandum in writing of the said bargain be made and signed by the parties to be charged by such contract, or their agents thereunto lawfully authorised.'

As to what amount is sufficient earnest, Blackstone lays it down, that, 'if any part of the price is paid down, if it be but a penny, or any portion of the goods is delivered by way of earnest, it is binding.' To constitute earnest the thing must be given as a token of ratification of the contract, and it should be expressly stated so by the giver.

Ear-witness, one who attests or can attest anything as heard by himself.

Easement, a privilege without profit, which the owner of one neighbouring tenement hath of another, existing in respect of their several tenements, by which the one (called the servient) tenement is obliged to suffer or not to do something on his own land for the advantage of the owner of the other (called the dominant) tenement, e.g., a right of way, a right of passage of water. It is the servitus of the civil law. An easement is an incorporeal hereditament, which from its nature can only be created by grant: hence the origin of all easements may be referred to a grant by the owner of the servient tenement either expressed or implied. In the majority of cases the right is founded upon the implication of a grant, the terms of which can only be ascertained from the actual enjoyment of the easement. Such implication arises in two ways:—1. By the severance of one tenement into two parts; 2. By prescription. See Gale on Easements, and see 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 71, s. 2.

East India Company. The East India Company was originally established for prosecuting the trade between England and India, which they acquired a right to carry on exclusively. Since the middle of the last century, however, the company's political affairs had become of more importance than their commerce. In 1851, by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 106, the government of the territories of the company was transferred to the Crown. See INDIA.

Easter [fr. Ostern, Ger., supposed to be derived from the name of the Teutonic goddess Ostera (oster, to arise), celebrated by the ancient Saxons early in the spring], a feast of the church held in memory of our Saviour's resurrection. The Greeks and Latins call it pascha, passover, to which Jewish feast our Easter answers.

Easter Monday is made a Bank holiday by the 34 Vict. c. 17, and 38 & 39 Vict. c. 13.

Easter-offerings, or Easter-dues, small sums of money paid to the parochial clergy by the parishioners at Easter as a compensation for personal tithes, or the tithe for personal labour; recoverable under 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 6 before justices of the peace.—2 & 3 Edw. IV. c. 13; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 62, s. 9; Reg. v. Hall, L. R. 1 Q. B. 632.

Easter sittings of the Supreme Court commence on the Tuesday after Easter week, and terminate on the Friday before Whitsunday. (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. LXI., r. 1).

Easter Term, formerly called a moveable term, but afterwards fixed, beginning on the 15th of April, and ending on the 8th of May in every year. See 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, s. 6; 1 Wm. IV. c. 3, s. 3.

Easter Vacation in the Supreme Court commences on Good Friday, and terminates on Easter Tuesday (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. LXI., r. 2). See VACATION.

Easterling, a coin struck by Richard II., which is supposed to have given rise to the name of sterling, as applied to English money.

Eastinus, an easterly coast or country.

Eat inde sine die, words used on the acquittal of a defendant, that he may go thence without a day, i.e., be dismissed without any further continuance or adjournment.

Eaves. The edge of a roof, built so as to project over the walls of a house, in order that the rain may drop therefrom to the ground instead of running down the wall.

Eaves-droppers, persons who listen under walls or windows, or the eaves of a house, to hearken after discourse, and thereupon to frame slanderous and mischievous tales. They are a common nuisance, and presentable at the courtleet, or were indictable at the sessions, and punishable by fine and finding sureties for good behaviour.—2 Hawk. P. C. c. x., s. 58.

Ebdomadarius, an officer in cathedral churches who supervised the regular performance of divine service and prescribed the particular duties of each person in the choir.

Eberemorth, Eberemors, Ebere-murder. See ABEREMURDER.

Ecce modo mirum, quod fœmina fert breve regis, non nominando virum conjunctum robore legis. Co. Litt. 132 b.—(Behold, indeed, a wonder! that a woman has the king's writ without naming her husband who by law is united to her.)

Ecchymosis [fr. ἐκχύμωσις, Gk., extravasation of blood], an appearance of livid spots on the skin, occasioned by an extravasation of the blood from a vein between the flesh and skin. It is in fact an effusion or spreading of blood into the cellular tissue, produced by violent contusion; it is sometimes extended to a considerable distance beyond the seat of the injury. When the quantity of blood is sufficiently large to produce a tumour or swelling of any magnitude, it is called a thrombus.—See Beck. Med. Jurisp. 534.

Ecclesia, a church, an assembly, a parsonage. Ecclesia ecclesiæ decimas solvere non debet. Cro. Eliz. 479.—(A church ought not to pay tithes to a church.)

Ecclesia fungitur vice minoris; meliorem conditionem suam facere potest, deteriorem nequaquam. Co. Litt. 341.—(The church enjoys the privilege of a minor; it can make its own condition better but not worse.)

Ecclesia non moritur. 2 Inst. 3.—(The church does not die.)

Ecclesiæ magis favendum est quam persone. Godolphin Rep. Can. 172.—(The church is to be more favoured than the parson.)

Ecclesiarch [fr. ἐκκλησία, Gk., church, and ἀρχός, a chief], the ruler of a church.

Ecclesiastic, or Ecclesiastical, something belonging to or set apart for the church, as distinguished from civil or secular, with regard to the world.

Ecclesiastical Authorities, principally the clergy under the sovereign, as temporal head of the church, set apart from the rest of the people or laity, in order to superintend the public worship of Almighty God and the other ceremonies of religion, and to administer spiritual counsel and instruction.

The several orders of the clergy are—I. Archbishops and bishops. II. Deans and chapters. III. Archdeacons. IV. Rural deans. V. Parsons (under whom are included appropriators) and vicars. VI. Curates. Churchwardens or sidesmen, and parish clerks and sextons, inasmuch as their duties are connected with the church, may be considered to be a species of Ecclesiastical Authorities.

Ecclesiastical Benefice. See ADVOWSON, BENEFICE.

Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, a body corporate, erected by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 77, empowered to suggest measures conducive to the efficiency of the established church to be ratified by orders in council. Church Estates Commissioners are appointed ex officio members of this corporation. See 3 & 4 Vict. c. 113; 4 & 5 Vict. c. 39; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 94; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 124; and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 64. See CHURCH BUILDING COMMISSIONERS ACTS.

Ecclesiastical Corporations. Corporations created for the furtherance of religion, and for the perpetuation of the rights of the church, the members of which are exclusively spiritual persons. They are of two kinds: corporations sole; viz., bishops, certain deans, parsons, and vicars; and corporations aggregate; viz., deans and chapters, and formerly prior and convent, abbot and monks, and the like.

The ordinary is their visitor, by the common law. The pope formerly, and now the Crown as supreme ordinary, is the visitor of the archbishop or metropolitan; the metropolitan has the charge and coercion of all his suffragan bishops, and the bishops in their several dioceses are, in ecclesiastical matters, the visitors of all deans and chapters, of all parsons and vicars, and of all other spiritual corporations.—1 Bl. Com. 470.

Ecclesiastical Courts [curiæ Christianitatis, Lat.] are the archdeacon's court, the consistory courts, the court of arches, the court of peculiars, the prerogative courts of the two archbishops, the faculty court, and the privy council, which is the appeal court. See also PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT.

Ecclesiastical Dilapidations Act, 1871, 34 & 35 Vict. c. 43, amended by 35 & 36 Vict. c. 96.

Ecclesiastical Division of England is into provinces, dioceses, archdeaconries, rural deaneries, and parishes.

Ecclesiastical Law, the law administered in the ecclesiastical courts; it is derived from the civil and canon law. Consult Phillimore's Ecclesiastical Law.

Edicus [fr. ἔδικος, Gk., from ἐκ and δίκη, justice], an attorney or proctor of a corporation; a recorder.—Civ. Law.

E converso, conversely. See CONVERSE.

Ecumenical [fr., οἰκουμένη, Gk., the habitable world], general, universal: as an Ecumenical Council.

Edderbreche [Sax.], the offence of hedge-breaking. Obsolete.

Edestia [fr. ædes, Lat.], buildings.—Old Records.

Edia, ease; aid or help.—Cowel.

Edict [fr. edictum, Lat.], a proclamation, command, or prohibition; a law promulgated.

Edictum Theodorici. This is the first collection of law that was made after the downfall of the Roman power in Italy. It was promulgated by Theodoric, King of the Ostrogoths, at Rome in A.D. 500. It consists of 154 chapters, in which we recognise parts taken from the Code and Novellæ of Theodosius, from the Codices Gregorianus and Hermogenianus, and the Sententiæ of Paulus. The edict was doubtless drawn up by Roman writers, but the original sources are more disfigured and altered than in any other compilation. This collection of law was intended to apply both to the Goths and the Romans, so far as its provisions went; but when it made no alteration in the Gothic law, that law was still to be in force.—Savigny, Geschichte des R. R., etc.

Education. See 7 & 8 Vict. c. 37; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 131; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 116. Under the Poor Law, see 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 40 (amended by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 82, and 13 & 14 Vict. cc. 11 & 101); and 18 Vict. c. 34; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 43; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 6, ss. 47—9; 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122. See also ENDOWED SCHOOLS; SCHOOL BOARD, etc.

By the Elementary Education Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75, amended by 36 & 37 Vict. c. 86), provision is made for the establishment of educational districts; the providing for every such district sufficient amount of accommodation in public elementary schools, available for all the children resident in such district, for whose elementary education efficient and suitable provision is not otherwise made; the management of such schools by district school boards; the maintenance of the same by means of local rates; the enforced attendance of children at such schools, etc.

Egistment. See AGISTMENT.

Eia, or Ey, an island.—Cowel.

Ei incumbit probatio, qui dicit, non qui negat: cum per rerum naturam factum negantis probatio nulla sit.—(The proof lies upon him who affirms, not upon him who denies: since, by the nature of things, he who denies a fact cannot produce any proof.)

Ei nihil turpe, cui nihil satis. 4 Inst. 53.—(To whom nothing is sufficient, to him nothing is base.)

Eikon basilikê, a work published after the death of Charles I. as his; now attributed to Dr. Gauden. It gives an account of his last days.

Ejecta, a woman ravished or deflowered, or cast forth from the virtuous.—Blount.

Ejectione custodiæ [ejectment de garde, Fr.], a writ that lay against him who had cast out the guardian from any land during the minority of the heir. Reg. Orig. 162. There were two other writs not unlike this; the one termed ravishment de garde, and the other droit de gard.

Ejectione firmæ, a writ which lay to eject a tenant from his holding. See next article.

Ejectment, the only mixed action at common law, the whole method of proceeding in which was anomalous, and depended on fictions invented and upheld by the Court for the convenience of justice, in order to escape from the inconveniences which were found to attend the ancient forms of real and mixed actions.

This possessory action is mixed, because it seeks to recover the possession of land (which is real), and damages and costs for the wrongful withholding of the land (which are personal). The proper technical term for the action since the Judicature Act is 'Recovery of Land,' but the term 'ejectment' has by no means gone out of use.

Until abolished by the C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 168, the forms of this action exhibited the most remarkable string of fictions then recognised by the courts of common law. The original mode of proceeding was this: The party having the right of entry upon the land entered upon it, and being then in possession, he there, upon the land, sealed and delivered a lease for years to some third person, who, having entered thereunder, remained in possession until the prior tenant, or he who had the previous possession, entered and ousted him, or until some other person, called the casual ejector, either by accident or previous arrangement, came upon the land and ejected him, whereupon the lessee brought his action against the casual ejector, or the prior tenant. If the action were brought against the casual ejector, and not against the tenant in possession, the courts of law, not suffering the tenant to lose his possession without an opportunity of defending it, promulgated a rule that no plaintiff should proceed in ejectment to recover lands against a casual ejector, without giving notice to the tenant in possession, if there were any, and making him a defendant if he pleased. But during the Protectorate, Lord Chief Justice Rolle, who then presided in the Upper Bench, introduced the fictitious mode of proceeding which formed the practice now abolished. Since much trouble and formality attended the actual making of the lease, entry, and ouster, as above described, no lease was sealed (except in the case of vacant possession), no entry and ouster actually made (unless to avoid a fine, for though fines were abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, yet an entry must still be made to avoid a fine commenced before the passing of this act), the plaintiff and defendant were fictitious persons, and all the preliminaries were merely ideal, for the sole purpose of trying the title. The action was commenced by the party claiming title delivering to the party in possession a declaration in which the plaintiff (John Doe) and the defendant (Richard Roe) were fictitious persons. The declaration stated that a lease of the premises in question for a term of years had been made by the party claiming the title (who was the real plaintiff) to John Doe, who entered upon the land by virtue of such demise, and that afterwards Richard Roe, the casual ejector, entered and ousted John Doe, during the continuance of his term. Appended to this declaration was a notice signed by Richard Roe, addressed to the tenant in possession (who was the actual defendant) informing him of the action brought by the lessee, and that Richard Roe had no title to the premises, and advising him to appear at a certain time and defend his title, otherwise he, Richard Roe, would suffer judgment by default, by which the actual tenant would be turned out of possession by the sheriff under a writ of habere facias possessionem.

The plaintiff, in order to maintain his action at the trial, must have made out these four points:—viz., title, lease, entry, and ouster. The real defendant, therefore, was admitted to defend upon condition of his entering into a consent rule to confess, at the trial of the cause, the lease of the lessor, the entry of the plaintiff John Doe, and the ouster by Richard Roe. These requisites being fictitious, could not have been proved, and if not confessed a nonsuit would have been the consequence, but by the actual defendant's confession of them, he agreed not to avail himself of the want of such proof, but to rest his defence entirely upon the merits of his title. And to prevent his breaking his engagement, a condition was added, that in such case he should pay the costs of the suit, and should allow judgment to be entered against the casual ejector (Richard Roe).

The title of the action, after the tenant's appearance, stood thus:—Doe (the fictitious lessee), on the demise of ——— (the lessor or person really claiming the title), against ——— (the real defendant, the casual ejector Richard Roe having withdrawn).

As to the proceedings under the Judicature Acts in an action for the recovery of land, they are, with some exceptions, the same as in other actions in the High Court. The following are the principal points in which the practice in this differs from that in other actions. The writ will be endorsed as required by the Act of 1875 (App. A., part II., s. IV.) and in such endorsement mesne profits may be claimed; and there will be the same pleadings as in other actions. But a defendant in possession by himself or his tenant, need not plead his title unless he relies upon an equitable defence (Ib., Ord. XIX., r. 15). In case of vacant possession the writ may be served by posting a copy on some conspicuous part of the property (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. IX., r. 8). Any person not named in the writ may appear and defend by leave of the Court or a judge, on filing an affidavit showing that he is in possession by himself or his tenant (Ibid., Ord. XII., rr. 18, 20); and in the latter case shall state in his appearance that he is only landlord (r. 19). The defence of any person may be limited to part of the land (r. 21). In default of appearance or pleading the plaintiff may enter judgment to recover any part not defended for (Ibid., Ord. XIII., r. 7; Ord. XXIX., rr. 7, 8).

Judgment in ejectment may be executed as before by writ of possession (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XLII., r. 3; Ord. XLVIII.).

It is a maxim that the plaintiff must recover on the strength of his own title, and not on the weakness of that of his adversary; for his possession gives him a right against every one who cannot establish a good title, and it is sufficient for him if he can show the real title of the land to be out of the plaintiff. It suffices, however, to prove undisturbed possession of an estate by the claimant or his ancestor for twenty years, from which the highest title is to be presumed, until the contrary be proved. The rule that the plaintiff in ejectment must recover on the strength of his own title, is qualified in its application to the case of landlord and tenant, for a tenant who has come in under the plaintiff will not be allowed to controvert his title, although he might show that it had subsequently expired.—Adam's Eject. c. iv.

The action is maintainable for anything, whether corporeal or incorporeal, upon which an entry can be made, or of which the sheriff can give possession.

If a tenant do not forthwith give notice to his landlord of an ejectment having been brought against him, he forfeits three years' rack-rent of the premises recoverable by action (15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, ss. 168—221; Gen. R. Hil. T. 1853, 112—114). A plaintiff in the second ejectment for the same premises against the same defendant, may be ordered to give security for cost after the appearance (17 & 18 Vict. c. 125, s. 93).

The person who has the right of entry may, if the premises be unoccupied and vacant, peaceably and without force, enter and take possession of them, without ejectment; though it is better to proceed by ejectment, more especially where he claims adversely to the person last in possession. It is a nice question, what is a vacant possession. A distinction must here be made between actual abandonment of possession and discontinuance to occupy, still retaining the virtual possession. Locking up the premises and quitting is an instance of actual abandonment; leaving anything, such as hay, in a barn, will be an instance of discontinuance of possession. In the former case the landlord must proceed in the ejectment as upon a vacant possession; in the latter in the ordinary way.

The 11 Geo. II. c. 19, s. 16, and 57 Geo. III. c. 52, give power to two justices of the peace, when premises are deserted by a tenant, and no sufficient distress is to be found upon them to answer the arrears of rent, to give possession of them to the landlord.

As to proceedings in ejectment by landlord for forfeiture by non-payment of rent:—

First, where there is a sufficient distress upon the premises, the proceeding is under the common law; but before the ejectment is brought (the proceedings of which have been previously described, according as the tenant is in possession, or the possession is vacant), a demand of the rent must be made, unless there is an express agreement dispensing with such demand. And inasmuch as the common law does not favour forfeitures, great strictness is required in this respect. The landlord, or another person under a formal power, must go in person, upon some notorious place on the land, as before the front door of the dwelling-house (unless the lease specify a place for payment of rent, and then, upon the place pointed out), on the last day on which the rent can be paid to save a forfeiture, at sunset, and demand the precise sum due, although, in fact, nobody is present upon the part of the tenant to answer; if the rent be not then paid, the landlord is entitled to bring his ejectment. This proceeding has been seldom practised, both on account of the nicety of the demand, and because the tenant, by filing a bill in equity, might obtain an injunction staying proceedings, upon paying the arrears of rent; and could now obtain equitable relief by defence to the action (Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24).

Where there is not a sufficient distress upon the premises, the ejectment is regulated by the C. L. P. Act, 1852, ss. 210—212, which enacts, that where a half-year's rent shall be in arrear, and a right of re-entry has been reserved by the express terms of the lease, and no sufficient distress can be found on the premises to countervail the arrears of rent, the landlord or lessor may, without any demand or re-entry, serve a writ in ejectment; but the tenant, by paying the rent and costs, can obtain relief, and this (under the former practice) either at law or in equity. The proceedings are the same as in ordinary cases, mutatis mutandis.

By the C. L. P. Act, 1860, ss. 1—3, provision was made for relief after trial. These provisions were supplementary to those of the Act of 1852, and enabled the Common Law Courts to administer such relief within the six months limited by the Act of 1852, s. 210, for the intervention of a court of equity. It will be borne in mind, that now all divisions of the Supreme Court have power to give effect to equitable rights and defences (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 24).

The proceedings in ejectment upon the determination of a tenancy are regulated by the C. L. P. Act, 1852, ss. 213—215.

Possession can be obtained by a landlord against his tenant by summary proceedings before two justices, under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 74, where the term exceeds not seven years, and the rent is not more than 20*l.*, no fine being reserved; and in a County Court, where neither the value of the premises nor the rent payable in respect thereof exceed 50*l.* a year, and where no fine or premium shall have been paid.—19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 50.

Ejectment of any kind may be brought in the County Courts where the annual value of the property does not exceed 20*l.* (30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 11).

As to former proceedings in ejectment by a landlord whose right of entry accrued after Hilary or Trinity Terms, see the C. L. P. Act, 1852, ss. 217, 218.

As to mesne profits, see that title.

Consult Adams or Cole on Ejectment.

Ejectum, jet, jetsom, wreck, etc.

Ejectus, a whoremonger.—Blount.

Eigné [fr. ainé, Fr.], eldest, or first-born. See BASTARD EIGNÉ.

Eik to a reversion, an additional loan to a wadsetter (or mortgagor), who is the reversioner of the mortgaged estate; also to a testament, an addition to an inventory made up by an executor.—Scotch term.

Einecia, eldership. See ESNECY.

Eire, or Eyre [fr. iter, Lat.], the Court of justice itinerant, and justices in eyre. They were, anciently, sent with a general commission into divers counties to hear such causes as are termed pleas of the Crown; and this was done for the ease of the people who must else have been brought to the Queen's Bench, if the cause were too high for the County Court: it is said they were sent but once in seven years. The eyre of the forest is the justice-seat, which, by an ancient custom, was held every three years by the justices of the forest journeying up and down for that purpose.—Bract. l. 3, c. xi.

Ejuration, renouncing or resigning one's place.—Encyc. Lond.

Ejus nulla culpa est cui parere necesse sit. D. 17, 50, 169.—(He is not in any fault who is bound to obey.)

Ejusdem generis (of the same kind or nature).

Electio est interna libera et spontanea separatio unius rei ab aliâ, sine compulsione, consistens in animo et voluntate. Dyer, 281.—(Election is an internal, free, and spontaneous separation of one thing from another, without compulsion, consisting in intention and will.)

Electio semel facta, et placitum testatum, non patitur regressum. Co. Litt. 146.—(Election once made, and plea witnessed, suffers not a recall.)

Elder Brethren. A name of the Masters of the Trinity House.

Election, the act of selecting one or more from a greater number for an office; also the exercise of his choice by a man left to his own free will to take or to do one thing or another.

The doctrine of election, strictly so called, is derived from the civil law, and is the obligation imposed upon a person to choose between two inconsistent or alternative rights, or claims, in cases where there is a clear intention of the person from whom he derives one, that he should not enjoy both. Every case of election, therefore, presupposes a plurality of gifts or rights, with an intention, expressed or implied, of the person who has a right to control one or both, that one should be a substitute for the other. The person who is to take has a choice, but he cannot enjoy the benefits of both.

As to a defendant in Equity (before the Jud. Acts) compelling a plaintiff to elect between proceedings at Law and in Equity, see Consol. Ord. 1860, xlii., 5 and 6. By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24, all parts of the Supreme Court have now equitable jurisdiction.

Election of Members of Parliament. See the Reform Act, 1832, 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 45; the 'Representation of the People Act, 1867' (30 & 31 Vict. c. 102); the Ballot Act, 1872, 35 & 36 Vict. c. 33; Chitty's Statutes, vol. iv., tit. 'Parliament'; and Rogers on Elections. The manner of proceeding on election petitions is regulated by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, and the Reg. Gen. of M. T., 1868, made pursuant thereto. Such petitions must be presented to the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court. Voting by ballot was introduced by the Ballot Act, 1872, 35 & 36 Vict. c. 33, which was originally limited to expire on the 31st December, 1880, and has not yet (Jan. 1883) been made perpetual. See CORRUPT PRACTICES.

Election to Municipal Offices. See MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

Election Judges. Judges of the High Court selected in pursuance of the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 125, s. 11, and Jud. Act, 1873, s. 38, for the trial of election petitions.

Election-Auditors, officers annually appointed, to whom was committed the duty of taking and publishing the account of all expenses incurred at parliamentary elections. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 102, ss. 18, 26—28. But these sections have been repealed by the 26 Vict. c. 29, which throws the duty of preparing the accounts on the declared agent of the candidate, and the duty of publishing an abstract of it on the returning officer.

Electiones fiant ritè et libère sine interruptione aliquâ. 2 Inst. 169.—(Let elections be made rightly and freely, without any interruption.)

Elector, he that has a vote in the choice of any officer; a constituent; also the title of certain German princes who formerly had a voice in the election of the German Emperors.

Electric Lighting. The supply of electricity for lighting is facilitated and regulated by the Electric Lighting Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 56. Under this act powers may be obtained either (1) by license from the Board of Trade; or (2) by Provisional Order of the Board of Trade, needing confirmation by special act of Parliament; or (3) by special act of Parliament. These licenses and orders may either be granted to the local authorities themselves, or, with their consent, to independent contractors. Land may be purchased by agreement, but not compulsorily. Licenses continue in force for any period not exceeding 7 years, but are renewable. By s. 27 an undertaking authorised by provisional order or special act may be purchased compulsorily by the local authority within six months after the expiration of 21 years.

Large powers of supervision are vested in the Board of Trade. By s. 5 that Board may frame rules as to notices, etc., on application for licenses and provisional orders: and the rules now (Jan. 1883) in force provide (inter alia) that a local authority is to have a preference over private contractors. By s. 6 the Board may insert in a license or order such provisions as they think proper in addition to the prices to be charged, the enforcement of a supply of the light, and the securing the safety of the public from personal injury. See Fitzgerald's Electric Lighting Act; Bower & Webb on the Law of Electric Lighting.

Electric Telegraphs, establishment of. See 7 & 8 Vict. c. 85, ss. 13, 14; 26 & 27 Vict. c. 112; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 3. By the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 110, and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 73, provisions are made for transferring the telegraphs to the Postmaster-General. See further on this subject POST OFFICE TELEGRAPHS. The destruction or removal of any part of an electric telegraph or the obstruction of messages is a misdemeanour; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 37, 38.

Elects, officers of the College of Physicians.

Eleemosyna, alms.

Eleemosyna Regis, and Eleemosyna Aratri, or Carucarum, a penny which King Ethelred ordered to be paid for every plough in England towards the support of the poor.—Leg. Ethel. c. i.

Eleemosynæ, possessions belonging to the church.—Blount.

Eleemosynaria, the place in a religious house where the common alms were deposited, and thence by the almoner distributed to the poor.

Eleemosynarius, the almoner or peculiar officer who received the rents and gifts, and in due method distributed them to pious and charitable uses.

Eleemosynary Corporations, corporate bodies, constituted for the perpetual distribution of the free alms or bounty of the founder of them. Of this kind are all hospitals for the maintenance of the poor, sick, and impotent, and all colleges, both in our universities and out of them, which are founded for the promotion of piety and learning by proper regulations and ordinances, and for imparting assistance to the members of those bodies, in order to enable them to prosecute their devotions and studies with greater care and assiduity. These eleemosynary corporations, though in some things partaking of the nature of ecclesiastical bodies, are, strictly speaking, lay, and not ecclesiastical, even though composed of ecclesiastical persons; and accordingly, they are not subject to the jurisdiction of the ecclesiastical courts, or to the visitations of the ordinary or diocesan in their spiritual characters.—3 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 6, 7, 26.

Elegit (he has chosen), a judicial writ of execution founded on the statute of Westminster II. (13 Edw. I. c. 18) issuing out of the court where the record or other proceeding is upon which it is grounded, and addressed to the sheriff, who, by virtue of it, gives to the judgment-creditor the lands and tenements of the judgment-debtor, to be occupied and enjoyed until the money due on such judgment is fully paid; during the time he so holds them he is called tenant by elegit, and his interest is denominated an estate of freehold, defeasible upon a condition subsequent. His interest, however, is really a chattel, and passes to the executor.

The writ of elegit (which has come more into use since the decision in ex parte Abbott, in re Gourlay, 15 Ch. D. 447, that s. 87 of the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, does not apply to it) now extends to all the debtor's lands, instead of a moiety as before; and also to the debtor's customary and copyhold lands, subject to the rights of the lord of the manor; also to lands over which the debtor has any disposing power, which he may, without the assent of any other person, exercise for his own benefit; also to trust estates, estates in reversion, or leases for lives or years, rent-charges, lands in ancient demesne, the wife's lands which the husband has during coverture, lands of a bishop, and terms for years; also (see ex parte Abbott, supra) to goods and chattels. But the following property cannot be extended: an advowson in gross; the glebe belonging to an ecclesiastical benefice, or the churchyard, because they are each solum Deo consecratum; and any tenement that cannot be granted over; also an estate vested in a purchaser or mortgagee.—18 & 19 Vict. c. 15, s. 11. See 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, s. 1, which provides that writs of execution of judgments must be registered, otherwise such judgment shall not affect real property as against a bona fide purchaser for valuable consideration; and 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, which provides that no judgment, statute, or recognizance to be entered up after the passing of that act, shall affect any land, until such land shall have been actually delivered in execution, by virtue of a writ of elegit, or other lawful authority, in pursuance of such judgment, statute, or recognizance.

Upon the receipt of the elegit, the sheriff must impanel a jury, who are to inquire of all the goods and chattels of the debtor, and appraise the same, and also to inquire as to his lands and tenements, and their value: upon such inquiry had, the sheriff is to deliver to the execution-creditor all the goods and chattels of the debtor (except his oxen and beasts of the plough) at the value set upon them by the jury; and if the goods be sufficient to satisfy the debt, the lands cannot be extended. If, however, the goods be insufficient, the sheriff is to proceed to make and deliver execution to the execution-creditor of all the lands, etc., of the debtor, and must return the writ, in order that the inquisition may be recorded in the court out of which the elegit issued. The 5 & 6 Vict. c. 98, abolished poundage on this writ.

If no land be extended upon an elegit, the plaintiff may, of course, have an elegit into another county; or even if lands be extended upon the first elegit the plaintiff, on a suggestion that the defendant has more lands either in the same, or in another county, may have another elegit. But where land is extended under an elegit, no other writ of execution but an elegit can be sued out against the defendant, unless the plaintiff be evicted from the lands extended, or the elegit be ineffective or void.

The sheriff delivers only legal possession of the lands, or rather a right of entry, and not actual possession; if, therefore, the execution-creditor cannot enter without force, he should proceed by ejectment. As soon as the plaintiff shall have fully satisfied his judgment out of the extended value of the land, the defendant may recover his land either by ejectment, scire facias ad rehavendam terram, action, or reference to one of the masters of the Court to ascertain the amount of the rents and profits received, and order that, if it appear that the debt, damages, and costs are satisfied, possession shall be delivered to the defendant.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac. As to an elegit in Equity, see Dan. Ch. Prac., 4th ed., 958 et seq.

Writs of elegit and other writs in aid thereof are under the Jud. Acts to have the same force and effect as before (Jud. Act, 1873, Ord. XLIII., r. 1—2); and see Ib., Ord. XLII., r. 15.

Elementary Education Act. See EDUCATION.

Elimination, the act of banishing or turning out of doors: rejection.

Elinguation, the punishment of cutting out the tongue.

Elisors, electors. In cases of challenge to the sheriff and coroners for partiality, etc., the jury process was directed to two clerks of the Court, or two persons of the county named by the Court, and sworn. Then these elisors indifferently name or choose the jury, and their return is final, no challenge being allowed to the array.—Co. Litt. 158.

Eloigne, or Eloine [fr. eloigner, Fr.], to put at a distance; to remove one far from another.—Cowel.

Eloignment, removal; sending to a distant place.

Elongata, a return made by a sheriff in replevin, that cattle, etc., are not to be found, or are removed, so that he cannot make deliverance, etc.

Elongatus, a return to a writ de homine replegiando, that the man was out of the sheriff's jurisdiction, whereupon a process was issued, called a capias in withernam, to imprison the defendant himself without bail or mainprize, until he produced him.

Elul, the twelfth month of the Jewish civil year, and the sixth of the ecclesiastical. It consisted of only twenty-nine days, and answered nearly to our August.

Elvers, fry of eels, for which in the Severn fishery district a close time is fixed by 39 & 40 Vict. c. 34.

Ely (perhaps fr. ἔλος, Gk., a marsh, or helig, C. Br., a willow), the ancient city and metropolis of the county of Cambridge.

The Isle of Ely was never a county palatine, but it was a royal franchise, which, however, by 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 87, was taken away from the bishop, whose secular authority is now vested in the Crown.

Emancipatio. A solemn act by which a pater-familias divests himself of his power over his filius-familias, so that the filius-familias may become sui juris. There are three forms of emancipatio. (1) The old emancipation, which was by several mancipationes, followed by several enfranchisements. The mancipatio, or solemn sale, destroyed the patria potestas and put the filius-familias in mancipio, which was a kind of slavery. The enfranchisement by the purchaser made the filius-familias sui juris. As the enfranchiser acquired all rights of patronage, the father, on occasion of the last mancipatio, added the trust-clause (fiducia contracta), i.e., an express condition that the purchaser should remancipate the filius-familias to the pater-familias, so that having ceased to be a pater-familias, and being only an ordinary purchaser, he might himself enfranchise his child, and so acquire the rights of patronage.

(2) The Anastasian emancipation, introduced by Anastasius. It consisted in obtaining an imperial rescript, authorizing the emancipation, which was to be registered with the proper officer. In this way a filius-familias might be emancipated in his absence, which could not be done by the old form per aes et libram, since the purchaser had to lay hold of the thing.

(3) The Justinian emancipation, a mere declaration of the pater-familias before the magistrate, no leave being required for the purpose (recta via):—Cum. C. L. 36; and Sand. Just., 5th ed., xxxix. & 50.

Embargo [fr. embargar, Sp., a prohibition to pass], a stop, arrest, or detention of ships; a prohibition imposed in time of war by a belligerent state upon merchant ships against their leaving port for a time specified.

Embassador. See AMBASSADOR.

Embassage, or Embassy, the message or commission given by a sovereign or state to a minister, called an ambassador, empowered to treat or communicate with another sovereign or state; also the establishment of an ambassador.

Embezzlement, the appropriation to his own use by a servant or clerk of money or chattels received by him for and on account of his master or employer. Embezzlement differs from larceny in this, that in the former the property misappropriated is not at the time in the actual or legal possession of the owner, whilst in the latter it is. The distinctions between larceny and embezzlement are often extremely nice and subtle; and it is sometimes difficult to say under which head the offence ranges. Unless the offender is a clerk or a servant, whose business it is to receive money for his master, he is not guilty of embezzlement. But if he have been employed to receive it in a single instance, he need not be a general servant. By 31 & 32 Vict. c. 116, partners stealing or embezzling money, etc., belonging to the co-partnership may be convicted and punished as if they had not been such partners.

Embezzlement by a clerk, or servant, or person employed as such, of any chattel, money, or valuable security, is a felony punishable by penal servitude for a term not exceeding fourteen years, or by imprisonment, and in the case of a male under the age of sixteen by whipping in addition to imprisonment (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 68). Embezzlement by persons in the service of Her Majesty, or by a constable or other person employed in the police is a felony punishable in the same manner, with the exception of whipping (s. 70). Embezzlement by any officer or servant of the Bank of England or Bank of Ireland is a felony punishable by penal servitude for life, or not less than five years, or imprisonment not exceeding two years (s. 73).

In the same indictment any number of distinct acts of embezzlement, not exceeding three, committed against Her Majesty, or the same master, or employer, may be charged if committed within the space of six months from the first to the last act. In an indictment for embezzling money or any valuable security, it is sufficient to allege the embezzlement to be of money without specifying the particular coin or valuable security (s. 71).

If upon the trial of any person indicted for embezzlement, etc., it shall be proved that he took the property in question in any such manner as to amount in law to larceny, the jury may find him not guilty of embezzlement, etc., but guilty of simple larceny, or of larceny as a clerk, servant, or person employed for the purpose or in the capacity of a clerk or servant, etc., as the case may be; and if upon the trial of any person indicted for larceny it shall be proved that he took the property in question in any such manner as to amount in law to embezzlement, etc., the jury may find him not guilty of larceny, but guilty of embezzlement, etc.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 72. As to the fraudulent misappropriation of property by bankers, merchants, brokers, attorneys, or agents, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 86; by trustees, ss. 80 and 86; by directors, members, or public officers of bodies corporate, or public companies, ss. 81, 86. See Russell on Crimes.

Emblements [fr. emblavance de bled, O. Fr., corn sprung 'or put above ground], the growing crops of those vegetable productions of the soil which are annually produced by the labour of the cultivator. They are deemed personal property, and pass as such to the executor or administrator of the occupier, whether he were the owner in fee, or for life, or for years, if he die before he has actually cut, reaped, or gathered the same; and this, although being affixed to the soil, they might for some purposes be considered, whilst growing, as part of the realty.

If a tenant for life or pur autre vie die, his executor or administrator is entitled to emblements, for the estate was determined by the act of God; and it is a maxim in the law that actus Dei nemini facit injuriam. The advantages of emblements are extended to parochial clergy by 28 Hen. VIII. c. 11, but a parson who resigns his living, or forfeits it by his own act, is not entitled to emblements, although his lessee is. By devise, the devisee may, without express words, be entitled to the growing crops. But a legatee of the goods, stock, and moveables on a farm, is entitled to growing corn in preference as well to the devisee of the land as to the executor. So, a tenant at will or sufferance, the duration of whose tenancy is uncertain, is, if the lessor suddenly determine the tenancy, entitled to emblements. And, at common law, fructus industriales, as growing corn and other annual produce, which would go to the executor upon death, may be taken in execution; but the appraisement and sale thereof are regulated by statute; and, by statute, growing crops may be distrained upon, and sold when ripe. But a crop of natural grass growing at the time of the death of a tenant for life, and although fit to cut for hay, does not belong to his executor, but goes to the remainder-man.

It is provided by statutes 14 & 15 Vict. c. 11, s. 1, that 'where the lease or tenancy of any farm or lands held by a tenant at rack-rent shall determine by the death or cessor of the estate of any landlord entitled for his life, or for any other uncertain interest, instead of claims to emblements, the tenant shall continue to hold and occupy such farm or lands until the expiration of the then current year of his tenancy, and shall then quit upon the terms of his lease or holding in the same manner, as if such lease or tenancy were then determined by effluxion of time or other lawful means, during the continuance of his landlord's estate.' And see AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACT, 1875.

Emblers de gentz [Fr.], a stealing from the people. The phrase occurs in our old rolls of parliament—'Whereas divers murders, emblers de gentz, and robberies are committed,' etc.—Rot. Parl. 21 Edw. III. n. 62.

Embraceor [fr. embrasour, Fr.], he that when a matter is in trial between party and party, comes to the bar with one of the parties, having received some reward so to do, and speaks in the case; or privately labours the jury or stands in the court to survey and overlook them, whereby they are awed or influenced, or put in fear or doubt of the matter.—19 Hen. VII. c. 13; Termes de la Ley. But counsel, solicitors, etc., may speak in the case for their clients and not be embraceors.

Embracery, an attempt to influence a jury corruptly in favour of one party in a trial, by promises, persuasions, entreaties, money, entertainments, and the like. The punishment for this misdemeanour in the person embracing and the juror embraced is, by the common law, and also by statute 6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 61, fine and imprisonment.

Embring days [fr. embers; cineres, Lat., because our ancestors, when they fasted, sat in ashes, or strewed them on their heads], those days which the ancient fathers called quatuor tempora jejunii, are of great antiquity in the church; they are observed on Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday next after Quadragesima Sunday, or the first Sunday in Lent, after Whitsuntide, Holyrood Day, in September, and St. Lucy's Day, about the middle of December.—Brit. c. liii. Our almanacs call the weeks in which they fall the Ember-weeks, and they are now chiefly noticed on account of the ordination of priests and deacons; because the canon appoints the Sundays next after the Ember-weeks for the solemn times of ordination; though the bishops, if they please, may ordain on any Sunday or holiday.—Encyc. Lond., Wheat. Com. Pr.

Emendals, an old word still made use of in the accounts of the society of the Inner Temple; where so much in emendals at the foot of an account on the balance thereof, signifies so much money in the bank or stock of the houses, for reparation of losses, or other emergent occasions.—Spelm.

Emendare, to make amends for any crime, or trespass committed. And a capital crime, not to be atoned by fine, was said to be inemendabile.—Leg. Canut. 2.

Emendatio, the power of amending and correcting abuses, according to stated rules and measures.

Emergent year, the epoch or date whence any people begin to compute their time.

Emigration Commissioners. See 18 & 19 Vict. c. 119, s. 6, and see PASSENGER ACTS.

Emigration of Paupers. See 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 76, s. 62; 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, s. 29; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 110, s. 5; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 103, s. 20; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 101, s. 4.

Eminence, an honorary title given to cardinals. They were called illustrissimi and reverendissimi until the pontificate of Urban VIII.

Eminent domain, the right which a government retains over the estates of individuals to resume them for public use.

Emissary, a person sent upon a mission as the agent of another; also a secret agent sent to ascertain the sentiments and designs of others, and to propagate opinions favourable to his employer.

Empalement, a mode of inflicting punishment, by thrusting a sharp pole up the fundament.—Encyc. Lond.

Empannel [fr. panne, Fr.], the writing or entering by the sheriff, on a parchment schedule or roll of paper, the names of a jury summoned by him.—Cowel.

Empanlance. See IMPARLANCE.

Emperor [fr. empereur, Fr., imperator, Lat.], a sovereign prince who bears rule over large kingdoms and territories; a monarch of title and dignity supposed to be superior to a king. Sovereigns of England have at times assumed the title to vindicate their equality with every European monarch. The title imperator was by the early Romans conferred on renowned and victorious generals who acquired great power and dominion, and was by degrees extended to signify a commander-in-chief sent upon important military service. After the time of the Antonines the term was applied to the sovereign ruler of the Roman Empire, and after the fall of the Western Empire, the title was assumed by Charlemagne, the founder of the second or German Empire. When the German branch of the Carolingian family became extinct, the imperial crown became elective, and so continued until the last century. The title of Emperor of Germany was given up by Francis II., who, in lieu of it, assumed the title of Emperor of Austria. The title of Emperor of the French was assumed by Napoleon I., and was again assumed by Napoleon III. The sovereign of Russia is also styled emperor. The present Queen of England is Empress of India. King Edgar, in an old charter, styles himself Imperator. In 1870, the King of Prussia acquired the title of Emperor of Germany.

Emphyteusis, the jus emphyteuticarium, or as it is more generally called emphyteusis, was the right of enjoying all the fruits, and disposing at pleasure of the property of another, subject to the payment of a yearly rent (pensio or canon) to the owner. Formerly the lands of the Roman municipalities, or of the college of priests, used to be let for different terms of years, sometimes for a short term, such as that of five years, sometimes for a term amounting almost to a perpetuity, under the name of agri vectigiales (Gai. iii. 145). Afterwards the lands of private individuals were let in a similar manner, and were also comprehended under the term agri vectigiales. The emperors let their patrimonial lands in a similar way, and these lands so let were termed emphyteuticarii (C. xi. 58, 61), a name arising from there being a new ownership, or what almost amounted to an ownership, engrafted (ἐν φύτεω) on the real dominion. Either shortly before or in the time of Justinian, the two rights, that of the ager vectigalis, and that of emphyteusis, were united under the common name of emphyteusis, and subjected to particular regulations. Both lands and buildings could be subjected to emphyteusis (Nov. vii. 3, 1, 2). The emphyteuta, as the person who enjoyed the right was termed, besides enjoying all the rights of usufruct, could dispose of the thing, or rather of his rights over it, in any way he pleased (Nov. vii. 3, 2); he could create a servitude over it or mortgage it (D. xiii. 7, 16, 2); he had a real action (which, however, was said to be a utilis vindicatio, because he was not the owner, but only in the place of one) to defend or assert his rights; which at his death went to his heirs (Nov. vii. 3).

He was obliged to pay his pensio under any circumstances, whether he actually benefited by his emphyteusis or not, because the payment of rent was an acknowledgment of the title of the dominus. He was also bound to use the thing over which his right extended, so that it was not deteriorated in value at the time his right expired (Nov. vii. 3, 2).—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 133, 364.

Empire, the dominion or jurisdiction of an emperor; the region over which the dominion of an emperor extends imperial power; supreme dominion; sovereign command.

Empiric, a practitioner in medicine or surgery, who proceeds on experience only without science or legal qualification; a quack.

Emplead, to indict; to prefer a charge against; to accuse.

Employment of Women and Children. See CHILDREN, WOMEN, and FACTORY.

Emporium [fr. ἐμπόριον, Gk., a trading-place], a place for wholesale trade in commodities carried by sea. The name is sometimes applied to a seaport town, but it properly signifies only a particular place in such a town. The word is derived from ἐμπορος, which signifies in Homer a person who sails as a passenger in a ship belonging to another person (Od. ii. 319; xxiv. 300); but in later writers it signifies the merchant or wholesale dealer, and differs from κάπηλος, the retail dealer, in that it is applied to the merchant who carries on commerce with foreign countries, while the κάπηλος purchases his goods from the ἐμπορος, and retails them in the market-place.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Emption, the act of buying; a purchase.

Emptor, a buyer or purchaser.

Enabling statute, 32 Hen. VIII. c. 28, A.D. 1540. By the Common Law, all persons may make leases to endure so long as their interests in the land continue, but no longer. This statute enabled first, a tenant-in-tail to make a lease for three lives, or twenty-one years, to bind his issue. Secondly, a husband seised in right of his wife in fee-simple or fee-tail, to make a similar lease to bind his wife and her heirs, provided she join therein. Thirdly, ecclesiastical persons seised of an estate of fee-simple in right of their churches (not parsons or vicars who are seised for life only), to make leases to bind their successors. But certain requisites must be observed in making those leases.—2 Bl. Com. 219. This act is repealed by the Settled Estates Act, 1856, 19 & 20 Vict. c. 120, s. 35, except so far as relates to leases made by persons having an estate in the right of their churches; and even as regards such leases it has been practically superseded by the Ecclesiastical Leasing Act, 1842, and similar acts.

Enach, the satisfaction for a crime; the recompense for a fault.—Skene.

Enact, to act, perform, or effect; to establish by law; to decree.

Enbrever, to write down in short.—Brit. 56.

Encheason [old law Fr.], cause; occasion.—Cowel; Barley.

Encroachment An unlawful gaining upon the possession of a neighbour.

Endemic Disease. A disease of a chronic character; the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 134, empowers the Local Government Board to make regulations to prevent the spreading of any formidable epidemic, endemic, or infectious disease.

Endenzie, or Endenizen, to make free; to enfranchise.

Endorsement. See INDORSEMENT.

Endowed Schools. The Endowed Schools Acts, 23 Vict. c. 11; 31 & 32 Vict. c. 32; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 56; 36 & 37 Vict. c. 87; and 38 & 39 Vict. c. 29. By the 37 & 38 Vict. c. 87, all powers and duties vested by the Endowed Schools Acts in the Endowed Schools Commissioners, are transferred to the Charity Commissioners, and various provisions of the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 56, and 36 & 37 Vict. c. 87, are repealed. See EDUCATION.

Endowed Charities Act, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 136. See CHARITABLE TRUSTS.

Endowment, wealth applied to any person or use. The assuring dower to a woman; the setting forth a sufficient portion for a vicar towards his perpetual maintenance, when the benefice is appropriated; the creation of a perpetual provision out of lands or money for any institution or person.

En échange il convient que les estates soient égales. Co. Litt. 50.—(In an exchange it is desirable that the estates be equal.)

Enfeoffment, the act of investing with any dignity or possession; also the instrument or deed by which a person is invested with possessions.

Enfranchise, to make free, or incorporate a person into a society; to invest with the elective franchise.

Enfranchisement, investiture with the privileges of a denizen; also the act of incorporating a person into a society.

As to enfranchisement of copyholds, see COPYHOLD.

Engine. As to malicious injuries to engines and machinery, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 11, 14, 15; and as to placing wood, etc., on any railway with intent to obstruct or overthrow any engine, see s. 35. See 8 Vict. c. 20, s. 116.

Englecery, or Englescherie, or Englishery [fr. Engleceria, Lat.], the being an Englishman.—14 Edw. III. st. 1, c. 4.

English information. A proceeding in the Court of Exchequer in matters of revenue. See 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104. See EXCHEQUER INFORMATION.

Engravings Copyright Acts. See COPYRIGHT.

Engross, to copy in a fair and clerkly hand.

Engrosser, he that purchases large quantities of any commodity in order to sell it at a high price.—7 & 8 Vict. c. 24.

Enicia pars. See ESNECY.

Enitia pars semper præferenda est propter privilegium ætatis. Co. Litt. 166.—(The part of the elder sister is always to be preferred on account of the privilege of age.)

Enlarge (v. a.), to enlarge a rule is to extend the time within which it is returnable.

Enlarge the estate, a species of release which enures by way of enlarging an estate, and consists of a conveyance of the ulterior interest to the particular tenant; as if there be tenant for life or years, remainder to another in fee, and he in remainder releases all his right to the particular tenant and his heirs, this gives him the estate in fee.—1 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 518.

Enpleet, anciently used for implead.—Covel.

Enquest. See INQUEST.

Enquiry. See INQUIRY.

Enrolment, register, record; writing in which anything is recorded.

By the Statute of Enrolments, 27 Hen. VIII. c. 16, every bargain and sale of a freehold interest is to be enrolled in Chancery within six [lunar] months after its date.

No assurance by a tenant-in-tail, under the 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, will have any operation unless it be enrolled in the Court of Chancery within six calendar months after its execution, which enrolment will be sufficient of itself, even where the conveyance is by bargain and sale, within the Statute of Enrolments. This provision does not extend to copyholds, the enrolment then being on the court-rolls of the manor.

If a party to a suit in Equity, who had obtained a decree or order, was desirous of preventing a rehearing of the cause before the judge pronouncing the same, or of preventing an appeal to the Lord Chancellor, or Lords Justices of Appeal, it must have been enrolled. So also where a decree was pronounced either by the Master of the Rolls, or one of the Vice-Chancellors, and the party, instead of appealing to the Lord Chancellor, or Lords Justices of Appeal, was desirous of appealing at once to the House of Lords, the decree must first have been enrolled. The effect of enrolling a decree of the Lord Chancellor was to prevent its being reheard by him. After a decree was enrolled, it could only be reversed or altered either by appeal to the House of Lords or by bill of review. It might be enrolled immediately after it had been passed and entered, unless a caveat had been entered, and then, if the party entering it did not present his petition of appeal or rehearing within twenty-eight days; the enrolment might be perfected. By Consol. Ord. 1860, xxiii., r. 24, the expenses of enrolment of decrees and orders were diminished: and by Ord. xxii., r. 16, the defendant had power to vacate the enrolment under certain circumstances; but the effect of the Judicature Act is practically to abolish enrolment. See CHARITABLE TRUSTS.

Ens, being, or existence.

Enschedule, to insert in a list, account, or writing.

Ensient, or Enseint, the being with child.—Old Law Fr.

Entail [fr. feudum talliatum, Lat.; entailé, Fr., from tailler, to cut], an estate settled with regard to the rule of its descent. See TAIL.

Entailed money, money directed to be invested in realty to be entailed. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, ss. 70, 71, 72. See TAIL.

Entendment. See INTENDMENT.

Enter (v. a.), to enrol, to commence officially, to inscribe upon the records of a Court, or upon an official list. See also ENTRY.

Entering short. When bills not due are paid into a bank by a customer, it is the custom of some bankers not to carry the amount of the bills directly to his credit, but to 'enter them short' as it is called, i.e., to note down the receipt of their bills, their amounts, and the times when they become due in a previous column of the page, and the amounts when received are carried forward into the usual cash column. See Giles v. Perkins, 9 East, 13. Sometimes, instead of entering such bills short, bankers credit the customer directly with the amount of the bills as cash, charging interest on any advances they may make on their account, and allow him at once to draw upon them to that amount. If the banker becomes bankrupt, the property in bills entered short does not pass to his assignees, but the customer is entitled to them if they remain in his hands, or to their proceeds, if received, subject to any lien the banker may have upon them.

Enterpleader. See INTERPLEADER.

Entire contract, a contract wherein everything to be done on the one side is the consideration for everything to be done on the other.

Entire tenancy, a sole possession by one person, called severalty, which is contrary to several tenancy where a joint or common possession is in one or more.

Entireties, Tenancy by. Where an estate is conveyed or devised to a man and his wife during coverture, they are said to be tenants by entireties, that is, each is said to be seised of the whole estate, and neither of a part.

The consequence is, that the husband's conveyance alone will not have any effect against his wife him surviving. The husband being seised of the whole estate during coverture, either in his own right or jure uxoris, can of course part with that interest; but to make a complete conveyance of all the interests held in entirety the wife must concur. Tenants by entireties are seised per tout, and not per my et per tout. This species of tenancy seems to be an exception to the rule that the husband and wife are one person in law; if they are to be considered as one person, the husband should be able to convey alone, which in this case he cannot do.—Watk. Conv. 170.

Entirety, the whole; completeness.

Entrepôt [Fr.], a warehouse or magazine for the deposit of goods.

Entry, the depositing of a document in the proper office or place; actual entry on land is necessary to constitute a seisin in deed, and is necessary in certain cases, as, e.g., to perfect a common-law lease.

When a person without any right has taken possession of land, the party entitled may make a formal but peaceable entry, which is quite an extrajudicial and summary remedy, on such lands, declaring that thereby he takes possession, which notorious act of ownership is equivalent to a feodal investiture by the lord; or he may enter on any part of it in the same county, declaring it to be in the name of the whole; but if it lie in different counties, he must make different entries for the notoriety of such entry and claim. This remedy by entry takes place in three only of the five species of ouster—viz., abatement, intrusion, and disseisin: for as in these the original entry of the wrongdoer was unlawful, they may therefore be remedied by the mere entry of him who has right. But upon a discontinuance or deforcement, the owner of the estate cannot enter, but is driven to his action; for herein the original entry being lawful, and thereby an apparent right of possession being gained, the law will not suffer that right to be overthrown by the mere act or entry of the claimant.—1 Inst. 57.

An action must be brought within twelve (formerly twenty) years next after a right of entry first accrued, ten (formerly six) years being allowed after the determination of disabilities, provided it be not more than thirty (formerly forty) years in the whole. See Real Property Limitation Act, 1874, 37 & 38 Vict. c. 57, repealing 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 2. No descent-cast which may happen or be made after the 31st of December, 1833, shall toll or defeat any right of entry or action for the recovery of land. All writs of entry and real actions by which lands might have been formerly recovered, except dower, dower unde nihil habet, and quare impedit, are abolished.—3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27. See DOWER.

By 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 6, a right of entry may be disposed of by deed.

In Scotch law, it refers to the acknowledgment of the title of the heir, etc., to be admitted by the superior.

As to a burglarious entry, see BURGLARY.

In commerce, the act of setting down in an account-book the particulars of business transacted. Book-keeping is performed either by single or double entry.

Episcopus teneat placitum, in curiâ Christianitatis, de iis quæ merè sunt spiritualia. 12 Co. 44.—(A bishop may hold plea in a Court Christian, of things merely spiritual.)

Episcopus puerorum. It was an old custom that upon certain feasts some lay person should plait his hair, and put on the garments of a bishop, and in them pretend to exercise episcopal jurisdiction, and do several ludicrous actions, for which reason he was called bishop of the boys; and this custom obtained here long after several constitutions were made to abolish it.—Blount. Such an officer is mentioned in the statutes of some of the cathedrals of the old foundation in England.

Equitable Assets. See ASSETS.

Equitable Defences at Common Law. 'The Common Law Procedure Act, 1854' (ss. 83—86), enabled any defendant to plead the facts which would entitle him, if judgment were obtained against him, to relief in Equity from such judgment on equitable grounds, by way of defence, and also enabled the plaintiff to avoid such defence by a replication upon equitable grounds. A plea on equitable grounds was good at Law only where an absolute and unconditional injunction would be granted in Equity. The effect of this statutory jurisdiction was not to bring Chancery suits into the Common Law Courts, but simply to enable defendants in an action to set up what would be absolute defences in Equity.

It is now provided by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 24, that in all actions in any Division of the Supreme Court, matters which would have entitled a party to relief in the Court of Chancery, shall be taken cognizance of, and all equitable rights to be given effect to. And by that section a mode of summary application to the court is substituted, in certain cases, for injunctions to stay proceedings.

Equitable Estates, one of the three kinds of property in lands and tenements; the other two being legal property and customary property.

That is properly an equitable estate or interest for which a Court of Equity affords the only remedy: and of this nature especially, is the benefit of every trust, express or implied, which is not converted into a legal estate by the Statute of Uses. The rest are equities of redemption, constructive trusts, and all equitable charges.—Burton's Comp. c. viii.

Equitable Lien. See LIEN.

Equitable Mortgage. The following mortgages are equitable.

(1) Where the subject of a mortgage is trust property, which security is effected either by a formal deed or a written memorandum, notice being given to the trustees in order to preserve the priority.

(2) Where it is an equity of redemption, which is merely a right to bring an action in the Chancery Division to redeem the estate.

(3) Where there is a written agreement only to make a mortgage, which creates an equitable lien on the land.

(4) Where a debtor deposits the title-deeds of his estate with his creditor or some person on his behalf, without even a verbal communication. The deposit itself is deemed evidence of an executed agreement or contract for a mortgage for such estate.

This transaction, which appears to be a judicial repeal of the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 4, is extensively resorted to, and is known in practice as an equitable mortgage by deposit of title-deeds. The title-deeds may be deposited at different times, if it be in pursuance of the original contract, and perhaps; a deposit of the conveyance to the mortgagor will alone constitute an equitable mortgage. A deposit of a material portion of the title-deeds to an estate is a sufficient equitable mortgage of such property.—Lacon v. Allen, 4 W. R. 693 (1856). When it is proposed to effect an equitable mortgage of joint-stock shares, the shareholder and depositary should give notice to the company's officer that the former has agreed to make the deeds of his shares a security for a sum of money, which the latter is advancing on them, as this converts the officer into a trustee of the deeds for the lender. The shareholder should sign an agreement to execute a formal mortgage whenever required; and it would be proper, in order to denude himself of every symbol of possession, to hand over the certificates, though this does not appear to be absolutely essential.

The deposit will extend to and cover subsequent advances, upon proof that they were made upon the faith of such security, or that the deposit was originally made as a security, as well for the first as for any subsequent advance, or that the original deposit was continued with an agreement for a further advance. Where a deposit of deeds has been made with a firm, if it is the intention of the parties that the deposit should be for the benefit of any of its future members, such intention should either be expressly stated in the memorandum made on the deposit, or be proved by parol evidence; but dealings with the new firm may afford sufficient evidence of a new agreement with them, so as to give them the benefit of the deposit.

A deposit of title-deeds is good against the Crown, if made before the depositor became its debtor, either by record or specialty, and also against the creditors of their bankrupt-depositor, unless it is plainly a fraudulent preference. An equitable mortgagee, who advanced his money bonâ fide, may protect his equitable estate, and gain priority by obtaining the legal estate from his debtor, even in contemplation of his bankruptcy.—Haern v. Mill, 13 Ves. 122 (1806). Such a depositary retains his right in Equity, to enforce his security against the title of a creditor under a subsequent judgment, although the latter may have acquired the legal seisin and possession of the land under an elegit, without notice of the equitable mortgage.—Whitworth v. Gaugain, 3 Hare, 416 (1844), affirmed by Lord Lyndhurst, 1 Ph. 728. A deposit of title-deeds is entitled to priority over a subsequent legal mortgagee or purchaser, who lent or paid his money with notice of the deposit, but not in the absence of such notice; for then the equities of these parties being equal, the Law must prevail.

A deposit in the hands of one person will not secure an advance made by another person, unless the former person be merely a trustee, who has not lent any money upon it.

An equitable mortgage being a contract for a mortgage, the mortgagee might file a bill or claim in Equity, either for a legal mortgage, a foreclosure and conveyance, a sale. And may now bring an action for the same purpose in the Chancery Division of the High Court (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34 (3)).

A mere depositary of a lease cannot be compelled to take a legal assignment, so as to enable the lessor to sue him at Law on the covenants in the lease, nor is he liable to them until he has made himself legal assignee.

Equitable Waste. See WASTE.

Equity [fr. æquitas, Lat.]. There is some confusion as to the meaning of Equity, as a scheme of jurisprudence, distinct from Law. 'Equity' is an equivocal term: the difficulty lies in drawing the dividing lines between the several senses in which it is used. Its three leading senses are distinguished thus:—

(1) Taken broadly and philosophically, Equity means to do to all men as we would they should do unto us—by the Justinian Pandects, honeste vivere, alterum non lædere, suum cuique tribuere. It is clear that human tribunals cannot cope with so wide a range of duties.

(2) Taken, in a less universal sense, Equity is used in contradistinction to strict law. This is Moral Equity, which should be the genius of every kind of human jurisprudence; since it expounds and limits the language of the positive laws, and construes them not according to their strict letter, but rather in their reasonable and benignant spirit.

Aristotle, in his discussion concerning Moral Equity, Ethics, b. v. c. x., calls it the correction of mere law, which (being altogether universal, and it not being possible to treat a subject exhaustively, when speaking universally) takes the most obvious case, from an impossibility for providing for every possible predicament in express words. Now, this fault is not in the Law, nor the legislature, but in the nature of the thing itself; for the subject matter of human conduct is altogether of this description. When, therefore, the Law speaks universally, and a matter happens somewhat differing from the case provided for, then it is proper, where the legislator falls short, and has erred from speaking generally, to fill up the deficiency, as the legislator would himself direct if he were present, or as he would have included in the Law, if he had anticipated the matter.

(3) But it is in neither of these senses that Equity is to be understood as the substantial justice which has been expounded by our Courts of Chancery. It is here expected in a more limited and technical sense, and may be called Municipal Equity, and described as the system of supplemental law administered in Chancery, and founded upon defined rules, recorded precedents, and established principles, to which it closely adheres; the judges, however, liberally expounding and developing them, in order to meet novel exigencies. While it aims to assist the defects of the Common Law, by extending relief to those rights of property which the strict law does not recognise, and by giving more ample and distributive redress than the ordinary tribunals afford, it by no means either controls, mitigates, or supersedes the Common Law, but rather guides itself by its analogies, and does not assume any power to subvert its doctrines. This is amply shown by two well-known maxims of the Court of Chancery, viz., Æquitas sequitur legem, and Where the Equities are equal, the Common Law must prevail.

The grand characteristic of Municipal Equity is displayed in the nature and extent of its redress. Not content, as the Common Law generally is, to adjudicate strictly and absolutely in rem, i.e., upon the transaction itself, as it is presented by the litigants; Equity insists upon the conscientious obligations of the suitors, and by adjudicating in personam, compels an actual completion of the matter intended to be accomplished by the parties, adjusting, qualifying, and restraining their several and sometimes conflicting rights, duties, and interests. It also grapples with anticipated injuries, by preventing the perpetration of meditated or threatened mischief; a very wholesome prerogative, since an interdictive power is more valuable and frequently of much greater efficacy than a merely compensative or punitive function.

An Equity judge has usually pronounced his decision upon the proofs, arguments, and merits presented to him without the assistance of a jury; yet, if a serious doubt were entertained, as to a question of fact, the Court might have directed an issue upon it to be tried by a judge and jury at Common Law, and might itself impanel a jury to award damages to an injured party either in addition to or in substitution for an injunction or specific performance, pursuant to 'The Chancery Amendment Act, 1858,' 21 & 22 Vict. c. 27. The mode of taking evidence underwent considerable alteration by the 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 28, which abolished the system of examining witnesses upon written interrogatories, unless specially ordered by the Court, and enacted by its sections 30, 31, and 32, that allegations should be verified by affidavit, unless either party elected to have the evidence taken orally, either by an examiner in town, or one specially appointed in the country, who then recorded it in the form of a narrative, the witnesses being subject to examination-in-chief, cross-examination, and re-examination in the presence of the suitors, their counsel, and solicitors; the public, however, or a third-hand writer, not being admitted unless allowed by such examiner. See 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, ss. 28—41, and Orders of the 7th of August, 1852, pl. 31—39, and of the 13th Jan. 1855. See now AFFIDAVIT and EVIDENCE.

As to the origin and growth of Equity Jurisprudence see 4 Reeves, 368; 5 Ibid. 158. As to the Equity Jurisdiction and former Courts of Equity, see CHANCERY.

Large powers are now given to all branches of the Supreme Court to administer Equity, though many matters of equitable jurisdiction are still left to the Chancery Division of the High Court in the first instance (Jud. Act, 1873, ss. 24, 25, 34). See CHANCERY.

Equity of Redemption. A mortgagee, although he has become absolute owner of the legal estate in the pledged property, on account of the breach of the condition for repayment of the loan within the strict time, yet is compelled to reconvey the legal estate to the mortgagor, who applies to Equity to redeem it before foreclosure, and within twelve years of the last written acknowledgment (Real Prop. Limit. Act, 1874, s. 7), on payment of the principal, interest, and costs, Equity treating the breach of the condition as a penalty which it abhors; and the retention for the mortgagee's own benefit of that which was intended simply as a pledge, as contrary to substantial justice.

An equity of redemption may be mortgaged toties quoties, until it is barred by a decree in Equity, and each incumbrancer of it has preference according to his priority in time.

The following dangers and disadvantages attend this species of security:—

(1) A prior mortgagee may be postponed to a subsequent mortgagee, who, having advanced the loan with notice of such prior mortgage, afterwards acquires the legal estate. See TACKING, which though abolished by 37 & 38 Vict. c. 78, s. 7, was revived by 38 & 39 Vict. c. 87, s. 129.

(2) The first mortgagee may, either before or after the mortgage of the equity of redemption, in the absence of any notice of it, make further advances, and tack them to his first security, to the displacement of the mesne mortgage. In order to guard against this disparagement, the mortgagee of an equity of redemption, should not only inquire of the first mortgagee the amount of his loan, but must give him express notice of his own advance. And notice of it should be put on the principal title-deed, in order to avoid the chance of the mortgagor redeeming the first mortgage, and conveying the legal estate to a person without notice of the mesne mortgage, who would thus gain a preference to such unintimated equitable mortgage.

(3) The mortgagor may have secretly effected a prior charge on the equity of redemption. And although the perpetration of so gross a fraud would forfeit his equity of redemption pursuant to 4 & 5 Wm. III. c. 16, yet this will be small consolation to such a mortgagee.

(4) Such a mortgagee has not any legal remedy, so as to affect the estate itself, but only equitable relief. See MORTGAGE and FORECLOSURE. And see CHANCERY and EQUITY.

Equity to a Settlement (Wife's). Prior to the Married Women's Property Acts (see MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY), the law permitted a husband to possess himself absolutely of the whole of his wife's personal property and the profits of her realty; but as in many cases he might have it in his power to alien all the property to which he is entitled jure mariti, or upon his becoming bankrupt or insolvent it would vest in his trustee for the benefit of his creditors, and thus his wife, however great may have been her fortune, might, with her children, be left utterly destitute; Equity compelled him, whenever he or any person claiming in his right was obliged to sue for the recovery of the wife's property, to make a settlement of some portion of it, the rule being to settle one-half in ordinary cases, but the whole if the husband were insolvent or had deserted his wife, or there had been a dissolution of marriage on the ground of his adultery.—Barrow v. Barrow, 3 Eq. Rep. 149 (1854); Morgan v. Morgan, 2 Eq. Rep. 1270 (1854). The Married Women's Property Act, 1882, by vesting a wife's property in herself, has rendered the exercise of this jurisdiction unnecessary; but it may still be useful to recapitulate the main outlines of a procedure so recently discontinued.

The Court did not, in judging of the wife's right to a settlement, take into account what the husband had already received. And the wife of a man who was domiciled in a country, according to the law of which he was absolutely entitled to all her personal property, of whatever nature, had not an equity to a settlement out of an equitable chose in action in England. The Court did not settle the reversionary interest of a married woman, but a supplemental action had to be brought when the interest falls into possession.

Should he refuse to make the settlement directed, the Court preserved the capital of the property for the wife and children, and ordered the interest to be accumulated for her benefit, should he have had a large portion through the wife, which he had spent, unless, indeed, he were actually starving for want of a maintenance. If the husband deserted his wife, and left her destitute, Equity did not allow him to touch either the principal or income of the property, but directed a maintenance from it for the wife and children (if any). And maintenance was sometimes given to the wife where she had been obliged to leave her husband on account of his cruelty.

Equity would also direct a settlement to be made on the wife out of her equitable estate, upon her own application, through her next friend, against her husband, or those claiming under him. If, however, before any proceedings were commenced, the property had been paid or transferred to the husband, it would then be too late to apply to the Court for aid to insist upon a settlement out of it on the wife and children. But a settlement could not be thus avoided after proceedings had been initiated. If the wife were of full age, and had not been a ward of Court, married without its consent, she could waive her equity, and that of her children, to a settlement, and consent that the whole property be given up to her husband.

If a wife wished to waive her equity to a settlement, her consent to her husband having her property had to be formally taken upon her examination in Court, or under a commission issuing from the Court. Where the wife waived her equity to a settlement, and consented to her husband having her property, either an affidavit had to be made by the husband and wife that there was no settlement upon their marriage, or if there was a settlement it had to be produced, and an affidavit made by the husband and wife that there was no other settlement, and counsel had to certify that the settlement itself does not affect the property which the wife consents to her husband having.

The settlement directed by the Court usually extended to the children; but the equity to a settlement was strictly personal to the wife. If, therefore, she died before asserting her right, her children could not insist upon a settlement. When the wife had entered into a contract, or had obtained a decree for a settlement, the interests of the children would not then be defeated if she died without waiving it. The Court would not render any assistance to a wife who left her husband without any adequate cause, or who had been guilty of adultery.

If the husband, prior to the marriage, settled property upon his wife, either expressly or impliedly in consideration of the fortune she then was, or might afterwards become, entitled to, the wife being a party to such settlement, she would not be entitled to any settlement out of her equitable property, whether her husband's settlement were adequate or not, for he had then become the purchaser of his wife's property; but if his settlement were made after marriage in consideration of his wife's equitable property, then, if it were not adequate, the Court would allow the wife a further settlement out of such property.—1 White and Tudor's Lead. Cases, 4th ed., 445 et seq. The practice was when the property is small, to order it into court, and the dividends to be paid to the wife during her life; this saved the cost of a settlement.

Equus coopertus. A horse equipped with saddle and furniture. See Du Change.

Era. See ÆRA.

Erastians, the followers of Erastus. They held that offences against religion and morality should be punished by the civil power, and not by the censures of the church, or by excommunication.

Ernes, the loose scattered ears of corn that are left on the ground after the binding.—Kennet's Glos.

Erotomania [fr. ἔρως, love, and μανία, frenzy], sometimes also called Erotico-mania, a disease of the brain on sexual subjects. The distinction between it and Nymphomania is that in the latter, although the condition of mind is similar, the disease is caused by a local disorder of the sexual organs reacting on the brain.

Errant [itinerant], applied to justices on circuit, and bailiffs at large, etc. See EYRE.

Erraticum, a waif or stray.—Cowel.

Error. The name for recourse to the Court of Exchequer Chamber from any of the inferior tribunals, by reason of defects in the record, or to the House of Lords from the Exchequer Chamber; or to the Queen's Bench in criminal cases (vide infra). Proceedings in error are now abolished by the Jud. Act, 1875, Order LVIII., r. 1, except in criminal cases, appeal being substituted in civil cases. See APPEAL, COURT OF.

As to error in criminal cases:—

After a judgment given against a prisoner, either at sessions or the assizes, if there be a substantial defect in the indictment, or error apparent on the record, such judgment may be reversed by the Queen's Bench. But it is necessary previously to obtain the Attorney-General's fiat, which in misdemeanours, on sufficient cause shown, is granted as a matter of course; but in felonies, it is granted only ex mera gratia. The Attorney-General may confess error, and so consent to a reversal of the judgment. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 68; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 78; and 16 & 17 Vict. c. 32. See also REVERSAL OF JUDGMENT.

Error fucatus nudâ veritate in multis est probabilior; et sæpenumero rationibus vincit veritatem error. 2 Co. 73.—(Varnished error is in many things more probable than naked truth; and very frequently error conquers truth by reasoning.)

Error nominis, a mistake of detail in the name of a person; used in contradistinction to error de personâ, a mistake as to identity. See Reg. v. Mellor, D. & B. 468.

Error, qui non resistitur, approbatur. Doct. and Stud. c. 70.—(An error which is not resisted, is approved.)

Errores ad sua principia referre, est refellere. 3 Inst. 15.—(To refer errors to their principles, is to refute them.)

Errores scribentis nocere non debent. Jenk. Cent. 324.—(The mistakes of the writer ought not to harm.)

Errors excepted, a phrase appended to an account stated, in order to excuse slight mistakes or oversights.

Erthmiotum, a meeting of the neighbourhood to compromise differences amongst themselves; a court held on the boundary of two lands.—Leg. Hen. I. c. 57.

Erubescit lex filios castigare parentes. 8 Co. 116.—(The law blushes when children correct their parents.)

Esbrancatura, cutting off branches or boughs in forests, etc.—Hov. 784.

Escaldare, to scald. It is said that to scald hogs was one of our ancient tenures in serjeanty.—Lib. Rub. Scaccar. MS. 137.

Escambio [fr. cambier, Span., to change], a license granted to make over bills of exchange to another beyond the sea. Abolished by 59 Geo. III. c. 49, s. 11.

Escape [fr. échapper, Fr., to fly from], a violent or private evasion out of some lawful restraint; as where a man is arrested or imprisoned, and gets away before he is delivered by due course of law. Escapes are either in civil or criminal cases.

(1) Civil. The abolition of imprisonment for debt has rendered this all but obsolete, and the sheriff is expressly discharged from any liability by s. 31 of the Prison Act, 1877. They are either voluntary, by the express consent of the keeper, after which he never can take his prisoner again (though the plaintiff may retake him at any time), but the sheriff had to answer for the debt, and he had no remedy over against the person escaping; or, negligent, where a prisoner escapes without his keeper's knowledge or consent, and then upon fresh pursuit the defendant may be retaken, even on a Sunday, and the sheriff was excused, if he had him again, before any action brought against himself for the escape.

(2) Criminal. An escape of a person lawfully arrested for felony or misdemeanour is an offence against public justice, and punishable by fine or imprisonment. Officers and others negligently permitting a felon to escape are punishable by fine, but voluntarily permitting an escape amounts to the same kind of offence, and is punishable in the same degree as the offence of which the prisoner is guilty, and for which he is in custody, whether treason, felony, or trespass; although, before the conviction of the principal party, the officer thus neglecting his duty may be fined and imprisoned for a misdemeanour.—See 1 Edw. I. st. 2; 16 Geo. II. c. 31; 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 88; 4 Geo. IV. c. 64; 5 Geo. IV. c. 84, s. 22—4; and 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 67.

Escape-warrant, a process addressed to all sheriffs, etc., throughout England, to retake an escaped prisoner, even on a Sunday, and commit him to proper custody.—1 Anne, c. 16.

Escapio quietus, delivered from that punishment which by the laws of the forest lay upon those whose beasts were found upon forbidden land.—Jacob.

Escapium, that which comes by chance or accident.—Cowel.

Esceppa a measure of corn.—Cowel.

Escheat [eschet or échet, formed from the word eschoir or échir, Fr., to happen], a species of reversion: it is a fruit of seigniority, the lord of the fee, from whom or from whose ancestor the estate was originally derived, taking it as ultimus hæres upon the failure, natural or legal, of the intestate tenant's family.

An escheat is partly in the nature of a purchase as well as of a descent; it is a purchase so far as it is necessary for the lord to enter on the reverted property, in order to complete his full ownership of it; and it is a descent, because the escheated estate follows the seigniority, and is inherited along with it, by the lord's heir-at-law. The lord, on the escheat, takes the estate by a title paramount to the tenant, since he is in possession of an estate, out of which the tenant's interest was originally derived or carved. It is then a mixed title, being neither a pure purchase nor a pure descent, but in some measure compounded of both.

It differs from a forfeiture (now abolished for treason or felony by 33 & 34 Viet. c. 23), in that the latter is a penalty for a crime personal to the offender, of which the Crown is entitled to take advantage by virtue of its prerogative; while an escheat results from tenure only, and arises from an obstruction in the course of descent; it originated in feudalism, and respects the intestate's succession. So, while forfeiture affects the rents and profits only, escheat operates on the inheritance.

Escheat arises, then, where there is not any heir-at-law, which may be either by defect of lineage, whereby the descent is at an end (ob defectum sanguinis, or tenentis in the case of an alien); or by the commission of treason or felony (pro delicto tenentis). But now by the 33 & 34 Viet. c. 23, it is provided, that no conviction for treason or felony shall hereafter cause attainder or corruption of blood, or any forfeiture or escheat.

It arises from default of heirs, when the tenant dies without any lawful and natural-born relations on the part of any of his ancestors, or when he dies without any lawful and natural-born relations on the part of those ancestors from whom the estate descended, or where the intestate tenant, having been a bastard or denizen, does not leave any lineal descendants, since he cannot have any collateral descendants.

It arose from corruption of blood (now abolished by 33 & 34 Viet. c. 23), when the tenant had been attainted of treason or murder.

The following estates escheat, viz.: a fee-simple; an estate-tail, where the tenant-in-tail has in himself the reversion in fee, otherwise the estate would pass to the reversioner; and a copyhold estate.

The following interests do not escheat, viz.: gavelkind, propter delictum tenentis; a rent-charge; a right of common, free warren, or indeed any kind of inheritance which does not lie in tenure, because they rather become extinct; a trust estate, for where the beneficiary dies without heirs, the trustee shall retain the land for his own benefit; an estate given to a corporation and their successors, for it reverts to the donor on the corporation being dissolved, unless perhaps it had been granted over to another before the dissolution; an equity of redemption; and money to be laid out in land.

The statute-law made an exception to the general law of escheat in the case of a trustee or mortgagee dying intestate and heirless, for the protection of the beneficiaries or mortgagor. See 13 & 14 Viet. c. 60.

A descent can be traced through an attainted ancestor.

The law of escheat is seldom called into action in modern times, and when its application is required the Crown usually waives its prerogative by making a grant, in order to restore the estate to the family of the attainted person, or to effectuate any disposition of it which the former tenant may have contemplated.—7 Ves. 71.

Eschaeta derivatur à verbo Gallico eschoir, quod est accidere, quia accidit domino ex eventu et ex insperato. Co. Litt. 93.—(Escheat is derived from the French word eschoir, which signifies to happen, because it falls to the lord from an event and from an unforeseen circumstance.)

Eschaete vulgò dicuntur quæ decidentibus iis quæ de rege tenent, cum non existit ratione sanguinis hæres, ad fiscum relabuntur. Co. Litt. 13.—(Those things are commonly called escheats which revert to the exchequer from a failure of issue in those who hold of the king, when there does not exist any heir by consanguinity.)

Escheator [fr. escaetor, Lat.], an officer anciently appointed by the lord treasurer, etc., in every county, to make inquests of titles by escheat, which inquests were to be taken by good and lawful men of the county, impaneled by the sheriff.—4 Inst. 225.

Escheccum, a jury or inquisition.—Mat. Par.

Eschipare, to build or equip.—Du Cange.

Escobar, a great Spanish writer on points of casuistry.

Escot [Fr.], a tax formerly paid in boroughs and corporations towards the support of the community, which is called scot and lot.

Escrow, a writing under seal delivered to a third person, to be delivered by him to the person whom it purports to benefit, upon some condition. Upon the performance of the condition it becomes an absolute deed; but if the condition be not performed, it never becomes a deed. It is not delivered as a deed, but as an escrow, i.e., a scrawl or writing which is not to take effect as a deed till the condition be performed.—Co. Litt. 36 a; 2 Bl. Com. 307. See DELIVERY OF DEED.

Escuage [fr. escu, Fr., a shield], a pecuniary instead of a military service. This kind of feudal tenure was called scutagium, in Latin, or servitium scuti (the service of the shield), scutum being then a well-known denomination for money.—Co. Litt. 68 b.

Escurare, to scour or cleanse.—Cowel.

Eglise, or Eglise, a church.—Jacob.

Esketores, robbers or destroyers of other men's lands and fortunes.—Cowel.

Eskippamentum, skippage; tackle or ship furniture.—Cowel.

Eskipper, to ship.—Jacob.

Eskippeson, skipping or passage by sea.—Cowel.

Esisors. See ELISORS.

Esne, a hireling of servile condition.

Esneey [fr. esnesia, Lat.], a private prerogative allowed to the eldest coparcener, where an estate descends to daughters for want of an heir male, to choose after the inheritance is divided.—Fleta, l. 5, c. x.

Esperons. Spurs.—7 Co. Rep. 13.

Esplees [fr. expletive, Lat.], the products of land; as the hay of meadows, herbage of pasture, corn of arable land, rents, services, etc.; also the lands, etc., themselves.—Termes de la Ley.

Esponsals [fr. sponsalia, Lat.; espouse, Fr.], the act of contracting or affiancing a man and woman to each other; the ceremony of betrothing.

Esquire [fr. escuyer, Fr.; scutum, Lat.; σκῦτος, Gk., hide of which shields were made and afterwards covered], he who attended a knight in time of war, and carried his shield; whence he was called escuyer, in French, and scutifer or armiger, i.e., armour-bearer, in Latin. No estate, however large, conferred this rank upon its owner.

Esquires may be divided into five classes:

(I.) The younger sons of peers and their eldest sons.

(II.) The eldest sons of knights and their eldest sons.

(III.) The chiefs of ancient families are esquires by prescription.

(IV.) Esquires by creation or office. Such are the heralds and serjeants-at-arms, and some others, who are constituted esquires by receiving a collar of S. S. Judges and other officers of state, justices of the peace, and the higher naval and military officers are designated esquires in their patents and commissions. Doctors in the several faculties, and barristers at law, are also esquires. None of these offices convey gentility to the posterity of the holders.

(V.) The last kind of esquires are those of Knights of the Bath, each of whom appoints three to attend upon him at his installation, and at coronations.

Essartum, woodlands turned into tillage by uprooting the trees and removing the underwood.—Old Records.

Essence, that which is indispensable to that of which it is the essence.

Essendi quietum de tolonio, a writ to be quit of toll; it lies for citizens and burgesses of any city or town, who, by charter or prescription, ought to be exempted from toll, where the same is exacted of them.—Reg. Orig. 258.

Essoin, Essoigne, Assoign [fr. essonium, Lat.; essoine, Fr.; ex, priv., and soing, cura; ab angustia curæ, vel labore liberare, which is a more probable derivation than ἐξομύσθαι, Gk.; though it signifies to excuse by means of an oath, which is the precise nature of an essoin. See Spelman, voc., 'Essoinaire,' an excuse for him who is summoned to appear and answer to an action, or to perform suit to a court-baron, etc., by reason of sickness or infirmity, or other just cause of absence.

The causes of excuse called essoins allowed in the king's court were many. The principal essoin was that de infirmitate, which was of two kinds: 1. De infirmitate veniendi; 2. De infirmitate resiantie—of which the first was afterwards called de malo veniendi, the latter de malo lecti. See 1 Reeves, 115 and 405, for other essoins.

Formerly the first general return day of the term was called the essoin day, because the Court sat to receive essoins; but when essoins were no longer allowed to be cast, i.e., obtained, in personal actions, the Court discontinued such sittings. Still it was considered the essoin day for many purposes, until the 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, s. 6, did away with the essoin day for all purposes, as part of the term.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac., 12th ed., 160.

Essoiniator, a person who made an essoin.

Essoins, Statute of, 12 Edw. II., st. 2. See 2 Reeves, 303.

Est aliquid quod non oportet etiam si licet; quicquid verò non licet certè non oportet. Hob. 159.—(There is that which is not proper, even though permitted; but whatever is not permitted is certainly not proper.)

Estache [fr. estacher, Fr., to fasten], a bridge or stank of stone or timber.—Cowel.

Estanques, wears or kiddles in rivers.

Estate [fr. status, Lat.; état, Fr.]; the condition and circumstance in which an owner stands with regard to his property. It is used in two senses: (1) technically, as the quantity of interest in realty owned by a person; and (2) popularly, as the realty itself. It is either legal, customary, or equitable.

Blackstone considers legal estates in a three-fold view, thus:—

(1) The quantity of interest or duration, divided into—

(A) Freeholds of inheritance, which are subdivided into—

(a) Absolute or fee simple.

(β) Limited fees; which are (a) qualified or base fees, and (b) fees conditional at the common law, afterwards called fees-tail in consequence of the Statute De Donis, which may be (i) general or special, (ii) male or female, (iii) given in frank-marriage.

(B) Freeholds not of inheritance, subdivided into—

(a) Conventional, or created by the act of the parties; they are (a) estates for one's own life, (b) estates pur autre vie, (c) general grant, without expressing any term at all.

(β) Legal, or created by operation of law; they are (a) tenancy in tail after possibility of issue extinct, (b) tenancy by the courtesy of England, (c) tenancy in dower.

(C) Estates less than freehold, subdivided into—

(a) Estates for years.

(β) Estates at will.

(γ) Estates at sufferance.

(D) Estates upon condition, subdivided into—

(a) Estates upon condition implied.

(β) Estates upon condition expressed, and these are either precedent, or subsequent; (a) precedent, which must be performed before an estate can vest or be enlarged; (b) subsequent, by the failure or non-performance of which an estate already vested is defeated; such are (i) estates held in vadio, gage, or pledge, which are of two kinds, vivum vadium, living pledge or vifgage, and mortuum vadium, dead pledge or mortgage; (ii) estates by statute merchant or statute staple; (iii) estates by elegit.

(2) The time of enjoyment, either—

(A) In possession, or

(B) In expectancy, subdivided into—

(a) Remainders created by convention of parties, which are (a) vested, (b) contingent or executory, (c) cross.

(β) Reversions arising by operation of law.

(3) The number and connection of the tenants; either

(A) Severalty,

(B) Joint-tenancy,

(C) Coparceny,

(D) Tenancy in common,

(E) Entireties.—2 Bl. Com. cc. vii.

Estate ad remanentiam, an estate in fee simple.—Glanv. l. 7, c. 1.

Estate Clause, an express clause in conveyances, passing all the estate, etc., in the property conveyed: now implied by virtue of s. 63 of the Conveyancing Act, 1881.

Estates of the Realm, the three branches of the Legislature—The Lords Spiritual, the Lords Temporal, and the Commons. The notion entertained by many, that the three estates of the realm are the King, the Lords, and the Commons, is an error. See Hallam, 'Middle Ages,' vol. iii., c. viii., part 3.

Estoppel [fr. estoupir, Fr., i.e., oppilare, obstipare, Lat.], a conclusive admission, which cannot be denied or controverted. It is of three kinds:—

(1) By matter of record, which imports such absolute and incontrovertible verity, that no person against whom it is producible shall be permitted to aver against it. A record concludes the parties thereto, and their privies, whether in blood, in law, or by estate, upon the point adjudged, but not upon any matter collateral or adjudged by inference.—A judgment in an action in rem is absolutely binding upon all the world.

(2) By deed. No person can be allowed to dispute his own solemn deed, which is therefore conclusive against him, and those claiming under him, even as to the facts recited in it. The general rule is that an indenture estops all who are parties to it, while a deed-poll only estops the party who executes it, since it is his sole language and act.—Shep. Touch. 53.

(3) In pris, as that a tenant cannot dispute his landlord's title. See Duchess of Kingston's case, 2 Smi. L. C., 6th ed., 679.

Estoveria sunt arandi, arandi, construendi et claudendi. 13 Co. 68.—(Estovers are of firebote, ploughbote, housebote, and hedgebote.)

Estoveriis habendis, a writ for a wife judicially separated to recover her alimony or estovers. Obsolete.

Estovers, or Estouviers [fr. estoffer, Fr., to furnish, or festover, Fr., i.e., overe, Lat., to keep warm, cherish, sustain, or defend]. Bote, any kind of sustenance; also a wife's alimony. See COMMON.

Estrays, such valuable animals as are found wandering in a manor or lordship, the owner whereof is not known; in which case the law gives them to the sovereign, and they now most commonly belong to the lord of the manor by special grant from the Crown. But they must be proclaimed in the church and two market towns next adjoining to the place where they are found; and then, if no person claim them, after proclamation and a year and a day passed, they belong to the sovereign or his substitute, without redemption, even though the owner was a minor, or under any other legal incapacity. The doctrine of estrays is only applicable to animals domite nature.—2 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 539, 548.

Estreat, the true extract, copy. Digitized by Google some original writing or record, and especially of recognizances, fines, amercements, etc., entered on the rolls of a court to be levied by the bailiff or other officer.—F. N. B. 57; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 99; and 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, s. 28.

Estreciatus, straightened, applied to roads.—Cowel.

Estrepe, to make spoils in lands to the damage of another, as of a reversioner, etc.

Estrepement [fr. estropier, Fr., to lame; extirpare, Lat.], any spoil or waste made by tenant for life, upon any lands or woods to the prejudice of him in reversion; also making land barren by continual ploughing. The writ of estrepement was abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27.

Ethanim, the seventh month of the Jewish sacred year, and the first of their civil; it answered partly to September and partly to October. After the captivity it was called Tizri.—Brown's Dict. of Bible.

Ethelling, or Ætheling. See ADELING.

Etiquette of the profession, the code of honour agreed on by mutual understanding and tacitly accepted by members of the legal profession; especially by the bar. The Attorney-General is the chief authority on questions of this kind.

Evasion, the act of escaping by means of artifice; a trick or subterfuge.

Eventus est qui ex causa sequitur; et dicitur eventus quia ex causis evenit. 9 Co. 81.—(An event is that which follows from the cause, and is called an event because it eventuates from causes.)

Eventus varios res nova semper habet. Co. Litt. 379.—(A new matter always produces various events.)

Eves-droppers. See EAVES-DROPPERS.

Eviction [fr. evincio, Lat., to overcome], dispossession; also a recovery of land, etc., by form of law. See EJECTMENT.

Evidence, proof, either written or unwritten, of allegations in issue between parties.

The leading rules of evidence are the following:—

(1) The sole object and end of evidence is, to ascertain the truth of the several disputed facts or points in issue; and no evidence ought to be admitted which is not relevant to the issues.

(2) The point in issue is to be proved by the party who asserts the affirmative; according to the maxim affirmanti non neganti incumbit probatio. But where one person charges another with a culpable omission or breach of duty, this rule will not apply, for the person who makes the charge is bound to prove it, though it may involve a negative, since it is one of the first principles of justice, not to presume that a person has acted illegally, till the contrary is proved.

(3) It will be sufficient to prove the substance of the issue.

(4) The best evidence must be given of which the nature of the thing is capable.

(5) Hearsay evidence of a fact is not admissible. The principal exceptions to this rule are the following:—Death-bed declarations (which see); hearsay evidence in questions of pedigree, public right, custom, boundaries, etc., also old leases, rent-rolls, surveys, etc., which are received in favour of persons claiming under the lessors; declarations against interest; rectors' and vicars' books as to the receipt of ecclesiastical dues in favour of their successors; also declarations in the course of office or business in certain cases, as entries in the books of a tradesman by his deceased shopman, who therein supplies proof of a charge against himself, have been admitted as a proof of the delivery of goods, or of other matter therein stated within his own knowledge.

Evidence is also divided into direct and circumstantial. The rules of evidence are the same in civil as in criminal courts, for a fact must be established by the same evidence, whether it be followed by a civil or a criminal consequence.—Lord Melville's case, 29 How. St. Tr. 76 b.

The mode of taking evidence on a trial in the Common Law Courts differed from that which was usual in the Court of Chancery. It was oral in the former, and by affidavit in the latter. Now, however, that there is one Supreme Court, the ordinary mode of taking evidence is by oral examination of witnesses; but by agreement, or by leave of the Court or a judge, affidavits or depositions may be used (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XXXVII.), and are very frequently used in the Chancery Division. The forms of written evidence which may be admitted, and the terms that may be imposed, will be seen from the rules in the above Order. See Best, or Roscoe, or Taylor, or Powell on Evidence, and for a collection of the statutes upon the subject, see Chitty's Statutes, vol. ii., tit. 'Evidence.'

Eundo, morando, et redeundo (in going, remaining, and returning).

Eunomy [fr. εὐνομία, Gk.], a constitution of good laws.

Every one must be taken to intend that which is the natural consequence of his actions. A leading maxim of English law.

Evocation, withdrawing a case from the cognizance of an inferior court.—Fr. Law.

Ewage [fr. eau, Fr., water], toll paid for water-passage.—Jacob. See AQUAGE.

Ewbrice [fr. ew, Sax., marriage, and bryce, breaking], adultery.—Jacob.

Ewry, an office in the royal household where the table linen, etc., is taken care of.

Ex abundanti cautela (from abundant caution).

Exaction, a wrong done by an officer, or one in pretended authority, by taking a reward or fee for that which the law allows not, whereas extortion is where an officer takes more than is due, when something is due to him. The punishment is fine and imprisonment.—Co. Litt. 368.

Exactor regis, the king's collector of taxes; also a sheriff.

Ex æquo et bono (in equity and good conscience).

Examination, the act of eliciting by questions a person's knowledge of facts or science. A witness undergoes three examinations; (1) Examination-in-chief, which is made by the party calling him; (2) Cross-examination, by the opposite party; and (3) Re-examination, by the party who called the witness, which is confined to matters arising out of the cross-examination.

Examiners in Chancery. Two officers appointed to examine witnesses in town in causes depending in that Court. Special examiners were appointed for the country, and occasionally for town.—Smi. Eq. Pr. 419.

Exannual roll, the old way of exhibiting sheriff's accounts. Illeivable and desperate debts were transcribed into this roll, which was yearly read, to see what might be recovered.

Ex antecedentibus et consequentibus fit optima interpretatio. 2 Inst. 317.—(The best interpretation is made from the context.)

Ex assensu patris, dower, a species of dower ad ostium ecclesie, during the life of the father of the husband; the son, by the father's consent expressly given, endowing his wife with parcel of his father's lands. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 105, s. 13.

Excambiator, a broker; one employed to exchange lands.—Cowel.

Excambium, an exchange: a place where merchants meet to transact their business; also an equivalent in recompense; a recompense in lieu of dower ad ostium ecclesie.—1 Reeves, 101 & 103.

Excambion, a contract whereby one piece of land is exchanged for another.—Scotch Law.

Ex cathedra, with the weight of one in authority; originally applied to the decisions of the Popes from their cathedra, or chair.

Excellency, the title of a viceroy, Governor-general, Ambassador, or Commander-in-chief.

Exceptio, the designation for the defendant's plea.—Civil Law.

Exceptio ejus rei cujus petitur dissolutio nulla est. Jenk. Cent. 37.—(A plea of that thing of which the dissolution is sought is a nullity.)

Exceptio falsi omnium ultima.—(A plea of that which is false is the last of all.)

Exceptio nulla est versus actionem quæ exceptionem perimit. Jenk. Cent. 106.—(A plea against an action which entirely destroys the plea is a nullity.)

Exceptio probat regulam de rebus non exceptis. 11 Co. Litt. 41.—(An exception proves the rule concerning things not excepted.)

Exceptio quæ firmat legem, exponit legem. 2 Buls. 189.—(An exception which confirms the law, expounds the law.)

Exceptio rei judicatæ, a defence that the matter has been already adjudged in another court between the parties.—Scotch Law.

Exceptio semper ultima ponenda est. 9 Co. Litt. 53.—(An exception is always to be last.)

Exception, exclusion of anything or person; a stop or stay to an action; also the particular point of law stated in the margin of a demurrer. In Chancery, exceptions might be taken to pleadings if scandalous, and if a defendant's answer were insufficient, the plaintiff might file exceptions to it.—Sm. Ch. Pr. 344, 786.

In summary proceedings upon an act of parliament, an exception in the act 'may be proved by the defendant, but need not be negated or specified in the information or complaint'; and if so specified or negated need not be proved by the informant or complainant. Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, s. 39, subs. 2, extending the proviso of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1848, 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 14.

In the Scotch law, as in the Roman, exceptio is synonymous with defence.

Exceptis excipiendis, with all necessary exceptions.

Excerpta, or Excerpts. Extracts.

Excess. When a defendant pleaded to an action of assault that the plaintiff trespassed on his land, and he would not depart when ordered, whereupon he, molliter manus imposuit, gently laid hands on him: the replication of excess was to the effect that the defendant used more force than necessary. See PLEADING.

Excessum in jure reprobatur. Excessus in re quilibet jure reprobatur communi. Co. Litt. 44.—(Excess in law is reprehended. Excess in anything is reprehended at Common Law.)

Exchange [cambium, permutatio, Lat.], often contracted into change, a building or other place in considerable trading cities, where merchants, agents, bankers, brokers, and other persons concerned in commerce, meet at certain times to confer and treat together of matters relating to exchanges, remittances, payments, adventures, assurances, freights, and other mercantile negotiations, both by sea and land..

Also used to designate that species of mercantile transactions by which the debts of individuals residing at a distance from their creditors are satisfied without the transmission of actual money.

Par of Exchange. The par of the currency of any two countries, means, among merchants, the equivalency of a certain amount of the currency of the one in the currency of the other, supposing the currencies of both to be of the precise weight and purity fixed by their respective mints. Thus, according to the mint regulations of Great Britain and France, 1*l.* sterling is equal to 25 fr. 20 c., which is said to be the par between London and Paris. And the exchange between the two countries is said to be at par when bills are negotiated on this footing; that is, for example, when a bill for 100*l.* drawn in London is worth 2520 fr. in Paris, and conversely. When 1*l.* in London buys a bill on Paris for more than 25 fr. 20 c. the exchange is said to be in favour of London, and against Paris; and when, on the other hand, 1*l.* in London will not buy a bill on Paris for 25 fr. 20 c. the exchange is against London and in favour of Paris.

Circumstances which determine the course of exchange. The exchange is affected, or made to diverge from par, by two classes of circumstances; first, by any discrepancy between the actual weight and fineness of the coins, or of the bullion for which the substitutes used in their place will exchange, and their weight or fineness, as fixed by the mint regulations; and, secondly, by any sudden increase or diminution of the bills drawn in one country upon another.—McCull. Com. Dict.

Exchange, Bill of. See BILL OF EXCHANGE.

Exchange [fr. excambium, Lat.], Deed of, an original Common Law conveyance, for the reciprocal transfer of interests, ejusdem generis, as fee simple for fee simple, legal estate for legal estate, copyhold for copyhold of the same manor, and the like, the one in consideration of the other. It takes place between two distinct contracting parties only, although several persons may compose each party. The operative and indispensable verb is 'exchange,' which no longer implies a general warranty or right of re-entry (8 & 9 the property exchanged by the parties themselves to the deed is essential. The exchange is void if either party dies before entry, for, under such circumstances, the parties have no freehold in them, for the heir cannot enter and take as a purchaser, because he takes under the deed, only by way of limitation in course of descent.

In consequence of the inconvenience arising from the implied warranty and re-entry, exchange fell into disuse, and mutual conveyances, the one in consideration of the other, were resorted to; but the abolition of this implied condition in law tends to revive Common Law exchanges.

The General Inclosure Act (8 & 9 Vict. c. 118, s. 92) provides for the allotment and award of any land to be inclosed in exchange for any other land within the parish in which the land to be enclosed shall be situate, and enables the Commissioners to effect exchanges of lands upon the written application of the persons interested in the lands proposed to be exchanged by directing inquiries whether the proposed exchange would be beneficial to the owners, and if so, by framing under their hands and seals an order of exchange, with a map or plan of the lands to be given and taken in exchange, and such order is not to be impeached by reason of any infirmity of estate or defect of title of the persons on whose application it shall be made. The land taken in exchange remains and inures to the same uses, trusts, intents, and purposes, and is subject to the same charges as the land given in exchange (s. 147). The act provides for the division of intermixed lands, and for the exchange of inconvenient allotments for public purposes for more convenient land upon giving certain notices, and also empowers the Commissioners to apportion the expenses (ss. 148, 151); and see 9 & 10 Vict. c. 70: 10 & 11 Vict. c. 111; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 99; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 83 (s. 7 extends exchange and petition to rights, easements, and rent charges); 14 & 15 Vict. c. 53; 15 & 16 Vict. c. 79; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 124; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 97; 18 & 19 Vict. c. 52; and 20 & 21 Vict. c. 31, which severally amend and explain the General Inclosure Act; and as to exchanges generally see 1 & 2 Geo. IV. c. 92; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 3; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 60, s. 30; 14 & 15 Vict. c. 104, s. 1; 17 & 18 Vict. c. 116; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 124 and c. 145, ss. 1—10. Consult Cooke on Inclosures.

The Settled Land Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 38, s. 3, subs. 3, allows a tenant for life to make an exchange of settled land for other land.

Exchange of livings, effected by commodatio (see QUOMINUS), it administered them into the bishop's hands, and each party being inducted into the other's benefice; if either die before both are inducted, the exchange is void.—31 Eliz. c. 6, s. 8.

Exchanges, Regimental. See 38 Vict. c. 16, by which the Sovereign may from time to time by regulation authorize exchanges by officers from one regiment to another, and nothing in the 'Army Brokerage Acts' (i.e., 5 & 6 Ed. VI., c. 16, and 49 Geo. III. c. 126, by which the sale of commissions is punishable) extends to exchanges so authorised.

Excheat. See ESCHEAT.

Exchequer bills, bills of credit issued by authority of Parliament. They are for various sums, and bear interest (generally from $1\frac{1}{2}d.$ to $2\frac{1}{2}d.$ per diem, per 100*l.*) according to the usual rate at the time. The advances of the Bank to Government are made upon Exchequer bills; and the daily transactions between the Bank and Government are principally carried on through their intervention.

Notice of the time at which outstanding Exchequer bills are to be paid off is given by public advertisement. Bankers prefer investing in Exchequer bills to any other species of stock, even though the interest be for the most part comparatively low; because the capital may be received at the Treasury at the rate originally paid for it, the holders being exempted from any risk of fluctuation. Exchequer bills were first issued in 1696, and have been annually issued ever since.—McCull Com. Dict.; and see the act for consolidating the several laws regulating the preparation, issue, and payment of Exchequer bills and bonds, 29 & 30 Vict. c. 25. As to the punishment for the forgery of Exchequer bills, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, s. 8; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 25, s. 15; 36 & 37 Vict. c. 54, s. 5.

Exchequer, Court of [fr. eschequier, Nor.-Fr.; scaccarium, Low Lat.; schatz, Germ., a treasure], consisted of two divisions, a Court of Revenue, and a Court of Common Law, having also an equitable jurisdiction, which, except when it sat as a Court of Revenue, was transferred to the Court of Chancery by 5 Vict. c. 5. See A.-G. v. Halling, 15 M. & W. 687. As a Court of Revenue it ascertained and enforced by proceedings appropriate to the case, the proprietary rights of the Crown against the subjects of the realm. To proceed against a person in this department of the Court was called to exchequer him. The practice and procedure on the revenue side of this Court was amended by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, and afterwards by 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104. As a Court of Common Law (after having obtained jurisdiction by the fiction of redress between subject and subject in all actions whatever, except real actions. It was a court of record, and its judges were six (formerly five) in number, consisting of one chief and five (formerly four) puisné barons. This Court was made a Division of the High Court of Justice (Jud. Act, 1873, ss. 31, 34). See EXCHEQUER DIVISION.

Exchequer Chamber, Court of, a tribunal of error and appeal.

First, it existed in former times as a Court of mere debate, such causes from the other Courts being sometimes adjourned into it as the judges upon argument found to be of great weight and difficulty, before any judgment was given upon them in the Court below. It then consisted of all the judges of the three Superior Courts of Common Law, and at times the Lord Chancellor also.

Second, it existed as a Court of Error, where the judgments of each of the Superior Courts of Common Law, in all actions whatever, were subject to revision by the judges of the other two sitting collectively. See 27 Eliz. c. 8 (error from Queen's Bench) and 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 70, s. 8 (error from the three courts). The composition of this Court consequently admitted of three different combinations, consisting of any two of the Courts below which were not parties to the judgment appealed against. There was no given number required to constitute the Exchequer Chamber, but the Court never consisted of less than five. One counsel only was heard on each side. Error lay from this Court to the House of Lords. The Court is abolished and its jurisdiction in appeals (proceedings in error in civil cases and bills of exceptions being abolished) is transferred to the Court of Appeal (Jud. Act, 1875, s. 18 (4)). See APPEAL, COURT OF.

The 40 Geo. II. c. 39, established a Court of Exchequer Chamber in Ireland.

Exchequer Division. A division of the High Court of Justice, to which the special business of the Court of Exchequer was specially assigned by s. 34 of the Judicature Act, 1873. Merged in the Queen's Bench Division from and after February, 1881, by Order in Council under s. 31 of that Act.

Excise [fr. accis, Dut.; excisum, Lat.], the name given to the duties or taxes laid on certain articles produced and consumed at home, amongst which spirits have always been the most important; but, exclusive of these, the duties on the licenses of auctioneers, brewers, etc., etc., and on the licenses to keep dogs, kill game, etc., etc., are included in the excise duties.

Excise duties were introduced into England by the Long Parliament in 1643, being then laid on the makers and vendors of ale, beer, cider, and perry. The management of the excise, originally and for a long time entrusted to special commissioners (as to whom see 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 53), was, in 1849, by 12 Vict. c. 1, transferred to the Board of Inland Revenue.

Consult Bell and Dwell's Excise Acts, published in 1873.

Exclusa, Exclusagium, a sluice to carry off water; the payment to the lord for the benefit of such a sluice.—Cowel.

Excommencement, excommunication.—Law French. See 23 Hen. VIII. c. 3.

Excommunication, an ecclesiastical interdict or censure, divided into the greater and the lesser; by the greater a person was excluded from the communion of the church and the company of the faithful, and was rendered incapable of any legal act; by the lesser he was merely debarred from participation in the sacraments. (As to refusal to administer the Holy Communion, see Jenkins v. Cook, 1 P. D. 80.)

Excommunication was formerly the process by which the decrees and orders of the Ecclesiastical Courts were enforced; but in all cases of contempt of court it has now been abolished, and in lieu thereof, where a lawful citation or sentence has not been obeyed, the judge has power, after a certain period, to pronounce such person contumacious and in contempt, and to signify the same to the Court of Chancery; whereupon a writ de contumace capiendo shall issue having the same force as formerly belonged, in case of contempt, to a writ de excommunicato capiendo.—53 Geo. III. c. 127, s. 2. See 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 93; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 93; and 6 & 7 Vict. 38.

Excommunicato capiendo. See EXCOMMUNICATION.

Excommunicato deliberando, a writ to the sheriff for delivery of an excommunicated person out of prison, upon certificate from the ordinary of his conformity to the ecclesiastical jurisdiction.—F. N. B. 63.

Excommunicato interdictitur omnis actus legitimus, ita quod agere non potest, nec aliquem convenire, licet ipse ab aliis possit conveniri. Co. Litt. 133.—(Every legal act is forbidden an excommunicated person, so that he cannot act; nor sue any person; but he may be sued by others.)

Excommunicato recapiendo, a writ commanding that persons excommunicated, who for their obstinacy had been committed to prison, but were unlawfully set free before they had given caution to obey the authority of the church, should be sought after, retaken, and imprisoned again.—Reg. Orig. 67.

Ex concessis, as has been already allowed.

Ex contractu (from a contract). One of the greatest classes of obligation from which a right of action accrues. The actions are (1) account; (2) assumpsit, or promises; (3) covenant; (4) debt; (5) detinue; (6) scire facias, or revivor. See now ACTION.

Exculpation, letters of, a warrant granted at the suit of a prisoner for citing witnesses in his own defence.—Scotch Law.

Excusable homicide is of two sorts, either per infortunium, by misadventure, or se defendendo, upon a sudden affray.

Homicide, per infortunium, is where a man, doing a lawful act, without any intention of hurt, unfortunately kills another; but if death ensue from any unlawful act, the offence is manslaughter, and not misadventure.

Homicide, se defendendo, is where a man kills another upon a sudden affray, merely in his own defence, or in defence of his wife, child, parent, or servant, and not from any vindictive feeling.—Bl. Com. 178.

Excusat aut extenuat delictum in capitalibus quod non operatur idem in civilibus. Bac. Max. r. 15.—(That may excuse or palliate a wrongful act in capital cases which would not have the same effect in civil injuries.) See Broom's Maxims, 5th ed., 324.

Excuss, to seize and detain by law.

Excussion, seizure by law.

Ex debito justitiæ. From what is owed by justice, or of right. Said of a remedy which the Court has no discretion to refuse.

Ex delicto (from a tort or offence). The actions which arose from torts were: (1) case, (2) trespass, (3) trover, (4) replevin. Consult Addison on Torts.

Ex delicto non ex supplicio emergit infamia. —(Infamy arises from the crime, not from the punishment.)

Ex diuturnitate temporis omnia præsumuntur esse solemniter acta. Jenk. Cent. 185.—(From lapse of time, all things are presumed to have been done properly.)

Ex dolo malo non oritur actio. Cowp. 343. —(From a fraud an action does not arise.)

Ex donationibus autem feodu militaria vel magnum serjeantium non continentibus oritur nobis quoddam nomen generale, quod est socagium. Co Litt. 86.—(From grants not containing military fees or grand serjeanty, a kind of general name is used by us, which is socage.)

Exeat, a permission which a bishop grants to a priest to go out of his diocese; also leave to go out generally.

Executed, something done or completed.

Executed consideration, a consideration which is executed before the promise upon which it is founded is made, as where A. bails a man's servant, and the master afterwards promises to indemnify A.; but if a man promise to indemnify A. in the event of his bailing his servant, the consideration is then executory. With respect to an executed consideration, the rule is, that if it were not at the precedent request of the promiser, but a merely voluntary courtesy, it will not suffice to support a promise; therefore, in the first example, the promise would not be binding, unless the bailing were at the master's precedent request.—Smith on Contracts; and Notes to Lampleigh v. Braithwait, 1 Smith L. C., 6th ed., 139.

Executed contract, where nothing remains to be done by either party, and where the transaction is completed at the moment that the agreement is made, as where an article is sold and delivered, and payment therefore is made on the spot. A contract is said to be executory where some future act is to be done, as where an agreement is made to build a house in six months, or to do an act on or before some future day, or to lend money upon a certain interest, payable at a future time.—Story on Contracts, 8.

Executed estates, estates in possession.

Executed fine, the fine sur cognizance de droit, come ceo que il ad de son done; or a fine upon acknowledgment of the right of the cognizee, as that which he has of the gift of the cognizor. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

Executed remainder. A vested remainder, which see.

Executed trust. When an estate is conveyed to the use of A. and his heirs, with a simple declaration of trust for B. and his heirs, or the heirs of his body, the trust is perfect; and it is said to be executed, because no further act is necessary to be done by the trustee to raise and give effect to it; because there is no ground for the interference of a Court of Equity to affix a meaning to the words declaratory of the trust, which they do not legally import.—1 Sand. Uses and Trusts, 335.

As all trusts are executory in this sense, that the trustee is bound to dispose of the estate according to the tenure of his trust, whether active or passive, it would be more accurate and precise to substitute the terms, perfect and imperfect, for executed and executory trusts.—1 Hayes's Conv. 85.

Executed use, the first use in a conveyance upon which the Statute of Uses operates by bringing the possession to it, the combination of which, i.e., the use and the possession, form the legal estate, and thus the statute is said to execute the use.

Executio est finis et fructus legis. Co. Litt. 289.—(Execution is the end and fruit of the law.)

Executio juris non habet injuriam. 2 Rol. Rep. 301.—(The execution of law does no injury.)

Executio est executio juris secundum judicium. 3 Inst. 212.—(Execution is the execution of the law according to the judgment.)

Execution, the last stage of a suit whereby possession is obtained of anything recovered. It is styled final process.

Writs of execution are of various kinds and bear various names.

(1) A judgment for the recovery of money in any branch of the High Court is enforceable by any of the modes by which a judgment or decree for the payment of money of any Court whose jurisdiction is transferred to the High Court might have been enforced (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XLII., r. 1). See as to Common Law Execution, 1 Chit. Arch. Pr., 12th ed., 591 et seq.; and as to Chancery, Dan. Ch. Pr., 5th ed., 912 et seq.

(2) A judgment for the payment of money into Court may be enforced by sequestration or attachment (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XLII., r. 2).

(3) A judgment for the recovery of land may be enforced by writ of possession (Ibid., r. 3).

(4) A judgment for the recovery of property other than land or money may be enforced by writ for delivery of the property, or by attachment, or by sequestration (Ibid., r. 4).

(5) A judgment requiring any person to do any other act, or to abstain from doing anything may be enforced by attachment or committal (Ibid., r. 5).

The Court, before allowing execution where the judgment is subject to any condition, may direct an issue to determine the rights of the parties (Ibid., r. 7). Execution can only be had on filing a precipe, and the production of the judgment or an office copy showing the date of entry (Ibid., rr. 9 and 10). In case of a judgment for the payment of money, execution may issue immediately on judgment being entered, if the money is then payable, subject to power in a judge to shorten or lengthen the time within which the judgment may be so enforced (Ibid., r. 15). A writ of execution remains in force for one year only, unless renewed (Ibid., r. 16). As between the original parties to a judgment execution may issue at any time within six years from recovery of the judgment (Ibid., r. 18); but after that time or any change of parties by death or otherwise, leave must be obtained before it can issue (Ibid., r. 19), subject also to a power in a judge to try the rights of parties by an issue (Ibid.). The order in which writs of execution may be issued remains as before (Ibid., r. 24).

The ordinary writs of execution are capias ad satisfaciendum; fieri facias; elegit; levari facias; and habere facias possessionem. See these titles respectively. As to the writ of capias ad satisfaciendum it is to be borne in mind that by the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, imprisonment for debt has been abolished, except in the cases specified in s. 4. See IMPRISONMENT.

If two writs of execution against the same person are delivered to the sheriff he must execute that first which was first delivered to him, even where both were delivered upon the same day; and he must set about executing the writ within a reasonable time after he receives it for execution; and if he omit doing so, and any damage arise to the party from his negligence, an action on the case may be supported against him. The sheriff cannot break open any outer door of the party's dwelling-house, in order to enforce a writ of execution; unless in the case of a writ of seisin, or habere facias possessionem; but he may seize the party's goods in the house of a stranger, and even break open the outer door to do so. (Semayne's case, 1 Sm. L. C.)

Writs of execution are seldom returned in practice, except the elegit and inquisition. Either party may, however, rule the sheriff to return the writ, even after he goes out of office, provided it be within six lunar months after the expiration of his term of office. If execution be sued out against two or more persons, and the whole amount be levied upon one, in actions ex contractu (unless upon a contract made, with the defendants as partners in trade), the party upon whom the whole is levied may maintain an action against the others, and oblige them to contribute their respective shares; but in most cases in actions ex delicto he cannot thus compel a contribution, and he is, in general, altogether without remedy. An irregular execution will be set aside on motion, and usually with costs. The 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 57, abolished arrests for debts under 20*l.*—1 Chit. Arch. Prac., 12th ed., 591 et seq. For the forms of writs of execution and of precipes for them, see Jud. Act, 1875, App. E. & F.

By 23 & 24 Vict. c. 38, writs of execution of judgments are required to be registered in order to affect lands as against bond fide purchasers for valuable consideration, and by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 112, no judgment, etc., shall affect lands, until such lands shall have been actually delivered in execution by virtue of a writ of elegit, or other lawful authority; and such writ of execution must be registered. See ELEGIT, FIERI FACIAS, etc.

Execution of Criminals must be performed by the legal officer—the sheriff, or his deputy.—4 Bl. Com. c. xxxii. The common law mode of execution is by hanging, which until 1868 took place in public; but in that year the Act 31 Vict. c. 24 prescribed that the execution must take place within the walls of the prison, in presence of the sheriff, gaoler, chaplain, and surgeon of the prison, and such other officers of the prison as the sheriff requires, or allows.

As to the suspension of execution of sentence of death in case of a lunatic, see 27 & 28 Vict. c. 29.

Execution of decree. Sometimes, from the neglect of parties, or some other cause, it became impossible to carry a decree into execution without the further decree of the Court upon a bill filed for that purpose. This happened generally in cases where parties having neglected to proceed upon the decree, their rights under it became so embarrassed by a variety of subsequent events that it was necessary to have the decree of the Court to settle and ascertain them. Such a bill might also be brought to carry into execution the judgment of an inferior Court of Equity, if the jurisdiction of that Court was not equal to the purpose; as in the case of a decree in Wales, which the defendant avoided by fleeing into England.

This species of bill was generally partly an original bill, and partly a bill in the nature of an original bill, though not strictly original.—Story's Eq. Plead. 342; Dan. Ch. Pr., 5th ed., 1429. See JUDGMENT.

Execution of Deeds, the signing, sealing, and delivery of them by the parties, as their own acts and deeds, in the presence of witnesses. See DEED. As to compulsory executions, the 1 Wm. IV. c. 36, s. 15, subs 15, enacts, that when any person shall have been directed by any decree or order in Chancery, to execute any deed, etc., and shall have refused to execute, or transfer the same, and shall have been committed to prison for contempt, the Court may appoint an officer of the Court to execute the deed instead, and that such official execution shall have the same validity as if the deed had been executed by the party himself.

The rule that a purchaser was entitled to have the conveyance executed in his presence is abrogated by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41, s. 8, which section, however, preserves the rule that the purchaser may have at his own cost the execution of the conveyance attested by some person appointed by him.

Execution of Wills. By the Wills Act, 1 Vict. c. 26, a will must be in writing (except in the case of soldiers and sailors in active service) and signed at the foot or end thereof by the testator, or by some other person in his presence and by his direction; and such signature must be made or acknowledged by the testator in the presence of two or more witnesses present at the same time; and each witness must attest and subscribe the will in the presence of the testator, but no form of attestation is necessary, although it is usual to embody in an attestation-clause all the statutory requirements. An Act passed in 1852, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 24, contains most elaborate saving allowances for the position of the signature. Thus, the signature of the testator may be placed 'at, or after, or following, or under, or beside, or opposite to, the end of the will'; 'a blank space may intervene between the concluding word of the will and the signature'; the signature may be 'on a side, or page, or other portion of the paper or papers containing the will, whereon no clause, or paragraph, or disposing part of the will may be written above the signature,' etc., the only restriction being that 'no signature is to be operative to give effect to any disposition or direction which is underneath or which follows it; nor to give effect to any disposition or direction inserted after the signature is made.'

Obiterations, interlineations, or other alterations must, by s. 21 of the Wills Act, be executed in the same manner as a will. See Jarman on Wills and Williams on Executors, and post. tit. WILL.

Executione faciendâ, a writ commanding execution of a judgment. Obsolete.—Cowel.

Executione faciendâ in withernamium, a writ that lay for taking cattle of one who has conveyed the cattle of another out of the county, so that the sheriff cannot replevy them.—Reg. Orig. 82.

Executione judicii, a writ directed to the judge of an Inferior Court to do execution upon a judgment therein, or to return some reasonable cause wherefore he delays the execution.—F. N. B. 20.

Executioner, he that inflicts capital punishment; he that puts to death according to the sentence of the Law. See EXECUTION OF CRIMINALS.

Executive, that branch of the government which puts the laws into execution, as distinguished from the legislative and judicial branches. The body that deliberates and enacts laws is legislative; the body that judges and applies the laws in particular cases is judicial; and the body that carries the laws into effect, or superintends the enforcement of them, is executive. The executive authority, in all monarchies, is vested in the sovereign.

Executor [fr. exécuteur, Fr.], a person appointed by a testator to carry out the directions and requests in his will, and to dispose of the property according to his testamentary provisions after his decease.

The leading duties and responsibilities of an executor may be thus classed :—

(1) He will not be allowed as against creditors extravagant funeral expenses if the testator died insolvent ; and if he neglects to secure the property, and loss ensue, he will be personally liable for a devastavit.

(2) Before probate of the will, an executor may effectually do most of the acts that he could do afterwards, because by the very appointment the testator has evinced personal confidence in his nominee, and, therefore, the interest of an executor arises not from the probate, but from the will ; and he may release a debt or assign a term for years before probate. Also, he may collect and secure assets, receive debts, and give effectual receipts, assent to a legacy, present bills or notes for payment, give notices of dishonour, or take proceedings in bankruptcy ; so he may issue a writ of summons, but he must obtain probate before the hearing. He may be sued before probate, if he has acted. It is said that a person who is entitled to administration, can, before obtaining letters of administration, do no act whatever ; but he might have filed a bill in Chancery, although he might not commence an action at Law, and he may collect, secure, and ascertain the value of the property, so as to enable him to make affidavit that it does not exceed a certain value, as required by the statute.

(3) Instead of an inventory and valuation of the testator's personal property on stamped paper it is now usual, in order to be safe, to have an accurate inventory made by any competent person, distinguishing such debts due to the estate as are separate or good from those which are doubtful or desperate, and then obtain the written consent of all persons interested in the assets, or at least of the legatees or residuary legatee, so as to save the expense of a valuation. It is a usual and proper precaution, in cases of the least doubt, shortly after the funeral, to publish an advertisement in the principal newspapers for debtors to pay their debts, and for claimants to send in the particulars of their claims to a named person.

(4) Probate should be obtained within six calendar months after death of testator, and if delayed after that time, a penalty of 100%. and 10% per cent. on the property would be incurred. If there be a suit or dispute relative to the will or administration, the probate or letters of administration should be obtained within two calendar months after it is ended (55 Geo. III. c. 184, s. 37). The probate should be obtained to the extent of the sum really expected to be received. An administrator, after obtaining letters of administration, stands in many respects in the same situation as an executor, and the cases relating to one in general equally apply to the other.

(5) It is the duty of the executor or administrator to collect and speedily reduce into money the personal assets, when not otherwise directed, especially if they be of a perishable nature. If executors be directed by the will to carry on the testator's business or trade, they should do so under the protection of the Chancery Division of the High Court. The 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 2, enables executors or administrators to recover for any injuries to the real or personal estate of the deceased, committed within six months before his death. Actions against executors or administrators may be supported for any wrong committed by the deceased to the real or personal property of another, provided they be brought within six months after the death of the deceased. Section 31 subjects executors or administrators personally to costs when non-suited or having a verdict against them, unless the Court or judge otherwise order. But they will be allowed such costs out of the assets, unless they have been guilty of misconduct or fraud. If an executor be hastily pressed by one or more creditors, in case of any reasonable doubt, he should either act with the concurrence of the legatees and next of kin, or bring an action in the Chancery Division of the High Court (see Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34), or get a friendly creditor to do so, to compel all the creditors to come in and receive payment. Submissions to arbitration should restrict the arbitrator from awarding against the executor personally, and should be made with the consent of creditors, legatees, and next of kin. If the executor or administrator does not bring an action within six months for compensation to the family of a testator killed by accident, the parties beneficially interested may sue.—27 & 28 Vict. c. 95. As to the mode of administering the estate of a deceased person who is insolvent, see DEBTS.

(6) As an executor or administrator cannot sue himself, the Law allows him, when he has been legally invested with his representative character, to retain out of any assets that may have come to his hands money to the extent of all funeral and testamentary expenses and debts legally paid by him out of his own pocket, and also any debt due to himself, before he pays any other creditor, in equal degree, and he may retain his own debt, notwithstanding a decree has been made in a suit by other creditors for administration of assets equally, and notwithstanding assets out of which he seeks to retain his debt came to his hands after decree, and even if the debt be barred by the Statute of Limitations. Where there are joint executors or administrators, they must, inter se, retain their debts rateably, and in proportion to the assets.

(7) It has long been settled that, amongst creditors in equal degree, an executor may, even after action commenced by an adverse creditor, and at any time before judgment therein, confess a judgment, and give a preference to any other favoured creditor in the same or a higher degree, thereby postponing the party first suing; and unless assets should afterwards come to hand sufficient to pay both, the first suitor will be totally deprived of the benefit of his prior action, and this, although it be done for the express purpose of depriving the plaintiff of the debt. But the Court will, to a certain extent, by a judgment, but not before, upon action brought by any creditor on behalf of himself and all other creditors, against the executor or administrator, require him to account and distribute equally and decree a proper division and distribution, and this is considered in the nature of a judgment in favour of all the creditors.

(8) In general, legacies ought not to be paid within a year after the death of the testator, and not even then without an indemnity, if there be the least reason to apprehend that there are debts or claims outstanding. This year is allowed in analogy to the Statute of Distributions, which enacts 'that no distribution of the goods of any person dying intestate be made till after one year after the intestate's death'; and in order that the executor may have full opportunity to obtain information of the state of the property, an executor cannot be compelled to pay a legacy, within that period, even in a case where the testator directed it to be discharged within six months after his death. An executor cannot give himself or any other legatee (except in the case of specific legacies) any preference over the remaining legatees, as he may in the case of debts, nor can he retain a sum so as to pay himself; and in case of insufficiency of assets to pay the whole, all general legatees are to abate alike and in proportion to the amount of their respective legacies; and a legatee will be compelled to refund when the estate proves insufficient, whether security has been given by him for such purpose or not.

(9) An executor is not entitled to any remuneration for his own personal trouble or loss of time, unless it be expressed in the will; on which account the law formerly gave to the executor the whole residue undisposed of, unless, by some expression, to be collected from the will, a contrary intention was to be collected. But the next of kin became entitled to the unbequeathed residue by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 40.

(10) All the executors should join in suing, otherwise the defendant might have pleaded in abatement or defeated the proceeding (and may now apply to change the parties, see ABATEMENT), unless those who have not proved have formally renounced. Consult Williams on Executors and Administrators.

The distribution of a residuary estate by the executor is to some extent facilitated by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, ss. 27—29, which allow a sum to be set apart to meet future claims upon the estate in respect of the covenants in a lease assigned to a purchaser, etc. See ADMINISTRATION.

As to the administration of persons deceased in the naval service, see 28 & 29 Vict. c. 111. The next of kin of a deceased soldier are in some cases allowed to receive his share of prize money without taking out probate or letters of administration. 27 & 28 Vict. c. 36. When an executor or administrator sues, his representative character must appear on the writ (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. III., r. 4); and he may sue or be sued without joining the parties beneficially interested in the estate (Ibid., Ord. XIV., r. 7). See PARTIES; and his right to represent the estate must, if denied, be denied specifically (Ibid., Ord. XIX., r. 11). As to joining claims by or against executors or administrators with other claims, see JOINDER OF CAUSES OF ACTION. See also COUNTY COURTS.

Executor de son tort. If a stranger take upon himself to act as executor, without any just authority (as by intermeddling with the goods of the deceased, and many other transactions), he is called in Law an executor of his own wrong, de son tort, and is liable to all the trouble of an executorship without any of the profits or advantages; but the doing of acts of necessity or humanity, as locking up the goods or burying the corpse of the deceased, will not amount to such an intermeddling as will charge a man as executor of his own wrong. Such an one cannot bring an action himself in right of the deceased; but actions may be brought against him. And, in all actions by creditors against such an intruder he shall be named as executor generally; for the most obvious conclusion which strangers can form of his conduct is, that he has a will of the deceased wherein he is named executor, but has not yet taken probate thereof. He is chargeable with the debts of the deceased, so far as assets come to his hands; and, as against creditors in general, he is allowed all payments made to any other creditor in the same or a superior degree, himself only excepted. And though as against the rightful executor or administrator he cannot plead such payment, yet it shall be allowed him in mitigation of damages; unless, perhaps, upon a deficiency of assets, whereby the rightful executor may be prevented from satisfying his own debt.—1 Wms. Exors, 7th ed., 257 et seq.; and see Peters v. Leeder, 47 L. J. Q. B. 573.

Executor of an Executor. The interest in a testator's estate and effects, vested in his executor, at the decease of the executor devolves upon such executor's executor; but in the case of the decease of an administrator, a fresh administration must be granted; for this reason, that, whereas an executor is appointed by the testator, an administrator merely derives his authority from the Court of Probate.

Executor lucratus. An executor who has assets of his testator who in his lifetime made himself liable by a wrongful interference with the property of another.—Davidson v. Tulloch, 6 Jurist (n. s.), 543.

• Executory, performing official duties; contingent; also personal estate of a deceased; whatever may be executed.

Executory consideration. A consideration which is to be performed after the contract for which it is a consideration is made. See CONSIDERATION.

Executory contract. A contract in which something is to be performed after it is made, as where A. agrees to build a house for B., and B. agrees to pay A. 1000*l.* when the house is finished. See CONTRACT.

Executory devise. Mr. Fearne (Cont. Rem. 386) defines an executory devise to be strictly, such a limitation of a future estate or interest in lands or chattels (though in the case of chattels personal, it is more properly an executory bequest) as the Law admits in the case of a will, though contrary to the rules of limitation in conveyances at Common Law. It is only an indulgence allowed to a man's last will and testament, where otherwise the words of the will would be void; for wherever a future interest is so limited by devise as to fall within the rules laid down for the limitation of contingent remainders, such an interest is not an executory devise, but a contingent remainder.

Executory Devises have been divided into three kinds, viz. :—

(1) Where a testator devises his whole fee-simple, but, upon some contingency, qualifies such devise, and limits an estate on the contingency: e.g., a devise of land to the testator's wife for life, remainder to C., his second son in fee, provided if D., his third son, should, within three months after the wife's death, pay 500*l.* to C. or his executors, then to D. and his heirs: D. has an executory devise.

(2) Where a testator, without disposing of the immediate fee, gives the future estate to arise, either upon a contingency, or at a period certain, unpreceded by, or not having the requisite connection with, any immediate freehold, to give it effect as a remainder.

The case of a devise to one, to take effect six months after the testator's decease, is an instance of the first class in this description.

And the case of a limitation to one for life, and from and after the expiration of one day (or any other period, not exceeding twenty-one years, we may suppose) next ensuing his decease, then over to another, may be adduced as an instance of the latter part of this description.

(3) The third sort of executory devises, comprising all that relates to chattels, is where a term or any personal estate is bequeathed to one for life, or otherwise, and after the decease of the devisee or legatee for life, or some other contingency or period, is given over to another person.

It is to be remarked that a remainder can only be limited in freehold estates. In personal property, under which both chattels real and chattels personal are included, there cannot be a remainder in the strict sense of that word; and therefore every future bequest of personal property, whether it be preceded or not preceded by a prior bequest, or limited on a certain or an uncertain event, is an executory bequest, and falls under the rules by which that mode of limitation is regulated.

The great and essential difference between the nature of a contingent remainder and that of an executory devise consists in this, that the first may be barred and destroyed or prevented from taking effect by several different means; but it is a rule, that an executory devise cannot be prevented or destroyed by any alteration whatsoever, in the estate out of which or after which it is limited.

If the executory devise be limited to take effect on an estate-tail, then the tenant in tail may by a deed of disposition in conformity with the stat. 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74, bar the entail, and all remainders, executory devises, and conditional limitations dependent thereupon. If the executory devise is expectant on an estate in fee, then there are no means of preventing its taking effect, if the event happen on which it is to arise.

Executory estates, interests which depend for their enjoyment on some subsequent event or contingency. These are capable of being assigned.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 6.

Executory fines, the fines sur cognizance de droit tantum; sur concessit; and sur done, grant et render. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74.

Executory Limitation. A limitation of a future interest by deed or will; if by will, it is also called an executory devise. The Conveyancing Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 39, s. 10, restricts executory limitations of land contained in an instrument coming into operation after 1st Jan., 1883, by this enactment:—

‘Where there is a person entitled to land for an estate in fee, or for a term of years absolute or determinable on life, or for term of life, with an executory limitation over on default or failure of all or any of his issue, whether within or at any specified period or time or not, that executory limitation shall be or become void and incapable of taking effect, if and as soon as there is living any issue who has attained the age of 21 years, of the class on default or failure whereof the limitation over was to take effect.’

Executory remainder, a contingent remainder, because no present interest passes.

Executory trusts. In the case of articles of agreement, made in contemplation of marriage, and which are consequently preparatory to a settlement, and in the case of those wills which are merely directory of a subsequent conveyance, the trusts declared by them are said to be executory or imperfect, because they require an ulterior act to raise and perfect them. They are rather considered as instructions for settlements than as instruments in themselves complete; and therefore Equity, in order to promote the presumed views of the parties in the one case, and to support the manifest intention of the testator in the other, will attach to the words expressive of the trusts a more liberal and enlarged construction than they would admit if applied either to the limitation of a legal estate or a trust executed.—1 Sand. Uses and Trusts, 237.

Executory uses, springing uses, which confer a legal title answering to an executory devise; as when a limitation to the use of A. in fee, is defeasible by a limitation to the use of B., to arise at a future period, or on a given event.

Executrix, a woman appointed by a testator to perform his will. By the Married Women’s Property Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict.

c. 75, s. 18, a married woman appointed an executrix may sue and be sued, and may transfer stock independently of her husband ‘as if she were a feme sole.’ See EXECUTOR.

Exemplary damages, damages on an unsparing scale, given in respect of tortious acts, committed through malice or other circumstances of aggravation. In Belt v. Lawes, an action by a sculptor for libellously styling him an impostor, tried in 1882, the jury awarded 5000*l.* damages; but a rule nisi for a new trial on the grounds, amongst others, of excessive damages, is now (Jan. 1883) pending for argument.

Exemplification, a copy; a certified transcript either under the great seal or under the seal of a particular court.—1 Stark. Evid. 224.

Exemplificatione, a writ granted for the exemplification or transcript of an original record.—Reg. Orig., 290.

Exempli gratiâ [abbrev. ex. gr. or e.g., Lat.], for the purpose of example, or for instance.

Exemption, immunity; freedom from imposts; a privilege to be free from service or appearance.

Exennium, or Exhenium, a gift; a new year’s gift.—Covel.

Exequatur, an official recognition of a person in the character of consul or commercial agent, authorizing him to exercise his power, and given by the government of the country in which it is to be exercised.

Exeitorial power, the trust given to a shipmaster.

Exercitor navis, the temporary owner or charterer of a ship.

Exercitual, a heriot, paid only in arms, horses, or military accoutrements.

Ex facto jus oritur. 2 Inst. 49.—(The law arises from the fact.)—See Broom’s Leg. Max.

Exeter, or Exon, Domesday, the name given to a record preserved among the muniments and charters belonging to the dean and chapter of Exeter Cathedral, which contains a description of the western parts of the kingdom, comprising the counties of Wilts, Dorset, Somerset, Devon, and Cornwall. The Exeter Domesday was published with several other surveys nearly contemporary, by order of the Commissioners of the Public Records, under the direction of Sir Henry Ellis, in a volume supplementary to the Great Domesday, folio, London, 1816.

Exfrediare, to break the peace; to commit open violence.—Jacob.

Ex frequenti delicto augetur poena. 2 Inst. 479.—(Punishment increases with increasing crime.)

Ex gravi querelâ, a writ that lay for him to whom any lands or tenements in fee were devised (within any city, town, or borough wherein lands were devisable by custom), against the heir of the devisor when he entered and detained them from him.—Reg. Orig. 224. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36.

Exheredatio [Lat.], the act of disinheriting. The exclusion of a child by his father from the inheritance of any part of his estate.—Civil Law. See Sand. Just., 5th ed., liii., 178—185.

Exhibit, a document or other thing shown to a witness when giving evidence, and referred to by him in his evidence. The term is usually applied to a document referred to in, but not annexed to, an affidavit, and shown to the witness when the affidavit is sworn. A certificate, signed by the person before whom the affidavit is sworn, identifying the document, is usually endorsed upon the exhibit.

Exhibitant, a person who exhibits anything, as a complainant in articles of the peace.

Exhibition, an allowance for meat and drink, usually made by religious appropriators of churches to the vicar. Also, the benefaction settled for the maintaining of scholars in the universities, not depending on the foundation.—Paroch. Antiq. 304.

In the Scotch law it is an action for compelling the production of writings.

Exhibition Medals Act, 1863, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 119, to prevent false representations as to grants of medals or certificates by the commissioners for the Exhibitions of 1851 and 1862.

Exigence, or Exigency [probably a corruption of exigents, vitiated by an unskilful pronunciation], demand, want, need.

Exigendaries. See EXIGENTER.

Exigent, or Exigi facias (that you cause to be demanded), a judicial writ commanding the sheriff to demand the defendant from county court to county court, or, if in London, from hustling to hustling, until he be outlawed; or if he appear, then to take and have him before the court on a day certain to answer to the plaintiff in an action of, etc. See OUTLAW.

Exigenter [fr. exigendarius, Lat.], an officer of the Court of Common Pleas, who makes all exigents, proclamations, etc.—Cowel.

Exigible, demandable, requirable.

Exile [fr. exilium, Lat.], banishment; the person banished.

Exilium, spoiling. The author of Fleta distinguishes between vastum, destructio, and exilium; for he tells us that vastum and destructio are almost the same, and are properly applied to houses, gardens, or woods; but exilium is where servants are enfranchised, and afterwards unlawfully turned out of their tenements.—Fleta, l. 1, c. xi.

Exilium est patrie privatio, natalis soli mutatio, legum nativarum amissio. 7 Co. 20.—(Exile is a privation of country, a change of natal soil, a loss of native laws.)

Exitus, children, offspring; 2, the rents, issues, and profits of lands and tenements; 3, the conclusion of the pleadings. See ISSUE.

Exlegalitus, he who is prosecuted as an outlaw.—Jacob.

Ex-lex, an outlaw.

Ex maleficio non oritur contractus.—(From a tort a contract does not arise.)

Ex malis moribus bonæ leges natæ sunt. 2 Inst. 161.—(Good laws arise from evil manners.)

Ex mero motu (of his own accord). See OFFICE OF A JUDGE.

Ex multitudinē signorum colligitur identitas vera. Bacon.—(True identity is collected from a number of signs.)

Ex nudo pacto non oritur actio. Noy. Max. 24.—(An action does not arise from a nude contract.) See Br. Max.

Ex necessitate legis (from the necessity of law).

Ex necessitate rei (from the necessity of the case).

Ex officio (officially; by virtue of office); e.g., justices of the peace are ex officio guardians of the poor.

Ex officio informations, proceedings filed in the Queen's Bench Division by the Attorney-General, at the direct and proper instance of the Crown, in cases of such enormous misdemeanours as peculiarly tend to disturb or endanger the government, or to molest or affront the sovereign in discharging the royal functions. The information is tried by a jury of the county where the offence arose, and for that purpose, unless the case be of such importance as to be tried at bar, it is sent down by writ of Nisi Prius into that county, and tried either by a common or special jury, like a civil action.—4 Steph. Com.

Ex officio oath, an oath taken by offending priests; abolished by 13 Car. II. st. 1, c. 12.

Exoine, Essoigne [Fr.], the excuse for not appearing in court when cited. See ESSOIN.

Exoneracione sectæ, a writ that lay for the Crown's ward, to be free from all suit to the county-court, hundred-court, leet, etc., during wardship.—F. N. B. 158.

Exoneracione sectæ ad curiam baron, a writ of the same nature, issued by the guardian of the Crown's ward, and addressed to the sheriffs or stewards of the Court, forbidding them to distrain him, etc., for not doing suit of court, etc.—New N. B. 352.

Exoneretur (that he be discharged), an entry made upon the bail-piece upon render of a defendant to prison in discharge of his bail.

Exordium, the beginning or introductory part of a speech.

Ex pacto illicito non oritur actio.—(No action arises out of an illicit bargain.)—Broom's Max., 5th ed., 742.

Ex parte (on behalf of), a proceeding by one party in the absence of the other.

Ex parte talis, a writ that lay for a bailiff or receiver, who, having auditors appointed to take his accounts, cannot obtain of them reasonable allowance, but is cast into prison.—F. N. B. 129.

Expatriation, the forsaking one's own country, and renouncing allegiance, with the intention of becoming a permanent resident and citizen in another country. See Naturalization Act, 1870, 33 Vict. c. 14, ss. 4, 6.

Ex paucis dictis intendere plurima possis. Litt. s. 384.—(You can imply many things from few expressions.)

Expectancy, in, executory; relating to something in futuro.

Expectant, having relation to, or dependent upon.

Expectant estates, interests to come into possession and be enjoyed in futuro; they are of two sorts at Common Law—reversions and remainders—2 Bl. Com., 163.

Expectant heir. A person to whom property is assured on the death of another person. Expectant heirs wishing to anticipate this property, have frequently borrowed money, to be repaid when the expected property shall devolve upon them. From the uncertainty of this period, the unsoundness of the security which the expectant heir can offer, and from the pressing character of his immediate necessities, the rate of interest is necessarily higher than that upon an ordinary loan, and is frequently very much higher than the risk run by the lender requires. At common law all such loans are good, and the interest upon them, however high, recoverable. By the Usury Acts, indeed,—which, however, did not apply to loans to expectant heirs with any greater vigour than to loans to other persons,—they were for a long period of years subject to the restriction that only a fixed maximum rate of interest could be exacted, but the Usury Acts were repealed in 1854, 17 & 18 Vict. c. 90. See USURY.

From very early times, however, Courts of Equity have been accustomed to interfere between lender and borrower in these cases, and to set aside as 'unconscionable bargains' those mortgages of reversionary interests or other contracts of sale or loan in which the distress of the expectant heir is taken advantage of. See the leading case of Earl of Chesterfield v. Jansen, 1 White & Tudor, and Earl of Aylesford v. Morris, L. R. 8 Ch. 484, which latter case settles that the Act 31 Vict. c. 4, enacting that no bond fide purchase of a reversion shall be set aside 'merely on the ground of undervalue,' leaves the jurisdiction of courts of equity to set aside these unconscionable bargains. See REVERSION.

The practice of the Court in setting aside the bargain is to direct the reversion charged to stand as security for money actually advanced only, and for interest at the rate of five per cent. only upon such actual advance.

Expectation of life, in the doctrine of life annuities, is the share or number of years of life, which a person of a given age may, upon an equality of chance, expect to enjoy. Consult Inwood's Tables.

Expedit, the whole of a person's goods and chattels, bag and baggage.

Expeditatæ arbores, trees rooted up or cut down to the roots.—Fleta, 1, 2, c. xli.

Expedit reipublicæ ne sua re quis male utetur. I. 1, 8, 2.—(It is for the public good that no one use his property badly.)

Expedit reipublicæ ut sit finis litium. Co. Litt. 303.—(It is for the public good that there be an end of litigation.) See LIMITATION.

Expeditate, to cut out the ball of a dog's fore-feet, for the preservation of the royal game.—Manw. c. xvi.

Expeditors, persons appointed by commissioners of sewers to pay, disburse, or expend the money collected by the tax for the repairs of sewers, etc., when paid into their hands by the collectors, on the reparations, amendments, and reformations ordered by the commissioners, for which they are to render accounts when thereunto required. See Statute of Sewers, 23 Hen. VIII. c. 5.

Expensæ litis (costs of suit). See COSTS.

Expensis militum non levandis, etc., an ancient writ to prohibit the sheriff from levying any allowance for knights of the shire, upon those who held lands in ancient demesne.—Reg. Orig. 261.

Experientia per varios actus legem facit. Magistra rerum experientia. Co. Litt. 60.—(Experience by various acts makes law. Experience is the mistress of things.)

Experts, witnesses who give evidence upon matters of science; e.g., professed judges of handwriting.

Expilation, robbery; the act of committing waste upon land to the loss of the heir; also abstracting the goods of a succession.

Expiring Laws Continuance Acts. Acts bearing this title, and continuing for a further period—usually for one full year more—temporary acts which would otherwise expire, have for many years been passed at the end of each session of parliament. See the latest, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 64, which contains as many as twenty-eight temporary statutes, of which the more important are the Act 3 & 4 Vict. c. 89, exempting stock-in-trade from poor rates, the Ballot Act, 1872, the Corrupt Practices Prevention Acts, and the Regulation of Railways Act, 1873, from which the railway commissioners derive their jurisdiction.

Expleses. See ESPLEES.

Expleta, Expletia, or Explecia, the rents and profits of an estate.—Old Records.

Explorator, a scout, huntsman, chaser.

Explosive substances, as to injuries by, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 9, 10, 54—5, c. 100, ss. 28—30, 64, 65.

The Explosives Act, 1875 (38 Vict. c. 17), now regulates the manufacture and keeping of gunpowder and other explosives; the licensing and management of factories, magazines, and stores, and the sale and conveyance of such substances. It also gives powers for the inspection of premises, seizure of goods, and punishment of offenders.

Exposing in a public thoroughfare a person infected with a contagious disease is a common nuisance, and punishable accordingly.—4 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 271. It is also punishable on summary conviction under the Public Health Act, 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, s. 126.

Exposing child under the age of two years. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 100, s. 27.

Expositio, explanation.

Ex post facto [jure] (from a law made after), the thing prohibited was done.

Exposure of person. See INDECENT EXPOSURE.

Ex precedentibus et consequentibus optima fit interpretatio. 1 Rol. Rep. 374.—(The best interpretation is made from the context).

Express, that which is not left to implication; as express promise, express covenant.

Expressa nocent, non expressa non nocent. D. 50, 17, 195.—(Things expressed hurt, things not expressed do not.)

Express colour, in pleading. An evasive form of special pleading in a case where the defendant ought to plead the general issue. Abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 64. Consult Report of the Common Law Commissioners (1850), 24, and see 3. Steph. Com., bk. v., ch. x.

Expressa non prosunt quæ non expressa proderunt. 4 Co. 73.—(The expression of things, of which, if unexpressed, one would have the benefit, is useless.)

Expressio eorum quæ tacitè insunt nihil operatur. Co. Litt. 210.—(The expression of those things which are tacitly implied has no effect.)

Expressio unius personæ est exclusio alterius. Co. Litt. 210.—(The mention of one person is the exclusion of another.) See Broom's Legal Max., 5th ed., 651.

Expressum facit cessare tacitum.—(What is expressed makes what is silent to cease.) See Broom's Legal Max., 5th ed., 651.

Expromission, a species of novation, as a creditor's acceptance of a new debtor, who takes the place of the old debtor, who is discharged.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 389.

Expromissor, a surety; bail.—Civil. Law.

Expropriation, the surrender of a claim to exclusive property.

Ex provisione mariti (from the provision of the husband).

Expurgation, the act of purging or cleansing, as where a book is published without its obscene passages.

Ex relatione, on the report of: an expression affixed to cases which the reporter gives on the authority of another; as ex relatione amici.

Extend, to value the lands, etc., of one bound by a statute, who has forfeited his bond, at their yearly value, so that it may be known when the creditor will be paid his debt.—Cowel.

Extensio manerii. 4 Edw. I. s. 1. It was a direction for the making of a survey of buildings, lands, commons, parks, woods, etc.

Extension, an indulgence by giving time to pay a debt, or perform an obligation.

Extent, or Extendi facias (that you cause to be appraised at their full or extended value), the peculiar remedy to recover debts of record due to the Crown; it differs from an ordinary writ of execution at the suit of a subject, because under it the body, lands, and goods of the debtor may be all taken at once, in order to compel the payment of the debt. It is not usual, however, to seize the body.

There are two kinds of Extents—in chief, and in aid. (1) Extent in chief. It issues from the Exchequer, and may bear teste, and be made returnable on any day certain in term or vacation (5 & 6 Vict. c. 86, s. 8). It directs the sheriff to take an inquisition or inquest of office, on the oaths of lawful men, to ascertain the lands, etc., of the debtor, and seize the same into the Queen's hands. The writ should be preceded by a scire facias in order to bring the debtor into Court, and afford him an opportunity to show cause against it; but where the debt is in danger of being lost, the extent will be issued without a scire facias, upon an affidavit of circumstances; and after the sheriff's return, the debtor, if he dispute the debt, or a third person, if he claim the property set forth in the inquisition, may enter an appearance and plead to the extent; issue is then joined, and it is decided either on demurrer or by a trial before a jury. If judgment be given for the Crown, it is that the subject take nothing by his traverse or plea; if given for the defendant or claimant, it is in award of amoveas manus. Error will lie upon the judgment, provided the Attorney-General consent to the proceeding. Where there was no judgment, it was the rule to issue a commission to ascertain what debt was due to the Crown; but by the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104, s. 47, a commission to find a debt due to the Crown shall not be necessary for authorizing the issue of an immediate extent, or of a writ of diem clausit extremum, and an immediate extent may be issued on an affidavit of debt and danger, and a writ of diem clausit extremum may be issued on an affidavit of debt and death, and on a fiat, as is thereby provided. It is enacted by 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11, that no debt due to the Crown on judgment, statute, or recognition, inquisition of debt, obligation, or specialty, or acceptance of office, shall affect any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, as to purchasers or mortgagees, unless and until such memorandum or minute thereof, as in the act provided, shall be registered as is therein provided; and provision is made in regard to the registration of a quietus for any Crown debt, and for Treasury certificates being granted exonerating lands from any further claim of the Crown. By the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 104, s. 48, it is provided that any Crown judgment, etc., or specialty, shall not affect any land, as to a bond fide purchaser for valuable consideration, or as to a mortgagee (with or without notice of such judgment, etc.), unless a writ of extent, or of diem clausit extremum, or other writ or process of execution, has been issued and registered before the execution of the conveyance or mortgage. By 29 Vict. c. 39, s. 42, where the estate of a public accountant is sold under writ of extent, and the purchase-money paid, the purchaser shall be exonerated from all further claims of the Crown.

There is also an extent in chief in the second degree, which is a proceeding by the Crown against the debtor of a Crown-debtor, against whom also an extent in chief has issued.

(2) Extent in aid. It issues, not at the suit of the Crown, like an extent in chief, but at the suit of a Crown debtor against a person indebted to himself; and it is grounded on the Statute of Extent, 33 Hen. IV. c. 39, and on the principle that the Crown is entitled to the debts due to the debtor. The practice is governed by 57 Geo. III. c. 117, and by a rule of the Court of Exchequer June 22, 1822, that the Crown-debtor must make oath that otherwise the debt will be lost.

There is a special writ of extent, which is issued in the event of the death of a Crown-debtor, and is called a diem clausit etremum, because it recites the death of the party. The sheriff is commanded to inquire, by a jury, concerning the chattels and lands of the deceased debtor, and seize them into the Crown's hands.—3 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 662.

Extinguishment, the annihilation of a collateral interest, or the supersedure of one interest by another and greater interest, thing, or subject in that out of which it is derived. It is of various natures as applied to various rights.

(1) Extinguishment of common. If he who is entitled to common appurtenant, purchase any part of the land which is subject to his right of common, that right is extinguished for the whole: and so, if he release his right over any part of the land. But it has been justly doubted whether in any case (and especially if all persons who have common appurtenant in the same land concur in discharging some part of it), this legal trap should be allowed to operate.—Burton's Comp., 8th ed., 352. If one of the tenants of a manor purchase any part of the land over which he has a right of common appendant, his right over the rest will continue. So, on the alienation of any part of land to which common is appendant or appurtenant (though the latter is less favoured by the old law), the right of common is preserved and apportioned.—1 Bac. Ab. 628. All incorporeal hereditaments of necessity, or arising by operation of law, and services, may be extinguished, excepting ways.

(2) Extinguishment of copyhold. When a tenant conveys to his lord, or does an act denoting his intention of not holding of his lord any longer, his copyhold is extinguished. When the lord does an act inconsistent with the nature of the tenure, e.g., conveys to the tenant the freehold, or releases to him his seignorial rights, an enfranchisement is effected. See COPYHOLD.

(3) Extinguishment of debt. A creditor, by accepting a higher security than he had before, extinguishes the first debt. And when judgment is given for a debt, it supercedes or extinguishes the previous obligation. So, if a feme sole debtee marry her debtor, or an obligee marry one of two joint obligors in a bond, or a debtor make his debtee, or vice versa, his executor; in these cases the debt is extinguished.—Plowd. 184; 1 Salk. 304.

(4) Extinguishment of estates. If a person have a yearly rent out of lands, and afterwards purchase those lands, so that he has as good an estate in the land as in the rent, the rent is extinguished; for no one can have a rent issuing out of his own land, though a person must have as high an estate in the land as in the rent, or the rent will not be extinct.—Co. Litt. 147. It appears that an estate by statute, recognizance, or elegit, may be extinguished by any act (as a deed of defeazance or of release), which extinguished the debt.—Burt. Comp. 373. The Judicature Act, 1873, s. 25 (4), provides that there shall not, after the commencement of that Act, be any merger by operation of law only, of any estate the beneficial interest in which would not be deemed to be merged or extinguished in equity.

(5) Extinguishment of an interesse termini. A mere interesse termini can neither promote nor hinder the merger of any estate, nor can itself, properly speaking, be surrendered; but it may be extinguished by surrender in law, or by assignment or release.—Burt. Comp. 364.

(6) Release by way of extinguishment. If my tenant for life make a greater estate than he is warranted in granting, as a lease to A. for life, remainder to B. and his heirs, and I release to A., this extinguishes my right to the reversion, and shall enure to the advantage of B.'s remainder as well as of A.'s particular estate.—2 Bl. Com. 325.

Extirpatione, a judicial writ, either before or after judgment, that lay against a person who, when a verdict was found against him for land, etc., maliciously overthrew any house or extirpated any trees upon it.—Reg. Jud. 13, 56.

Extocare, to grub up lands, and reduce them to arable or meadow.—Mon. Angl., t. 2, p. 71.

Extortio est crimen quando quis colore officii extorquet quod non est debitum, vel supra debitum, vel ante tempus quod est debitum. 10 Co. 102.—(Extortion is a crime when, by colour of office, any person extorts that which is not due, or more than is due, or before the time when it is due.)

Extortion [fr. extorqueo, Lat., to wrest away], any oppression under colour of right, as the demanding of a fee or present by colour of office. The Act 3 Edw. I. provides against extortion by the king's officers; and see 15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, ss. 3, 4; 32 Geo. II. c. 28; 33 Geo. III. c. 52, s. 62; 7 Wm. IV. & 1 Vict. c. 30, s. 19, which latter act prohibits masters of the Supreme Court from taking gratuities.

Extorting money, etc., by menaces. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 44—5, and Extortion by Menaces.

Ex tota materia emergat resolutio. Wing. 238.—(Let the decision arise from the whole case.)

Extra costs, those charges which do not appear upon the face of the proceedings, such as witnesses' expenses, fees to counsel, attendances, court-fees, etc., an affidavit of which must be made, to warrant the master in allowing them upon taxation of costs. See INCREASE.

Extracta curiæ, the issues or profits of holding a court, arising from the customary fees, etc.—Paroch. Antig. 572.

Extradition, the act of sending by authority of law a person accused of a crime to a foreign jurisdiction, where it was committed, in order that he may be tried there. It is recognised as a duty, independent of treaty, by international law, but is usually the subject of treaty, terminable at one year's notice. Conventions have been entered into by this country with various foreign countries, including France, the United States (see 6 & 7 Vict. cc. 75, 76, repealed by Act of 1870), Germany, Belgium, Brazil, Italy, Denmark, Austria, and Sweden, for the apprehension and extradition of persons charged with particular offences. The Extradition Act, 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 52), 'as to the whole of Her Majesty's dominions' provides (s. 2) that 'where an arrangement has been made with any foreign state with respect to the surrender to such state of any fugitive criminals, Her Majesty may, by order in Council, direct that this act shall apply in the case of such foreign state.' The act provides for the arrangements and procedure regarding extradition, and imposes various restrictions thereon, e.g., in regard to political offences. See an Amendment Act, 36 & 37 Vict. c. 60. Consult Clarke on Extradition.

Extrajudicial [fr. extra and judicium, Lat.], out of the regular course of legal procedure. An extrajudicial dictum is the same as an obiter dictum; see OBITER DICTUM.

Extra legem positus est civiliter mortuus. Co. Litt. 130.—(He who is placed out of the law is civilly dead.)

Extraneus est subditus qui extra terram, i.e., potestatem regis natus est. 7 Co. 16.—(A foreigner is a subject who is born out of the territory, that is, government of the king.)

Extraparochial [fr. extra and parochia, Lat.], outside of any parish. As to extraparochial highways, see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61, s. 32; as to extra-parochial marriages, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 24; and as to the relief of extraparochial poor, see 5 & 6 Vict. c. 48, and 20 Vict. c. 19.

Extra-territoriality, immunity from a country's laws, such as that enjoyed by an ambassador. Consult Wheaton's Inter. Law, 8th ed., 153, 156, 179, 300.

Extra territorium jus dicenti non paretur impune. 10 Co. 77.—(The sentence of one adjudicating beyond his territory cannot be obeyed with impunity.)

Extravagantes, those decretal epistles which were published after the Clementines. They were so called because at first they were not digested or arranged with the other papal constitutions, but seemed to be, as it were, detached from the canon law. They continued to be called by the same name when they were afterwards inserted in the body of the canon law. The first extravagantes are those of Pope John XXII., successor of Clement V. The last collection was brought down to the year 1483, and was called the common extravagantes, notwithstanding that they were likewise incorporated with the rest of the canon law.—Encyc. Lond.

Extra viam, out of the way.

Extra vires, beyond powers. See ULTRA VIRES.

Extumæ, reliques in churches and tombs.

Ex turpi causâ non oritur actio. (No right of action arises from a base cause.)

Ex visitatione Dei (by the visitation of God).

Ex vi termini (from the force or meaning of the expression).

Ey, ea, or ee, an island.

Eye-witness, one who gives testimony to facts seen by himself.

Eyre, Justices in [fr. eyre, Fr.; iter, Lat.], the court of justices itinerant, which Bracton in many places calls justiciarios itinerantes; more commonly called in modern times the judges of assize, who have travelled on their several circuits since their first appointment by the statute of nisi prius, 13 Ed. I., st. 1, c. 30. The eyre also of the forest is nothing but the justice-seat, which is, or should, by ancient custom, be held every three years by the justices of the forest, journeying up and down for such purpose.—Cowel.

Ezardar, a farmer or renter of land in the districts of Hindoostan.—Indian.

F.

F, a stigma put upon felons with a hot iron, on their being admitted to the benefit of clergy; abolished by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 6.

Fabric lands [ad fabricam reparandam, Lat.], land given to provide for the rebuilding or repair of cathedrals and churches. Anciently, almost every person gave something by his will to be applied in repairing the fabric of the cathedral or parish church where he lived.—Cowel.

Facinus quos inquinat æquat.—Guilt makes equal those whom it stains.)

Facio, ut des (I perform, that you may give).

Facio, ut facias (I do, that you may do).

Fac simile (make it like). An exact copy, preserving all the marks of the original.

Fac simile probate, where the construction of a will may be affected by the appearance of the original paper, the court will order the probate to pass in fac simile, as it may possibly help to show the meaning of the testator.

Fact, question of. See QUESTIONS OF FACT.

Facta armorum, feats of arms, jousts, tournaments, etc.—Cowel.

Facta sunt potentiora verbis.—(Deeds are more powerful than words.)

Facta tenent multa quæ fieri prohibentur. 12 Co. 124.—(Deeds contain many things which are prohibited to be done.)

Facto, in fact; as where anything is actually done.—Jacob.

Factor [fr. facteur, Fr.], a substitute in mercantile affairs; an agent employed to sell goods or merchandise consigned or delivered to him by or for his principal, for a compensation commonly called factorage or commission. Hence he is often called a commission-merchant or consignee; and the goods received by him for sale are called a consignment. He is a home factor when he resides in the same state or country with his principal, and a foreign factor when he resides in a different state or country. He differs from a broker in this, that he may buy and sell in his own name, and is entrusted with the possession and disposal of the goods, and has a special property in, and a lien on, them; yet neither can delegate his authority, unless conferred by usages of trade or the assent of his principal. Factors have no incidental authority to barter goods, or to pledge them for advances made to them on their own account, or debts due by themselves; but they may pledge them for advances made on account of their principal, or for advances to themselves to the extent of their own lien on the goods. And they may pledge their principal's goods for the duties and other charges due thereon. The duty of a factor is to procure the intelligence of the state of trade at his residence, the course of exchange, the quantity and quality of the goods at market; their price, and the probability of a rise or fall.

By the Factors Act, 6 Geo. IV. c. 94, factors or agents having goods, etc., in their possession are under certain circumstances deemed owners, so as to give validity to contracts with persons dealing bonâ fide upon the faith of such property (s. 1), and persons intrusted with and in possession of bills of lading, dock warrants, etc., are deemed the true owners, so as to give validity to any contracts or agreements with persons dealing without notice for the sale or disposition of the same, or the deposit or pledge thereof, as security. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 75, et seq., provision is made for the punishment of frauds by factors. While the 6 Geo. IV. c. 94, confirms bona fide sales, made in the ordinary course of business, in cases in which the purchaser had noticed that the seller was merely an agent, it does not confirm bona fide advances made on goods, or on documents of title to goods, under the same circumstances. To obviate this discrepancy, to get rid of the litigation to which certain ambiguities in the 6 Geo. IV. c. 94 had given rise, and to facilitate commerce, the Acts 5 & 6 Vict. c. 39, and 40 & 41 Vict. c. 39, were passed. Consult Smith's Mercantile Law, and see Fuentes v. Montis, L. R. 3 C. P. 268, which apparently gave rise to the passing of 40 & 41 Vict. c. 39, and Johnson v. Credit Lyonnais 3 C. P. D. 43.

Factorage, the wages, commission, or allowance made to a factor by a merchant.

Factory, a place where a number of traders reside in a foreign country for the convenience of trade; also a building in which goods are manufactured.

The Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, 41 Vict. c. 16, which contains 107 sections and 6 schedules, consolidates, with a few amendments, the seventeen acts from 42 Geo. III. c. 73 (Addington's Act) to 37 & 38 Vict. c. 44 (The Factory Act, 1874), by which the labour of women, young persons, and children has been from time to time regulated, the education of children indirectly attained, and the fencing of machinery prescribed.

The use of steam whistles for summoning or dismissing factory hands requires the sanction of local authorities, by virtue of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 61.

Factum, a person's act or deed; anything stated or made certain.

Factum à iudice quod ad ejus officium non spectat, non ratum est. 10 Co. 76.—(An action of a judge which relates not to his office, is of no force.) See Broom's Legal Maxims, 5th ed., 93.

Factum non dicitur quod non perseverat. 5 Co. 96.—(That is not called a deed which does not continue operative.)

Factum unius alteri noceri non debet. Co. Litt. 152.—(The deed of one should not hurt another.)

Facultas probationum non est angustanda. 4 Inst. 279.—(The facility of proof is not to be narrowed.)

Faculties, Court of, a jurisdiction or tribunal belonging to the Archbishop. It does not hold pleas in any suits, but creates rights to pews, monuments, and particular places, and modes of burial. It has also various powers under 25 Henry VIII. c. 21, in granting licenses of different descriptions, as a license to marry, a faculty to erect an organ in a parish church, to level a churchyard, to remove bodies previously buried.—4 Inst. 337. See Phillimore's Eccl. Law.

Faculty, a license or authority; in ecclesiastical law a privilege granted by the ordinary to a man by favour and indulgence to do that which by law he may not do, e.g., to marry without banns, to erect a monument in a church, etc.

Faculty of advocates, the college or society of advocates in Scotland. See ADVOCATE.

Fæder-feoh, the portion brought by a wife to her husband, and which reverted to a widow, in case the heir of her deceased husband refused his consent to her second marriage: i.e., it reverted to her family in case she returned to them.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Faggot, a badge worn in popish times by persons who had recanted and abjured what was then adjudged to be heresy, as an emblem of what they had merited.—Cowel.

Faggot votes; a faggot vote is where a man is formally possessed of a right to vote for members of parliament, without possessing the substance which the vote should represent; as if he is enabled to buy a property, and at the same moment mortgage it to its full value for the mere sake of the vote; such a vote is called a faggot-vote. See 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 25, s. 7.

Faida, malice or deadly feud.

Failing of record, when an action is brought against a person who alleges in his plea matter of record in bar of the action, and avers to prove it by the record; but the plaintiff saith nul tiel record, viz., denies there is any such record: upon which the defendant has a day given him by the court to bring it in; if he fail to do it, then he is said to fail of his record, and the plaintiff is entitled to sign judgment.—Termes de la Ley.

Faint action, a feigned action.—Co. Litt. 361.

Faint pleader, a fraudulent, false, or collusive manner of pleading to the deception of a third person.—3 Edw. I. c. 19.

Fair pleader. See BEAU-PLEADER.

Fairs [fr. foire, Fr.; forum nundinæ, Lat.], these institutions are very closely allied to markets. A fair is a greater species of market, recurring at more distant intervals. No fair can be held without grant from the Crown, or a prescription which supposes such grant.

Before a patent is granted, it is usual to have a writ of ad quod damnum executed and returned, that it may not be issued to the prejudice of another fair or market already existing. The grant usually contains a clause that it shall not be to the hurt of another fair or market; but this clause, if omitted, will be implied: for if the franchise occasion damage either to the Crown or a subject, in any respect, it will be revoked; and a person whose ancient title is prejudiced, is entitled to have a scire facias in the Queen's name to repeal the letters-patent. If Her Majesty grant power to hold a fair or market in a particular place, the lieges can resort to no other even though it be inconvenient. But if no place be appointed, the grantees may keep the fair or market where they please, or where they can most conveniently. Times of holding fairs and markets are either determined by the letters-patent appointing the fair or market, or by usage, or under the 36 & 37 Vict. c. 37 (repealing 31 & 32 Vict. c. 51), by the Secretary of State. See 'The Markets and Fairs Clauses Act' (10 & 11 Vict. c. 14). 'The Metropolitan Fairs Act, 1868' (31 & 32 Vict. c. 106), was passed for the prevention of the holding of unlawful fairs within the limits of the Metropolitan police district. As to the powers of local authorities with reference to fairs, see 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, s. 167.

The 34 Vict. c. 12, proceeding on the preamble that 'certain of the fairs held in England and Wales are unnecessary, are the cause of grievous immorality, and are very injurious to the inhabitants of the towns in which such fairs are held,' gives power to the Home Secretary to abolish any fair on representation of the magistrates, and with consent of the owner; and many fairs have been abolished under the powers of the act.

Fait [fr. factum, Lat.], a deed or writing.

Fait enrolle, a deed enrolled, as a bargain and sale of freeholds.—1 Keb. 568.

Faitours, evil-doers; idle livers; vagabonds.—Termes de la Ley.

Falang, jacket or close coat.—Blount.

Falcatura, one day's mowing of grass, a customary service to the lord by his inferior tenants. Falcata, the fresh grass mowed and laid in swathes. Falcator, the tenant-mower.—Ken. Glos.

Fald, or Falda, a sheep-fold.—Cowel.

Faldage [fr. faldagium, Lat.], a fold-course, i.e., common of pasture for sheep.

Faldæ cursus, a sheep-walk.—2 Vent. 139.

Fald-fee, a composition paid anciently by tenants for the privilege of faldage.—Cowel.

Faldisdory [fr. falde, Sax., a hedge, and stop, a place], the bishop's seat or throne within the chancel.

Faldstool, or Foldstool, a place at the south side of the altar, at which the sovereign kneels at his coronation.

Faldworth, a person of age, that he may be reckoned of some decennary.—Du Fresne. See DECENNARY.

Falesia, a hill, or down by the sea-side.—Old Records.

Falk-land. See FOLKLAND.

Falkland Islands. See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 13, amended by 23 & 24 Vict. c. 121.

Fall of land, a quantity of land six ells square superficial measure.

Fallow-land, land ploughed, but not sown, and left uncultivated for a time after successive crops.

Fallum, an unexplained term for some particular kind of land.—Cowel.

Falmotum. See FOLKEMOTE.

Falsa demonstratio non nocet. 6 T. R. 766. —(False description does not vitiate.) See Broom's Leg. Max., 5th ed., 629.

Falsa orthographia, sive falsa grammatica, non vitiat concessionem. 9 Co. 48.—(Bad spelling or bad grammar does not vitiate a grant.)

False character to servants. See 32 Geo. III. c. 56, and PERSONATION.

False imprisonment, restraining personal liberty without lawful authority, for which offence the law has not only decreed a punishment as a public crime, but has also given a private reparation to the party as well by removing the actual confinement for the present by habeas corpus, as by subjecting the wrongdoer to an action of trespass, etc., usually called an action of false imprisonment, on account of the damage sustained by the loss of time and liberty.—Consult Addison on Torts.

False judgment, writ of, a process that lay by way of appeal, to the Superior Courts from inferior courts not of record, to amend errors in their proceedings.

False Latin. When law proceedings were written in Latin, if a word were significant though not good Latin, yet an indictment, declaration, or fine should not be made void by it; but if the word were not Latin, nor allowed by the law, and it were in a material point, it made the whole vicious.—5 Rep. 121 2 Nels. 830.

False news, spreading, to make discord between the sovereign and nobility, or concerning any great man of the realm, was a misdemeanour, punishable at common law by fine and imprisonment; which was confirmed by statutes Westm. 1, 3 Edw. I. c. 34; 2 Rich. II. st. 1, c. 5; and 12 Rich. II. c. 11.

False oath. See PERJURY.

False personation, to obtain property. See

False plea. See SHAM PLEA.

False pretences, obtaining property, etc., by. This offence, though closely allied to larceny, is distinguishable from it, as being perpetrated through the medium of a mere fraud; it is a misdemeanour at common law, and punishable by fine and imprisonment. By 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 88, whosoever shall by any false pretence obtain from any other person, any chattel, money, or valuable security, with intent to defraud, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and liable to be kept in penal servitude for the term of three (now five by 27 & 28 Vict. c. 47) years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years. In order to be convicted under this section, the accused must have made a false pretence of an existing fact, and the money, etc., must have been obtained by means of such false pretence.

False prophecies, with intent to disturb the peace, were unlawful, as raising enthusiastic jealousies in the people, and terrifying them with imaginary fears. They were punishable as misdemeanours, by 5 Eliz. c. 15, repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1863.

False representation. See DECEIT.

False return by a sheriff, mayor, etc., to a writ is remedied by a special action on the case. See Bullen and Leake on Pl., 3rd ed., 639.

False signal, or lights, exhibiting with intent to bring ships into danger is a felony punishable with penal servitude for life.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 47.

False verdict. Formerly, if a jury gave a false verdict, the party injured by it might sue out and prosecute a writ of attain against them, either at common law or on the statute 11 Hen. VII. c. 24, at his election, for the purpose of reversing the judgment and punishing the jury for their verdict; but not where the jury erred merely in point of law, if they found according to the judge's direction. The practice of setting aside verdicts and granting new trials, however, so superseded the use of attainments, that there is no instance of one to be found in our books of reports later than in the time of Elizabeth, and it was altogether abolished by 6 Geo. IV. c. 50, s. 60.

False weights and measures. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Falsi crimen, fraudulent subornation or concealment, with design to darken or hide the truth, and make things appear otherwise than they are. It is committed:—(1) By words, as when a witness swears falsely; (2) by writing, as when a person antedates a contract; (3) by deed, as selling by false weights and measures.

Falsification of Accounts Act, 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 24. See ACCOUNTS, FALSIFICATION OF.

Falsifying judgments, reversing them.

Falsifying pedigree, upon which title does or may depend, punishable by 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, s. 24.

Falsifying a record, a high offence against public justice, punishable by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, ss. 27, 28.

Falsonarius, a forger.—Hov. 424.

Falso retorno brevium, a writ that lay against a sheriff, who had execution of process for a false return.—Reg. Jud. 43.

Falsus in uno, falsus in omnibus.—(False in one thing, false in all.)

Fama, quæ suspicionem inducit, oriri debet apud bonos et graves, non quidem malevolos et maledicos, sed providas et fide dignas personas, non semel sed sæpius, quia clamor minuit et defamatio manifestat. 2 Inst. 52.—(Report, which induces suspicion, ought to arise from good and grave men, not indeed from malevolent and malicious men, but from cautious and credible persons, not only once, but frequently; for clamour diminishes, and defamation manifests.)

Famicide [fr. fama, Lat., reputation, and cædo, to kill], a slanderer.—Scott.

Famosus libellus, an infamous libel.

Fanatio. See FENCE-MONTH.

Faquer, or Fakir, a poor man, mendicant; a religious beggar.—Indian.

Farandman, a traveller or merchant stranger.—Skene.

Fardel of land, the fourth part of a yard-land. Noy says an eighth only, because, according to him, two fardels make a nook, and four nooks a yard-land.—Comp. Lawy. 57.

Farding-deal, or Farundel of land, the fourth part of an acre of land.—Spelm.

Fare, a voyage or passage by water; also the money paid for a passage either by land or by water.—Cowel.

Railway fares must be published at stations, by 31 & 32 Vict. c. 119, s. 16. Travelling without prepayment and with intent to avoid payment is punishable on summary conviction by 8 Vict. c. 20, s. 103.

Farinagium, toll of meal or flour.—Jacob.

Farleu, money paid by tenants in lieu of a heriot. It is often applied to the best chattel, as distinguished from heriot the best beast.—Cowel.

Farlingarii, whoremongers and adulterers.

Farm, or Ferm [fr. firma, Lat.; feorme, Sax., food, and feorman, to feed], land taken upon lease under a rent, generally annual, payable by the tenant. It is a collective word, consisting of many things, as a messuage, land, meadow, pasture, wood, common, etc. In Lancashire a farm was called ferm-holt; in the north, a tack; and in Essex, a wike.—Termes de la Ley.

Farm let [ad firmam tradidi, Lat.], operative words in a lease, which strictly mean to let upon payment of a certain rent in farm, i.e., in agricultural produce.

Farmer, one who cultivates hired land, also the lessee of taxes or tolls.

Faro, a game of chance in vogue in the eighteenth century; an unlawful game by 12 Geo. II. c. 28, where it is spelt 'Pharaoh.'

Farriers. As to the duties of common farriers, see Raym. 654, and Olipphant on Horses, 3rd ed., 233 et seq.

Farthing [fr. feoven, Sax., four], the fourth part of a penny.

Farthing of Gold, an ancient coin, containing in value the fourth part of a noble. —9 Hen. V. c. 7.

Farthing, or Farthingdell of land, a quantity of land, the extent of which is not known. Some say it is a quarter of an acre.

Farundel of land. See FARDING-DEAL.

Faryndon Inn, the ancient appellation of Serjeants' Inn, Chancery Lane.

Fasius, a faggot of wood.—Mon. Angl. tom. ii., 238.

Fast-day, a day of mortification by religious abstinence. See a list of Church of England Fast-Days in the Prayer-Book Calendar, scheduled to 24 Geo. III. c. 23, and see also 5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 3. Fast-days may also be appointed on special occasions by Royal proclamation. R. G. H. T. 1853, r. 174, recognised such days, and so does R. S. C., Ord. LXI., r. 4, and Ord. XXXVII., r. 35 of the County Court Rules, by the direction that offices of the Court shall be open 'every day, except . . . all days appointed by proclamation to be observed as days of general fast, humiliation, or thanksgiving.'

Fastens een or even [fr. vastal-abend, low Sax.], Shrove-Tuesday, the succeeding day being Ash-Wednesday, the first of the Lenten fast.

Fastermans, or Fasting-men [homines habentes, Lat.], men in repute and substance; pledges, sureties, or bondsmen, who, according to the Saxon polity, were fast bound to answer for each other's peaceable behaviour. —Encyc. Lond.

Fasti, fas signifies divine law; the epithet fastus is properly applied to anything in accordance with divine law, and hence those days upon which legal business might without impiety (sine piaculo) be transacted before the prætor, were technically denominated fasti dies, i.e., lawful days. Consult Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Fatetur facinus qui judicium fugit. 3 Inst. 14.—(He who flees judgment confesses his guilt.)

Father-in-law [socer, Lat.], the father of one's wife or husband.

Fathom [fr. fad, Teut.], a measure of 6 feet in length.

Fatua mulier, a whore.—Du Fresne.

Fatuous persons, idiots.

Fatuus, apud jurisconsultos nostros, accipitur pro non compos mentis; et fatuus dicitur, qui omnino desipit. 4 Co. 128.—(Fatuous, among our juriconsults, is understood for a man not of right mind; and he is called 'fatuus' who is altogether foolish.)

Fautors, favours or supporters of others; abettors of crimes, etc.—Cowel.

Favours, challenge to. See CHALLENGE.

Favorabilia in lege sunt fiscus, dos, vita, libertas. Jenk. Cent. 94.—(Things favourably considered in law are the treasury, dower, life, liberty.)

Favorabiliores rei potius, quam actores, habentur. D. 50, 17, 125.—(The condition of the defendant must be favoured rather than that of the plaintiff.) In other words, Melior est conditio defendentis. See Broom's Max.

Favorabiliores sunt executiones aliis processibus quibuscumque. Co. Litt. 289.—(Executions are preferred to all other processes whatever.)

Feal, tenants by knight-service, who swore to their lords to be feal and leal, i.e., faithful and loyal.

Feal and Divot, a right in Scotland, similar to the right of turbary in England, for fuel, etc.

Fealty [fr. fidelitas, Lat.; feaulté, Fr.], the special oath of fidelity or mutual bond of obligation between a lord and his tenant; the general oath being the allegiance performed by every subject to his sovereign, but this is better known by its more significant appellation of the oath of allegiance. Although foreign jurists consider fealty and homage as convertible terms, because in some continental countries they are blended so as to form one engagement, yet they are not to be confounded in our country, for they do not imply the same thing, homage being the acknowledgment of tenure, and fealty, the vassal-oath of fidelity, being the essential feudal bond, and the animating principle of a feud, without which it could not subsist. Fealty comprehends the following obligations, viz.; (1) Incolume, that the tenant do no bodily harm to his lord; (2) Trutum, that he do no secret damage to him in his house; (3) Honestum, that he damage not his reputation; (4) Utile, that he do no damage to him in his possessions ; (5) Facile, and (6) Possibile, that he render it easy for the lord to do any good, and not make that impossible to be done which was before in his power to do.—Leg. Hen. I. c. 5.

Feasts, anniversary days of rejoicing, either on a civil or religious occasion. Opposed to fasts. Our feasts are either (1) immoveable, such as Christmas-day, the Circumcision, Epiphany, Candlemas-day, Lady-day, All Saints, and All Souls, besides the days of the several apostles, St. Peter, St. Thomas, etc. : these are always celebrated on the same day of the year ; or (2) moveable, such as Easter, which fixes all the rest, as Palm Sunday, Good Friday, Ash Wednesday, Sexagesima, Ascension-day, Pentecost, Trinity Sunday, etc. The four principal immoveable feasts of the year, which are commonly assigned in England for the payment of rents on leases, are the Annunciation of the Blessed Virgin Mary or Lady-day, being the 25th of March ; the Nativity of St. John the Baptist, held on the 24th of June ; the feast of St. Michael the Archangel, on the 29th of September ; and Christmas-day on the 25th of December.—5 & 6 Edw. VI. c. 3 ; 3 Jac. I. c. 1 ; and 12 Car. II. c. 30.

Federal Government. When two or more sovereign or independent states mutually agree not to exercise certain powers incident to their several sovereignties, but to delegate the exercise of those powers to some person or body chosen by them jointly, there is said to be a federal union of those states, and the person or body to whom the exercise of such powers is delegated is called the Federal Government. The Swiss Confederation, and the United States of North America, are instances of federal Governments.

Fee [fr. feoh, Sax. ; fee, Dan., cattle ; feudum, Mod. Lat. ; feu, Scot.], property, peculiar ; reward or recompense for services. See FEES. Also an estate of inheritance divided into three species ; (1) fee-simple absolute ; (2) qualified or base fee ; (3) fee-tail, formerly fee-conditional. See FEE-SIMPLE.

Fee-base. See BASE FEE.

Fee-conditional. See CONDITIONAL FEE.

Feed, to lend additional support ; to strengthen ex post facto ; ‘the interest when it accrues feeds the estoppel.’ See Doe d. Christmas v. Oliver, 5 M. & R. 202.

Fee-expectant, where lands are given to a man and his wife, and the heirs of their bodies.

Fee-farm-rent, where an estate in fee is granted, subject to a rent in fee of at least one-fourth of the value of the lands at the time of its reservation ; and such rent appears to be called fee-farm, because a grant of land reserving so considerable a rent is indeed only letting lands to farm in fee-simple, instead of the usual method of life or years.—1 Steph. Com.

Fee-simple, a freehold estate of inheritance, absolute and unqualified. It stands at the head of estates as the highest in dignity and the most ample in extent ; since every other kind of estate is derivable thereout, and mergeable therein, for omne majus continet in se minus. It may be enjoyed not only in land, but also in advowsons, commons, estovers, and other hereditaments as well as in personalty, as an annuity or dignity, and also in an upper chamber, though the lower buildings and soil belong to another.

Littleton, in his Tenures (L. i. c. 1, s. 1), gives a description of this estate, which appears to have been adopted by every subsequent writer. His language is this :—

A person who holds ‘in fee simple is he which hath lands or tenements to hold to him and his heirs for ever. And it is called in Latin feodum simplex, for feodum is the same that inheritance is, and simplex is as much as to say lawful or pure. And so feodum simplex signifies a lawful or pure inheritance. For if a man would purchase lands or tenements in fee simple it behoveth him to have these words in his purchase, to have and to hold to him and to his heirs ; for these words (his heirs) make the estate of inheritance. For if a man purchase lands to have and to hold to him for ever ; or by these words, to have and to hold to him and his assignees for ever : in these two cases he hath but an estate for term of life, for that there lack these words (his heirs), which words only make an estate of inheritance in all feoffments and grants.’

In practice the phrase universally adopted in the designation clause of deeds, in order to transfer a fee-simple absolute, was, before the Conveyancing Act of 1881—‘to A., his heirs, and assigns, for ever.’ (The word ‘assigns,’ however, was not material, and might have been omitted, for it gave no other privilege to the owner than that which the law confers upon him by virtue of his estate, as entitling him to alien or transfer it ; and the phrase ‘for ever’ not being limitary but simply declaratory of the time during which the property shall be enjoyed, might also have been omitted in the conveyance.)

The necessity of any explanatory words is done away with by the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41, s. 51, which enacts that ‘in a deed’ it shall be sufficient in the limitation of an estate in fee simple, to use the words ‘in fee simple,' without the word 'heirs,' but this section applies only to conveyances made after the commencement of the act; i.e., by s. 2, on or after the 1st January, 1882.

The incidents of a fee-simple are the following:—

(a) An uncontrollable power of alienation, whether by deed, gift, or will; and whether of the whole or part of the estate. This power may be partially limited thus: a condition that they shall not alien to a given person or any of his heirs; or a devise in fee to A. and B. on condition that they shall not alien to any but sisters or their children (Litt. s. 361; 4 East, 173; 3 Ves. 324), or for a given time.

A new kind of inheritance cannot be created, for if one convey an estate to A. and his heirs male, or to A. and his heirs female, the word 'male' or 'female' is to be rejected, and A. will have the estate to him and his heirs generally.—Litt. L. i. c. 2, s. 31. So a grant to A. and his heirs, on the part of his mother, will descend to his heirs on the part of his father, the words italicised being rejected.

Inheritable offices of personal trust, dignity, or foundership cannot be alienated.

(b) If the owner die intestate, it descends to his heirs general, male or female, lineal or collateral, according to the canons as settled by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, except the estate be subjected to gavelkind, borough-English, or copyhold customs, when the particular customs vacates the general law, for consuetudo loci observanda est (6 Rep. 67).

(c) It is subject to the curtesy of a husband, and the dower of a wife, as the case may be, provided the right of the former be consummated by the necessary stipulations having been perfected, or that of the latter has not been barred.

(d) The owner has an uncontrollable power of waste over it.

(e) It is liable to all the owner's debts (1 Wm. IV. c. 47; 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 104; 1 & 2 Vict. c. 110; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 11; 2 & 3 Vict. c. 60; and 11 & 12 Vict. c. 87), after the unexempted personalty has been exhausted.

(f) It escheats to the Crown for want of heirs.

(g) Until the passing of the 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, abolishing forfeiture and escheat for treason or felony—see FORFEITURE—it was forfeitable for treason of the beneficial owner to the Crown absolutely; for murder, to the Crown during a year and a day, and then to the lord of the fee absolutely; for other felonies, to the Crown during a year and a day, and then the lord took the profits during the felon-owner's life, who still retained the legal estate, which upon his death devolved upon his heir-at-law, unless the offender had otherwise disposed of the estate in reversion expectant on his decease.—1 Cru. Dig. 63. The forfeiture related back to the commission of the crime, so as to shut out and make void all intermediate transfers of and charges upon the estate.

Fee-tail. See TAIL.

Fees, certain perquisites allowed to officers in the administration of justice, as a recompense for their labour and trouble, ascertained either by acts of parliament, by rule or order of Court, or by ancient usage, in modern times frequently commuted for a salary; e.g., by the Justices' Clerks Act, 1877.

As to Common Law fees, see 2 Chit. Arch. Prac., 12th ed., 1869; and in Equity, see Dan. Ch. Pr., 5th ed., passim. Fees in Chancery and Common Law were paid by means of stamps.—15 & 16 Vict. c. 87, s. 8, and 28 & 29 Vict. c. 45.

The mode of collecting court fees in the Supreme Court is similar to that formerly in use in the Superior Courts, and is regulated by the Judicature Act, 1873, ss. 26—29, and the new Order of 28 Oct., 1875.

The mode of collecting fees in a public office is under the Public Office Fees Act, 1879, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 58 (repealing and replacing the Public Office Fees Act, 1866), by stamps or money, as the treasury may direct.

The fees of the steward of a manor are regulated entirely by custom, and a customal or list of fees to be taken, under every circumstance, is generally handed down from steward to steward. When the steward charges enormously, the copyholder may bring an action on the case, to recover the excess, and it has been suggested that an indictment would lie for extortion colore officii. The fees of the steward of a manor who is a solicitor, but acts in the character of a steward only, are not taxable under 6 & 7 Vict. c. 73, s. 37. In transactions where these fees are large or numerous, a special agreement is generally made.—Allen v. Aldridge, 5 Beav. 401.

As to barristers' fees, see BARRISTER; and as to Solicitors' Fees, see COSTS.

Feigned action. See FAINT ACTION and FEIGNED ISSUE.

Feigned issue, a proceeding whereby an action was supposed to be brought by consent of the parties to determine some disputed right without the formality of pleading, saving thereby both time and expense. It might be ordered either by a Court of Law or Equity, or by a judge under the Interpleader Act, 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 58. Before the 8 & 9

Vict. c. 109, s. 19, questions of fact were often tried by means of a pretended wager between the parties interested. But by the last-named act, in every case, where any Court of Law or Equity desired to have any question of fact decided by a jury, the Court might direct a writ of summons to be sued out by such person as it thought ought to be plaintiff, against such person as it thought ought to be defendant, and thereupon proceedings went on as upon a feigned issue.

There are several instances under the new practice in which the judges have power to order certain questions to be tried as issues, such as the liability of a garnishee (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XLV., r. 5), the right to issue execution after a change of the parties to the judgment (Ibid., Ord. XLII., r. 19), etc., and see, too, Ibid., Ord. XLII., r. 7. And see also INTERPLEADER.

Felagus, a companion, but particularly a friend who was bound in the decennary for the good behaviour of another.

Feld, field; in composition, wild.—Blount.

Fele, or Feal homogers [fr. fai, Sax.; fides, Lat.], faithful subjects.

Fellow [quasi, to follow, Minshew, fr. fe, Sax., faith, and lag, bound, Junius; fallow, Scot.], a companion; one with whom we consort; a member of a college or corporate body.

Fellow-heir, co-heir; partner of the same inheritance.

Fellow-servant. At common law a master is not liable to his servant for injury caused by the negligence of a fellow-servant. A foreman was held to be a fellow-servant within this rule, but this state of the law is altered by the Employers' Liability Act, 1880, 43 & 44 Vict. c. 42, which is limited to expire on the 31st December, 1887.

Felo de se (a felon with respect to himself), a self-murderer; one who feloniously commits self-murder. The barbarous mode of burying such persons was abolished by 4 Geo. IV. c. 52, which directed burial in the churchyard or other burial ground (without divine service) between the hours of nine and twelve at night. The Interments (Felo de se) Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 19, repealed and re-enacted the above act, omitting the provisions as to the hours of burial, and allowing, by permission of the ordinary, a religious service. Escheat or forfeiture for felony is abolished by 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23.

Felon [fr. felon, Fr.; felo, Mod. low Lat.; fel., Sax.], one who has committed felony. See FELONY.

Felonia implicatur in quolibet proditione. 3 Inst. 15.—(Felony is implied in every treason.)

Felonia, ex vi termini significat quodlibet capitale crimen felleo animo perpetratum. Co. Litt. 391.—(Felony, by force of the term, signifies any capital crime perpetrated with a malignant mind.)

Felonius homicide, killing a human creature without justification or excuse. It is of two kinds:—(1) Killing one's self, or felo de se. (2) Killing another.

Felony [fr. felonie, Fr.; felonia, Lat.; some deduce it fr. φῆλος, Gk., a deceiver, and fallo, Lat., to deceive; Spelman derives it fr. the Teutonic or German fee, a fieu or fief, and lon, price or value]. All indictable crimes are either felonies or misdemeanours. In its original signification it meant the penal consequences resulting from the commission of certain offences, i.e., the forfeiture of the offender's lands and goods at Common Law, but in modern times it imports the offence itself. See 1 Mill's Log. 40, note. As to felony in the nature of treason, see 11 Vict. c. 12. By 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, it has been provided that no conviction for felony or treason shall hereafter cause any attainder or corruption of blood, or any forfeiture, or escheat; and provision is also made for the appointment of administrators of the estate of felons.

Female-labour. See MINE, and FACTORY.

Feme or Femme, a woman. See WOMAN.

Feme-covert, a married woman. See MARRIED WOMAN.

Feme-sole, an unmarried woman.

Fence, a hedge, ditch, or other enclosure of land for the better manurance and improvement of the same. As to the larceny or malicious destruction of fences, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 34, 35, and c. 97, s. 25.

Fencing machinery. See MACHINERY.

Fence-month or Defence-month, a time during which deer in forests do fawn; when hunting them is unlawful. It begins fifteen days before Old Midsummer, and ends fifteen days after it.—Manw., pt. 2, c. xiii.

Feneration [fr. feneratio, Lat.], usury; the gain of interest; the practice of increasing money by lending.

Fengeld, a tax or imposition, exacted for the repelling of enemies.

Fenian [fenaight, s. fol, Fenee], a champion, hero, giant. This word, in the plural, was anciently used to signify invaders or foreign spoilers, which inclines Dr. Kelly (Manx and English Dict.) to suppose that these Fenee were either the Feni of Ireland (for so were the inhabitants of Ulster called), or the Pœni or Phœnicians of Carthage; but from about the year 1865 (when an actual 'Fenian rising' took place) it has been used to signify that party in Ireland which seeks to promote a separation from Great Britain—the name having been originally taken by themselves.

Feod, or Feud, the right which the vassal had in land, or some immoveable property of his lord, to use the same and take the profits thereof, rendering unto the lord such duties and services as belonged to the particular tenure; the actual property in the soil always remaining in the lord.—Spelm. Feuds and Tenures.

Feodal, of or belonging to the feod or feud.

Feodal system. See FEUDAL SYSTEM.

Feodality, fealty. See FEALTY.

Feodary, or Feudary, an officer of the Court of Wards, appointed by the master of that Court, under 32 Hen. VIII. c. 26, whose business it was to be present with the escheator in every county at the finding of offices of lands, and to give evidence for the king, as well concerning the value as the tenure; and his office was also to survey the land of the ward, after the office found, and to rate it. He also assigned the king's widows their dower; and received all the rents, etc. Abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Feodatory, or Feudatory, the tenant who held his estate by feudal service.

Feodum est quod quis tenet ex quacunque causa sive sit tenementum sive redditus. Co. Litt. 1.—(A fee is that which any one holds from whatever cause, whether tenement or rent.)

Feodum simplex quia feodum idem est quod hæreditas, et simplex idem est quod legitimum vel purum; et sic feodum simplex idem est quod hæreditas legitima vel hæreditas pura. Litt. s. 1.—(A fee-simple, so called because fee is the same as inheritance, and simple is the same as lawful or pure; and thus fee-simple is the same as a lawful inheritance, or pure inheritance.)

Feodum talliatum, i.e., hæreditas in quandam certitudinem limitata. Litt. s. 13.—(Fee-tail; that is, an inheritance limited in a definite descent.)

Feodum. See FEOD.

Feodum, or Feodum antiquum, a feud which devolved upon a vassal from his intestate ancestor.

Feodum laicum, a lay-fee.

Feodum militis, a knight's-fee

Feodum, or Feodum novum, a feud acquired by a vassal himself.

Feoffee, one put in possession.

Feoffee to uses, the person in whom, before the Statute of Uses, the legal seisin or feudal tenancy of the land was vested, the substantial and beneficial ownership or use being in the cestui que use. The statute destroyed the estate of the feoffee to uses, and conveyed the possession to the cestui que use, who has now the legal estate, his use being executed by the statute. See USE.

Feoffer, one who gives possession of anything.

Feoffment [fr. feoffare, to give a feud], a deed (29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 1, and 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 3) evidencing and explaining the transmuting of the possession of a freehold estate, the transmutation being effected by a ceremony technically called livery of seisin. Since, however, the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, all real property, as regards conveyance of the immediate freehold thereof is transferable as well by grant as by livery.

A feoffment was a tortious conveyance, i.e., if a person attempted to convey by it a greater freehold than he had, he forfeited the estate of which he was seised; but now it is a rightful (droiturel) or innocent conveyance, transferring only the estate which the feoffer can lawfully convey, being void pro tanto as to the excess, and so operating no forfeiture.—8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 4.

Feoffment to uses. A feoffment is a conveyance at the common law, so far as it conveys the lands of the feoffee; if it is directed to operate to, or to the use of, the feoffee, it has no other operation than at the common law: but if it is directed to operate to the use of any other person, then, though it be a common law conveyance, so far as it conveys the land to the feoffee, it derives its effect from the Statute of Uses, so far as the use is limited by it to the person or persons in whose favour it is declared. Thus, if A. be desirous to convey to B. in fee, he may do so by enfeoffing a third person, C., to hold to him and his heirs to the use of B. and his heirs; the effect of which will be to convey the legal estate in fee-simple to B. For since the Statute of Uses, the legal estate passes to the feoffee by means of the livery, as it would have done before; but no sooner has this taken place than the limitation to uses begins to operate, and C. thereby becomes seised to the use defined or limited; the consequence of which is, that by force of the legislative enactment the legal estate is eo instanti taken out of him, and vests in B., for the like interest as was limited in the use, that is, in fee simple. B. thus becomes the legal tenant as effectually as if the feoffment had been made to himself, and without the intervention of a trustee. This method is not much practised in consequence of the livery of seisin.—2 Sand. Uses and Trusts, 13; Watk. Conv. 288.

Feoffer. See FEOFFER.

Feoh, or Fioh, cattle, money.

Feorme, a certain portion of the produce of the land due by the grantee to the lord according to the terms of the charter.—Spelman on Feuds, c. 7.

Feræ naturæ, Animals. Beasts and birds of a wild disposition, such as deer, hares, coney in a warren, pheasants, partridges, etc., as distinguished from those domitæ naturæ, or tame, such as horses, sheep, poultry, etc. They are not whilst living the subjects of absolute property, so that they cannot be the subject of larceny, nor are they liable to distress for rent. But a man may acquire a qualified property in them, either, (1) Per industriam, by his reclaiming and making them tame by art and industry, or by so confining them that they cannot escape, e.g., deer in a park, hares or rabbits in an enclosed warren, etc. The property in them only continues so long as they remain in a man's actual possession, but ceases if they regain their liberty, unless they have animus revertendi, as in the case of pigeons, tame hawks, etc. (2) Ratione impotentie, on account of their inability, as when birds, coney, etc., make their nests or burrows on a man's land, and have young ones, then he has a qualified property in the young until they can fly or run away. (3) Propter privilegium, when a man has the privilege of hunting, taking, and killing certain wild animals, usually called game, in exclusion of other persons. He has a transient property in them so long as they continue within his liberty, and may prevent any stranger from taking them therein; but the instant they depart from his liberty, his qualified property in them ceases.

Of animals feræ naturæ when dead, reclaimed, or confined, if they are fit for food, larceny may be committed at common law. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 11—24, and 2 Bl. Com. 391. See further ANIMALS.

With regard to injuries inflicted by savage animals and the responsibility for their owner therefore, if a man be possessed of an animal absolutely feræ naturæ, as a tiger, he is an insurer, and responsible for any damage done by it; but if there be an animal of a kind generally amenable, but the individual beast be accustomed to do mischief, it must be proved that he was known to be so by his master. Such was the rule universally until the 28 & 29 Vict. c. 60; since then, in the case of injury to sheep and cattle by dogs, it need not be shown that the offending animal was previously given to do hurt.

Ferdella terræ, a fardel-land; ten acres; or perhaps a yard-land.—Cowel.

Ferdingus, apparently a freeman of the lowest class, being named after the cotseti.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Ferdwit [fr. ferd, Sax., army, and wite, punishment], quit of manslaughter committed in the army; also a fine imposed on persons for not going forth on a military expedition.—Cowel.

Feriae, holidays; generally speaking, days or seasons during which free-born Romans suspended their political transactions and their law suits, and during which slaves enjoyed a cessation from labour.—Cic. de Leg. ii. 8, 12.

Ferling, the fourth part of a penny; also the quarter of a ward in a borough.—Old Records.

Ferlingata, a fourth part of a yard-land.

Ferlingus, or Ferlingum, a furlong, which see.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Ferm, or Fearn, a house or land or both, let by lease.—Cowel.

Fernary, an hospital.—Jacob.

Fernier, one who farms any public revenue in France.

Fermisona, the winter season for killing deer.

Fern. Unlawfully and maliciously setting fire to growing fern or to a stack of fern is a felony. See 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 16—17.

Fernigo, a piece of waste ground where ferns grow.—Cowel.

Ferrets, are not the subjects of larceny.—2 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 7 n. (g).

Ferriage, the fare paid at a ferry.

Ferry, the right to carry persons and their goods in boats across a river, and to take toll for such carriage. It is a franchise, and can only be created by license from the Crown or by act of parliament, but the owner if he lose his traffic by the competition of a railway bridge, can get no compensation under the Lands Clauses Act (Hopkins v. Great Northern Railway Co., 2 Q. B. D. 224). As to the duties of common ferrymen, see 1 Shower, 140.

Ferspeken, to speak suddenly.—Leg. H. I. c. 61.

Fesance, an act.

Festinatio justitiae est noverca infortunii. Hob. 97.—(Hasty justice is the stepmother of misfortune.)

Festa in cappis, grand holidays, on which choirs wore caps.—Jacob.

Festing-men. See FASTING-MEN.

Festing-penny [fr. festnian, Sax., to confirm], earnest given to servants when hired or retained in service.

Festinum remedium, a prompt redress.

Festum (a feast).

Festum stultorum, the feast of fools.

Feu, or Few, a free and gratuitous right to lands, made to one for service to be performed by him, according to the proper nature thereof. Feu, in Scotland, means vassal tenure, in contradistinction to ward-holding, or military tenure, being that holding where the vassal, in place of military service, makes a return in money which is called the feu-duty or feu-annual.

Feud. See DEADLY FEUD.

Feudal system, that scheme of tenure which the Conqueror perfected in this country, thereby displacing the Saxon laws of property, and which was the chief institution of the middle ages. See FEOD and TENURE.

While the principles of reality are for the most part of feudal derivation, the rules concerning personalty are brought from the civil law, or the law of nature. Sir Robert Chambers, in his Treatise on Estates and Tenures, epitomizes the history of the Feudal System as follows:—The duration of the feudal law has by some writers been fancifully distinguished into four ages:—(1) In its infancy, the lands given to the soldiers, which were not yet called feuds, and perhaps had no name, were held by the will and pleasure of their lord. (2) The second age began when some regard was had to descent. It is supposed, that at first the son of a tenant was put into possession of his father's land, not as having a better right, but as being naturally more known and more favoured than a stranger. That which was reasonable became by degrees customary, and when the son without any cause alleged was excluded, the lord was considered as exercising summum jus, as acting unkindly, though not illegally. In time the advantages of a more certain settlement were discovered, and grants were made to a tenant and his sons. These grants were, however, interpreted with literal rigour. (3) In the third age those possessions which, while they were granted only for life, or at most were very strict limitations, had been termed beneficia, began to be made indefinitely inheritable, and took the name of feuds. The succession to a feud was for some time strictly lineal. The three periods of the feudal law which have been mentioned are called its infancy, childhood, and youth. (4) Then commenced its fourth age or maturity; the order of descent was settled, collateral relations admitted to inheritance, the reciprocal obligations of lord and tenant fully understood, and some princes, the first of whom was the Emperor Conrad the Second, had published edicts in writing for regulating feudal successions.—Craig de Feudis passim. The main incidents of the feudal system were not expressly abolished in England until 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Feudbote, a recompense for engaging in a feud or quarrel. See Cowel.

Feudist, a writer on feuds, as Cujacius, Spelman, etc.

Feudum. Fidelis ero verè domino vero meo.—(A fee. I will be truly faithful to my true lord.)

Feuds, Book of, published during the reign of Henry III., about the year 1152. 'While most of the nations of Europe referred to the Book of Feuds as the grand code of law by which to correct and amend the imperfections in their own tenures, there is not in our law-books any allusion that intimates the existence of such a body of constitutions.'—2 Reeves 55.

Fiar, opposed to liferenter. The person in whom the property of an estate is vested, subject to the liferenter's estate.—Scotch Law.

Fiars prices, the value of grain in the different counties of Scotland, fixed yearly by the respective sheriffs, in the month of February, with the assistance of juries. These regulate the prices of grain stipulated to be sold at the fiar prices, or when no price has been stipulated.—Ersk. L. 1, tit. 4, s. 6.

Fiat (let it be done), a decree; a short order or warrant of some judge for making out and allowing certain processes, e.g., the fiat of the Attorney-General for a writ of error (See Castro v. Murray, L. R. 10 Ex. 213).

Fiat in Bankruptcy, the authority of the Lord Chancellor to a commissioner of bankrupts, which authorized him to proceed in the bankruptcy of a trader mentioned therein. It was abolished by 12 & 13 Vict. c. 106, and a petition for adjudication substituted.

Fiat jus, ruat justitia.—(Let law prevail, though justice fail.)

Fiat justitia, ruat cælum.—(Let right be done, though the heavens should fall.)

Fiaunt [fr. fiat, Lat.], warrant.

Fictio cedit veritati. Fictio juris non est ubi veritas.—(Fiction yields to truth. Where there is truth, fiction of law exists not.)

Fictio legis iniquè operatur alicui damnum vel injuriam. 3 Rep. 36.—(A legal fiction does not properly work loss or injury, i.e., In fictione juris semper æquitas existit.)

Fiction. Fictions are 'those things that have no real essence in their own body, but are so accepted in law for especial purpose.' The fictions of the Roman law apparently had their origin in the edictal power, and were devised to provide for cases where there was no legislative provision.

The English law has always abounded in fictions. See, e.g., DAY, EJECTMENT, FINE, LATITAT, TROVER.

Fide-jussor, a surety, or one that obliges himself in the same contract with a principal, for the greater security of the creditor or stipulator.—Civ. Law.

Fidei-commisum, a testamentary disposition, by which a person who gives a thing to another imposes on him the obligation of transferring it to a third person. The obligation was not created by words of legal binding force (civilia verba), but by words of request (precative), such as 'fidei committo,' 'peto,' 'volo dari,' and the like, which were the operative words (verba utilia). If the object of the fidei-commissum was the hereditas, the whole or a part, it was called fidei-commissaria hereditas, which is equivalent to a universal fidei-commissum; if it was a single thing, or a sum of money, it was called fidei-commissum singule rei. The obligation to transfer the former could only be imposed on the heirs; the obligation of transferring the latter might be imposed on a legatee. It appears that there were no legal means of enforcing the due discharge of the trust called fidei-commissum, till the time of Augustus, who gave the consuls jurisdiction in fidei-commissa. Fidei-commissa seem to have been introduced in order to evade the civil law, and to give the hereditas, or a legacy to a person who was either incapacitated from taking directly, or who could not take as much as the donor wished to give. Gaius, when observing that peregrini could take fidei-commissa, observes, that 'this' (the object of evading the law) 'was probably the origin of fidei-commissa'; but by a senatus-consultum, made in the time of Hadrian, such fidei-commissa were claimed by the fiscus. Fidei-commissa were ultimately assimilated to legacies.—Gaius, ii. 247—289; Ulp. Frag. tit. 25; Sand. Just., 5th ed., 246—259.

Fidelitas. De nullo tenemento, quod tenetur ad terminum, fit homagii; fit tamen inde fidelitatis sacramentum. Co. Litt. 676.—(Fealty. For no tenement which is held for a term is there the oath of homage, but there is the oath of fealty.)

Fidem mentiri, when a tenant does not keep that fealty which he has sworn to the lord.—Leg. Hen. I. c. 53.

Fides est obligatio conscientie alicujus ad intentionem alterius. Bacon.—(A trust is an obligation of conscience of one to the will of another.)

Fiducia. If a man transferred his property to another, on condition that it should be restored to him, this contract was called fiducia, and the person to whom the property was so transferred was said fiducium accipere.—Cic. Top. 10. A man might transfer his property to another for the sake of greater security in time of danger, or for other sufficient reasons.—Gaius, ii. 60.

Fiduciary [fr. fiduciarius, Lat.], one who holds anything in trust.

Fief, a fee; a manor, a possession held by some tenant of a superior.

Fiefs were originally called terre jure beneficii concessæ; and it was not till under Charles le Gros the term fief began to be in use.—Du Cange.

Fief d'haubert, the Norman phrase for knight-service.

Fierding courts, inferior ancient Gothic courts, so called because four were established within every superior district or hundred.

Fieri facias, usually abbreviated fi. fa. (that you cause to be made), a judicial writ that lies for him who has recovered any debt or damages in the Queen's Courts. It is a command to the sheriff, that of the goods and chattels of the party he cause to be made the sum recovered by the judgment, with interest, at 4*l.* per cent. from the time of entering up judgment, to be rendered to the party who sued it out. If the sheriff return nulla bona, an alias fi. fa. may issue; and upon that being returned, a pluries, or a testatum fi. fa. may be issued into another county.

By 8 Anne c. 14, s. 1, 'no goods or chattels in any message, lands, or tenements, which are leased for life or lives, term of years, at will, etc., shall be taken in execution, unless the creditor before their removal pay the landlord all the money due for rent, at the time not amounting to more than one year's rent; if more be due, one year's rent only. The sheriff is required to levy and pay to the plaintiff as well the money paid for rent as the execution money.' And see 7 & 8 Vict. c. 96, s. 67, as to short tenancies.

Under this execution can be taken all personal goods and chattels, excepting wearing apparel, etc., to the value of 5*l.* (8 & 9 Vict. c. 127, s. 8). Also any money or banknotes (whether of the Governor and Company of the Bank of England, or of any other bank or bankers), and any cheques, bills of exchange, promissory notes, bonds, specialities, or other security for money belonging to the person against whose effects a fi. fa. shall be sued out. (1 & 2 Vict. c. 110, s. 12.) The sheriff cannot sell an estate in fee or for life, unless, perhaps, an estate pur autre vie; but he may sell leases and terms for years. Neither can fixtures be seized, but emblements may. The seizure and sale of straw, chaff, turnips, manure, hay, grapes, roots, vegetables, etc., on lands let to farm, are regulated by 56 Geo. III. c. 50. As to growing crops, see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 25, s. 2. As to the rolling stock of railways, see RAILWAY ROLLING STOCK PROTECTION. If the sheriff seize the goods of a stranger, he will be liable to an action. If he return that he has taken goods, but that they remain in his hand for want of buyers, a venditioni exponas is issued to compel a sale; but if he have gone out of office after such return, instead of a venditioni exponas, a distringas nuper vicecomitem issues to the new sheriff to make the late sheriff sell the goods. An elegit may issue after a fi. fa. if the judgment be not satisfied.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac., 13th ed., 550 et seq. A fi. fa. might be issued in Chancery suits, for the purpose of obtaining satisfaction of any pecuniary demand to which a person was entitled under a decree or order of the Court.—1 & 2 Vict. c. 110; and Consol. Ord. 1860, Ord. xxix. 3.

By Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XLIII., r. 1, it is provided that writs of fieri facias shall have the same force and effect as the like writs have heretofore had, and shall be executed in the same manner in which the like writs have heretofore been executed.

Fieri facias de bonis ecclesiasticis (that you cause to be made of the ecclesiastical goods), when a sheriff to a common fi. fa. returns nulla bona, and that the defendant is a benefited clerk, not having any lay fee, a plaintiff may issue a fi. fa. de bonis ecclesiasticis, addressed to the bishop of the diocese or to the archbishop (during the vacancy of the bishop's see), commanding him to make of the ecclesiastical goods and chattels belonging to the defendant within his diocese, the sum therein mentioned.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac., 12th ed., 1062.

It could be obtained in Chancery. See Consol. Ord. 1860, Ord. xxix. 4.

This writ under the Rules of the Supreme Court may be issued and executed in the same cases, and in the same manner as before (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XLIII. r. 2).

Fieri feci (I have caused to be made), a return made by a sheriff when he has executed a writ of execution.

Fifteenths, a tribute or imposition of money anciently laid generally upon cities, boroughs, etc., throughout the whole realm; it amounted to a fifteenth of that which each city or town was valued at, or of every man's personal estate.—Cam. Brit. 171.

Fight. See CHALLENGES TO FIGHT.

Fightwite, making a quarrel to the disturbance of the peace.—Jacob.

Figures, the numerical characters by which numbers are expressed or written, as the ten digits, which are usually called the Arabic or Indian figures, from their supposed origin. The 6 Geo. II. c. 14, allowed expressing numbers by figures in all writs, etc., pleadings, rules, orders, and indictments, etc., in courts of justice, as had been commonly used, notwithstanding the 4 Geo. II. c. 26.

Filacer, Filazer, or Filizer [fr. filum, Lat; file, filace, Fr., a thread], an officer of the Superior Courts of Westminster, who filed original writs, etc., and issued processes thereon.—2 Wm. IV. c. 39, s. 4; 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 110, s. 2.

Fild-ale, or Filk-ale [fr. fillen, Sax., to fill, and ale], an ale-feast. A term applied to an extortionate practice of officers of the forest, and of bailiffs of hundreds, of compelling persons to contribute to the supplying them with drink, etc. Prohibited by the Carta de Foresta.—4 Inst. 307.

File [fr. filacium, Lat.], a thread, string, or wire, upon which writs and other exhibits in courts and offices are fastened or filed, for the more safe keeping of, and ready reference to, the same.

Filiation [fr. filius, Lat.], the relation of a son to his father; correlative to paternity.

Filiatio non potest probari. Co. Litt. 126.—(Filiation cannot be proved.) But see 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101 and title AFFILIATION.

Filicetum [fr. filix, Lat., fern-brake], brackie land, land where ferns grow.—Co. Litt. 4.

Filiolus, a little son; a godson.—Jacob.

Filius in utero matris est pars viscerum matris. 7 Co. 8.—(A son in the mother's womb is part of the mother's vitals.)

Filius mulieratus, the eldest legitimate son of a woman who was illicitly connected with his father before marriage.

Filius populi, a son of the people, a natural child. See Cowel, voce Mulier.

Filum aquæ, medium, the thread or middle of the stream where a river parts two lordships; also the middle of any river or stream which divides counties, townships, parishes, manors, liberties, etc.

Filum viæ, the thread or middle of a road.

Final decree, a conclusive decision of the Court, as distinguished from interlocutory.

Final judgment. See JUDGMENT.

Final process, a writ of execution on a judgment or decree,

Finances, the revenue of a sovereign or state, or the money raised by loans, taxes, etc., for the public services.

Financier, a person employed in the economical management and application of public money.

Finder, a searcher employed to discover goods imported or exported, without paying custom.—Jacob.

Finder of goods acquires a special property in them, available against all the world, except the true owner; he is bound, however, before appropriating them to his own use, to take all the means in his power to discover the owner. If the property had not been designedly abandoned, and the finder knew who the owner was, or with due exertion could have discovered him, he is held guilty of larceny if he keep and appropriate the articles to his own use. See R. v. Thurborn, 1 Den. C. C. 328.

Fine, a sum of money, or mulct imposed upon an offender, also called a ransom. See PENALTY. As to the enforcement of such fines, see 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21.

An income or a sum of money paid at the entrance of a tenant into his land; a sum paid for the renewal of a lease

An assurance,—abolished by the Fines and Recoveries Act, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 74,—by matter of record, founded on a supposed previously existing right. In every fine, which was the compromise of a fictitious suit, and resembled the transactio of the Romans, there was a suit supposed, in which the person who was to recover the thing was called the plaintiff, conusee, or recognisee, and the person who parted with the thing the deforçant, conusor, or recognisor. It was termed a fine for its worthiness, and the peace and quiet it brought with it—finis fructus exitus et effectus legis. There were five essential parts to the levying of a fine:—(1) The original writ of right, usually of covenant, issued out of the Common Pleas against the conusor, and the præcipe, which was a summary of the writ and upon which the fine was levied; (2) the royal license (licentia concordandi) for the levying of the fine, for which the Crown was paid a sum of money called king's silver, which was the post-fine, as distinguished from the præ-fine, which was due on the writ; (3) the conusance, or concord itself, which was the agreement expressing the terms of the assurance, and was indeed the conveyance; (4) the note of the fine, which was an abstract of the original contract or concord; (5) the foot of the fine, or the last part of it, which contained all the matter, the day, year, and place, and before what justices it had been levied. A fine was said to be engrossed when the chirographer made the indentures of the fine and delivered them to the party to whom the conusance was made. The chirograph, or indentures, was evidence of the fine.

A fine without proclamation was a fine at the Common Law, and a fine with proclamations (which was to be proclaimed openly in the Common Pleas once a term for four terms next after its engrossment) was a fine according to the statute 4 Hen. VII. c. 24, and of this sort were most fines. A fine was single when an estate was granted to the cognisee, and nothing rendered to the cognisor; or double, when there was a render back again either of the land itself or something out of it, for some new estate.

There were four sorts of fine:—(1) a fine sur cognizance de droit come ceo, etc., which was the most common, and was an acknowledgment on record of a previous gift or feoffment.

(2) A fine sur done grant et render consisted of two parts, a grant and a render, and operated like a feoffment and re-enfeoffment. —Salk. 340.

(3) A fine sur conusance de droit tantum gave or transferred only the right or estate which was in the conusor. It was generally used to pass a reversionary interest or to surrender a life estate.

(4) A fine sur concessit, which might have been either for years, for life, in tail, or in fee. It conveyed the estates of wives, and created terms, which were binding, by estoppel, on contingent or executory interests. See 1 Touch. c. ii., and 1 Prest. Conv. c. ii.

The chirograph of a fine is sufficient evidence of its acknowledgment. It will be proper to see that the fine agrees with the deed leading or declaring the uses, that the parcels are sufficient to comprise the property conveyed, that the proclamations are endorsed, and that the possession has gone according to the fine.

Fine adullando levato de tenemento quod fuit de antiquo dominico, an abolished writ for disannulling a fine levied of lands in ancient demesne to the prejudice of the lord. —Reg. Orig. 15.

Fine arts. As to copyright in works of the fine arts, see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 68, and see COPYRIGHT.

Fine capiendo pro terris, etc., an obsolete writ which lay for a person who, upon conviction by jury, had his lands and goods taken, and his body imprisoned, to be remitted his imprisonment, and have his lands and goods redelivered to him, on obtaining favour of a sum of money, etc.—Reg. Orig. 142.

Fine force, where a person is compelled to do that which he cannot help.—O. N. B. 63.

Fine non capiendo pro pulchre placitando, an obsolete writ to inhibit officers of courts to take fines for fair pleading.

Fine pro redisseisinâ capiendo, an old writ that lay for the release of one imprisoned for a redisseisin, on payment of a reasonable fine.—Reg. Orig. 222.

Fines for alienation, one of the oppressions of the feudal system, abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Fines in copyholds. A fine which is preserved by 12 Car. II. c. 24, s. 6, is a sum of money payable by custom to the lord. There are three classes of fines:—(1) those due on the change of the lord; (2) those on the change of the tenant; and (3) those for a license to empower the tenant to do certain acts.

When the fine is due on the change of the lord, such change must be by the act of God, and not in consequence of any act of the party. It can therefore be only claimed on the death of the lord.

When it is due on the change of the tenant, it matters not whether that change is effected by the act of God, or by the tenant's own act. Whenever the tenancy is changed, a fine is payable.

Those fines which are due on licenses by the lord, to empower the tenant to do certain acts, as to demise, etc., are rare. There must be a special custom to support such fine, for, by general custom, fines are due only on admissions.

Upon admittance a fine is due to the lord unless there is a special custom to the contrary. The fine, as well as the steward's fees, are payable by the purchaser; and even a covenant to surrender copyholds, at the costs of the vendor, is not broken by the non-payment of this fine, the title being perfected by admittance.—Graham v. Sime, 1 East. 634.

The admission fine is prima facie uncertain and arbitrary, or rather arbitrable, unless a special custom fix it; it must, however, be reasonable, and not excessive, for excessus in re quilibet, jure reprobatur communi, and two years' improved value of the land, deducting quit rents, but not land-tax, is now the full extent which the Courts will allow the lord to take in the exercise of this arbitrary power, except on voluntary grants, for then it is altogether in the lord's option. On the death of a surrenderee before admission, the lord must admit his heir on payment of a single fine only,—1 Serv. Cop. 341. But if the heir of a copyholder die before admission, his heir or devisee could not compel admission, except on payment of a double fine. Without a special custom for it, the remainderman is not liable on the death of the tenant for life, to pay a fine; for the admittance of the life-tenant is an admittance of those in remainder or reversion, and although there is alteration of the tenant, yet there is not any of the estate; but the heir or surrenderee of a reversioner or remainder-man, as well as the surrenderee of a particular tenant, must be admitted and pay a fine.

If a copyholder intend the estate to be sold at his death, he may save a double fine by giving a power of sale to his executors, for the donee of a power is not admitted, but the appointee only, upon whose admittance a fine is due; but if he devise the copyhold to trustees, upon trust to sell, the trustees must themselves be admitted; the trustee, not the cestui que trust, is admitted tenant.

If the fine be certain, the tenant should come prepared to pay it, but the lord cannot refuse admittance because the fine is not tendered to him. When the fine is uncertain, the practice is to fix a reasonable day and place of payment.

Upon payment of a fine, the steward delivers a copy of the court-roll, which is the tenant's muniment of his title.

Fines for endowment, anciently paid to the lord when a married woman was endowed; they were grounded on the feudal exactions.

Fines for offences. See PENALTY.

Finire, to fine, or pay a fine upon composition and making satisfaction.—Old Records.

Finis unius diei est principium alterius. 2 Buls. 305.—(The end of one day is the beginning of another.) See FULLAGE.

Finitio, death.—Blount.

Firdiringa, a preparation to go into the army.—Leg. Hen. I.

Firdfare, and Firdwite. See FERDWIT.

Fire. No action for damages lies against any person in whose house, etc., a fire shall accidentally begin.—14 Geo. III. c. 78, s. 86.

The maintenance of fire engines in urban sanitary districts is provided for by the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 171, which incorporates ss. 30—33 of the Town Public Clauses Act, 1847, and in the Metropolis by the Fire Brigade Act, 1865. See FIRE BRIGADE.

If, after a contract for the sale or lease of a house, etc., the house, etc., be burnt down, the loss falls on the intending purchaser or tenant. See Paine v. Mellor, 6 Ves. 349; Counter v. Macpherson, 5 Moore P. C. 83. In a lease, both the covenant to pay rent, and the covenant to repair must be complied with by the tenant notwithstanding the destruction of the demised premises by fire;—for which reason it is common to insert in each of these covenants an appropriate saving or exception. See also INSURANCE.

Fire-arms, this word comprises all sorts of guns, fowling-pieces, blunderbusses, pistols, etc. See GUN.

In consequence of the frequent occurrence of accidents from the bursting of insufficient barrels, the legislature has interfered, to prevent persons from using or selling barrels not regularly proved in a public proof-house. The first act for this purpose was passed in 1813; it was superseded by 55 Geo. III. c. 59, repealed by 18 & 19 Vict. c. cxlviii.; which imposed a fine of 20*l.* on any one using, in any of the progressive stages of its manufacture, any barrel not duly proved; on any delivering the same except through a proof-house; and on any receiving for the purpose of making guns, etc., any barrels which have not passed through a proof-house.—

McCull. Com. Dict. See now 31 & 32 Vict. c. cxiii., repealing 18 & 19 Vict. c. cxlviii.

Firebare, a beacon or high tower by the seaside, wherein are continual lights, either to direct sailors in the night, or to give warning of the approach of an enemy.—Cowel.

Firebote, fuel for necessary use, allowed to tenants out of the lands granted to them.

Fire Brigade (Metropolitan). See 28 & 29 Vict. c. 90, which entrusts to the Metropolitan Board of Works the duty of extinguishing fires in the metropolis, and with a view to the performance of that duty, authorizes them to provide and maintain an efficient force of firemen, etc. By s. 12 of the Act, on the occasion of a fire, the chief officer of the fire brigade may take any measures that appear expedient for the protection of life and property.

Fire insurance. See INSURANCE.

Fire-ordeal, trial by red-hot iron, used upon accusations without manifest proof (though not without suspicion that the accused might be guilty). The accused, if he denied the charge, was adjudged to take red-hot iron, and to hold it in his bare hand, which, after many prayers and invocations that the truth might be manifested, he was bound to do, or yield himself guilty, and so receive the punishment that the law awarded. Some were adjudged to go blindfolded, with their bare feet, over certain plough-shares, made red-hot and laid a little distance one before another. If the accused in passing through them did chance not to tread upon them, or treading upon them received no harm, he was declared innocent. The trial was practised in England upon Emma, the mother of King Edward the Confessor, who was accused of adultery, and is said to have proved her innocence thereby.

Fire-plugs. As to the duty of urban authorities to provide fire plugs, see 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, s. 66, and 10 & 11 Vict. c. 34, s. 124. As to the like duty of undertakers of waterworks, see 10 & 11 Vict. c. 17, ss. 38—43. As to the metropolis, see 34 & 35 Vict. c. 113, s. 34.

Fire policy. See INSURANCE.

Fire and Sword, Letters of, anciently issued from the privy council of Scotland, addressed to the sheriff of the county, authorising him to call for the assistance of the county to dispossess a tenant unlawfully retaining possession.—Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Fireworks. The making and selling of fireworks and squibs or throwing them about in the street was declared to be a common nuisance by 9 & 10 Wm. III. c. 7. See also Metropolitan Police Act, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 87.

c. 47, s. 54, and 9 & 10 Vict. c. 25. By the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 139, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 130, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 98, provisions were made for regulating the manufacture, sale, and use of fireworks, but these have now been repealed, and the law relating to this subject amended by the Explosives Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 17). See EXPLOSIVE SUBSTANCES.

Firkin, a measure containing nine gallons.

Firm, the name or names under which any house of trade is established. Partners may sue or be sued in the name of their firm. Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XVI., r. 10. See PARTIES.

Firma, a tribute anciently paid towards the entertainment of the King of England for one night; also victuals, provisions, or rent.—Cowel.

Firma Alba. See ALBA FIRMA.

Firman, an Asiatic word denoting a decree or grant of privileges, or passport to a traveller.

Firmarius, a fructuary.—1 Reeves, 324.

Firmaratio, the right of a tenant to his lands and tenements.—Cowel.

Firmatio, the doe season.—Cowel. Also a supplying with food.—Leg. Inc., c. 34.

Firmaun, or Phirmaund, an order, mandate, an imperial decree, royal grant, or charter.—Indian.

Firme, a farm.—Old Records.

Firmior et potentior est operatio legis quam dispositio hominis. Co. Litt. 102.—(The operation of the law is firmer and more powerful than the disposition of man.)

Firmura, liberty to scour and repair a mill-dam, and carry away the soil, etc.—Blount.

First fruits, an incident to the old feudal tenures, being one year's profits of the land, after the death of a tenant, which belonged to the king. Hence arose the claim of the head of the church to the first year's profits of every clergyman's benefice; otherwise called annates or primitiæ. By 2 & 3 Anne c. 8, the first fruits of all benefices, except those under the value of 50*l.* per annum, which are exempted from the payment of first fruits, were vested in trustees to form a perpetual fund, called Queen Anne's bounty, for the augmentation of poor livings. See BOUNTY OF QUEEN ANNE.

First impression. See PRIMÆ IMPRESSIONIS.

Fisc, or Fiscus [fr. fiscus, Lat., a great basket], the treasury of a prince or state.

Fiscal, belonging to the exchequer or revenue.

Fiscus is a wicker basket, or pannier, in which the Romans were accustomed to keep and carry about large sums of money (Cic. 1 Verr. c. viii.; Phædr. Fab. ii. 7), hence any treasure or money chest.

The importance of the imperial fiscus led to the appropriating the name to that property which the Cæsar claimed as Cæsar, and 'fiscus,' without any adjunct, was so used (Juv. Sat. iv. 54). Ultimately the word came to signify, generally, the property of the state, the Cæsar having concentrated in himself all the sovereign power; thus the word had finally the signification of cerarium in the republican period. It does not appear at what time the cerarium was merged in the fiscus, though the distinction continued to the time of Hadrian. In the latter periods the words were used indiscriminately, to mean the imperial, which was the only public, chest.—Smith's Dict. Antig.

Fishery, the right to take fish. Fisheries are either free, common, or several. A free fishery is the exclusive right of fishing in a public river, and is a royal franchise. Common of fishery, or common of piscary, is the right of fishing in another man's water. A several fishery is the exclusive right of fishing, and he that has it, according to Blackstone, 'must also be (or at least derive his right from) the owner of the soil.'—2 Bl. Com. 40. This position of Blackstone has been questioned. See Harg. Co. Litt. 122 a, n. (7); Holford v. Bailey, 8 Q. B. 1000; 13 Q. B. 427; and Marshall v. The Ulleswater Steam Navigation Company, 32 L. J. (Q. B.), 139. See Paterson's Fishery Laws.

The term is also applied to fishing grounds, or parts of the sea where at certain seasons numbers of fish are taken. The right of frequenting these has frequently been the subject of dispute between nations, and sometimes of treaties. For collection of statutes relating to fisheries, see Chitty's Statutes, vol. ii., tit. 'Fish.' As to oyster fisheries, see 31 & 32 Vict. c. 45, s. 27 et seq., and 38 Vict. c. 15, s. 1. As to salmon fisheries, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, and c. 109; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 97; 26 & 27 Vict. cc. 50 and 114; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 118; and 28 & 29 Vict. c. 121; and particularly 36 & 37 Vict. c. 71. By the 36 & 37 Vict. c. 13, the office of Special Commissioners of Salmon Fisheries in England is discontinued. A close season for all freshwater fish is prescribed by the Freshwater Fisheries Act, 1878, 41 & 42 Vict. c. 39. As to exportation of salmon at certain times, see 26 & 27 Vict. c. 10. As to cutting through or destroying the dam, floodgate, or sluice of, or putting lime or noxious materials in, a fishpond or water which is private property, or in which there is a private right of fishery, with intent to take or destroy fish, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 32. As to the unlawful taking or destroying of fish, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 24 and 25. As to Sea Fisheries generally, see Sea Fisheries Act, 1868, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 45; as to the seal fishery off the coast of Greenland, see 38 & 39 Vict. c. 18; and as to oysters, crabs, and lobsters, see 40 & 41 Vict. c. 42.

Fishgarth, a dam or wear in a river for taking fish.—Cowel.

Fish-royal. Whale and sturgeon, the taking of which is the exclusive right of the sovereign.—2 Bl. Com. 403.

Fisk, the right of the Crown to the moveable estate of a person pronounced rebel.—Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Fitung, strife.

Fitz [Nor., fr. fils, Fr.], a son. It is used in law and genealogy; as Fitzherbert, the son of Herbert; Fitzjames, the son of James; Fitzroy, the son of the king. It was originally applied to illegitimate children.

Fitzherbert, the most distinguished writer upon law in the reign of Henry VIII. He was first a serjeant, and some years after a judge of the Common Pleas. The first book published by this learned author was his Grand Abridgment, printed in 1514 by Richard Pynson, of which in 1516 a second edition was printed by Wynkyn de Worde. In 1534 he published his new Natura Brevium, which was reprinted in 1537. In 1541 we find The New Booke of Justices of Peace made by Anthony Fitzherbert, Judge, lately translated out of Frenche into Englishe. Of these, the Natura Brevium (nature of writs), which is an improvement of a more ancient work of the same nature and title, is by far the best known and most often cited. It is remarkable that this treatise on the nature and effect of the principal writs in the Register was published at a time when those writs were, many of them, going into disuse, and soon afterwards became obsolete.

Five-mile Act, 35 Eliz. c. 2, whereby popish recusants convicted for not going to church, were compelled to repair to their usual place of abode, and not to remove above five miles from thence, repealed by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 102.

Fixtures, things of an accessory character, annexed to houses or lands, which become, immediately on annexation, part of the realty itself, i.e., governed by the same law which applies to the land, in conformity with the maxim quicquid plantatur solo, solo cedit.—1 C. L. Rep. 280 (1854). The application of this legal principle, however, is not uniform, as may be thus shown:—

(1) Between landlord and tenant. If the chattels be not let into the soil, they are not fixtures at all, and may be removed at will, like any other species of personal property. When the chattel is connected with the freehold, by being let into the earth, or by being cemented, or otherwise united to some erection attached to the ground, the question arises—when may the tenant remove such fixtures?

The general rule as to annexations made by a tenant during the continuance of his term is the following:—Whenever he has affixed anything to the demised premises during the term he can never again sever it without his landlord's consent; the property, by being annexed to the land, immediately belongs to the freeholder, and a tenant, by making it a part of the freehold, is considered to have abandoned all future right to it, so that it would be waste in him to remove it afterwards; it therefore falls in with his term, and comes to the reversioner as part of the land. But a tenant may so construct the erections, that they shall not be deemed fixtures; thus, if he erect even buildings—as barns, granaries, sheds, and mills—upon blocks, rollers, pattens, pillars, or plates, resting on brickwork, they may be removed; for unless they be affixed to the freehold, by being let into it, or are, by means of rails, mortar, or the like, united to it, they remain merely moveable chattels.

The exceptions to the above rules are three :

(a) In favour of trade. A tenant may remove such things which he has fixed to the freehold for purposes of trade or manufacture, if the removal causes no material injury to the estate: furnaces, coppers, brewing-vessels, fixed vats, salt pans, and the like; machinery in breweries, collieries, and mills, such as steam-engines, cider mills, etc.; buildings for trade, as a varnish-house, built on plates laid on brickwork, and a shed called a Dutch barn, formed of uprights rising from a foundation of brick. (β) For agricultural purposes. By 14 & 15 Vict. c. 25, s. 3, if any tenant of a farm or land shall, after the passing of the act [24th of July, 1851], with the consent in writing of the landlord, at his own cost, erect any farm building, detached or otherwise, or put up any other building, engine, or machinery, either for agricultural purposes, or for the purposes of trade and agriculture (which shall not have been erected or put up in pursuance of some obligation in that behalf), all such buildings, etc., shall be the property of the tenant, and removable by him, though consisting of separate buildings, although built in or permanently fixed to the soil, so that the removal do not injure the land or buildings of the landlord, or so that the tenant put the same in like or as good condition as before. But no tenant shall be entitled to remove any such thing without giving the landlord one month's notice in writing of his intention; and thereupon the landlord, or agent, may elect to purchase any of the things so proposed to be removed; the value to be ascertained by two referees, one to be chosen by each party, or by an umpire to be named by such referees, and to be paid or allowed in account by the landlord. In somewhat similar terms, the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 92, s. 53, gives the tenant an absolute property in all fixtures affixed by him to his holding, but this latter act does not require, except in the case of steam-engines, that the fixture should have been erected with the consent of the landlord. (γ) For ornament and convenience. The following are removable:—Hangings, tapestry, and pier-glasses, whether nailed to the walls or panels, or put up in lieu of panels; marble or other ornamental chimney-pieces; marble slabs, window blinds; wainscot fixed to the walls by screws; grates, ranges, and stoves, although fixed in brickwork; iron backs to chimneys; beds fastened to the walls or ceiling; fixed tables, furnaces, and coppers, mash-tubs, and fixed water-tubs; coffee and malt-mills; cupboards fixed with holdfasts; clock cases, iron ovens, and the like; provided the separation occasion but little or no damage. The fixtures must be moved before the tenant's term or interest expires, unless in the case of a strict tenancy at will, when the tenant may be allowed a reasonable time after his tenancy, if his interest were not terminated by his own act.—Woodf. Land. and Ten., 12th ed., 594 et seq.

(2) Between the heir and the personal representative of the terre-tenant. Though the fixtures will generally pass with the freehold to the heir, yet such of them as are put up for ornament, domestic use, or trade, devolve to the personal representative, provided they can be easily removed, and are not essential to the enjoyment of the inheritance.

(3) Between the tenant of a particular estate and the remainder-man or reversioner, a similar rule applies as in the last case, though the right is more favourably construed.

The larceny of fixtures is specially punishable by the Larceny Act, 1861, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 74.

Flaco, a place covered with standing water.

Flagrant necessity, a case of urgency rendering lawful an otherwise illegal act, as an assault to remove a man from impending danger.

Flagrante delicto (in the very act of committing the crime).

Flecta, a feathered or fleet arrow.—Cowel.

Fledwite, or Flightwite [fr. flyth, Sax., flight, and wite, punishment], a discharge from amerciaments, where a person having been a fugitive came to the peace of our lord the king, of his own accord, or with license.

Fleet [fr. fleet, Sax., an estuary], a place where the tide flows, a creek, or inlet of water, hence Northfleet, Purfleet; also a company of ships or navy; also a prison in London (so called from a river or ditch formerly in its vicinity), now abolished by 5 & 6 Vict. c. 22.

Fleet-books. The books of the old Fleet prison are not, it is said, admissible in evidence to prove a marriage, for they are not made under public authority. But perhaps on a question of pedigree, they are evidence to show the name by which a woman passed when she was married there. These books are now deposited in the office of the Registrar-General, pursuant to the Act of 3 & 4 Vict. c. 92, ss. 6, 20. They contain the original entries of marriages solemnized in the Fleet prison from 1686 to 1754.—Taylor on Evid. s. 1430.

Flem [fr. flaen, Sax., to kill], an outlaw.

Flemene frit, Flemenens frinthe, Flymena frynthe, the reception or relief of a fugitive or outlaw.—Jacob.

Flemeswite, the possession of the goods of fugitives.—Fleta, lib. 1, cxlvii.

Flet, house; home.—Cowel.

Fleta, seu Commentarius Juris Anglicani, a treatise upon the whole law, as it stood at the time this author wrote, which serves as an appendix, and often as a commentary, to Bracton. The author was wholly an imitator.

The book was written after the thirteenth year of Edward I., and not much later. The occasion or the title of it is given by the author himself, who says it was written during his confinement in the Fleet prison. From that circumstance it has been conjectured that he might be one of those lawyers who, for malpractice in their office as judges, were punished with imprisonment and pecuniary penalties.—2 Reeves, p. 279.

Fletwit or Flitwit. See FLEDWITE.

Flichwite, a fine on account of brawls and quarrels.—Spelm.

Flit, treason.

Floating capital. Capital retained for the purpose of meeting current expenditure.

Floor of the court. The part of the court between the judges and the first row of counsel. Parties who appear in person stand there.

Florin, a coin of the value of two shillings.

Flotages, such things as by accident swim on the top of great rivers.—Cowel.

Flotsam, or Floatsam, goods floating upon the sea which belong to the Crown, unless claimed by the true owners thereof within a year and a day.—5 Co. Rep. 106 b.; 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107, s. 76; and 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, ss. 499, 500. See JETSAM.

Flumina et portus publica sunt, ideoque jus piscandi omnibus commune est. (Rivers and ports are public, therefore the right of fishing is common to all.)

Fly for it. On a criminal trial in former times, it was usual after a verdict of not guilty to inquire also, 'Did he fly for it?' This practice was abolished by the 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 5.

Flyma, a runaway; fugitive; one escaped from justice, or who has no 'hlaford'.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Flyman-frymth, the offence of harbouring a fugitive, the penalty attached to which was one of the rights of the Crown.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

F. N. B., Fitzherbert's Natura Brevium. See FITZHERBERT.

F. O. B., free on board, a term frequently inserted in contracts for the sale of goods to be conveyed by ship, meaning that the cost of shipping will be paid by the buyer. When goods are so sold in London the buyer is considered as the shipper, and the goods when shipped are at his risk. See Cowas-Jee v. Thompson, 5 Moore, P. C. C. 165; Browne v. Hare, 3 H. & N. 484, and 4 Ibid. 822; Green v. Sichel, 29 L. J. (C. P.) 213.

Focage, housebote, firebote.—Cowel.

Focale, firewood.—Cowel.

Fodder, food for horses or cattle; (2) among the Feudists, a prerogative of the prince to be provided with corn, etc., for his horses by his subjects in his wars.

Fodertorium, provisions to be paid by custom to the royal purveyors.—Cowel.

Fœdus, a league or compact.

Fœmina viro co-operta (a married woman).

Fœminæ non sunt capaces de publicis officiis. Jenk. Cent. 237.—(Women are not admissible to public offices.) But see WOMAN.

Fœneration, the act of putting out money to usury.

Fœnus nauticum (nautical usury), a contract for the repayment of money borrowed, not on the ship and goods only, but on the mere hazard of the voyage itself, with a condition to be repaid with extraordinary interest.

Fœsa, grass; herbage.—Mon. Angl. tom. 2, p. 506.

Fœticide, criminal abortion. It may be said of all the means resorted to in order to effect this abominable crime that they are uncertain in their operation upon the fœtus, that they always endanger the life of the mother, and that they sometimes destroy the mother without affecting the fœtus. See ABORTION.

Fœtus, a babe in the womb.

Fogage, fog or rank after-grass, not eaten in summer.—Cowel.

Foiterers, vagabonds.—Blount.

Folc-land, the land of the folk or people. It was the property of the community. It might be occupied in common or possessed in severalty: and in the latter case, it was probably parcelled out to individuals in the folc-gemot or court of the district; and the grant sanctioned by the freemen who were there present. But, while it continued to be folc-land, it could not be alienated in perpetuity; and therefore, on the expiration of the term for which it had been granted, it reverted to the community, and was again distributed by the same authority. Spelman describes folc-land as terra popularis quæ jure communi possidetur—sine scripto (Gloss. voce Folcland). In another place he distinguishes it accurately from bocland: Prædia Saxones duplici titulo possidebant: vel scripti auctoritate, quod bocland vocabant, vel populi testimonio, quod folcland dixerent (Ib., voce Bocland).

Folcland was subject to many burthens and exactions from which bocland was exempt. The possessors of folcland were bound to assist in the reparation of royal villis and other public works. They were liable to have travellers and others quartered on them. They were required to give hospitality to kings and great men in their progresses through the country, to furnish carriages and horses to them and to their messengers and servants, and those who had charge of their hawks, horses, and hounds. From these burthens the lands were liberated, when converted by charter into bocland. See Allen's Inquiry into the Rise and Progress of the Royal Prerogative in England, 143—149.

Folc-mote, or Folk-mote [fr. folk, Sax., people, and mote, meeting], a general assembly of the people to consider of and order matters concerning the commonwealth; also any kind of popular or public meeting.—Somner; Spelm.; Brady's Glos. 48; Termes de la Ley.

Folc-right, or Folk-right, the jus commune, or common law, mentioned in the laws of King Edward the Elder, declaring the same equal right, law, or justice to be due to persons of all degrees.

Foldage, and Foldcourse. See FALDAGE.

Folgarii, menial servants, followers.—Bracton.

Folgere, a freeman, who has no house or dwelling of his own, but is the follower or retainer of another (heorthfest), for whom he performs certain predial services.—Angl. Inst. Eng.

Folgoth, official dignity.

Folio (abbrev. fol.), a certain number of words; in conveyances, etc., amounting to seventy-two, and in parliamentary proceedings to ninety. (2) In printing, the figure at the top or bottom of a page. (3) The largest size of a book.

Folkland. See FOLCLAND.

Food. See ADULTERATION.

Foot of a fine, the conclusion of it, including the whole matter, and reciting the parties, day, year, and place, and before whom it was acknowledged or levied.

Foot-geld, an amercement for not expediting or cutting out the balls of dogs' feet in the forest.—Mamv. p. i. p. 86.

Forage, hay and straw for horses, particularly in the army.—Jacob.

Foragium, straw when the corn is thrashed out.—Cowel.

Forbalka, a balk or ridge of land lying forward or next to the highway.—Old Records.

Forbannitus, a pirate.—Leg. Ripuar.

Forbarre, to deprive one of a thing for ever.—Cowel.

Forbatudus, the aggressor slain in combat.—Jacob.

Forbes Mackenzie Act, 16 & 17 Vict. c. 67, for the better regulation of public-houses in Scotland, of which the best known provision is that for entirely closing them on Sunday, amending 9 Geo. IV. c. 58, and amended by 25 & 26 Vict. c. 35.

Force, unlawful violence. It is either simple, as entering upon another's possession, without doing any other unlawful act; compound, when some other violence is committed, which of itself alone is criminal; or implied, as is every trespass, rescous, or disseisin.

All force is contrary to law; it is, therefore, lawful to repel force by force; quod alias bonum et justum est, si per vim vel fraudem petatur, malum et injustum est. (That which is otherwise good and just, if it be obtained by force or fraud, is bad and unjust.)—3 Rep. 78.

Force and arms [vi et armis, Lat.], words usually inserted in an indictment, though not absolutely necessary.—14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 24. They were also formally inserted in every declaration for trespass, in order to give the Court of Common Pleas or Exchequer jurisdiction, but were rendered unnecessary by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, 15 & 16 Vict. c. 76, s. 49.

Forcible Detainer, refusing to restore another's goods, after sufficient amends tendered, the original taking having been lawful; for which injury the remedy usually resorted to was trover, q. v. But if the original taking were unlawful, it is a criminal offence against the public peace, and a misdemeanour, punishable by imprisonment and ransom at the pleasure of the crown.—4 Bl. Com. 148.

Forcible entry, a taking possession with a strong hand and with violence, which is both a civil and a criminal injury. The civil injury is remedied by immediate restitution of the ejected possessor (not by action for damages; see Beddall v. Maitland, 17 Ch. D. 174), the criminal injury, being a breach of the peace, is punished by a fine.—See 5 Rich. II. st. 1, c. 7; 15 Rich. II. c. 2; 8 Hen. VI. c. 9; and 3 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 243.

Forda, a ford or shallow in a river.—Cowel.

Fordol [fr. fore, Sax., before, and dæle, a portion], a butt or headland, jutting out upon other land.—Cowel.

Foreheapum, præ-emption, forestalling the market.—Jacob.

Foreclosure. A mortgagee, or any person claiming an interest in the mortgage under him, can compel the mortgagor, after breach of the condition, to elect either to redeem the pledge, or that his equity of redemption be extinguished.

The Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41, s. 25, repealing and replacing 15 & 16 Vict. c. 86, s. 48, empowers either mortgagor or mortgagee to obtain an order for sale instead of redemption.

The utmost indulgence is extended to the mortgagor in enabling him to pay, so as to prevent an absolute foreclosure; the time fixed has been extended four times, although the third was expressed to be peremptory, there being a fair prospect that the mortgagor would be able to obtain the money. Some ground must be assigned for enlarging the time, and it is done only on the terms of paying the interest and costs already certified.

A decree for foreclosure against an infant defendant gives the infant a day to show cause within six months after attaining majority; but the only cause that can be shown is error in the decree, for he may neither re-open the account nor redeem the mortgage.—2 Wh. & Tud., L. C., 1056—1063. As to the jurisdiction of the county courts in suits for foreclosure, see 28 & 29 Vict. c. 99, s. 1.

To obtain a foreclosure an action must be brought in the Chancery Division of the High Court (Jud. Act, 1873, s. 34). The procedure and decree will probably be similar to that used in a foreclosure suit under the former practice. For forms of pleadings, see Jud. Act, 1875, App. C., No. 14.

Foregift, a premium for a lease, frequently forbidden to be taken for an ecclesiastical lease; see, e.g., 5 & 6 Vict. c. 108, s. 30.

Foregoers, royal purveyors.—26 Ed. III. c. 5.

Fore-hand Rent, rent payable in advance.

Foreign attachment, a custom which prevails in the city of London, whereby a debt owing to a defendant sued in the Court of the Mayor or Sheriff, may be attached in the hands of the debtor. The custom was certified by the Recorder of London in the reign of Edward IV. to be, that if a plaintiff be affirmed in London before, etc., against any person, and it be returned nihil, if the plaintiff will surmise that another person within the city is a debtor to the defendant in any sum, he shall have garnishment against him to warn him to come in and answer whether he be indebted in the manner alleged; and if he comes and does not deny the debt, it shall be attached in his hands, and after four defaults recorded on the part of the defendant such person shall find new surety to the plaintiff for the said debt, and judgment shall be that the plaintiff shall have judgment against him, and that he shall be quit against the other after execution sued out by the plaintiff. Consult Brandon on Foreign Attachment, and see Cox v. Lord Mayor of London, L. R., 2 H. L. 239; Mayor of London v. London Joint Stock Bank, 6 App. Cas. 393, which exempts corporations from the process, and decides that fictional summonses render it invalid.

Foreign Bill of Exchange, a bill which is not an inland bill. See INLAND BILL. Before 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, a bill drawn in one part of the United Kingdom, as England, on a person in another part, as Ireland or Scotland, was deemed a foreign bill; but this was altered by s. 7 of that act, of which the effect is reproduced by s. 4 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. By the law of merchants, the holder of a foreign bill is obliged to protest it for non-payment, and also for non-acceptance, whenever notice of such non-acceptance is necessary. As to stamp duty on foreign bills drawn, negotiated, or presented for payment in the United Kingdom, see 33 & 34 Vict. c. 97, s. 51. See Chitty, Byles, Bayley, or Chalmers on Bills.

Foreign bought and sold, a custom in London, which, being found prejudicial to sellers of cattle in Smithfield, was abolished.

Foreign Courts. The proceedings of a foreign court are proved by copies under the seal of such court, proof being given that the seal affixed is the seal of such court. If a court have no seal, then proof by an exemplification under the hand of the chief judge of the court (his handwriting being proved) will be received.

Foreign domicile. See DOMICILE.

Foreign Enlistment Act, 59 Geo. III. c. 69, as to which see Burton v. Pinkerton, L. R., 2 Ex. 340, and the proclamation gazetted May 14, 1860, as to the non-interference of British subjects in the war between the States of America, repealed and replaced by 'The Foreign Enlistment Act, 1870' (33 & 34 Vict. c. 90), passed 'to regulate the conduct of Her Majesty's subjects during the existence of hostilities between foreign states with which Her Majesty is at peace.' By its provision is made, inter alia, for the prevention of illegal enlistment, illegal shipbuilding, and illegal expeditions, etc.

Foreign Jurisdiction Acts. 6 & 7 Vict. c. 94; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 116; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 87; 38 & 39 Vict. c. 85; and 41 & 42 Vict. c. 67. These acts regulate the exercise by the Crown of the powers and jurisdiction acquired by it (whether by treaty, grant, usage, sufferance, or otherwise), in countries out of the dominions of the British Crown.

Foreign law is a question of fact. See LAW, QUESTIONS OF, and SKILLED WITNESS. By 24 Vict. c. 11, the High Court of Justice may remit a case with queries to foreign courts of the countries with which a convention shall have been entered into for the purpose by the British Crown for ascertainment of the foreign law, and may apply the opinion obtained to the facts of the case. But no convention having been in fact entered into (see Chitty's Statutes, vol. ii., p. 827, and note), this act is as yet inoperative.

Foreign office, the department of State through which the Sovereign communicates with foreign powers; a Secretary of State is at its head. Till the middle of the last century, the functions of a Secretary of State as to foreign and home questions were not disunited.

Foreign plea, a plea objecting to the jurisdiction of a judge, on the ground that he had not cognizance of the subject-matter of the suit.—Cowel.

Foreign seamen. As to apprehension of, for deserting their ships, see 15 & 16 Vict. c. 26.

Foreigners, aliens. They are amenable to our laws whilst residing amongst us, and it is no defence for a foreigner charged with a crime committed in England, that he did not know he was doing wrong, the act not being criminal in his own country.—R. v. Esop, 7 C. & P. 456. As to the enlistment of foreigners in Her Majesty's forces, see Army Act, 1881, s. 95, which allows such enlistment by the consent of a Secretary of State 'in the proportion of one alien to every fifty British subjects,' but this does not restrict negroes. As to naturalization, and the right of aliens to hold property, see ALIENS.

Forejudge [fr. forisjudicatio, Lat.], a judgment whereby a person is deprived of, or put by, the thing in question. To be fore-judged the Court is when an officer or attorney of any Court is expelled the same for some offence, or for not appearing to an action.

Foreman, the presiding member of a jury.

Forensic, belonging to courts of justice.

Forensic medicine, the science which applies the principles and practice of the different branches of medicine to the elucidation of doubtful questions in a court of justice. It comprehends, in a more extensive sense, medical police, or those medical precepts which may prove useful to the legislature or the magistracy. This, science is also termed medical jurisprudence, legal medicine, and state medicine. Consult the works of Taylor, Guy, Beck, or Tidy on the subject.

Foreschoke [derelictum, Lat.], forsaken; disavowed.—10 Ed. II. c. 1.

Forest [fr. foresta, Ital.], an incorporeal hereditament, being the right or franchise of keeping, for the purpose of venery and hunting, the wild beasts and fowls of forest, chase, park, and warren (which means all animals pursued in field sports), in a certain territory or precinct of woody ground and pasture set apart for the purpose, with laws and officers of its own, established for protection of the game.—Manv. For. Laws.

The Charta de Foresta, confirmed in parliament, 9 Hen. III., disafforested many forests unlawfully made. Some of the royal forests still exist, as New Forest in Hampshire, Windsor, and Richmond. A forest is, in general, a royal possession, though it is capable of being vested in a subject. A forest is a right which the owner thereof (whether sovereign or subject) may have either in his own lands or the lands of another, differing from other incorporeal hereditaments, which are rights exercised over another's lands. The owner of a forest is also considered (notwithstanding the general rule, that title cannot be made to things ferre nature) as having a qualified property in the wild animals of chase and venery there found, as long as they continue therein.—1 Steph. Com.

Forest Courts, fallen into absolute desuetude. They were instituted for the government of the royal forests in different parts of the kingdom, and for the punishment of all injuries done to the deer or venison, to the vert or greensward, and to the covert in which such deer were lodged. They consisted of the Courts of attachments, regard, sweinmote, and justice-seat. The Court of attachments, woodmote, or forty days' Court, was held before the verderors of the forest once in every forty days, to inquire into all offences against vert and venison. The Court of reward, or survey of dogs, held every third year, for the expeditation of mastiffs. The Court of sweinemote, held before the verderors thrice in every year, the swains or freeholders within the forest composing the jury. It inquired into the oppressions and grievances committed by the officers of the forest, and tried presentments certified from the Court of attachments against offences in vert and venison. The Court of justice-seat, held before the chief itinerant judge, or his deputy, to hear and determine all trespasses within the forest, and claims of franchise, etc., therein arising. This was a Court of Record; but since the Revolution, in 1688, the forest laws have fallen into total disuse.—3 Steph. Com.

Forestage, duty or tribute payable to the king's foresters.—Cowel.

Forestalling the market, buying up merchandise on its way to market, or dissuading persons to bring their goods there, or persuading them to enhance the price when there. It was deemed an offence against public trade, but the statutes prohibiting it were repealed by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 24.—3 Inst. 196.

Forethought felony. See MURDER.

Forfang, or Forfeng [fr. fore, Sax., before, and fangen, to buy], the taking of provisions from any person in fairs or markets before the royal purveyors were served with necessities for the sovereign.—Cowel. Also the seizing and rescuing of stolen or strayed cattle from the hands of a thief, or of those having illegal possession of it; also the reward fixed for such rescue.

Forfeiture, a penalty for an offence or unlawful act, or for some wilful omission of a tenant of property, whereby he loses it, together with his title, which devolves upon others.

Forfeiture resulted from the following circumstances:—(1) Treason, misprision of treason, felony, murder, self-murder, pre-munire, and striking or threatening a judge. But 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, enacted that no conviction, etc., for treason or felony, or felo-de-se, shall cause any forfeiture except as consequent on outlawry. The act also makes provision for the appointment by the Crown of administrators of the property of convicts.

(2) Conveyance contrary to law, as transferring a freehold to an alien, who formerly could take lands, but could not hold them; wherefore upon office found the Crown was entitled to the land. But 33 & 34 Vict. c. 14 (subject to certain provisoes), enables aliens to hold real and personal property. See ALIEN.

(3) Alienation in mortmain, or to any kind of corporation (which was supposed to hold property in a dead hand locked up from all change or transfer), was prohibited under pain of forfeiture to the lord. The Crown may, however, grant a license, which will avoid this forfeiture.—7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 37; 3 & 4 Vict. c. 60; and 6 & 7 Vict. c. 37, s. 12.

(4) Disclaimer, which is a tenant's denial of his landlord's title, by setting up a title either in himself or any other person. This operates as a forfeiture of all interest in such tenant.

(5) Breaches of covenants or conditions contained in a lease or other instrument, when it is stipulated that they shall occasion forfeiture; a forfeiture, under these circumstances, may be waived by the person entitled to take advantage of it, by express declaration, or by any act inconsistent with it, or admitting a continuing tenancy, as by receiving rent accrued due since the breach, or distraining for the same, or by subsequently encouraging the tenant to make subsequent improvements; but he must have fully known of the act of forfeiture at the time of waiver, otherwise it will be no waiver.

Relief against forfeiture of the lease, where the breach was by non-payment of rent, was granted by Courts of Equity from very early times, and is now grantable by the High Court under the C. L. P. Act, 1860. Where the breach was by not insuring, relief was granted under 22 & 23 Vict. c. 35, and the C. L. P. Act, 1860, but only on the conditions that no loss had happened, that an insurance was on foot at the time of the application for the relief, and that the relief should not be granted again. Except as above, and except in rare cases of accident or surprise, no relief was grantable, however trivial the breach might have been, and however great might be the improved value of the demised premises, until the Conveyancing, etc., Act, 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41 (which repeals the prior enactments as to relief against forfeiture for non-insurance, but leaves standing those as to forfeiture for non-payment of rent), by s. 14 conferred on the Chancery Division of the High Court a general power to relieve against forfeiture. By this section, before proceeding to enforce a forfeiture, the lessor must serve on the lessee a notice requiring the lessee to pay compensation for the breach, and also remedy it if it be capable of remedy. If the parties fail to come to terms, and the lessor seek to enforce the forfeiture, the lessee may apply to the Court, which may grant or refuse relief as it thinks fit. The section does not apply to a covenant against assigning, or to a condition for forfeiture upon bankruptcy, or in the case of a mining lease, to a covenant to allow the lessor to inspect books.

It is very material to observe that the section is (1) retrospective, and (2) incapable of being nullified by any stipulation of the parties.

(6) Waste. The Statute of Gloucester, 6 Ed. I. c. 5, seems to have this operation; but the better opinion is that the forfeiture was abolished along with the writ of waste by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36, and at all events it is never insisted on.

(7) Breach of copyhold customs.

Besides the grounds of forfeiture mentioned above, there are two, which obtain in reference to ecclesiastical property, viz.: (1) lapse; and (2) simony.

As to forfeitures on clandestine marriages, see 4 Geo. IV. c. 76, ss. 23—25; 6 & 7 Wm. IV. c. 85, s. 43; and 19 & 20 Vict. c. 119, s. 19.

Forfeiture of Marriage, an ancient writ which lay against him who, holding by knight's service, and being under age and unmarried, refused to marry the woman whom the lord offered him without disparagement, and married another.—F. N. B. 141; Reg. Orig. 163.

Forgabulum, or Forgavel, a quit-rent; a small reserved rent in money.—Jacob.

Forgery [fr. forger, Fr.; or finjo, Lat.], the crimen falsi, or the false making or alteration of an instrument, which purports on the face of it to be good and valid for the purposes for which it was created, with a design to defraud.

Forgery at common law was a misdemeanour, but most forgeries have been by statute made felonious. Many of these statutes were consolidated by 11 Geo. IV. and 1 Wm. IV. c. 66, now repealed, and replaced by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 98. See as to the forgery of the Great Seal, Privy Seal, or Privy Signet, the Sign Manual, the Seals of Scotland, or the Great Seal of Ireland (s. 1); transfers of stock, etc., and powers of attorney relating thereto, or attestation to such powers (ss. 2, 4); false entries in books of the public funds (s. 5); clerks of banks making out false dividend warrants (s. 6); forgery of India bonds (s. 7); of Exchequer bills, bonds, debentures, etc. (s. 8); of bank notes, bank bills, etc. (s. 12); of deeds, bonds, wills, bills of exchange or promissory notes, orders, or receipts, etc., for money or goods (ss. 20—23); of debentures (s. 26); of proceedings of Courts of Record, copies of certificates, process of courts not of record, and instruments made evidence by statute (ss. 27, 28, 29); of court rolls (s. 30); of registers of deeds (s. 31); of orders of justices, recognizances, affidavits, etc. (s. 32); of name of accountant-general or of any officer of any court, or of officers of Banks of England and Ireland (s. 33); of marriage licenses or certificates (s. 35); of registers of births, marriages, deaths, or burials (ss. 36, 37). The statute also provides for the punishment of numerous offences which, though not amounting to forgery, facilitate, or are steps towards the commission of, that crime, or are of a somewhat similar nature, e.g., the false personation of owners of stock, etc., and so transferring stock or receiving dividends (s. 3); making plates in imitation of those used for Exchequer bills, etc. (s. 9); making paper in imitation of that used for Exchequer bills (s. 10); having in possession paper, plate, dies, etc., used for Exchequer bills (s. 11); purchasing or receiving forged bank notes, bank bills, etc. (s. 13); making or having in possession moulds for making paper, or paper with certain marks thereon similar to those on the notes of the Banks of England or Ireland, or of other banks (ss. 14, 15, 18); engraving on plates anything purporting to be a note or part of a note of such banks, or any words, figures, etc., resembling the words, figures, etc., upon such notes, or having in possession such plates (ss. 16, 17); engraving on plates, notes, or parts of notes, purporting to be the notes, etc., of foreign states, or having in possession such plates, or uttering or having impressions of such plates (s. 19); drawing, making, accepting, endorsing, or signing bills, notes, and receipts, etc., without authority (s. 24); obliterating crossings on cheques (s. 25); falsely acknowledging recognizances (s. 34); demanding property on forged instruments (s. 38).

It is not necessary to set forth a copy or a fac simile of the forged instrument in the indictment, a description of it being sufficient. Nor to allege or prove an intent to defraud a particular person.—24 & 25 Vict. c. 98, ss. 42, 44. Capital punishment for forgery is abolished, and the punishment is penal servitude, varying from life to five years, or imprisonment for not more than two years. Consult 2 Russell on Crimes.

Forinsecum manerium, that part of a manor which lies without the town, and is not included within the liberties of it.—Paroch. Antiq. 351.

Forinsecum servitium, the payment of extraordinary aid.—Ken. Glos.

Forinsecus, outlawed, or on the outside.

Forisbanitus, banished.—Mat. Par. 1245.

Forisfacere, i.e., extra legem seu consuetudinem facere. Co. Litt. 59.—(Forisfacere, i.e., to do something beyond law or custom.)

Forisfactura, forfeit.

Forisfiliation. 'A son was said to be forisfiliated' (says Reeves, i. 110), 'if his father assigned him part of his land and gave him seisin thereof, . . . and the son expressed himself satisfied with such portion.'

Forler-land, land in the diocese of Hereford, which had a peculiar custom attached to it, but which has been long since disused, although the name is retained.—But. Surv. 56.

Form, the legal exterior of a document apart from the substance. Special demurrers, now abolished, were objections to the pleadings as bad in form.

Forma legalis, forma essentialis. 10 Co. 100. (Legal form is essential form.)

Forma non observata infertur annullatio actus. 12 Co. 7.—(Form not being observed a nullity of the act is inferred.)

Forma pauperis, suing in. See IN FORMA PAUPERIS.

Formalities, robes worn by the magistrates of a city or corporation, etc., on solemn occasions.—Encyc. Lond.

Formedon, a writ in the nature of a writ of right, which was the remedy for a tenant-in-tail on a discontinuance. It was of three kinds: (1) in descender; (2) in remainder; (3) in reverter.—3 Reeves, 4. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 36.

Formella, a certain weight of above 70 lb., mentioned in 51 Henry III.—Cowel.

Formulary, a form, a precedent.

Fornagium [fr. fournage, Fr.], the fee taken by a lord of his tenant, who was bound to bake in the lord's common oven (in furno domini); or for a commission to use his own.—Plac. Parl. 18 Edw. 1.

Fornication [fr. fornix, a brothel, Lat.], the intercourse of a man with a prostitute; the act of incontinency in single persons; if either party be married, it is adultery. During the Commonwealth, a second offence was made felony without benefit of clergy.—Scob. 121. After the Restoration the offence was left to be dealt with by the spiritual court according to the rules of the canon law. Proceedings under the canon law for incontinency have fallen into desuetude.—4 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 280. See PROSTITUTE.

Forprise, an exception, or reservation; also an exaction; or taking beforehand.—Cowel.

Forschel, a strip of land lying next to the highway.

Forschoke, forsaken. See FORESCHOKE.

Forses [catatude, Lat.], waterfalls.—Cam. Brit.

Forspeaker, an attorney or advocate in a cause.—Blount.

For-speca, For-spreca, prolocutor, paranympus.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Forstellarius est pauperum depressor et totius communitatis et patrie publicus inimicus. 3 Inst. 196.—(A forestaller is an oppressor of the poor, and a public enemy of the whole community and country.) See FORESTALLING THE MARKET.

Fortalice, a fortress or place of strength, which anciently did not pass without a special grant.—11 Hen. VII. c. 18.

Forthcoming, action of, a process for effectuating the arrestment (attachment) of debts due to one's debtor.—Scotch Law; see 39 & 40 Vict. c. 70, s. 47.

Forthwith, when a defendant is ordered to plead forthwith, he must plead within twenty-four hours. When a statute enacts that an act is to be done 'forthwith,' it means that the act is to be done within a reasonable time.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac., 13th ed., 175.

Fortia, power, dominion, or jurisdiction.—Leg. Hen. I. c. 29.

Fortifications. Acts for defraying the expenses of constructing fortifications for the protection of the Royal Arsenals and Dockyards, and the ports of Dover and Portland, and of erecting a central arsenal.—23 & 24 Vict. c. 109, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 78. See also 23 & 24 Vict. c. 112, 'An Act to make better provision for acquiring lands for the defences of the realm.' See also 26 & 27 Vict. c. 80; 27 & 28 Vict. cc. 89, 109; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 61, amended by 30 & 31 Vict. cc. 24, 145; 32 & 33 Vict. c. 76. See DEFENCE ACTS.

Fortility, a fortified place; a castle; a bulwark.—Cowel; 11 Hen. VII. c. 18.

Fortior est custodia legis quam hominis. 2 Rol. Rep. 325.—(The custody of the law is stronger than that of man.)

Fortior et æquior est dispositio legis quam hominis. Co. Litt. 234.—(The disposition of the law is stronger and more just than that of man.)

Fortlett, a place or port of some strength; a little fort.—O. N. B. 45.

Fortuna, treasure-trove.—Jacob.

Fortunam faciunt iudicem. Co. Litt. 167.—(They make fortune a judge.)

Fortune-tellers, persons pretending or professing to tell fortunes, are punishable as rogues and vagabonds, under 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, s. 4. See further GYPSIES, and VAGRANT.

Fortunium, a tournament or fighting with spears; and an appeal to fortune therein.—Mat. Par. 1241.

Forty-days' Court, the court of attachment in forests, or wood-mote court. See FOREST.

Forum, a court; the court to the jurisdiction of which a party is liable. Forum competens, a court having jurisdiction over the suit; forum incompetens, a court not having such jurisdiction.

Forum originis [Lat.], the court of the country of a man's domicile by birth.

Forwarding Merchant, one who receives and forwards goods, taking upon himself the expenses of transportation, for which he receives a compensation from the owners, having no concern in the vessels or waggons by which they are transported, and no interest in the freight, and not being deemed a common carrier; but a mere warehouseman and agent.—Story's Bailments, 509.

Fossa, a ditch full of water, wherein women committing felony were drowned; also a grave. See FURCA.

Fossagium, the duty levied on the inhabitants for repairing the moat or ditch round a fortified town.

Fossway [fr. fossus, Lat., digged], one of the four ancient Roman ways through England. Trevisa describes it thus: 'The first and gretest of the foure weyes is called fosse, and stretches oute of the southe into the north, and begynneth from the corner of Cornewaille, and passeth forth by Devenshyre, by Somersete, and forth besides Tetbury, upon Cotteswold, beside Coventre, unto Leycester, and so forth, by wylde pleynes towards Newerke, and endeth at Lincoln.'—Polychron, l. 1, c. xiv.

Fosterland, lands allotted for the maintenance of a person.—Cowel.

Fosterlean, the remuneration fixed for the rearing of a foster-child; also the jointure of a wife.—Jacob.

Foujdar, Fojedar, Phousdar, Fogedar, under the Mogul government a magistrate of the police over a large district, who took cognizance of all criminal matters within his jurisdiction, and sometimes was employed as receiver-general of the revenues.—Indian.

Foujdarry-court, a tribunal for administering criminal law.—Indian.

Foundation, the founding or building of a college or hospital. The incorporation of a college or hospital is the foundation; and he who endows it with land or other property is the founder.

Foundling-hospitals, charitable institutions which exist in most countries for taking care of infants forsaken by their parents, such being generally the offspring of illegal connections. The Foundling Hospital Act is the 13 Geo. II. c. 29.

Fourcher, to put off, or delay an action.—Termes de la Ley.

Fourching, the act of delaying legal proceedings.—Termes de la Ley.

Four corners, of an instrument; that which is contained on the face of a deed (without any aid from the knowledge of the circumstances under which it is made), is said to be within its four corners, because every deed is still supposed to be written on one entire skin, and so to have but four corners.

Fourierism. A form of Socialism. It purposes that the operations of industry should be carried on by associations of about two thousand members, combining their labour on a district of about a square league in extent, under the guidance of chiefs selected by themselves. In the distribution, a certain minimum is first assigned for the subsistence of every member of the community, whether capable, or not, of labour. The remainder of the produce is shared in certain proportions, to be determined beforehand, among the three elements—labour, capital, and talent. The capital of the community may be owned in unequal shares by different members, who would in that case receive, as in any other joint-stock company, proportional dividends. The claim of each person on the share of the produce apportioned to talent is estimated by the grade or rank which the individual occupies in the several groups of labourers to which he or she belongs; these grades being in all cases conferred by the choice of his or her companions. The remuneration, when received, would not of necessity be expended or enjoyed in common.—1 Mill's Pol. Eco. 260.

Fowls of warren. According to Coke they are the partridge, quail, rail, pheasant, woodcock, mallard, heron, etc. According to Manwood, they are the pheasant and partridge only.—Co. Litt. 233 a; Manw. 95.

Foxhunting upon the land of another is a trespass.—Paul v. Summerhayes, 4 Q. B. D. 9.

Fox's Act, 52 Geo. III. c. 60, which secured to juries, upon the trial of indictments for libel, the right of pronouncing a general verdict of guilty or not guilty upon the whole matter in issue, and no longer bound them to find a verdict of guilty on proof of the publication of the paper charged to be a libel, and of the sense ascribed to it in the indictment. See LIBEL.

Foy [fr. foi, Fr.], faith; allegiance.

Fractiorem diei non recipit lex. Lofft. 572.—The law does not take notice of a portion of a day.) See next title.

Fraction of a day, the law does not recognise, except in cases of necessity, and for the purposes of justice (see Clarke v. Bradlaugh, 8 Q. B. D. 63); when, therefore, a thing is to be done upon one day, all that day is allowed to do it in. An Act of Parliament becomes law as soon as the day on which it is passed commences (Tomlinson app. Bullock, resp. 4 Q. B. D. 230), unless the commencement be expressly postponed; and every minor comes of age on the day preceding the anniversary of his twenty-first birthday, and may act as of full age the first moment of that day.

Fractitium, arable land.—Mon. Angl.

Fractura navium, wreck of shipping at sea.

Franchilanus, a freeman.—Chart. Henry IV.

Franchise, an incorporeal hereditament synonymous with liberty. A royal privilege or branch of the Crown's prerogative subsisting in the hands of a subject. It arises either from royal grants, or from prescription which pre-supposes a grant. The kinds are almost infinite, but the principal are bodies-corporate, the right to hold court-leets, fairs, markets, ferries, forests, chases, parks, warrens, fisheries. The remedy for disturbance is an action.—1 Steph. Com.

Also, the right of voting at an election for a member of parliament. See ELECTION.

Franchise Prisons, abolished by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 22.

Frangienæ, a name anciently applied to foreigners generally.—Jacob. See FRENCHMAN.

Frangenti fidem, fides frangatur eidem.—(Let faith be broken with him who breaketh faith.)

Frank. Members of parliament, peers, etc., formerly had the privilege of franking their letters by autograph. It was abolished upon the introduction of the penny postage by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 96.

Frank-almoigne, free alms. A spiritual tenure whereby religious corporations, aggregate or sole, held lands of the donor to them and their successors for ever. They were discharged of all other except religious services, and the trinoda necessitas. It differs from tenure by divine service, in that the latter required the performance of certain divine services, whereas the former, as its name imports, is free. This tenure is expressly excepted in the 12 Car. II. c. 24, s. 7, and therefore still subsists, in some few instances.—2 Br. & Had. Com. 203.

Frank-bank. See FREE-BENCH.

Frank-chase, a liberty of free chase.

Frank-fee, freehold lands exempted from all services, but not from homage.

Frank-ferm, lands or tenements changed in the nature of the fee by feoffment, etc., out of knight service, for certain yearly acknowledgments.—Britton, c. lxiv.

Frank-fold. See FOLDAGE.

Frank-law, the benefit of the fee and common law of the land.—Crompton Juris. 156.

Franklin, a steward; a bailiff of land.

Frank-marriage [in libero maritaggio, Lat.], a species of entailed estates, now grown out of use, but still capable of subsisting. When tenements are given by one to another, together with a wife, who is a daughter or cousin of the donor, to hold in frank-marriage, the donees shall have the tenements to them and the heirs of their two bodies begotten, i.e., in special tail. For the word frank-marriage, ex vi termini, both creates and limits an inheritance, not only supplying words of descent, but also terms of procreation. The donees are liable to no service except fealty, and a reserved rent would be void, until the fourth degree of consanguinity be past between the issues of the donor and donee, when they were capable by the law of the church of intermarrying.—Litt. s. 19.

Frank-pledge, a surety to the sovereign for the good behaviour of freemen. Living under frank-pledge has been termed living under law.—Fleta, i. 47. See LEET.

Frank-tenement [liberum tenementum, Lat.], a freehold estate.

Frassetum, a wood or wood-ground where ash-trees grow.—Co. Litt. 4 b.

Frater consanguineus, a brother by the father's side, opposed to frater uterinus, the brother by the mother's side.

Frater fratri uterino non succedet in hæreditate paternâ.—(A brother shall not succeed an uterine brother in the paternal inheritance.)

The maxim is now superseded; for by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, s. 9, the half-blood inherit next after any relation in the same degree of the whole blood and his issue, where the common ancestor is a male, and next after the common ancestor where a female, so that the brothers of the half-blood, on the part of the father, inherit next after the sisters of the whole blood on the part of the father and their issue, and the brothers of the half-blood on the part of the mother inherit next after the mother.

Frater nutricius, a bastard brother.

Frater uterinus, a brother by the mother's side, opposed to frater consanguineus.

Fraternia, a fraternity or brotherhood.

Fraternities, bodies corporate.

Fratres conjurati, sworn brothers, or companions for the defence of their sovereign, or for other purposes.—Hoved. 445.

Fratres pyes, certain friars who wore white and black garments.—Walsingham, 124.

Fratriage, a younger brother's inheritance.

Fratricide, the killing of a brother or sister.

Fraud, deceit in defrauding or endeavouring to defraud another of his right, by artful device, contrary to the rule of honesty.

It is impossible to lay down a definition completely comprehending fraud, and no rule can, from the very nature of the subject, be invariable. Fraud is infinite; 'Crescit in orbe dolus'; and were the Courts to prescribe the limits of their equitable relief against fraud, or to define the species of evidence receivable in support of it, their decrees would be continually eluded: to afford complete protection, new principles must be created to meet new species of fraud.

The following ten general rules govern Equity in redressing a fraud :—

(1) The rule of law as to fraud holds good in Equity, that fraud is never to be presumed; it must be proved either expressly, or by necessary implication. Dolum non nisi perspicuis indicibus probari convenit; but in some cases that may be fraud in Equity (where fraud may be established by presumptive evidence) which is not so at Law. Equity will on grounds of public policy declare void transactions which have taken place under circumstances where, from the condition of the parties, and the difficulty which must exist of obtaining positive evidence as to the fairness of the transaction, they are peculiarly open to fraud and undue influence.

(2) An impeached deed cannot be supported by evidence of considerations wholly different from those alleged in it.

(3) A person who enables another to commit a fraud is responsible for its consequences.

(4) A married woman who commits a fraud, renders her property liable to its consequences.

(5) If the principal in a fraud be released, parties who would have been secondarily liable cannot be proceeded against.

(6) A deed cannot be set aside partim for fraud; it must be set aside in toto, and a fraudulent deed will thus be set aside, though innocent persons are interested under it.

(7) Wherever a contract is void, either by a positive law or upon principles of public policy, it cannot be confirmed; but where it is voidable only, a deliberate confirmation by the parties who could have avoided it, will establish its validity.

(8) There is no statute of limitations which bars the remedy from a concealed fraud, since no length of time can sanctify it, but redress should be sought within six years from the knowledge of the facts constituting fraud, or from the time when such knowledge might have been acquired by reasonable diligence; and as to fraud relating to realty, relief will be withheld, if twenty years have been suffered to elapse from the acquisition of its knowledge. But as to concealed fraud, see 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27, s. 26.

(9) The remedy for fraud does not die with the person, but relief may be obtained against the representative of its deceased perpetrator.

(10) Equity admits parol evidence to vary, alter, or explain written instruments on the ground of accident, mistake, or fraud. It is an exception to the rule excluding the reception of verbal evidence against written agreements. But the exception and rule stand upon the same ground of policy—the suppression of fraud and the promotion of good faith.

If an instrument be obtained from persons ignorant of their right, known to the party obtaining the instrument, Equity will relieve, even though no fraud has been practised.

Suppressio veri (suppression of truth), or suggestio falsi (suggestion of falsehood), in conveyances, releases, or agreements, will afford a sufficient ground for setting them aside.

There are a variety of cases where a person standing by, and by silence contributing to a fraud, has been compelled to remedy the mischief his fraudulent silence has occasioned.

There is no case where mere inadequacy of price has been held sufficient to set aside a transaction. A bargain may be hard and unconscionable, and yet valid, unless the inadequacy of price is such as ‘shocks the conscience,’ and amount in itself to conclusive evidence of fraud in the transaction.

A voluntary conveyance (unless obtained by imposition or fraud, as from a person of weak intellect), is good against the party making it, though cancelled, and against all subsequent acts of the donor, whether by deed or will, though the devise be for the payments of debts, for the Court ‘will not loose the fetters the party hath put upon himself; but he must lie down under his own folly.’ But as against purchasers as well of equitable as legal estates for a valuable consideration, even where the purchase was made with notice of the prior settlement, and also as against those who were creditors at the time of the making of it, a voluntary conveyance is void.—27 Eliz. c. 4.

A settlement, however, though voluntary at first, and therefore bad as against creditors and purchasers, may afterwards become good, even against them; as, where the object of the settlement sells to another, or where a father settles land on a daughter, and a person marries her in confidence of such settlement, in either case the settlement may be enforced.

Where deeds are set aside for fraud, they will generally be permitted to stand as a security for what is really due.—Wharton v. May, 5 Ves. 59; 1 Madd. Prin. of Equity, tit. ‘Fraud.’ As to fraud on the Marriage Laws, see Bishop on Marriage. And see the succeeding titles.

See also the Land Transfer Act, 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 87, ss. 98—103.

For the forms of pleadings in an action for fraud, see Jud. Act, 1875, App. C., No. 15.

Fraud constructive, such acts or contracts as, though not originating in any actual evil design or contrivance to perpetrate fraud or injury upon others, yet, by their tendency to deceive or mislead, or to violate public or private confidence, or to injure the public interests, are equally reprehensible with positive fraud, and therefore equally prohibited.

Thus, to prevent injustice and shut out inducement to wrong, certain transactions are held to be fraudulent, as contrary to general policy, or to fixed legal principle, as marriage-brokerage bonds, and contracts in restraint of trade. Other transactions again growing out of a special confidential or fiduciary relation between the parties are watched with especial jealousy, because they afford the means of taking advantage of or exercising undue influence over others: such are transactions between parent and child, attorney and client, principal and agent, or surety, guardian, and ward, trustee and cestui que trust, partners, etc. Others are of a mixed character, combining the ingredients of the preceding, with others of a peculiar nature; but they are chiefly prohibited because they operate as a fraud upon the private rights, interests, duties, or intentions of third parties; or compromise the private interests, rights, or duties of the parties themselves, such as secret composition deeds, voluntary conveyances, etc.—1 St. Eq. Jur. 213.

Frauds, Statute of, 29 Car. II. c. 3 (A.D. 1676). This famous statute is said to have been framed by Sir Matthew Hale, Lord-Keeper, Guilford, and Sir Leoline Jenkins, an eminent civilian. Lord Nottingham used to say of it, that 'every line was worth a subsidy,' and it has been said that at all events the explanation of every line has cost a subsidy, no statute having been the subject of so much litigation. 'This statute,' remarks Mr. Chancellor Kent (2 Com. 494, n (d)), 'carries its influence through the whole body of American jurisprudence, and is in many respects the most comprehensive, salutary, and important legislative regulation on record, affecting the security of private rights.'

The main object of the statute was to take away the facilities for fraud and the temptation to perjury which arose in verbal obligations, the proof of which depended upon unwritten evidence. Its principal enactments are:—Parol conveyances, leases, etc., of land, unless put in writing and signed by the parties making the same, or their agents lawfully authorized by writing, shall have the effect of leases at will only, except in the case of a lease for not more than three years, reserving as a rent two-thirds of the annual value (ss. 1 & 2). Grants and surrenders shall be by deed or writing signed by the party granting or surrendering, or his agents authorized by writing (s. 3).

'No action shall be brought to charge an executor or administrator upon any special promise to answer damages out of his own estate; or to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage, of another person; or to charge any person upon any agreement made upon consideration of marriage; or upon any contract or sale of lands, or any interest in or concerning them; or upon any agreement that is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, is in writing and signed by the party to be charged, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorised' (s. 4). Declarations and creations of trust of lands, and assignments of trusts shall be in writing (s. 9). Lands shall be liable to the judgment, etc., of cestui que trust, and held free from incumbrances of the trustees; and trusts, in fee-simple, shall be assets in the hands of the heirs of the cestui que trust (s. 11). Writs of execution shall bind the property of goods only from the time of their delivery to the sheriff (s. 16).

'No contract for the sale of any goods, wares, and merchandise for the price of 10*l.* or upwards shall be good except the buyer shall accept part of the goods so sold, and actually receive the same, or give something in earnest to bind the bargain or in part of payment, or that some note or memorandum in writing of the said bargain be made and signed by the parties to be charged by the contract, or their agents thereunto lawfully authorized' (s. 17).

Of the above sections the first three (materially altered by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, which requires a deed instead of a writing) and the 4th and 17th are of very great practical importance, and have been the subject of very numerous legal decisions, amongst the chief of which are Birkmyr v. Darnell, 1 Sm. L. C., Eastwood v. Kenyon, 11 A. & E. 438; Wright v. Stavert, 29 L. J. Q. B. 161; Hinde v. Whitehouse, 7 East, 558; Peter v. Compton, 1 Sm. L. C.; Allen v. Bennett, 3 Taunt. 169; and Sharman v. Brandt, L. R., 6 Q. B. 720.

The statute also contained important provisions as to the making, revocation, etc., of wills devising land, and as to nuncupative wills, etc., which have been repealed by the Wills Act, 1 Vict. c. 26.

The 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97, provided that persons acquiring titles to goods before they have been seized or attached under a writ against the seller shall be protected (s. 1); that the consideration for guarantees need not appear by writing (s. 3); and that guarantees to or for a firm shall cease upon a change in the firm, except in special cases (s. 4). Consult Chitty or Addison on Contracts.

Fraudulent conveyances, Statutes against, 13 Eliz. c. 5 (A.D. 1570), made perpetual by 29 Eliz. c. 5. Every conveyance of lands, hereditaments, goods, and chattels, or of any lease, rent, common, or other profit or charge, out of lands, etc., by writing or otherwise, and every bond, suit, judgment, and execution to be made with the intent to defraud creditors or others of their actions, suits, debts, accounts, damages, penalties, forfeitures, heriots, mortuaries, and reliefs, shall be deemed (only as against that person, his heirs, executors, administrators, and assigns, whose actions, etc., are or shall be any way disturbed, delayed, or defrauded) to be utterly void.

The 27 Eliz. c. 4, s. 2, made perpetual by 39 Eliz. c. 18, enacts that every conveyance of lands, tenements, or hereditaments made with the intent to defraud and deceive any person, bodies politic or corporate, who shall purchase the same, shall be deemed (only as against that person or persons, body politic or corporate, his and their heirs, etc.) to be utterly void. But the act shall not be construed to defeat or make void any conveyance, etc., for good consideration and bond fide. See Twyne's case, 1 Smith's L. C. 1.

The deeds which are rendered void by these statutes are of two sorts:—(1) Deeds made with an express intent to defraud creditors or subsequent purchasers. (2) Deeds made upon good but not valuable considerations, usually called voluntary conveyances. See FRAUDULENT PREFERENCES.

Fraudulent debtors. Punishable by 32 & 33 Vict. c. 62, ss. 11—23. As to Ireland, see the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 57.

Fraudulent preferences. Every conveyance or transfer of property or charge thereon made, every judgment made, every obligation incurred, and every judicial proceeding taken or suffered by any person unable to pay his debts as they become due from his own moneys, in favour of any creditor, with a view of giving such creditor a preference over other creditors, shall be deemed fraudulent and void if the debtor become bankrupt within three months.—32 & 33 Vict. c. 71, s. 92.

Fraunc, or Fraunke Ferme. See FRANK-FERM.

Fray. See AFFRAY.

Fred, peace.

Fredstole, or Fridstol, sanctuaries, seats of peace.—Gibson's Camden.

Fredum, a composition anciently paid by a criminal to be freed from prosecution, of which the third part was lodged in the Exchequer. See Montesquieu's Spirit of Laws, l. 30, c. 20.

Fredwit, a liberty to hold courts and make amerciaments.—Cowel.

Free-bench [sedes libera, Lat.], a widow's dower out of copyholds to which she is entitled by the custom of some manors. It is regarded as an excrescence growing out of the husband's interest, and is indeed a continuance of his estate.

The term freebench is equally applicable to the estate which, by the custom of some manors, a husband takes in his wife's copyhold lands after her death, and anciently it was indiscriminately applied to that and to the widow's dower, but now the estate of the husband is called his curtesy, while the term freebench is confined to the widow.

Since freebench is only claimable by special custom, the estate which a widow is to take, both as to its quantity, quality, and duration, must be such as the custom prescribes. It is generally a third for her life, as at common law, but it is sometimes a fourth part only, and sometimes but a portion of the rent. In many manors, the wife takes the whole for her life, in others she takes the inheritance. Frequently the customary right is durante viduitate, and in some cases it is confined to her chaste widowhood. See COPYHOLD.

Freebench differs from dower at the common law, in that the former, unless by particular custom, does not attach, even in right, till the actual decease of the husband; whereas the right to dower at the common law attaches immediately on marriage, and the widow is entitled to dower in lands of which the husband was seised at any time during the coverture. As the right of the wife to freebench does not attach till the husband's death, any alienation by him alone, to take effect in his lifetime, though without the concurrence of the wife, whether by surrender in court, by forfeiture, or in consequence of enfranchisement, bars the claim of the widow. And even if the husband make a lease for years, though by license of the lord, the widow shall not avoid it. But in this case it must be remarked that her claim to freebench is not defeated by reason of the husband's not dying seised (though it should seem to be so urged in some of the books), as he would most indisputably die seised in the present instance, he being the copyholder, and not the lessee, and moreover the possession of the lessee at common law would be the possession of the lessor; and, therefore, it should seem that the widow would not in this case be barred only quoad the lease, and consequently be entitled on its expiration. By special custom, however, the widow shall have her freebench, notwithstanding such lease, though without prejudice to it, she receiving the rent, etc. And if the husband contract for the sale of his copyhold, and die without any actual surrender, a Court of Equity will compel the widow to relinquish her freebench. A fortiori, if the husband actually surrender, and die before admittance of the surrenderee, she shall be barred: for the subsequent admittance of the surrenderee, though after the death of the husband, relates to the time of the surrender, and so precedes the title of the wife.

So if the husband became a bankrupt, and died after the execution of the bargain and sale by the commissioners, and before the admittance of the vendee, the widow of the bankrupt was not entitled to her freebench.

And the husband must die seised, at least by relation, in order to enable the widow to claim, so there can be no disseisin of a copyhold; and, though a person should enter with strong hand, yet the copyholder would continue tenant to the lord; and, therefore, if the husband was, before such entry, seised, he would, notwithstanding such entry, continue seised; and such entry would not defeat the title of the wife.—2 Wat. Cop. 82 et seq.

The Dower Act, 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 105, does not affect equitable copyholds, but only freeholds.

The widow of a purchaser or heir at law, who dies before admittance to his copyhold, is nevertheless dowable, since the admittance has reference back to the contract or to the ancestor's decease.

A jointure before marriage, in lieu of dower and thirds, out of any lands of freehold and inheritance, is a bar in Equity to freebench, which is a customary right nomine dotis; so is a devise with the same intent.

When a widow is dowable by custom, her estate has all the incidental qualities of dower at common law. Since the wife's estate is a continuation of that of her husband, she holds of the lord, and is not in need of admittance except by special custom, or, at least, it will suffice if she challenge her admittance. Admittance, however, is not dispensed with in gavelkind lands, or where the widow only takes a portion of the husband's copyhold lands, and then the heir must assign her freebench before her entry, and he could be compelled to do so by plaint in the nature of a writ of dower, duly levied in the manor court.

Formerly the remedy for freebench was by a plaint in the manor court, which was unaffected by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 27; but by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1860, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 26, the plaint was abolished, and in lieu thereof an action might be brought by writ of summons issuing out of the Court of Common Pleas (afterwards the Common Pleas Division of the High Court, and now the Queen's Bench Division of that Court), upon which was to be endorsed a notice that the plaintiff intended to declare for freebench. See COPYHOLD. See now as to endorsement of writs, Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. III.

Free-board, land claimed in some places, more or less, beyond or without the fence, said to be two feet and a half.—Mon. Angl., t. 2, p. 141.

Free-borough men, such great men as did not engage like the frank-pledge men for their decennier.—Jacob.

Free-chapel, a place of worship, so called because not liable to the visitation of the ordinary. It is always of royal foundation, or founded at least by private persons to whom the Crown has granted the privilege.—1 Burn's E. L. 298.

Free-course, having the wind from a favourable quarter.—Merc. Law.

Free-fishery, a royal franchise, being the exclusive right of fishing in a public river. Grants of this description cannot now be made, the Great Charter and its confirmations prohibiting it.

Freehold, one of the two chief tenures known in ancient times by the phrase 'tenure in free socage,' and the only free lay-mode of holding property. It is derived from the feudal system, but the services connected with it were honourable and mild. The annihilation of the feudal severities has left this tenure unshackled, and by far the greater part of the real property in this country is freehold.

Such an interest in lands of frank tenement as may endure not only during the owner's life, but which is cast after his death upon the persons who successively represent him, according to certain rules elsewhere explained. Such persons are called heirs, and he whom they thus represent, the ancestor. When the interest extends beyond the ancestor's life, it is called a freehold of inheritance, and when it only endures for the ancestor's life, it is a freehold not of inheritance.

An estate to be a freehold must possess these two qualities: (1) immobility, that is, the property must be either land or some interest issuing out of or annexed to land; and (2) indeterminate duration, for if the utmost period of time to which an estate can endure be fixed and determined, it cannot be a freehold.

Free-holder, he who possesses a freehold estate.

Freehold Land Societies, designed for the purpose of enabling mechanics, artizans, and other working-men to purchase at the least possible price a piece of freehold land of a sufficient yearly value to entitle the owner to the elective franchise for the county in which the land is situated. See Stone's Build. Soc., 96 et seq. See FAGGOT VOTES.

Freeman [liber homo, Lat.], an allodial proprietor; one born or made free to enjoy certain municipal immunities and privileges; the privileges of freemen were preserved by the Municipal Corporation Act, 1835, and continued by Part X. of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 50.

Freemasons, secret societies formed, as it is supposed, for the mutual assistance and the promotion of friendship and good fellowship. They are protected by law. See 39 Geo. III. c. 79, ss. 5, 7; and 57 Geo. III. c. 10, s. 26.

Freemen's roll, a list of all persons admitted burgesses, or freemen of those rights which are reserved by the Municipal Corporation Act (5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 76), as distinguished from the burgesses newly created by the act, and entitled to the rights which it confers, who are entered on the burgess-roll. See 6 & 7 Vict. c. 18.

Free-services, such as were not unbecoming the character of a soldier or a freeman to perform, as to serve under his lord in the wars, to pay a sum of money, or the like.

Free-ships, neutral ships.

Free-warren, a royal franchise, granted by the Crown to a subject for the preservation or custody of beasts and fowls of warren.

Freight, the sum paid by a merchant or other person chartering a ship or part of a ship, or sending goods in a general ship, for the use of such ship or part, or the conveyance of such goods during a specified voyage or for a specified time. The freight is most commonly fixed by the charter-party, or bill of lading, but in the absence of any formal stipulation on the subject, it would be due according to the custom or usage of trade. In the absence of an express contract to the contrary, the entire freight is not earned until the whole cargo be ready for delivery, or has been delivered to the consignee, according to the contract for its conveyance. As to the shipowner's lien for freight see 25 & 26 Vict. c. 63, s. 66 et seq.—Maude and Pollock on Sh.; Maclachlan on Sh.

Frenchman. In early times this term was applied to every stranger or outlandish man.—Bracton, lib. 3, tr. 2, c. 15. See FRANCIGENE.

Frend-wite [fr. freond, Sax., friend, and wite, mulct], a fine exacted of him who harboured an outlawed friend.—Blount.

Frequentia actus multum operatur. 4 Co. 78.—(The frequency of an act operates much.)

Fresh disseisin, that disseisin which a person might formerly seek to defeat of himself, and by his own power, without resorting to the law; as where it was not above fifteen days old, or of some other short continuance.—Brit. c. v.

Fresh-fine, a fine that has been levied within a year.—Westm. Cap. 45.

Fresh-force, a force newly done in any city, borough, etc.—F.N.B., 7. Old. Nat. B. 4.

Fresh suit, or pursuit, such a present and earnest following of a robber as never ceases from the time of the robbery until apprehension. The party pursuing then had back again his goods, which otherwise were forfeited to the Crown.—Staundf. Pl. Cor., lib. 3, cc. 10, 12.

Fretum, frectum, the freight of a ship; freight-money.—Covel.

Fretum Britannicum, the straits between Dover and Calais.

Friar [fr. frère, Fr.; frater, Lat., brother], an order of religious persons, of whom there were four principal branches, viz.: (1) Minors, Grey Friars, or Franciscans; (2) Augustines; (3) Dominicans, or Black Friars; (4) White Friars, or Carmelites, from whom the rest descend.

Friborough, or Frithburgh, the Norman term for frank-pledge.

Fribusculum, a temporary separation between husband and wife.—Civil Law.

Friendless man, an outlaw, because he was denied all help of friends.—Bracton, lib. 3, tr. 2, c. 12.

Friendly societies, associations supported by subscription for the relief and maintenance of the members or their wives, children, relations, and nominees, in sickness, infancy, advanced age, widowhood, etc. By the Friendly Societies Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 60), various prior statutes regulating these societies have been in whole or in part repealed, and the law has been consolidated and amended. Such societies may be formed for providing payments on birth of a member's child, or on death of a member, or for relief and maintenance of members and their husbands, wives, children, etc., in old age or sickness, the endowment of members at any age, the insurance of tools against fire, or of cattle, for working men's clubs, or for any other purpose authorized by the Treasury. Before any such society can be established, its rules must have been transmitted to and approved of by the central office for the registration of Friendly Societies. The act was amended in 1876 by 39 & 40 Vict. c. 32 as to conversion of Friendly Societies into branches, and other matters, and in 1879 by 42 Vict. c. 9 as to the receipt of contributions at a greater distance than ten miles from the registered offices. Consult Davis or Pratt on Friendly Societies.

Friends, Society of. See QUAKERS.

Friendly suit, brought by a creditor in Chancery against an executor or administrator, being really a suit by the executor or administrator, in the name of a creditor against himself, in order to compel the creditors to take an equal distribution of the assets.—2 Wms. Ex., 7th ed., 1915. See now CHANCERY.

2. Also any suit instituted by agreement between the parties to obtain the opinion of the Court upon some doubtful question in which they are interested.

Friling, or Freoling [fr. freoh, Sax., free, and ling, progenies], a freeman born.—Jacob.

Friscus, fresh, uncultivated ground.—Mon. Angl., t. 2, p. 56.

Frith-borg, frank-pledge.—Cowel.

Frithbreach, the breaking of the peace.—Cowel.

Frithgar, the year of jubilee, or of meeting for peace and friendship.—Jacob.

Frithgilda, guildhall; a company or fraternity for the maintenance of peace and security; also a fine for breach of the peace.—Jacob.

Frithman, a member of a company or fraternity.—Blount.

Frith-soen, or Frithstol, an asylum; sanctuary.

Frithsoke, Frithsoken, the right of liberty of frank-pledge.—Fleta.

Frithsplot, or Frith-geard, a spot or plot of land, encircling some stone, tree, or well, considered sacred, and therefore affording sanctuary to criminals.

Frodmortel, or Freomortel, an immunity for committing manslaughter.—Mon. Angl., tom. 1, p. 173.

From excludes the day from which the time is to be reckoned. See also Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. LXI., r. 3.

Fructus augent hæreditatem. D. A. 3, 20, 31.—(The yearly increase enhances an inheritance.)

Fructus industriales (emblemments).

Fruit, as to larceny of, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 36, 37, and c. 97, ss. 23, 24.

Fruit fallen, the produce of any possession detached therefrom, and capable of being enjoyed by itself. Thus, a next presentation, when a vacancy has occurred, is a fruit fallen from the advowson.

Frumgyld, the first payment made to the kindred of a person slain, the recompense for his murder.—Leg. Edm.

Frumstol, original or paternal dwelling.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Frusca terræ, waste and desert lands.

Frussura, a breaking; ploughing.—Cowel.

Frustrà fit per plura, quod fieri potest per pauciora. Jenk. Cent. 68; Wing. 177.—(That is needlessly done by many (words) which can be done by less.)

Frustrà legis auxilium querit qui in legem committit. (Vainly does he who offends against law seek the help of law.)

Frustrà petis quod statim, alteri reddere cogaris. Jenk. Cent. 256.—(You ask in vain that which you might immediately be compelled to restore to another.) See CIRCUITY OF ACTION.

Frustrà probatur quod probatum non relevat. Halkerston 58.—(It is useless to prove that which, when proved, is not relevant to the question at issue.)

Frustrum terræ, a piece or parcel of land.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Frutectum, Frutetum, Fruticetum, a place where shrubs or herbs grow.—Jacob.

Frymth, Fynmth, the affording harbour and entertainment to anyone.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Frythe, a plain between woods.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Fuage. See FUMAGE.

Fuer, flight. It is of two kinds: (1) fuer in fait, or in facto, where a person does apparently and corporally flee; (2) fuer in ley, or in lege, when being called in the County Court he does not appear, which legal interpretation makes flight.

Fuero jurgo, a code of Spanish law, said to be the most ancient in Europe.

Fuga catallorum, a drove of cattle.—Fleta.

Fugacia, a chase.—Blount.

Fugam fecit (he has made flight), said of a person who is found by inquisition to have fled for felony, etc., upon which forfeiture of goods took place. Obsolete.—7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 28, s. 5; and see 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23.

Fugatio, a privilege to hunt.—Blount.

Fugatores carrucarum, waggoners, who drive oxen without beating or goading.—Fleta, l. 2, c. lxxviii.

Fugitation. In Scotland, when a criminal does not obey the citation to answer, the Court pronounces sentence of fugitation against him, which induces a forfeiture of goods and chattels to the Crown.

Fugitive offenders. Where a person accused of any offence punishable by imprisonment with hard labour for twelve months or more, has left that part of Her Majesty's dominions where the offence is alleged to have been committed, he is liable, if found in any other part of Her Majesty's dominions, to be apprehended and returned in manner provided by the 'Fugitive Offenders Act, 1881), to the part from which he is a fugitive.

Full age, twenty-one years. A man is competent in Law to do anything as a person of full age on the day preceding his twenty-first birthday, because the completion of the twenty-first year is supposed to belong as much to the day before as to the day after the imaginary interval at which it takes place.

Full Court. The Judge Ordinary, with two other members of the Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes, constituted the Court of Appeal, and in some instances the Court of original jurisdiction, under the name of the Full Court of Divorce, the jurisdiction of which was transferred to the Court of Appeal by the Jud. Act, 1881.

Fullum aquæ, a stream or stream of water.

Fumage, Fuage, or Fouage (vulgarly called smoke-farthings), a tax paid to the sovereign for every house that had a chimney. It is probable that the hearth-money, imposed by 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 10, took its origin hence. This hearth-money was declared a great oppression, and abolished by 1 W. & M., st. 1, c. 10; but a tax was afterwards laid upon all houses, except cottages, and upon all windows, by 7 Wm. III. c. 18. The window-duty was repealed by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36.

Function [fr. fungor, Lat., to perform], employment; discharge of office.

Fundi patrimoniales (lands of inheritance).

Funditores, pioneers.—Jacob.

Funds, public, the name given to the public funded debt due by Government. The practice of borrowing money to defray a part of the war expenditure began, with us, in the reign of William III. In the infancy of the practice, it was customary to borrow upon the security of some tax, or portion of a tax, set apart as a fund for discharging the principal and interest of the sum borrowed. This discharge was rarely effected. The public exigencies still continuing, the loans were continued, or the taxes again mortgaged for fresh ones. At length the practice of borrowing for a fixed period, or, as it is called, upon terminable annuities, was abandoned, and loans made upon interminable annuities, or until it might be convenient for Government to pay off the principal.

In the beginning of the funding system, the term 'fund' meant the taxes or funds appropriated to the discharge of the principal and interest of loans; those who held government securities, and sold them to others, selling, of course, a corresponding claim upon such fund. But after the debt began to grow large, and the practice of borrowing upon interminable annuities had been introduced, the meaning of 'fund' was changed, and instead of signifying the security upon which loans were advanced, it has, for a long time, signified the principal of the loans themselves.

The National Debt Act, 1870, 33 & 34 Vict. c. 71, consolidates the law as to the denominations of stock, payment of dividends, and transfer, and also fixes the terms and dates of redemption.

The different funds or stocks constituting the public debt are the following.

(1.) Funds at three per cent. interest.

(a) Three per Cent. Consols, or Consolidated Annuities.—This stock forms by far the largest portion of the public debt. It had its origin in 1751, when an act was passed, consolidating (hence its name) several separate stocks bearing an interest of three per cent. into one general stock.

(b) Three per Cent. Reduced Annuities.—This fund was established in 1757. It consisted, as the name implies, of several funds which had previously been borrowed at a higher rate of interest; but, by an act passed in 1749, it was declared that such holders of the funds in question as did not choose to accept in future a reduced interest of three per cent. should be paid off: an alternative which comparatively few embraced.

(c) New Three per Cent. Annuities.—This fund, which came into existence in 1854, in pursuance of an arrangement made in 1844, consisted of several funds which had previously paid a higher rate of interest, viz.:

(1) The Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities of 1818. (2) The Reduced Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities of 1824. (3) The New Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities, arising from the reduction and conversion of other stock in 1830 and 1834.

(d) Debt due to the Bank of England.—This consists of the sum of 11,015,100*l.* lent by the Bank to the public at three per cent. This must not be confounded with Bank capital, on which the shareholders receive dividends.

(II.) Funds bearing other than three per cent. interest.

(a) New Three-and-a-Half per Cent. Annuities.

(b) New Two-and-a-Half per Cent Annuities, amounting to 3,960,354*l.* Funds (a) and (b) were created in the year 1854, when Government paid off the holders of the South Sea Old and New Three per Cent. Annuities, and the Three per Cent. Annuities of 1726 and 1751, giving the holders the option of being paid off or taking stock in either of these two funds upon certain terms.

Dividends on Consols, New Two-and-a-Half per Cents., New Three-and-a-Half per Cents., and New Five per Cents., are payable January 5th and July 5th; and on the reduced Three per Cents., and New Three per Cents., April 5th and October 5th.

(III.) Annuities. (a) Long Annuities.—These annuities were created at different periods, but they all expired together in 1860. They were chiefly granted by way of premia or douceurs to the subscribers to loans. Payable on April 5th and October 10th. (b) Annuities per 4 Geo. IV. c. 22.—This annuity was payable to the Bank of England, and was commonly known by the name of the 'Dead Weight' annuity. It expired in 1867. It was equivalent to a perpetual annuity of 470,319*l.* 10*s.* (c) Annuities per 48 Geo. III., 10 Geo. IV. c. 24, and 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 14.—These acts authorized the commissioners for the reduction of the national debt to grant annuities, for terms of years, and life annuities, accepting in payment either money or stock, according to rates specified in tables to be approved by the lords of the treasury. No annuities are granted on the life of any nominee under fifteen years of age, nor in any case not approved by the commissioners. Annuities for terms of years not granted for any period less than ten years. These annuities are transferable, but not in parts or shares. They are payable January 5th and July 5th, or April 5th and October 10th, according to the date of their purchase. See 27 & 28 Vict. c. 46; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 11; 36 & 37 Vict. c. 44; 38 & 39 Vict. c. 45. See Fenn on the Funds.

Fundus, the bottom or foundation of a thing; from fud, βυθ-ός, πυθ-μύη, the n in fundus being used to strengthen the syllable. Fundus is often used as applied to land, the solid substratum of all man's labours.—Smith's Dict. of Antiq.

Funeral charges. An executor or administrator should bury the deceased testator or intestate in a manner suitable to the estate he has left, and the expense of the burial will be allowed before all other debts and charges; but if the personal representative be extravagant, he commits a devastavit, for which he will be answerable to the creditors or legatees.

Fungibiles res, a term applied in the Civil Law to things of such a nature as that they could be replaced by equal quantities and qualities, because mutud vice funguntur, they replace and represent each other; thus, a bushel of wheat. A particular horse would not be fungibilis res.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 322.

Fungibiles, moveable goods, which may be estimated by weight, number, or measure; such as corn, wine, or money.

Furandi animus (an intent of stealing).

Furca [fr. farkah, Heb., to divide], the gallows.—Cowel.

Furcam et flagellum (the gallows and whip), the meanest of all servile tenures, when the bondman was at his lord's disposal, both life and limb.

Furigeldum, a mulct paid for theft.—Jacob.

Furiosi nulla voluntas est. D. 50, 17, 5; D. 1, 18, 13, s. 1.—(A madman has no free will.)

Furiosity, madness, as distinguished from fatuity or idiocy. See IDIOTS and LUNATICS.

Furiosus absentis loco est. Non multum distant à brutis qui ratione carent. 4 Co. 126.—(A madman is like a man who is absent. Those who want reason are not far removed from brutes.)

Furiosus solo furore punitur. Co. Litt. 247.—(Let a madman be punished by his madness alone.)

Furiosus stipulare non potest nec aliquid negotium agere, qui non intelligit quid agit. 4 Co. 126.—(A madman who knows not what he does cannot make a bargain, nor transact any business.)

Furlong [fr. furlang, A. S.; furlongus, ferlingus, ferlingum, low Lat.], quasi a furrow long, that is, bounded or terminated by the length of a furrow, i.e., quod uno progressu aratrum describit antequam regreditur; this equals 40 poles, or 220 yards, being the eighth part of a mile.—Weights and Measures Act, 1878. Spelman Gloss. Arch. Also, as Mins. says, the eighth part of an acre. Stadium and quarentena terræ are sometimes used for a furlong.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Furnagium. See FURNAGIUM.

Furnival's Inn, formerly an inn of Chancery. See INNS OF CHANCERY.

Furst and Fondung, time to advise or take counsel.—Jacob.

Further advance, or charge, a second or subsequent loan of money to a mortgagor by a mortgagee, either upon the same security as the original loan was advanced upon, or an additional security. Equity considers the arrears of interest on a mortgage security converted into principal, by agreement between the parties, as a further advance.

Further assurance, Covenant for, one of the usual agreements entered into by a vendor for the protection of the vendee's interest in the subject of purchase, to the effect that the vendor will, at the request and cost of the vendee, execute further conveyances, etc., for more perfectly assuring the subject-matter of the conveyance;—implied in conveyances made on or after Jan. 1st, 1882, by virtue of the Conveyancing and Law of Property Act, 1881, 44 & 45 Vict. c. 41.

Further consideration, as to setting down a cause for, under the old practice, see Sm. Ch. Prac., 629 et seq., and 2 Dan. Ch. Prac., 5th ed., 1228.

By the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XL., r. 10, it is provided that 'upon a motion for judgment or for a new trial, the court may, 'if it shall be of opinion that it has not sufficient materials before it to enable it to give judgment, direct the motion to stand over for further consideration,' and direct issues to be tried and accounts to be taken; and by Ord. XXXVI., r. 22, etc., made in pursuance of s. 17 of the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, a judge at a trial of an action 'may adjourn the case for further consideration' before himself.

Further directions, when a master ordinary in Chancery made a report in pursuance of a decree or decretal order, the cause was again set down before the judge who made the decree or order, to be proceeded with. Where a master made a separate report, or one not in pursuance of a decree or decretal order, a petition for consequential directions had to be presented, since the cause could not be set down for further directions under such circumstances. See 2 Dan. Ch. Prac., 5th ed., 1233, n.

Further maintenance of the action, plea to the. See PUIS DARREIN CONTINUANCE.

Furtum [fr. φῶρ, a thief, fr. φερῶν, to carry away], theft; robbery. It is manifestum et nec manifestum.—Sand. Just., 5th ed., 139, 393, where other kinds are enumerated; and see 2 Reeves, 40.

Furtum est contrectatio rei alienæ fraudulenta, cum animo furandi, invito illo domino cujus res illa fuerat. 3 Inst. 107.—(Theft is the fraudulent handling of another's property, with an intention of stealing, against the will of the proprietor, whose property is invaded)

Furtum non est ubi initium habet detentionis per dominium rei. 3 Inst. 107.—(There is no theft where the foundation of the detention is based upon ownership of the thing.)

Furze, growing, setting fire to, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, s. 17.

Future estates, expectancies, which are, at the Common Law, of two kinds: reversions and remainders.

Future uses. See CONTINGENT USES.

Fuz, or Fust [Celt.], a wood or forest.

Fyht-wite, one of the fines incurred for homicide.

Fyrd, Fyrdung, the military array or land force of the whole country. Contribution to the fyrd was one of the imposts forming the trinoda necessitas.

Fyrd-wite, the fine incurred by neglecting to join the fyrd; one of the rights of the Crown.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

G.

Gabel [fr. gabelle, Fr.; gabella, Ital.; gafel, Sax.], an excise, a tax on moveables; a rent, custom, or service.—Co. Litt. 213.

Gabulos denarium, rent paid in money.—Seld. Tit. 321.

Gaffoldgild, the payment of custom or tribute.—Scott.

Gaffoldland, property subject to the gaffoldgild, or liable to be taxed.—Ibid.

Gafold, rent, tribute, or tax.

Gage [fr. gage, Fr.], a pledge, pawn, or caution; anything given in security.

Gage, Estates in, those held in radio or pledge. They are of two kinds: (1) vivum vadum, or living pledge, or vifgage; (2) mortuum vadum, or dead pledge, better known as mortgage.

Gager de deliverance, when he who has distrained, being sued, has not delivered the cattle distrained; then he shall not only avow the distress, but gager deliverance, i.e., put in surety or pledge that he will deliver them.—F. N. B. 67.

Gager del ley (wager of law).

Gainage [fr. gainagium, Lat.], the gain or profit of tilled or planted land, raised by cultivating it; and the draught, plough, and furniture for carrying on the work of tillage by the baser kind of sokemen or villeins.—Bract. l. i. c. ix.

Gainery [fr. gaignerie, Fr.], tillage or the profit arising from it, or from the beasts employed therein.—Stat. West. 1, cc. 16, 17.

Gale [fr. gavel, Sax., a rent or duty], a periodical payment of rent.—Spelm. voce 'gabellum.'

Gallhalfpence, a kind of coin which, with suskins and doitkins, was forbidden by 3 Hen. V. c. 1.

Gallivolatium [fr. gallus, Lat., cock], a cock-shoot, or cock-glade.

Gallon, a liquid measure, containing 231 cubic inches, or 4 quarts.

Gallows [it is used by some in the singular, but more generally in the plural], a beam laid over either one or two posts from which malefactors are hanged. See EXECUTION OF CRIMINALS.

Game [fr. gaman, Sax.], all sorts of birds and beasts that are objects of the chase. The term is defined by 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 32, as including 'hares, pheasants, partridges, grouse, heath, or moor-game, black-game, and bustards'; but some of its provisions are also directed to trespass in pursuit of woodcocks, snipes, quails, land-rails, and conies.

At common law game belongs to a tenant, and not to a landlord, but leases frequently contain a reservation of the same to the landlord, and before 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 32, the right to kill game was restricted to freeholders having 100l. a year freehold, or leaseholders having a 99 years' leasehold of 150l. a year, etc. This act repeals the Qualification Act of 22 & 23 Car. II. c. 25, and (after giving the game to landlords in the case of leases made before the act for less than 21 years—a provision now expired) protects reservations of game by penal provisions. The act also requires all persons killing or taking game to take out a yearly certificate, and all uncertificated persons selling it, a yearly license, and makes it unlawful to kill game on a Sunday or Christmas-day, or between the days and seasons when game may be killed. The prohibited period is, for partridges, between 1st February and 1st September; for pheasants, between 1st February and 1st October; for black game (except in the county of Somerset or Devon, or in the New Forest, in the county of Southampton), between 10th December and 20th August; or in the county of Somerset or Devon, or in the New Forest, between 10th December and 1st September; for grouse, commonly called red game, between 10th December and 12th August; for bustard, between 1st March and 1st September.

As to right of occupier to kill hares and rabbits under Ground Game Act, 1880, see HARES. See also GUN LICENSE, POACHING.

Gamekeepers. As to their appointment and authority, see 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 32, s. 13.

Gaming or Gambling, the art or practice of playing and following up any game, particularly those of chance, as cards, dice, etc.

The 33 Hen. VIII. c. 9, prohibited the keeping of any common house for dice, cards, or any unlawful games, under penalties of 40s. for every day of so keeping the house, and 6s. 8d. for every time of playing therein; and the 30 Geo. II. c. 24, s. 14, inflicts the same punishment upon the master of any public-house wherein labourers or servants are permitted to game, as upon the labourers and servants themselves. As to the prevention of gaming in public-houses, see 35 & 36 Vict. c. 94, s. 17, and 37 & 38 Vict. c. 49, ss. 13 and 33. By 2 Geo. II. c. 28; 13 Geo. II. c. 19; and 18 Geo. II. c. 34, the games of faro, basset, ace of hearts, hazard, passage, roly-poly, and roulette, and all other games with dice, except backgammon, are prohibited under a penalty of 200l. for him that shall erect the same, and 50l. a time for the players. The 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, repeals so much of the 33 Hen. VIII. c. 9, as prohibits bowling, tennis, and other games of mere skill. It also provides that the owner or keeper of any common gaming-house, and every person having the care or management thereof, and also every banker, croupier, and other person in any manner conducting the business of any common gaming-house, shall, on conviction, be liable, in addition to the penalties of the act of Hen. VIII., to pay such penalty (not more than 100l.) as shall be adjudged by the justices, or may be imprisoned with or without hard labour for not more than six calendar months; but nothing shall prevent any proceeding by indictment. (The Act 17 & 18 Vict. c. 38, still further increases the maximum penalty to 500l.) Justices of the peace, at the general annual licensing meeting, may grant annual billiard licenses to such persons as they deem fit to keep billiard tables, and bagatelle boards, or the like. Several penalties are imposed for keeping such tables without a license, or allowing play between one and eight o'clock, a.m., or on Sunday, Christmas-day, or Good Friday, or on any day of public fast or thanksgiving. Winning money by 'ill practice' in play is made punishable in the same way as obtaining money under false pretences; and wagers are declared to be irrecoverable at law, and wagering contracts void. See also 17 & 18 Vict. c. 38, 'An Act for the Suppression of Gaming Houses.' The act 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, passed for the suppression of betting-houses, provided that they should be considered gaming-houses, within the meaning of the 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. Betting in the streets is prohibited by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 134, s. 23. As to unlawfully playing or betting in any street or public place, see 36 & 37 Vict. c. 38, repealing 31 & 32 Vict. c. 52. Further, by the 37 Vict. c. 15, s. 3, penalties are imposed on persons advertising, or sending letters, circulars, telegrams, etc., as to betting.

The 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 41 (amending 9 Anne c. 14), enacts that all notes, bills, or mortgages given for money won at play, are deemed to be given on an illegal consideration, and are void between the parties, but not in the hands of indorsees or purchasers for valuable consideration, without notice. See Chitty's Statutes, vol. ii., tit. 'Games.'

Ganancial [Sp.], a species of community in property enjoyed by husband and wife, the property being divisible between them equally on a dissolution of the marriage.—1 Burge Confl. Laws, 418.

Gangiatori, officers in ancient times whose business it was to examine weights and measures.—Skene.

Gang-week [fr. gangan, Sax., to go], the time when the bounds of the parish are lustrated or gone over by the parish officers—rogation week.—Encyc. Lond.

Gangs (Agricultural) Act, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 130. By this act, which recites that in certain counties in England certain persons, known as gang-masters, hire children, young persons, and women, with a view to contracting with farmers and others for the execution on their lands of various kinds of agricultural work, regulations are made with respect to the employment of children, young persons, and women, by such gang-masters.

Gantelope (pronounced gauntlett), [fr. gant, Dut., all; and loopen, to run], a military punishment, in which the criminal running between the ranks receives a lash from each man.—Encyc. Lond. This was called running the gauntlett.

Gaol [fr. gaola, Lat.; geole, Fr., a cage for birds], a prison; a strong place for the confinement of offenders against the law. See PRISONS.

Gaol Delivery, a commission to the judges, etc., to try and deliver every prisoner in gaol when they arrive at the assize town. See ASSIZE.

Gaol Sessions, a special sessions of county justices of the peace, constituted under 5 Geo. IV. c. 12, for the purpose of regulating all matters connected with county gaols under 4 Geo. IV. c. 64, repealed, but in great part re-enacted, by the Prison Act, 1865.

Gaoler, the master or keeper of a prison; one who has the custody of a place where prisoners are confined.

Garb, a bundle or sheaf of corn; a handful.—Fleta, l. 2, c. xii.

Garbales decimæ, tithes of corn.

Garbler of spices, an ancient officer in the city of London, who might enter into any shop, warehouse, etc., to view and search drugs and spices, and garble and make clean the same; or see that it be done.—6 Anne c. 16.

Garcio stolæ (groom of the stole).—Pl. Cor., 21st Ed. I.

Garciones, servants who follow a camp.—Wals. 242.

Gard [fr. garde, Fr.], wardship, care, custody.

Gardens. The Act 26 & 27 Vict. c. 13, provides for the protection of gardens and ornamental grounds in cities and boroughs. As to stealing or destroying any fruit or vegetable production in gardens, etc., see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 36, 37; and c. 97, ss. 23, 24. See PARKS.

Gardia, custody.—Lib. Feud.

Garlanda, a chaplet, coronet, or garland.

Garnestura, victuals, arms, and other implements of war, necessary for the defence of a town or castle.—Mat. Par. 1250.

Garnish, money paid by a prisoner on his going to prison. Forbidden by 4 Geo. IV. c. 43, s. 12, r. 23. Also, warning an heir; abolished by 6 Geo. IV. c. 105, s. 13.

Garnishee, a person warned not to pay money which he owes to another person, when the latter is indebted to the person warning or giving notice. See ATTACHMENT OF DEBTS. FOREIGN ATTACHMENT.

Garnishment, warning not to pay money, etc., to a defendant, but to appear and answer to a plaintiff-creditor's suit. It usually arose in cases of detainee thus:—If a defendant alleged that certain deeds were delivered to him by the plaintiff and another person upon condition, such defendant prayed that the other person might be warned to plead with the plaintiff, as to whether the conditions were performed or not, he, the defendant, being willing to deliver the property to the person entitled to it; thereupon a process of garnishment, monition, or notice issued, and all parties were brought before the Court, that the cause might be thoroughly and justly determined. It was nearly allied to the proceedings in interpleader.—3 Reeve's Hist. Eng. Law, 448. See FOREIGN ATTACHMENT.

By the Jud. Act, Ord. XLIV., replacing ss. 60—64 of the C. L. P. Act, 1854, any creditor who has obtained a judgment in the High Court may attach debts due to his debtor. See ATTACHMENT OF DEBTS.

Garnisture, a furnishing or providing.

Garranty. See GUARANTY.

Garson, a menial servant.—Toland.

Garsummune, a fine or amercement.—Spelm.

Garter [fr. gardus, Wel.; jartier, Fr., from gar, the binding of the knee], a string or ribbon by which the stocking is held upon the leg; the mark of the highest order of knighthood, ranking next after the nobility. This military order of knighthood is said to have been first instituted by Richard I. at the siege of Acre, where he caused twenty-six knights who firmly stood by him to wear thongs of blue leather about their legs. It is also said to have been perfected by Edward III., and to have received some alterations, which were afterwards laid aside, from Edward VI. The badge of the order is the image of St. George, called the George, and the motto is Honi soit qui mal y pense.

Garth [same as girth, fr. gyrdan, A. S., to surround, to enclose], an enclosure about a house, church, etc.; a close; a dam or wear; a place formed at the side of a river that the fish might be more easily taken.

Gas. See the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 15), amended by 34 & 35 Vict. c. 41; and as to the regulation of the measures used in sale of, see 22 & 23 Vict. c. 66; 23 & 24 Vict. cc. 125 & 146; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 79; and 29 & 30 Vict. c. 82, s. 14; and the Gasworks Clauses Act, 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 41). As to the metropolis, see 23 & 24 Vict. c. 125, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 79. By the Gas and Waterworks Facilities Act, 33 & 34 Vict. c. 70 (amended by 36 & 37 Vict. c. 89), provisions are made whereby such undertakings may be authorized by provisional orders.

By the Public Health Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 161, it is provided that any urban authority may contract with any person, for the supply of gas or other means of lighting their district, and provide lamps and other materials for such lighting; or where there is not any company or person authorized by parliament to supply gas, may themselves undertake to supply gas to their district or such part of it as is not within the limits of supply of any such company or person. By s. 162, an urban authority for the purpose of supplying gas to their district may (with the sanction of the Local Government Board) buy and the directors of any gas company (duly authorized as required by the act) may sell and transfer their undertaking to such authority, on agreed terms. Consult Michael and Will. on Gas and Water.

Gastaldus, a temporary governor of the country.—Blount.

Gaudies, double commons.—University term.

Gaudy [fr. gaudium, Lat.], a feast, a festival, a day of plenty.—Ibid.

Gauge of Railways, fixed, with some exceptions, at 4 feet 8½ inches in Great Britain, and 5 feet 3 inches in Ireland, by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 57.

Gauger, a surveying officer under the Board of Inland Revenue.

Gaugetum, a gauge or gauging; a measure of the contents of any vessel.

Gavel. See GABEL.

Gavelcester [sextarius vectigalis, Lat.], a certain measure of rent-ale.—Cowel.

Gavelet [fr. gaveletum, Lat.], an ancient and special kind of cessavit, used in Kent and London for the recovery of rent. Obsolete. The statute of Gavelet is 10 Edw. II.—2 Reeves, c. xii., p. 298.

Gavelgeld, payment of tribute or toll.—Mon. Angl. tom. 3, 155.

Gavelkind, derived from the Saxon word 'gafol,' or as it is otherwise written, 'gavel,' which signifies 'rent,' or a 'customary performance of husbandry works,' and therefore, the land which yielded this kind of service, in contradistinction to knight-service land, was called 'GAVELKIND,' that is, 'land of the kind that yields rent.' Lambard (Perambulations of Kent, ed. 1656, p. 585) first advanced and promulgated this supposition, in opposition to the opinion of Lord Coke, which, until then, was generally received.

Gavelkind land descends in the right line to all the sons equally, being an exception to the law of primogeniture. In default of sons, it descends to the daughters in the ordinary manner.

It is to be remarked, that though females, claiming in their own right, are postponed to males, yet they may inherit together with males by representation. If a man have three sons, and purchase lands held in gavelkind, and one of the sons dies in the lifetime of his father, leaving a daughter, she will inherit the share of her father; yet she is not within the words of the custom, inter hæredes masculos partibiles; for she is no male, but the daughter of a male coming in his stead jure representationis.

This custom extends also to the collateral line, for it has been resolved that where one brother dies without issue, all the other brothers shall inherit from him; and in default of brothers, their respective issue shall take jure representationis. But where the nephews succeed with an uncle, the descent is per stirpes and not per capita; and so from the nature of the thing it must be, where the sons of several brothers succeed, no uncle surviving, for though in equal degree, they stand in the place of their respective fathers.

The partible quality of gavelkind extends also to estates-tail, for if a person die seised in tail of lands held in gavelkind, all his sons shall inherit together as heirs of his body.

Since the 1st January, 1834, the half-blood inherit, for the Inheritance Act (s. 9) applies to land of every tenure (s. 1).

The other special customs of this tenure are: (1) a wife is dowable of one-half, instead of one-third of the land; (2) a husband will be tenant by the courtesy, whether there be issue born or not, but only of one-half so long as he remains unmarried; (3) gavelkind lands were not liable to escheat for felony, the maxim being, 'The father to the bough, the son to the plough,' although they were for treason or want of heirs (see 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, abolishing escheat or forfeiture for treason and felony); and (4) an heir in gavelkind at fifteen years may make a contract and sell his estate for money; but the livery upon the feoffment (the only deed which can be adopted) must be made by the heir in person; for, being under age, he cannot, by the common law, appoint an attorney.

Gavelkind, before A.D. 1066, was the general custom of the realm; the feudal law of primogeniture superseded it. It was retained in Kent, because, according to the historical legend, the Kentish men surrounded William I. with a moving wood of boughs, just after the slaughter at Hastings, and for that service obtained a confirmation of their ancient rights.

By 34 & 35 Hen. VIII. c. 26, all gavelkind lands in Wales were made descendible to the heir according to the Common Law; from which it would appear that the tenure likewise obtained in that principality. And even in Kent, lands belonging to various persons have been disgavelled by statute, especially the 31 Hen. VIII. c. 3, and made descendible according to the course of the common law. This can be only effected by act of parliament. Gavelkind is met with occasionally in a modified form in copyholds.

Prima facie all land in Kent is gavelkind, except such as is disgavelled by particular statutes (which should always be noticed in transactions relating to Kentish property); and as to such land the custom is never pleaded, but is presumed, and the Courts are bound to take judicial notice of it.—1 Mod. 98. Steph. Com., 7th ed., I., IV.

Gavelman, a tenant liable to tribute.—Blount.

Gavelmed, the duty or work of mowing grass or cutting meadow land, required by the lord from his customary tenants.—Somn.

Gavelwerk, the personal labour of customary tenants.

Gazette [fr. gaza, treasure; or gazetta, the name of a coin, about a farthing], the official newspaper of the government, said to have been first published at Oxford in 1665; on the removal of the Court to London, the title was changed to the London Gazette. It is published on Tuesdays and Fridays, and contains all the acts of state, and proclamations; also dissolutions of partnership, and notices of proceedings in bankruptcy. It is evidence of such governmental proceedings as it contains.—5 T. R. 436.

Gebocced [A. S.], conveyed.

Geburscript, neighbourhood or adjoining district.—Cowel.

Geburus, [fr. gebure, Sax., a farmer], an inhabitant of the same geburship or village.

Geld, a mulct, compensation, value, price. Angeld is the single value of a thing; twigeld, double value, etc.—Cowel.

Geldable, taxable.—Cowel.

Gemot, a mote or moot, meeting, public assembly. The various kinds were—(1) The folc-gemot, or general assembly of the people, whether it was held in a city or town, or consisted of the whole shire. It was sometimes summoned by the ringing of the moot-bell. Its regular meetings were annual. (2) The shire-gemot, or county court, which met twice during the year. (3) The burg-gemot, which met thrice in the year. (4) The hundred-gemot, or hundred court, which met twelve times a year in the Saxon ages; but afterwards a full, perhaps an extraordinary, meeting of every hundred was ordered to be held twice a year. This was the sheriff's tourn, or view of franc-pledge. (5) The halle-gemot, or the court-baron. (6) The wardemotus.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Genealogy [fr. γενεά, Gk., and λόγός], history of the succession of families; enumeration of descent in order of succession; pedigree.—Encyc. Lond.

Genearch [fr. γενεά, Gk., and ἀρχός], the head of a family.

Geneath, a hind or farmer.

Gener [Lat.], a son-in-law.

General agent, a person who has general authority in regard to a particular object or thing. See Story on Agency, ss. 17—19.

General average, the contribution made by the parties to an adventure towards a loss, consisting in the sacrifices made or expenses incurred by some of them, for the common benefit of ship and cargo. See Hopk. on Av.

General Council (of the Catholic Church), a council consisting of members of the Church from most parts of the world, but not from every part, as an Ecumenical Council.

General demurrer, was a pleading at Common Law, which excepted to the sufficiency of a pleading in general terms, without showing specifically the nature of the objection. It was resorted to when the objection was to matter of substance. All demurrers are now general demurrers, as special demurrers were abolished by the Common Law Procedure Act, 1852, s. 51. See DEMURRER.

General Gaol Delivery. See GAOL DELIVERY.

General issue, was a plea simply traversing modo et formâ the allegations in the declaration, as the plea of 'not guilty' in torts; 'never indebted' to money counts, or 'nunquam assumpsit' to actions on simple contract (C. L. P. Act, 1852, sched. B., 37). By certain statutes the general issue might be pleaded and special defences relied on under it, but the defendant must have given notice in the margin of the plea of the particular statute conferring this privilege. See Reg. Gen. H. T. 1853, r. 21. It is provided by the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XIX., r. 16, that nothing contained in the rules of that Act 'shall affect the right of any defendant to plead not guilty by statute.' See PLEADING.

In criminal proceedings, the general issue is 'not guilty,' which is pleaded viva voce by the prisoner at the bar.

General lien, a right to detain a chattel, etc., until payment be made, not only of any debt due in respect of the particular chattel, but of any balance that may be due on general account in the same line of business. A general lien being against the ordinary rule of law, depends entirely upon contract, express or implied, from the special usage of dealing between the parties. See LIEN.

General Quarter Sessions of the Peace. See SESSIONS.

General ship, a ship employed by the owners on a particular voyage in the conveyance of the goods of a number of persons unconnected with each other.

General tail, an estate tail where one parent only is specified, whence the issue must be derived, as to A. and the heirs of his body. See TAIL.

General verdict, the decision of the jury, either for the plaintiff or defendant generally. See VERDICT.

General warrant, a process from the secretary of state, to arrest (without naming any) the author, printer, and publisher of such obscene and seditious libels as were specified in it. It was declared illegal and void for uncertainty by a vote of the House of Commons.—Com. Jour., 22nd April, 1766.

General, the usual commons in a religious house, distinguished from pietantie, which on extraordinary occasions were allowed beyond the commons.—Cowel.

Generale nihil certi implicat. Wing. 164. —(A generality involves no particularity).

Generalia specialibus non derogant. Jenk. Cent. 120, cited L. R., 4 Exch., 226.—(General words do not derogate from special.)

Generalia verba sunt generaliter intelligenda. 3 Inst. 76.—(General words are to be understood generally).—Br. Max., 5th ed., 647.

Generalibus specialia derogant. Loft. 351; Halkerston, 51.—(Special things derogate from general.)

Generalis clausula non porrigitur ad ea quæ antea specialiter sunt comprehensa. 8 Rep. 154.—(A general clause is not to be extended to things which have been specifically embraced.)

Generalis regula generaliter est intelligenda. 6 Rep. 65.—(A general rule is to be understood generally.)

Generals of Orders, chiefs of the several orders of monks, friars, and other religious societies.

Generatio, the issue or offspring of a mother-monastery.—Cowel.

Generosus [Lat.], a gentleman.

Gen. fil. (Generosi filius), the son of a gentleman.

Gens, race, nation, great family.

Gentleman [fr. gentilhomme, Fr.; gentilhuomo, Ital., i.e., homo gentilis, Lat.; a man of ancestry, however high his rank]. All persons above yeomen; whereby noblemen are truly called gentlemen.—Smith de Rep. Ang. l. 1, cc. xx., xxi.

The word was not employed as a legal addition until about the time of Henry V.

The gentry may be divided into three classes: (I.) They who derive their stock with arms from their ancestors, are gentlemen of blood and coat-armour. They are of course the most noble who can prove the longest uninterrupted continuance of nobility in the families of both their parents.

(II.) They who are ennobled, by knight-hood or otherwise, with the grant of a coat-of-arms, are gentlemen of coat armour, and give gentility to their posterity. Such have been scornfully designated 'gentlemen of paper and wax.'

(III.) They who, by the exercise of a liberal profession or by holding some office, are gentlemen by reputation, although their ancestors were ignoble, as their posterity remains after them.—2 Steph. Com., Bk. iv., Chap. ix.

Gentleman Usher, one who holds a post at Court to usher others to the presence, etc.

Gentlewoman, a woman of birth above the common; an addition of a woman's state or degree.

Genus, in logic, is the first of the universal ideas, and is when the idea is so common that it extends to other ideas which are also universal: e.g., incorporeal hereditament is genus with respect to a rent, which is species.—Woolley's Introd. to Logic, 45; and 1 Mill's Log. 133.

General Survey Acts. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 63, and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 42.

Geoponics [fr. γή, Gk., land, and πονος, labour], the science of cultivating the ground; agriculture.

George-Noble, a gold coin, value 6s. 8d.—Leake.

George, St., Knight of. See GARTER.

German [fr. germain, Fr.; germanus, Lat.], brother; one approaching to a brother in proximity of blood: thus the children of brothers and sisters are called cousins-german.

Gerontocomium [fr. γέρων, Gk., an old man, and κομέω, to take care of], an almshouse or hospital for old people.—Encyc. Lond. Their managers are called gerontocomi.

Grsumarius, fineable; liable to be amerced at the discretion of the lord of a manor.—Cowel.

Gestation. See BIRTH.

Gestio pro hærede (behaviour as heir), conduct by which the heir renders himself liable for his ancestor's debts, as by taking possession of title-deeds, receiving rents, etc.—Scotch Phrase.

Gestu et famâ, an ancient and obsolete writ, resorted to when a person's good behaviour was impeached.—Lamb. Eiren, l. 4, c. 14.

Gewineda, the ancient convention of the people to decide a cause.—LL. Ethel. c. i.

Gewitnessa, the giving of evidence in our ancient British law.—Leg. Ethel. c. 1.

Gewrite, writings, deeds, or charters.

Ghirdawar, Girdwar, an overseer of police, under whom the goyendas or informers act.—Indian.

Gibbet [fr. gibet, Fr.], a gallows; the post on which malefactors are hanged, or on which their bodies are exposed—a practice abolished in England by 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 36. It differs from a common gallows in that it consists of one perpendicular post, from the top of which proceeds one arm; except it be a double gibbet, which is formed in the shape of the Roman capital T.—Encyc. Lond.

Gift. The old text-writers made a gift (donatio) a distinct species of deed, and describe it as a conveyance applicable to the creation of an estate-tail; while a feoffment they strictly confine to the creation of a fee simple estate. The operative verb is 'give,' which no longer implies any covenant in Law (8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 4), and the deed requires livery of seisin. It was in consequence of entails being thus originally created that the grantor was called the donor, the grantee in tail the donee, and the entail the gift or donation, the issue taking per formam doni. It is almost obsolete.

A gift is now understood to be a voluntary conveyance, without binding consideration, and therefore void in certain cases. A gift is likewise applied to gratuitous transfers of personalty and donationes mortis causâ. See DONATIO MORTIS CAUSÂ. A gift without delivery is ineffectual to pass any property (2 Stra. 955), unless the gift be by deed. Irons v. Smallpiece, 2 B. d. Ald. 551.

Gifta aquæ, the stream of water to a mill.—Mon. Angl., tom. 3.

Giftoman [Swed.], the right to dispose of a woman in marriage.

Gilbert Acts, 17 Geo. III. c. 53, providing for the building and repairing of parsonages, and the 22 Geo. III. c. 83 first establishing unions of parishes with guardians of the poor, superseded by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, and repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1871.

Gild, a tax, tribute, or contribution; a society or fraternity constituted for mutual protection and benefit. Consult Das Gildwesen in Mittelalter, von Dr. W. E. Wilda; and see 3 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 10, n. 31.

Gildable, liable to pay a gild.—Cowel.

Gilda mercatoria, a mercantile meeting or assembly. If the Crown grants to a set of men the privilege to have gildam mercatoriam, this is sufficient to incorporate them.—10 Rep. 30.

Gild-merchant, merchants privileged to hold pleas of land among themselves.—Scott.

Gild-rent, certain payments to the Crown from any gild or fraternity.

Gill, one-fourth of a pint-measure.

Girantem [fr. girare, Ital.], the drawer.—Merc. Law.

Gisement, cattle taken in to graze at a certain price; also the money received for grazing cattle.

Gisetaker, a person who takes cattle to graze.

Gisle, a pledge. Fredgisle, a pledge of peace. Gislebert, an illustrious pledge.—Gibs. Camden.

Gist of action [fr. giste, Fr., gesir, to lie; jaceo, Lat.], the cause for which an action lies; the ground and foundation of a suit, without which it is not maintainable.

Glandered horses. By 32 & 33 Vict. c. 70, ss. 57—8, penalties were imposed on persons bringing glandered horses, etc., into markets, etc., and provision is made for their seizure; but the Contagious Diseases Animals Act, 1878, 41 & 42 Vict. c. 74, which repeals and replaces that act, contains no such express provision, although by s. 32, subs. xxxii., it gives the Privy Council power to apply its provisions to horses and glanders and farcy. See CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT.

Glanville, the author of a book entitled

Tractatus de Legibus et Consuetudinibus Regni Angliæ, which is supposed to have been the first undertaking of the kind in any country of Europe. Though perhaps it was not written by that Ranulphus de Glanvilla who was justitiarius Angliæ under Henry II., yet it seems to be wholly written about the year 1181. It is little more than a sketch, as far as the plan of it goes, and is confined to proceedings in the King's Court. A translation of Glanville, with notes, was published in 1812, by Mr. Beames. See Hale's Hist. 168, and n. a; 1 Reeves, 221.

Glass, Excise on, repealed by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 6.

Glass-men, wandering rogues or vagrants. —1 Jac. I. c. 7.

Gleaning, Leasing, or Lesing. It is decided that no right exists at common law for the poor to enter on a person's land and glean after harvest.—Steel v. Houghton, 1 H. Bl. 51.

Gleba scriptitii, villein-soemen, who could not be removed from the land while they did the service due.—Brac. c. 7; 1 Reeves, 269.

Glebariæ, turfs dug out of the ground.—Cowel.

Glebe, the land possessed as a part of the revenue of an ecclesiastical benefice. By s. 5 of 5 & 6 Vict. c. 54, it is provided that the commissioners appointed to carry into effect the commutation of tithes shall have power to ascertain and define the boundaries of the glebe-lands of any benefice, or, with consent of the ordinary and patron, to exchange the glebe-lands for other lands within the same or any adjoining parish, or otherwise conveniently situated. See 17 & 18 Vict. c. 84. As to glebe-lands in Ireland, see now 38 & 39 Vict. cc. 11, 30, and 42.

Gliscywa, a fraternity.—Leg. Athel. c. 12.

Glomerells, commissioners appointed to determine differences between scholars in a school or university, and the townsmen of the place.—Jacob.

Glossa viperina est quæ corrodit viscera textus. 11 Co. 34.—(It is a poisonous gloss which corrupts the essence of the text.)

Gloucester, Statute of, 6 Edw. I. c. 1, A.D. 1278, by which a plaintiff recovering damages was first given a right to costs.

Glove silver, extraordinary rewards formerly given to officers of courts, etc.; money formerly given by the sheriff of a county in which no offenders are left for execution to the clerk of assize and judges' officers.—Jacob.

Gloves. It is an ancient custom on a maiden assize, when there is no offender to be tried, for the sheriff to present the judge with a pair of white gloves.—It is an im-morial custom to remove the glove from the right hand on taking oath.

Glycerine (Nitro). See EXPLOSIVE SUBSTANCES, and 38 Vict. c. 17, repealing 32 & 33 Vict. c. 113.

Glyn, or Glen [fr. glyn, Erse], a hollow between two mountains; a valley.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

God-bote, an ecclesiastical or church fine paid for crimes and offences committed against God.—Cowel.

God-gild, that which is offered to God or his service.—Jacob.

Godpenny, earnest money given to a servant when hired.

God's acre, a churchyard.

Going through the Bar. The Chief of a Common Law Court demanding of every member of the bar, in order of seniority, if he has anything to move. This was done at the sitting of the Court each day in term, except Special Paper days, Crown Paper days in the Queen's Bench, and Revenue Paper days in the Exchequer. On the last day of term this order is reversed, the first and second time round. See LAST DAY OF TERM.

Going to the country. When a party, under the system of pleading before the Common Law Procedure Act, finished his pleading by the words, 'and of this he puts himself upon his country,' meaning that he intended to take the verdict of a jury upon the issue of fact, this was called going to the country. It was the essential termination to a pleading which took issue upon a material fact in the preceding pleading. See VERIFICATION.

Golda, a mine.—Blount.

Gold-mines, a branch of the ordinary revenue of the kingdom. By 1 W. & M. st. 1, c. 30, and 5 W. & M. c. 6, amended by 55 Geo. III. c. 134, it is enacted that no mines of copper, tin, iron, or lead shall be looked upon as royal mines, notwithstanding gold or silver may be extracted from them in any quantities; but that the sovereign or persons claiming royal mines under his authority may have the ore (other than tin ore in the counties of Devon and Cornwall), paying for the same a price stated in the act.

Goldsmiths' notes. Bankers' cash notes (i.e., promissory notes given by a banker to his customers as acknowledgments of the receipt of money), were originally called in London goldsmiths' notes, from the circumstance that all the banking business in England was originally transacted by goldsmiths.

Goldwit, or Goldwich, a golden mulet.

Goliardus, a jester or buffoon.—Mat. Par. 1229.

Gomashtah, an agent, a steward, a confidential factor, a representative.—Indian.

Good, the technical term applied to pleading, to express soundness or validity.

Good abearing. See ABEARANCE.

Good behaviour, Security for. The exercise of preventive justice, which consists in being bound with one or more sureties in a recognizance or obligation to the Crown, and taken in some court, or by some judicial officer; whereby the parties acknowledge themselves to be indebted to the Crown in the sum required, with the condition to be void if the party shall be of good behaviour, either generally or specially for the time therein limited.

Good consideration, as distinguished from valuable consideration—a consideration founded on motives of generosity, prudence, and natural duty; such as natural love and affection.

Good Friday. The Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 61, s. 92, consolidating 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 42, passed for the better observance of Good Friday, and 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 15, provides that Good Friday and Christmas-day are to be excluded as 'non business-days' in cases where the time limited by that act for doing any act or thing is less than three days, and also by s. 14 that where the last of the three 'days of grace' (see GRACE, DAY OF) falls on Good Friday, a bill of exchange shall be payable on the preceding business day. Good Friday is a holiday in the courts and offices of the Supreme Court (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. LXI., r. 4). See further HOLIDAY.

Good Jury. A jury of which the members are selected from the list of special jurors. See Vickery v. L. B. & S. C. R. Co., L. R. 5, C. P. 155.

Goods and Chattels, the general denomination of things personal, as distinguished from things real, or lands, tenements, and hereditaments. See CHATELS.

Goodwill, the advantage or benefit which is acquired by a business, beyond the mere value of the capital, stock, funds, or property employed therein, in consequence of the general public patronage and encouragement which it receives from constant or habitual customers. It is considered a subject of sale along with the stock and premises.

Goole, a breach in a sea wall or bank; a passage worn by the flux and reflux of the sea.—16 & 17 Car. II. c. 11.

Gooroo guru, a spiritual guide.—Indian.

Gorce, or Gors, a wear, pool, or pit of water.—Termes de la Ley.

Gore, a narrow slip of land.—Par. Ant. 393.

Gossipred, compaternity, spiritual affinity.—Canon Law.

Gote, a ditch, sluice, or gutter. 23 H. VIII. c. 5.

Government, that form of fundamental rules and principles by which a nation or state is governed; the state itself.—Locke on Government; Montesquieu's Spirit of Laws.

Government Annuities. In 1833 the Act 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 14 enabled the industrious classes to make provisions for themselves by purchasing, on advantageous terms, a government annuity for life or term of years. By the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 45, this act, as well as the 7 & 8 Vict. c. 83, amending it, were repealed, and the old law in relation to the purchase of government annuities through the medium of saving banks, was consolidated. By 27 & 28 Vict. c. 43, and 45 & 46 Vict. c. 51, 'The Government Annuities Acts,' 1864 and 1882, and other 'Government Annuities Acts,' additional facilities were afforded for the purchase of such annuities, and for assuring payments of money on death, the latter act allowing the purchase of an annuity of any amount not exceeding 100*l.* a year, the limit under the Act of 1864 having been 50*l.* a year. See ANNUITIES.

Goyend, land immediately next to a village.—Indian.

Grace, a faculty, license, or dispensation; also general and free pardon by act of parliament.

Grace, Days of, time of indulgence granted to an acceptor for the payment of his bill of exchange. It was originally a gratuitous favour (hence the name), but custom has rendered it a legal right.

The number of these days varies according to the ancient custom or express law prevailing in each particular country. In the United Kingdom, by the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 61, s. 14, 'where a bill' [i.e., a bill of exchange or promissory note] 'is not payable on demand, the day on which it falls due is determined as follows:—Three days, called days of grace, are, in every case where the bill itself does not otherwise provide, added to the time of payment, as fixed by the bill, and the bill is due and payable on the last day of grace,' with a proviso that where the last day of grace falls on Sunday, Christmas-day, or Good Friday, or a public fast or thanksgiving day, the bill is payable on the preceding business days, or on the succeeding business day if the last day of grace is a bank holiday (other than Christmas-day or Good Friday), or if the last day of grace is a Sunday, and the second a bank holiday. For a table showing the number of days allowed in other countries, see Byles on Bills, 11th ed., 205, 206.

The law of the place where the bill is payable governs the allowance or non-allowance of the days of grace.

Gradient (adj.), moving by steps; the deviation of railways from a level surface to an inclined plane.

Graduates, scholars who have taken a degree in an university.

Gradus [Lat.] (a step or degree).

Gradus parentelæ, a pedigree; a table of relationship.

Graffer, a notary, or scrivener.—5 H. 8, c. 1.

Graffio, Gravio, a landgrave or earl.—Cowel.

Graffum, a writing-book, register, or cartulary of deeds and evidences.—Cowel.

Graile, a gradual or book containing some of the offices of the Roman Church. The holy graile was the vessel out of which our Lord was believed to have eaten at the Last Supper.—Cowel.

Grain, the twenty-fourth part of a penny-weight.—Troy Weight.

Grain, Poisoned, Act, prohibiting the use of, 26 & 27 Vict. c. 113.

Grainage, an ancient duty in London under which the twentieth part of salt imported by aliens was taken.

Grammar schools, Endowed. See 3 & 4 Vict. c. 77. See also ENDOWED SCHOOLS.

Grammatica falsa non vitiat chartam. 9 Co. 48.—(False grammar does not vitiate a deed.)

Granatarius, an officer who kept the corn-chamber in a religious house.

Grand assize, a peculiar species of trial by jury, introduced in the time of Henry II., giving the tenant or defendant in a writ of right the alternative of a trial by battle, or by his peers. Abolished by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 13.

Grand cape. See CAPE.

Grand Costumier of Normandy, an ancient book of great authority, containing the ducal customs of Normandy, probably compiled since the time of Richard I.—Hale's Hist. Com. Law, c. vi.

Grand distress, Writ of, formerly issued in the real action of quare impedit, when no appearance had been entered after the attachment; it commanded the sheriff to distrain the defendant's lands and chattels in order to compel appearance. It is no longer used, 23 & 24 Vict. c. 126, s. 26, having abolished the action of quare impedit, and substituted for it the procedure in an ordinary action.

Grand jury, an inquisition composed of not less than twelve nor more than twenty-three good and lawful men of a county, returned by the sheriff to every session of the peace, and every commission of oyer and terminer, and of general gaol delivery, who inquire, present, do, and execute all those things which on the part of our lady the queen shall then and there be commanded them. Grand jurymen at the Assize Courts ought to be freeholders; but to what amount is uncertain. 2 Hale P. C. 154.

The grand jury are previously instructed in the articles of their inquiry, by a charge from the judge. They then withdraw to sit, and receive indictments, which are preferred in the name of the Queen, but at the suit of any private prosecutor, and they are only to hear evidence on the part of the prosecution: for the finding of an indictment is only in the nature of an inquiry or accusation, afterwards to be tried; and the grand jury only inquire upon their oaths whether there be sufficient cause to call upon the party accused to answer it.

When the grand jury have heard the evidence, if they think it a groundless accusation, they endorse upon the bill of indictment, 'not a true bill,' or 'not found'; the bill is then thrown out, and the party accused discharged. But a fresh bill may afterwards be preferred to a subsequent grand jury. If they are satisfied of the truth of the accusation, they endorse 'a true bill'; the indictment is then found, and the party stands indicted. A majority of the grand jury must agree, i.e., not less than twelve.—4 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 361.

By 19 & 20 Vict. c. 54, the foreman of a grand jury is empowered to administer the oath to witnesses.

Grand larceny, stealing to above the value of twelve pence. Abolished by 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 29, s. 2.

Grand serjeanty, an ancient holding by military service. See TENURE.

Grange [Fr.], a farm furnished with barns, granaries, stables, and all conveniences for husbandry.—Co. Litt. 5 a.

Grangearius, a keeper of a grange or farm.

Grangia [low Lat.], a grange.—Co. Litt. 5 a.

Grant [fr. garantir, Fr., Junius and Skinner; but Minshew thinks gratuito, or perhaps gratia, gratificor, Lat.], a Common Law conveyance, operating by transmutation of possession.

This deed was originally confined to the transfer of incorporeal hereditaments and expectant estates, of which livery of seisin could not be given. But the distinction between property lying in livery and in grant, as regards the conveyance of the immediate freehold, is abolished by 8 & 9 Vict. c. 106, s. 2, which provides that all real property shall be transferable as well by grant as by livery. The operative verb is 'grant,' which, by s. 4 of the same statute, is not to imply any covenant in law in respect of any hereditaments except by force of any act of parliament. Railway acts provide that the operative word 'grant' in conveyances to and by the company shall imply the usual covenants for title; and under the Acts 6 Anne, c. 35, s. 30, and 8 Geo. II. c. 6, s. 35, relating to the registration of deeds in the East and North Riding of Yorkshire, the verbs 'grant,' 'bargain,' and 'sell,' will amount to express covenants for title, unless especially restrained by particular words. This provision is extended by 6 Anne c. 35, s. 34, to the West Riding, where the consideration-money exceeds 50*l*.

This conveyance has become the usual mode of transferring realty. A corporation can convey by grant.

A grant of personalty is more properly termed an assignment or a bill of sale.

The Queen's grants are matters of record, and are either letters-patent or writs close.

Grant to uses. This is the common grant with uses superadded, and has become the favourite mode of transferring realty.

Grantee, he to whom any grant is made.

Grantor, he by whom a grant is made.

Grantz, grantees.—Jacob.

Grass-hearth, the feudal service of turning up the earth with a plough.—Paroch. Antiq. 496.

Grasson, or Grassum, a fine paid upon the transfer of a copyhold estate.

Grass-week, rogation week, so called anciently in the Inns of Court and Chancery.

Gratis, without reward.

Gratis dictum, a voluntary statement.

Gratuitous bailment. See BAILMENT.

Gratuitous deeds, instruments made without binding consideration.

Gratuitous trustees, Act to amend the law in Scotland relative to the resignation, powers, and liabilities of, 24 & 25 Vict. c. 84, explained by 26 & 27 Vict. c. 115.

Grava, a little wood or grove.—Co. Litt. 4 b.

Gravamen, the substantial grievance or complaint.

Gravare et Gravatio, an accusation or impeachment.—Leg. Ethel. c. xix.

Gray's Inn, an Inn of Court. See INNS OF COURT.

Great cattle, all manner of beasts except sheep and yearlings.

Great charter, Magna Charta, which see.

Great seal [clavis regni, Lat.], the emblem of sovereignty, introduced by Edward the Confessor. By Art. 24 of the Union between England and Scotland (5 Anne, 8), it was provided that there should be one Great Seal for the United Kingdom, to be used for sealing writs to summon the parliament, and for sealing treaties with foreign states, and all public acts of state which concern the United Kingdom, and in all other matters relating to England, as the Great Seal of England was then used; and that a seal in Scotland should be kept and made use of in all things relating to private rights or grants, which had usually passed the Great Seal of Scotland, and which only concern offices, grants, commissions, and private rights within Scotland. On the Union between Great Britain and Ireland no express provision was made by any of the Articles of Union as to the establishing one Great Seal for the United Kingdom; but various acts as to the summoning parliament, etc., are required to be done under the Great Seal of Ireland; and by s. 3 of the Acts of Union, 39 & 40 Geo. III. c. 67 (British), and 40 Geo. III. c. 38 (Irish), it is enacted that the Great Seal of Ireland may, if His Majesty shall so think fit, after the Union, be used in like manner as before the Union (except where it is otherwise provided by the Articles of Union), within that part of the United Kingdom called Ireland. As to forging these seals, see FORGERY.

Great Seal (Offices) Act, 1874, 37 & 38 Vict. c. 81. This Act makes provision for the abolition of various offices connected with the Great Seal; such as those of the Messenger of the Great Seal, Clerk of the Petty Bag, Clerk of the Patents, and Pursebearer to the Lord Chancellor.

Great tithes, so called to distinguish them from tithes often granted by the name of small tithes to a vicar. It is difficult to define them with certainty. Thus much, however, is clear, that of the three kinds of tithes—mixed, personal, and predial—the two former are small tithes; and of the latter, it seems that tithes of corn, hay, wood, and of other herbs which are sown in large quantities, such as flax, hemp, etc., are great tithes. See Bac. Abr. Tythes; Com. Dig. Dismes (G).

Gree, satisfaction for an offence committed or injury done.—Cowel.

Greek Kalends, an expression to signify a time indefinitely remote, there being no such division of time known to the Greeks.

Green Cloth. The counting-house of the king's household was commonly called the Green Cloth in respect of the green cloth upon the table whereat the lord steward, the treasurer of the king's house, and other inferior officers sat:—(1) For daily taking the accounts for all expenses of the household. (2) For making provisions for the household, according to the laws and statutes of the realm. (3) For making of payments for the same. (4) For the good government of the king's servants.

(5) For payment of the wages of the king's servants. The officers of the counting-house never held plea of anything.—4 Inst. 131.

Greenhew or Greenhue, vert in forests, etc.—Mannv. 2, c. vi., n. 5.

Greenland Fisheries. See SEAL FISHERY ACT, 1875.

Green Silver, a feudal custom in the manor of Writtel, in Essex, where every tenant whose front door opens to Greenbury shall pay a halfpenny yearly to the lord, by the name of green silver or rent.—Cowel.

Greenwax, estreats delivered to a sheriff out of the Exchequer, under the seal of the Court, which was impressed upon green wax, to be levied.—7 Hen. IV. c. 3.

Greenwich Hospital. See 7 & 8 Wm. III. c. 21; 10 Geo. IV. c. 26; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 22; 9 & 10 Vict. cc. 9, 10; 10 & 11 Vict. c. 54; 11 & 12 Vict. c. 82; 12 & 13 Vict. c. 28; 13 & 14 Vict. cc. 24, 40; 19 & 20 Vict. c. 15; 28 & 29 Vict. c. 89; and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 44, which authorized the Admiralty to transfer invalids from Greenwich Hospital to naval hospitals or infirmaries, and to substitute pensions in lieu of maintenance in or at the expense of Greenwich Hospital. As to the application of the Revenues of the Hospital see 35 & 36 Vict. c. 67.

Gregorian Code. See CODEX GREGORIANUS.

Gregorian Epoch, the time from which the Gregorian calendar or computation dates, i.e., from the year 1582. See CALENDAR.

Grenville Act, 10 Geo. III. c. 16, by which the jurisdiction over parliamentary election petitions was transferred from the whole House of Commons to select committees. Repealed by 9 Geo. IV. c. 22, s. 1.

Gretna Green Marriage, a marriage celebrated at Gretna, in Dumfries (bordering on the county of Carlisle), in Scotland. By the law of Scotland a valid marriage may be contracted by consent alone, without any other formality. See PER VERBA DE PRÆSENTI. When the Marriage Act, 26 Geo. II. c. 33, rendered the publication of banns (or a license) necessary in England, it became usual for persons who wished to marry clandestinely, to go to Gretna Green, the nearest part of Scotland, and marry according to the Scotch law; so a sort of chapel was built at Gretna Green, in which the English marriage service was performed by the village blacksmith. But by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 96, s. 1, after 31st December, 1856, no marriage contracted in Scotland by declaration, acknowledgment, or ceremony is valid, unless one of the parties had, at the date thereof, his or her usual place of residence there, or had lived in Scotland for twenty-one days next preceding such marriage, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary notwithstanding.

Greve [fr. gerefa, or rather, reve, Sax.], a word of power or authority.—Cowel.

Grimgribber [fr. Grimoire, Fr., a conjuring book in the old French romances, or perhaps the art of necromancy itself], the jargon used as a cover for legal sophistry.—Div. of Purl. 36, and notes.

Grith, peace, protection. — Termes de la Ley.

Grithbreche, breach of the peace.—Cowel.

Grithstole, a place of sanctuary.—Cowel.

Gronna, a deep pit or place where turfs are dug to burn.—Hoved. 438.

Groom porter, formerly an officer belonging to the royal household.—Jacob.

Groom of the stole [fr. στολή, Gk., a robe], an officer of the royal household, who has charge of the king's wardrobe.

Gross, absolute, entire. A thing in gross exists in its own right, and not as an appendage to another thing.

Gross weight, the whole weight of goods and merchandize, including the dust and dross, and also the chest or bag, etc., upon which tare and tret are allowed.

Grosse bois, timber.—Cowel.

Grossment enceinte, pregnancy in its later stages.

Grotius, the greatest European writer on International Law. He was born at Delft, in Holland, in 1585, A.D. His greatest work is 'De Jure Pacis et Belli.'

Groundage, a custom or tribute paid for the standing of shipping in port.—Jacob.

Ground-annual, a ground rent.

Ground Game Act, 1880, 43 & 44 Vict. c. 41, giving to occupiers concurrent rights with owners to kill hares and rabbits. See HARES.

Ground-rent, a periodical payment for the privilege of building on another's land.

Ground-writ. By the C. L. P. Act, 1852, c. 121, 'It shall not be necessary to issue any writ directed to the sheriff of the county in which the venue is laid, but writs of execution may issue at once into any county, and be directed to and executed by the sheriff of any county, whether a county palatine or not, without reference to the county in which the venue is laid, and without any suggestion of the issuing of a prior writ into such county.'

Before this enactment, a ca. sa. or fi. fa. could not be issued into a county different from that in which the venue in the action was laid, without first issuing a writ called a ground-writ into the latter county, and then another writ which was called a testatum writ, into the former. The above enactment abolished this useless process. See EXECUTION.

Grouse. See GAME.

Growth halfpenny, a rate paid in some places for the tithe of every fat beast, ox, or other unfruitful cattle.—Clayton's Rep. 92.

Gruarii, the principal officers of a forest.

Guage, the measure or width of a railway, fixed, with some exceptions, at 4 feet 8½ inches in Great Britain, and 5 feet 3 inches in Ireland, by 9 & 10 Vict. c. 57.

Guarantee, he to whom a guaranty is made. See GUARANTY.

Guarantee by Companies Act, 1867, 30 & 31 Vict. c. 108, repealed, and new provisions substituted, by the Government Officers Security Act, 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 64).

Guarantor, he who makes a guaranty.

Guaranty, or Guarantee, a promise to a person to be answerable for the payment of a debt or the performance of a duty by another, in case he should fail to perform his engagement. An offer to guarantee until it be accepted is not binding. At the Common Law a guarantee need not have been in writing, but the Statute of Frauds, 29 Car. II. c. 3, s. 4, enacts that 'No action shall be brought whereby to charge the defendant upon any special promise to answer for the debt, default, or miscarriage of another, unless the agreement upon which such action shall be brought, or some memorandum or note thereof, shall be in writing, and signed by the parties to be charged by the contract, or some other person thereunto by him lawfully authorized.' In case of guarantees, great inconvenience had resulted from the construction put upon the above section, viz., that the consideration for the promise of the guarantor must appear upon the written instrument. To remedy this, the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 97 was passed, by which no promise to answer for the debt, etc., of another, is to be deemed invalid to support an action, by reason that the consideration does not appear in writing or by inference from writing (s. 3). The consideration must, however, exist. By s. 4 of the same act, no promise to answer for the debt, etc., of another made to a firm consisting of two or more persons, or to a single person trading under the name of a firm, and no promise to answer for the debt, etc., of a firm consisting of two or more, or of one trading under the name of a firm, is binding after a change in any of the firm, or in the person trading under the name of a firm; unless the attention of the parties to that effect appear expressly or by necessary implication from the nature of the firm or otherwise. Consult De Colyar on Guarantees.

As to guarantees of persons holding situations of trust under government by companies, societies, or associations, see Government Officers Security Act, 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 64, repealing 30 & 31 Vict. c. 108.

Guardage, state of wardship.

Guardian, or Warden of the Cinque Ports, a magistrate who has the jurisdiction of the ports or havens, which are called the Cinque Ports. This office was first created amongst us, in imitation of the Roman policy, to strengthen the sea-coasts against enemies, etc.—Camd. Br. 238.

Guardian de l'eglise, a churchwarden.

Guardian de l'estemary, the warden of the stannaries or mines in Cornwall, etc.

Guardian of the peace, a warden or conservator of the peace.

Guardian of the spiritualities, the person to whom the spiritual jurisdiction of any diocese is committed during the vacancy of the see.

Guardian of the temporalities, the person to whose custody a vacant see or abbey was committed by the Crown.

Guardians of the poor. First constituted by 22 Geo. III. c. 83 (Gilbert's Act), repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1871, are elected in 'unions' or parishes, as the case may be, by ratepayers and owners, within 40 days after the 25th March in every year, to serve for a year, under the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1834, 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 76, ss. 38 et seq. as amended by s. 17 of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, and other acts, and 'The Election of Guardians Consolidated Order, 1877.' Each voter has from one to six votes in proportion to the property qualifying him to vote. County justices of the peace are guardians ex officio.

Guardianship. The custody of infants involves the voluminous subject of guardianship, or temporary parentage which arises at the death of the father, or when the infant is taken away from its parents.

In modern times, guardians may be said to be of five kinds :—

(1) Testamentary. By the 12 Car. II. c. 24, s. 8, where any person has at the time of his death a child under twenty-one and unmarried, the father, whether such child be born at the time of his decease, or in ventre sa mere, or whether such father be within the age of twenty-one, or of full age, may by deed executed [or if such father be of full age, by last will in writing, executed in the presence of two witnesses (7 Wm. IV. and 1 Vict. c. 26, s. 7)], dispose of the custody and tuition of such child till twenty-one, or less, to any person in possession or remainder, and such disposition is good against all persons claiming his custody or tuition; and the guardian may bring trespass against any who takes away or detains him, and recover damages for the use of the child. By ss. 9, 10, the guardians have the custody of the lands and personal estate till twenty-one, and may bring such actions as guardians in socage may. The act is not to alter the custom of London, or other city or town, or of Berwick. This guardianship supersedes all others, being a continuation of the parental authority, and a mere personal trust; it is not assignable, but determines by death. If the guardian, being an unmarried woman, marry, the office is not transferred to her husband, but she continues to act herself. The mother cannot appoint a guardian to her children under this act though a widow; the statute is confined to fathers.

(2) Customary.—This guardianship is entirely local, and depends altogether upon the law of the particular place where it exists. It is found in copyhold manors, ancient corporations, and gavelkind lands. The father's authority of appointing a guardian under the 12 Car. II. c. 24, does not extend to copyhold property.

(3) Ad litem.—Every court in which an infant as one of the suitors has power to appoint a guardian for the purpose of protecting such infant's interest in the proceedings instituted. See 2 Chit. Arch. Prac., 13th ed., 1019, and Smi. Ch. Pr. 57. By the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XIII., r. 1, provision is made for the appointment of such a guardian in all cases where an infant or lunatic not so found by inquisition is defendant, and has not appeared to a writ duly served; and by Ord. XVI., r. 8, it is provided that infants may defend any action by a guardian appointed for that purpose.

(4).—By appointment of Chancery.—This Court had power to appoint a guardian, to protect the interests of an infant-ward, where there was no guardian already. The guardian was usually of the same religion as the infant's parents, solvent, and of a moral, capable, and humane character, residing in England. The Court would, if practicable, and not disadvantageous to the infant, give the preference to the father, who is primâ facie and naturally entitled to the custody of his children (even as against their mother), if seven years old. Next to the father's right is that of the testamentary or statute-guardian, whose authority is hardly to be distinguished from the father's, deriving his title from the parent by the act quoted above. The wardship of infants and the care of infants' estates, is continued to the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, by the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 34.

(5) Guardian in tort, or by intrusion (tutor alienus).—This is an indirect guardianship, arising from a person intruding into an infant's property; if he receive the profits belonging to the infant, he must account for them in Chancery, being regarded as the infant's trustee.

There are five other species of guardians recognised by our law, which have now become obsolete or comparatively rare:—

(1) Guardian by nature (jure nature).—To this guardianship the father has the first title, and should he not appoint one, pursuant to 12 Car. II. c. 24, then the mother, and afterwards the other ancestors, can claim it. Only an heir apparent, either male or female, can be the subject of this guardianship, which merely extends to the infant's person, and endures until majority.

(2) Guardian in socage, or by the common law (jure gentium).—This guardianship occurs only when an infant is legally entitled in possession to socage land by descent, and is in such of the infant's next of blood, as cannot possibly become entitled to the land upon the infant's death.

There are two kinds: Guardian by right (tutor proprius); and (2) Guardian by possession and claim (tutor alienus).

It is a personal trust for the infant's benefit, both as to his person and estate, and cannot be devised, assigned, or transmitted by succession, or forfeited by outlawry or attainder. On the guardian dying or becoming incapacitated, it devolves upon the next relation in blood, who can never become entitled to the land; he cannot be removed. It determines when the infant, male or female, attains fourteen (or fifteen in gavelkind land). Such guardian is superseded by the father's testamentary guardian.

A guardian per cause de ward exists only in socage land; it occurs when an infant in ward is guardian to another, in which case the wardship of the first infant draws after it that of the second.

(3) Guardianship for nurture arises when the infant has neither land nor guardian, the father or mother possessing the right, for its education and governance. It cannot be assigned. It certainly continues until the age of fourteen (Reg. v. Clarke, 7 E. & B. 186); and, in the case of a female infant, has been held to continue until the age of sixteen.—Reg. v. Howes, 30 L. J. (M. C.) 47. As to the infant's property, this guardian is very much on the same footing as a stranger.

(4) Guardian by the election of the infant.—In the absence of a guardian the infant may, after fourteen, choose one for himself. The election is frequently made before a judge in equity, or on circuit, but this is not necessary. The infant's election does not supersede the power of Chancery to appoint another, if advantageous.

The advisable course is always to apply to the Court to appoint a guardian.

(5) Guardianship by appointment of the Ecclesiastical Court.—Since the constitution of the Court of Probate this claim of the Ecclesiastical Courts is extinct.

In treating of guardianship, two questions naturally arise : (1) Whether the authority of a guardian over the person of his ward is local, and confined to the place of his domicile, or extends everywhere? (2) Whether the authority of the guardian over the property of his ward is local, or extends everywhere? The better opinion seems to be, that the guardian's authority extends everywhere, in both cases.—Story's Conf. of Laws, c. xiii.

Guastald, one who had the custody of the royal mansions.

Gubernator [Lat.], a pilot or steersman.

Guest-taker, an agistor; one who took cattle in to feed in the royal forests.—Cowel.

Guidage, a reward for safe conduct through a strange land or unknown country.—Cowel.

Guidon de la Mer, a treatise on maritime law, written in Rouen in 1671.

Guild [fr. gildan, Sax., to pay or contribute], a company, fraternity, or corporation, associated for some commercial purpose.

Guildhall, the chief hall of a city or borough-town, for holding courts, and for the meeting of the corporation in order to make laws for the regulation of the city or town, and to administer summary justice. See TOWN HALL.

Guildrents. See GILDRENT, GULTWIT.

Guilt (v. n.) [fr. wiglian, bewiglian, gewiglian, A. S., to conjure, to divine, and hence to practise, cheat, imposture, and enchantment; the past participle of gewiglian is gewigled, guiled, guilt.—Tooke. Others say it is derived from gildan, A. S., to pay a tax, and originally signified the fine or mulct paid for an offence, and afterwards the offence itself], sin, wickedness, crime, criminality.

Guilty; having committed a crime or tort; the word used by a prisoner in pleading to an indictment when he confesses the crime of which he is charged, and by the jury in convicting.

Guinea, a coin formerly issued by the mint, but all these coins were called in temp. Wm. IV.; the word now means only the sum of 1*l.* 1*s.*, in which denomination the fees of counsel and physicians are always given.

Gule of August, the first day of that month.—F. N. B. 62; Plow. 316.

Gules, the heraldic name of the colour usually called red. The word is derived from the Arabic word gule, a rose, and was probably introduced by the Crusaders. Gules is denoted in engravings by numerous perpendicular lines. Herald's who blazoned by planets and jewels called it Mars, and ruby.

Guiltwit, or Guiltwit, amends for a trespass.

Gun barrels. As to proof of, see 31 & 32 Vict. c. cxiii., repealing 18 & 19 Vict. c. cxlviii.

Gun-cotton. As to the making, sale, etc., of gun-cotton, see the Explosives Act, 38 Vict. c. 17.

Gun License. A duty of 10*s.* for every such license is imposed by 33 & 34 Vict. c. 57.

Gunmakers' Company. See GUN BARRELS.

Gunge, a granary, a depôt, chiefly of grain for sale. Wholesale markets held on particular days. Commercial depôts.—Indian.

Gunpowder. As to the making, keeping, sale, and carriage of gunpowder, see 38 Vict. c. 17. This Act repeals the 23 & 24 Vict. c. 139; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 130; and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 98. As to the exportation of gunpowder see also Customs Consolidation Act, 1876.

Gurgites [Lat.], wears.—Jacob.

Guti and Gotti, Goths, Jutæ or Getæ, who left Germany and came to inhabit this island.—Leg. Edw. Conf. c. 35.

Gwabr merched, a payment or fine made to the lords of some manors, upon their tenants' daughters marrying or committing incontinency.—Jacob. See MERCHETA MULIERUM.

Gwalstow, a place of execution.—Jacob.

Gwayf, that which has been stolen and afterwards dropped in the highway for fear of a discovery.—Cowel.

Gylput, the name of a court which was held every three weeks in the liberty or hundred of Pathbew in Warwick.—Jacob.

Gynarcy, or Gynæcocracy, government by a woman; a state in which women are legally capable of the supreme command, e.g., in Great Britain and Spain.

Gypsies. The first of the laws against gypsies, 22 Hen. VIII. c. 10, describes this people, who were then new comers in this country, as 'outlandish persons calling themselves Egyptians, using no craft or feat of merchandise, who have come into this realm and go from shire to shire and place to place in great company, and used great, subtle, and crafty means to deceive the people, bearing them in hand, that they by palmestry could tell men's and women's fortunes; and so many times by craft and subtilty have deceived the people of their money, and also have committed many heinous felonies and misdemeanors.' It was enacted, that if any such persons came within the realm, they should forfeit all their goods and chattels, and should leave the kingdom, within fifteen days after command so to do, upon pain of imprisonment.—4 Reeves, c. xxx., 490.

Both this act and the still more severe 1 & 2 P. & M. c. 4, have been repealed, as acts not in use, by the 19 & 20 Vict. c. 64. Fortune-tellers are, however, punishable under the Vagrant Act, 5 Geo. IV. c. 83, and, eo nomine, any gipsy encamping on a highway or turnpike road by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 50, s. 72, and 3 Geo. IV. c. 126, s. 121.

Gyves [fr. gevyn, Wel.], fetters or shackles for the legs.

Habeas corpora juratorum (that you have the bodies of the jurors), a process which issued out of the Court of Common Pleas, commanding the sheriff to summon a jury. The practice was similar to the distringas from the Queen's Bench and Exchequer for the same purpose. Abolished by C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 104.

Habeas Corpus Act, the 31 Car. II. c. 2, providing the great remedy for the violation of personal liberty by the writ of habeas corpus ad subjiciendum, which see below.

Habeas corpus ad faciendum et recipiendum (that you have the body to do and receive), a common law writ which issues out of the Supreme Court, when a person is sued in some inferior jurisdiction, and is desirous to remove the action into the superior court. It commands the inferior judges to produce the body of the defendant together with the day and cause of his caption and detainer, to do and receive whatever the Queen's Court shall consider in that behalf. It is also called a habeas corpus cum causa, which see; and consult 2 Chit. Arch. Prac., 12th ed., 1320.

Habeas corpus ad prosequendum (that you have the body to prosecute), a writ that issues when it is necessary to remove a prisoner, in order that he may be tried in the proper jurisdiction.—3 Bl. Com. 130.

Habeas corpus ad respondendum (that you have the body to answer), a writ which formerly issued when one had a cause of action against another, who was confined by the process of some inferior court, in order to remove the prisoner, and charge him with the new cause of action in the court above.—Ibid. No longer used.

Habeas corpus ad satisfaciendum (that you have the body to satisfy), when a plaintiff had obtained judgment in one of the superior Courts against a defendant, who was in the prison of an inferior court at the suit of another, he might, by this writ, bring up the prisoner to the superior court in order to charge him in execution.—Ibid. Rendered unnecessary by C. L. P. Act, 1852, s. 127.

Habeas corpus ad subjiciendum (that you have the body to answer). This, the most celebrated prerogative writ in the English law, is a remedy for a person deprived of his liberty. It is addressed to him who detains another in custody, and commands him to produce the body, with the day and cause of his caption and detention, and to do, submit to, and receive whatever the judge or court shall consider in that behalf. The writ is applied for either by motion to a court or application to a judge, supported by an affidavit of the facts. If a probable ground be shown that the party is imprisoned without cause, and has a right to be delivered, this writ ought of right to be granted to every man committed or detained in prison or otherwise restrained, though by command of the sovereign, the Privy Council, or any other power. Therefore there is an absolute necessity of expressing upon every commitment the reason for which it is made, that a court upon a habeas corpus may examine, and according to the circumstances of the case, may discharge, admit to bail, or remand the prisoner.

The Habeas Corpus Act, 31 Car. II. c. 2, enacts: (1) That on complaint and request in writing, by or on behalf of any person committed and charged with any crime (unless committed for treason or felony expressed in the warrant; or as, or on suspicion of being accessory before the fact to any felony, or upon suspicion thereof, plainly expressed in the warrant; or unless committed or charged in execution by legal process), the Lord Chancellor, or any of the judges in vacation, upon viewing a copy of the warrant or affidavit that a copy is denied, shall (unless the party has neglected, for two terms, to apply to any Court for his enlargement) award a habeas corpus for such prisoner, returnable immediately, before himself or any of the judges; and upon the return made shall discharge the party, if bailable, upon giving security to appear and answer to the accusation. (2) Such writs shall be endorsed, as granted in pursuance of this act, and signed by the party awarding them. (3) The writ shall be returned and the prisoner brought up within a limited time according to the distance, not exceeding twenty days. (4) Officers and keepers neglecting to make due returns, or not delivering to the prisoner or his agent, within six hours after demand, a copy of the warrant of commitment, or shifting the custody of a prisoner from one to another without sufficient reason or authority (specified in the act), shall for the first offence forfeit 100*l.*, for the second 200*l.* to the party grieved, and be disabled to hold their office. (5) No person once delivered by habeas corpus shall be recommitted for the same offence, on penalty of 500*l.* (6) Every person committed for treason or felony shall, if he require it, the first week of the next term, or the first day of the next session of oyer and terminer, be indicted in that term or session, or else admitted to bail; unless the witnesses for the Crown cannot be produced at that time; and if acquitted, or if not indicted and tried in the second term or session, he shall be discharged from imprisonment for such imputed offence; but no person, after the assizes be opened for the county in which he is detained, can be removed by habeas corpus till the assizes are ended; but is left to the judges of assize.

The writ of habeas corpus was rendered more actively remedial by the statute of Charles II., but it is founded on the broad basis of magna charta, and is the principal bulwark of English liberty.

This statute extends only to the case of commitments for such criminal charges as can produce no inconvenience to public justice by a temporary enlargement of the prisoner; all other cases of unjust imprisonment being left to the habeas corpus at Common Law, now regulated by 56 Geo. III. c. 100, which provides:—(1) That where any person is restrained of his liberty (otherwise than for some criminal or supposed criminal matter, and except persons imprisoned for debt, or by process in any civil suit), any baron of the Exchequer, or justice of either bench, shall upon probable and reasonable ground for such complaint, award in vacation a writ of habeas corpus, under the Seal of his Court, directed to the person in whose custody the party is, returnable immediately before himself or any other judge of the Court. (2) Upon disobedience, the judge may issue a warrant to arrest the party. (3) If the writ be awarded so late in vacation that it cannot be obeyed during vacation, it may be made returnable in the Court to which the judge by whom it is awarded belongs, in the next term. (4) That if such writ be awarded by the Court itself, so late that it cannot be obeyed during the term, it may be made returnable in the next vacation before any judge. (5) Though the return to the writ be good in law, the judge before whom it is returnable may proceed to examine into the facts, and if it be doubtful whether they be true, may let to bail the person confined; upon his entering into a recognizance to appear in the Court in the next term, the Court may proceed to examine into the facts, summarily, and to order as to the ing, or remanding of the party. (6) The like proceeding on the truth of the return may be had where the writ is awarded by the Court itself, or is returnable therein. (7) These provisions extend to all writs of habeas corpus awarded in pursuance of the 31 Car. II. c. 2.

Besides the efficacy of the writ of habeas corpus in liberating the subject from illegal confinement in a public prison, it also extends its influence to remove every unjust restraint of personal freedom in private life, though imposed by a husband or a father; but when women and infants are brought before the Court by a habeas corpus, they will only be set free from an unmerited or unreasonable confinement, and the Court will not determine the validity of a marriage, or the right to guardianship, but will hold them at liberty to choose whither they will go; and if there be reason to apprehend that they will be seized in returning from the Court, they will be sent home under the protection of an officer. If a child is too young to have any discretion of its own, the Court will deliver it into the custody of its parent, or the person who appears to be its legal guardian. See 3 Bl. Com. 131; 3 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 642; and 3 Burr. 1434. 25 & 26 Vict. c. 20, enacts that no writ of habeas corpus shall issue out of any of the Courts in England into any colony or foreign dominion of the Crown where Her Majesty has a lawfully established court of justice, having authority to grant and issue the said writ, and to ensure the due execution thereof throughout such colony or dominion. See 30 & 31 Vict. c. 35, s. 10, as to bringing up persons indicted, and who are in gaol for some other offence.

Habeas corpus ad testificandum (that you have the body to testify), a writ to bring a witness into Court, when he is in custody at the time of a trial. This is provided for by 43 Geo. III. c. 140, and 44 Geo. III. c. 102. He must be a material witness, and willing to attend. The Court will not grant this writ to bring up a prisoner at war; an application must be made to the Secretary of State. Under the 16 & 17 Vict. c. 30, s. 9, the Secretary of State may issue a warrant or order for bringing up witnesses in gaol (where not in gaol under civil process); and by 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 31, a similar power of compelling the attendance of a person in custody, in order that he may be examined, is given to a judge of a county court.

Habeas corpus cum causâ (that you have the body with the cause), a writ which a defendant may have to remove himself from one prison to another; also a writ to remove a cause from an inferior court into a superior court when the defendant is in custody in the Court below.—2 Chit. Arch. Prac. As to habeas corpus in Chancery, see Sm. Ch. Pr. 119.

Habemus confitentem reum. We have an accused person who confesses the whole charge.

Habendum of a deed, that part of a conveyance, etc., which determines the quantity of interest conveyed; but should the quantity be expressed in the premises, then the habendum may lessen, enlarge, explain, or qualify; but not contradict, or be repugnant to the estate granted in the premises. See DEED.

Habentia, riches.—Mon. Angl. t. 1, 100.

Habere facias possessionem (that you cause to have possession), a writ that issues for a successful plaintiff in ejectment, to put him in possession of the premises recovered. If the first writ be not executed, an alias, etc., may be sued out. The officer, if necessary, may break open outer doors, in order to give possession, or he may take the posse comitatus with him if he fear violence.—1 Chit. Arch. Prac., 12th ed., 1045. By the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. XLVIII., it is provided that a judgment that a party do recover possession of any land may be enforced by writ of possession in manner heretofore used in actions of ejectment in the Superior Courts of Common Law (r.1). Where by any judgment any person therein named is directed to deliver up possession of any lands to some other person, the person prosecuting such judgment shall, without any order for that purpose, be entitled to sue out a writ of possession on filing an affidavit showing due service of such judgment and that the same has not been obeyed (r. 2).

Habere facias seisinam (that you cause to have possession), a writ addressed to the sheriff to give seisin of a freehold estate recovered by ejectione firmæ or other action.—O. N. B. 154.

Habere facias visum (that you cause to have view), a writ that lay in divers cases in real actions, as in formedon, etc., where a view was required to be taken of the lands in controversy. See FORMEDON.

Habergeon, a diminutive of hauberk, a short coat of mail without sleeves.—Blount.

Haberjects, a cloth of a mixed colour.—Magna Charta, c. 26.

Habit and repute. By the law of Scotland marriage may be established by habit and repute where the parties cohabit and are at the same time held and reputed as man and wife.—Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Habitatio. The nature of this personal servitude is not obvious. Some jurists confound it with the right to use a house; but Justinian declares it to be quite distinct, both from the jus utendi and the jus fruendi. For whilst the jus utendi is one and entire, the habitatio is a series of rights arising from day to day, so that in bequeathing it you make a separate bequest, in fact, for each day; hence, also, it was not extinguished by non-user. Justinian added the further distinction, that it might be let.—Cum. C. L. 95, and Sand Just., 5th ed., 131.

Habitual Criminals Act, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 99. By this act power was given to apprehend on suspicion convicted persons holding license under the Penal Servitude Acts, 1853, 1857, and 1864. The act was repealed and replaced by the Prevention of Crimes Act, 1871, 34 & 35 Vict. c. 112. See PREVENTION OF CRIMES ACT, 1871.

Habitual Drunkard. Defined by the Habitual Drunkards' Act, 1879, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 19, which authorizes confinement in a retreat, upon the party's own application, as 'a person, who, not being amenable to any jurisdiction in lunacy, is, notwithstanding, by reason of habitual intemperate drinking of intoxicating liquor, at times dangerous to himself, or herself, or others, or incapable of managing himself or herself, or his or her affairs.' See DRUNKENNESS.

Hable, a seaport town.—27 Hen. VI. c. 3.

Hackney coaches. The provisions relating to these vehicles in large towns are contained in the Town Police Clauses Act, 1847, 10 & 11 Vict. c. 89, s. 37 et seq., incorporated by the Public Health Act, 1875, 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, s. 171, and in the metropolis in the 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 22, amended by 6 & 7 Vict. c. 86, which repeals all previous acts on the subject; 13 & 14 Vict. c. 7; 16 & 17 Vict. cc. 33, 127; 23 & 24 Vict. c. 113; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 64; 30 & 31 Vict. c. 134, s. 17; and 32 & 33 Vict. c. 115.

Hadbote, a recompense for an affront offered to a priest.—Cowel.

Haderunga [fr. had, Sax., person, and arung, honoured], respect of persons; partiality.—Cowel.

Hadgonel, a tax or mulct.—Jacob.

Hæreda [Goth.], court-leet.

Hærede abducto, an ancient writ that lay for the lord, who having by right the wardship of his tenant under age, could not obtain his person, the same being carried away by another person.—Old N. B. 93.

Hærede deliberando alteri qui habet custodium terræ, an ancient writ, directed to the sheriff to require one that had the body of an heir being in ward, to deliver him to the person whose ward he was by reason of his land.—Reg. Orig. 161.

Hærede raptio, an ancient writ that lay for the ravishment of the lord's ward.—Reg. Orig. 163.

Hæredes proximi, heirs begotten; children.

Hæredes remotiores, heirs not begotten, as grandchildren, great grandchildren, etc., descending in a direct line in infinitum.

Hæredipeta, the next heir to lands.

Hæreditas, alia corporalis, alia incorporalis; corporalis est, quæ tangi potest et videri; incorporalis quæ tangi non potest nec videri. Co. Litt. 9.—(An inheritance is either corporeal or incorporeal: corporeal, is that which can be touched and seen: incorporeal, that which can neither be touched nor seen.) As to the division of the hæreditas in the Civil Law, see Sand. Just., 5th ed., 261 et seq. Hæreditas, sensu objectivo, comprehends the entire state left by a deceased person or complexus bonorum defuncti; sensu subjectivo, it is the jushæreditarium, or right attaching thereupon.

Hæreditas est successio in universum jus quod defunctus habuerat. Co. Litt. 237.—(Inheritance is the succession to every right which the deceased had.)

Hæreditas jacens. An estate in Scotland is said to be in hereditate jacente when, after the ancestor's death, no title to it has been made up in the person of his heir.—Bell's Dict.

Hæreditas nunquam ascendit. Glan. 1, 7, c. i.—(Inheritance never ascends.) This feudal maxim was exploded by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106, s. 6. See CANONS OF INHERITANCE.

Hæreditas, n'est pas tant solement entendue l'ou' home ad terres ou tenements per discent d'enharitage, mes auai chescun fee simple ou tail que home ad per son purchase puit estre dit enheritance, pur ceo que ses heirs luy purront enheriter. Co. Litt. 26.—(Inheritance does not only comprehend all the lands and tenements which a man has by descent from his ancestors, but also every fee-simple or fee-tail which he has by purchase is called inheritance, because his heir can inherit it from him.)

Hæres est aut jure proprietatis aut jure representationis. 3 Rep. 40.—(An heir is such by right either of property or of representation.)

Hæres est nomen juris, filius est nomen naturæ. Bac. M. Reg. 11.—('Heir,' is a name of right, 'Son' is the name of nature.)

Hæres factus, an heir appointed; a devisee.

Hæres hæredis mei est meus hæres.—(The heir of my heir is my heir.)

Hæres legitimus est quem nuptie demonstrant. Co. Litt. 7 b.—(He is the lawful heir whom wedlock declares.)

Hæres minor uno et viginti annis non respondet, nisi in casu dotis. Moore, 348.—(An heir under twenty-one years of age is not answerable, except in the matter of dower.)

Hæres natus, an heir born; an heir by descent.

Hæres non tenetur in Angliâ ad debita antecessoris reddenda, nisi per antecessorem ad hoc fuerit obligatus præterquam debita regis tantum. Co. Litt. 386.—(In England the heir is not bound to pay his ancestor's debts, unless he be bound to it by the ancestor, except debts due to the king.)

But now, by 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 104, he is liable.

Hæretico comburendo (De), an ancient writ against a heretic, who having been convicted of heresy by the bishop, abjured it, and afterwards fell into the same again, or some other, and was thereupon delivered over to the secular power in order that he might be burnt.—F. N. B. 269.

Hafne, a haven or port.—Cowel.

Haga, a house in a city or borough.—Scott.

Hagia, a hedge.—Mon. Angl. tom. 2, p. 273.

Haia, a park enclosed.—Cowel.

Hailworkfolk (i.e., holywork folk), those who formerly held lands by the service of defending or repairing a church or monument.—Bailey.

Hainault, Forest of. As to its disafforesting, see 14 & 15 Vict. c. 43; and as to the allotment of commons, 21 & 22 Vict. c. 37.

Haketon, a military coat of defence.

Hale, Sir M., author of a work on the Pleas of the Crown. See PLEAS OF THE CROWN.

Half-blood, one not born of the same father and mother, who can now inherit by virtue of 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 106.

Half-brother, a brother by the father or mother's side only.

Half-deal, a moiety, or half of a thing.

Half-mark, a noble, or 6s. 8d. in money.

Half-seal, that which was used in the Chancery for sealing of commissions to delegates, upon any appeal to the Court of Delegates either in ecclesiastical or marine causes. Abolished.

Half-Timer. A child, who, by the operation of the Factory and Education Acts, is employed for less than the full time in a factory or workshop, in order that he may attend some 'recognised efficient school.' See Factory and Workshop Act, 1878, s. 23; Elementary Education Act, 1876, s. 11.

Half-tongue, a jury de medietate linguæ, empaneled to try foreigners. Since the 33 & 34 Vict. c. 14, foreigners are no longer entitled to this privilege.

Half-a-year, 182 days, and not six lunar months.—Cro. Jac. 166.

Halimass, the feast of All Saints, on the 1st of November, one of the cross quarters of the year, was computed from Halimass to Candlemass.

Halke, a hole.—Jacob.

Hallage, tolls paid for goods or merchandise vended in a hall.—6 Rep. 62.

Hanging, the mode of capital punishment which has been used in this country from time immemorial. See EXECUTION OF CRIMINALS AND CAPITAL FELONIES. As to the manner in which death occurs in cases of hanging, consult Beck's Med. Jur. 616.

Hanging in chains. In atrocious cases it was at one time usual for the Court to direct a murderer, after execution, to be hanged upon a gibbet in chains near the place where the murder was committed, a practice abolished by 4 & 5 Wm. IV. c. 26.

Hangwite, or Hangwit, a liberty to be quit of a felon or thief hanged without judgment, or escaped out of custody.—Rastal.

Hanig, customary labour.

Hanseatic, pertaining to the Hanse Towns, or to their confederacy. The Hanse Towns in Germany were commercial cities associated for the protection of commerce as early as the twelfth century. To this confederacy acceded commercial cities in Holland, England, France, Spain, and Italy, until they amounted to seventy-two; which for centuries commanded the respect and defied the power of kings. From the middle of the fifteenth century, the power of the confederacy, though still formidable, began to decline. This was not owing to misconduct on the part of its leaders, but to the progress of that improvement it had done so much to promote. The civilization, which had been at first confined to the cities, gradually extended over the contiguous country; and feudal anarchy was everywhere superseded by a system of subordination and the progress of the arts. At present it only consists of Hamburg, Lübeck, and Bremen; and they, indeed, possess merely the shadow of their former state.

Hansgrave, the chief of a company; the head man of a corporation.

Hantelode, an arrest.—Jacob.

Hap, to, to catch.—Cowel.

Hagne, a little hand-gun.—33 Hen. VIII. c. 6.

Hard labour, a punishment said to have been introduced by 5 Anne c. 6. It may be added in most cases to the sentence of imprisonment, and the mode of working out the sentence is regulated by the 34th and 35th regulations of the Prison Act, 1865, as amended by s. 37 of the Prison Act, 1877.

Hare, a beast of warren. Is 'game' within the Game Acts and Game Certificate Acts (see GAME), but by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 29, the occupier and the owner may kill hares without a certificate, and by the Ground Game Act, 1880, 43 & 44 Vict. c. 47, the occupier has, 'incident to and inseparable from his occupation,' a concurrent right with any other person to kill hares and rabbits on the land occupied. The Hares Preservation (Ireland) Act, 1879, 42 & 43 Vict. c. 23, following 27 Geo. III. c. 35, an act of the Irish Parliament repealed in the same year, makes the period between 20th April and 12th August a close time for hares in Ireland.

Harness, all warlike instruments (Hoved. 725); also the tackle or furniture of a ship.

Haro, Harron, an outcry after felons and malefactors.—Jacob.

Haugh, or Howgh, a green plot in a valley.

Haur, hatred.—Leg. W. 1, c. 16.

Hauthoner, a man armed with a coat of mail.—Jacob.

Havens [fr. havn, Dan.; haven, Dut., fr. hæfen, A. S., fr. habban, to have or hold], that which holds or contains ships, a port or harbour. To secure the marine revenue, the sovereign has the prerogative of appointing ports and havens for persons and merchandise to pass into and out of the realms. By the feudal laws all navigable rivers and havens were computed among the regalia, and subject to the sovereign of the state. The English sovereign is lord of the whole shore, and guardian of the ports and havens, which are the inlets and gates of the realm. Legal ports were, at first, assigned by the Crown; to each of them a court of portmote is incident, the jurisdiction of which must flow from the royal authority; the great ports of the sea are referred to as well known and established by 4 Hen. IV. c. 20, which prohibits the landing elsewhere under pain of confiscation; and the 1 Eliz. c. 11, recites that the franchise of landing and discharging had been frequently granted by the Crown. But though the sovereign had a power of granting the franchise of havens and ports, yet he had not a power of resumption, or of narrowing and confining their limits when once established; but any person had a right to load or discharge his merchandise in any part of the haven; whereby the revenue of the customs was much impaired and diminished, by fraudulent landings in obscure and private corners. This occasioned the 1 Eliz. c. 11; and 13 & 14 Car. II. c. 11, s. 14 (both abolished by 6 Geo. IV. c. 105), which enabled the Crown by commission to ascertain the limits of all ports, and to assign proper wharves and quays in each port for the exclusive landing and loading of merchandise. And by 46 Geo. III. c. 153, no pier, quay, wharf, jetty, breast, or embankment can be erected in or near to any public harbour without one month's notice to the Admiralty; saving the privileges of the city of London.—2 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 499. See 16 & 17 Vict. c. 107; and HARBOURS.

Haw, a small parcel of land so called in Kent; houses.—Co. Litt. 5.

Haward. See HAYWARD.

Hawberk, or Hawbert, he who held land in France, by finding a coat or shirt of mail, with which he was to be ready when called upon. See FIEF D'HAUBERT.

Hawgh, a valley.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Hawkers and Pedlars, persons who carry their goods from place to place for sale. The 50 Geo. III. c. 41, imposed a license duty on them, and made various provisions in regard to their trade. After many other acts (see 52 Geo. III. c. 108; 6 Geo. IV. c. 80, ss. 138—142; 1 & 2 Wm. IV. c. 22; 22 & 23 Vict. c. 36; 24 & 25 Vict. c. 21, ss. 4—9; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 18, s. 8, and c. 56, s. 7; 29 & 30 Vict. c. 64, ss. 11—14; and 33 & 34 Vict. c. 72), the 34 & 35 Vict. c. 96 was passed, which now regulates the exercise of the calling of hawkers and pedlars. See PEDLARS.

Hay, a hedge or enclosure; a net to take game.—Jacob.

Hay-bote, a liberty to take thorns and other wood to make and repair hedges, gates, fences, etc., either by tenant for life or years; also wood for the making of rakes and forks. See BOTE.

Hayward, one who keeps a common herd of cattle of a town, and the reason of his being so called may be, because one part of his office is to see that they neither break nor cross the hedges of enclosed lands; or because he keeps the grass from hurt and destruction. He is an officer appointed in the lord's court, to look to the fields and impound cattle trespassing thereon; to see that no pound breaches be made, and if any be, to present them to the leet, etc.—Kitch. 46.

Hazard, an unlawful game by 18 Geo. II. c. 34.

Headborough, the head of a borough; a constable. See CONSTABLE.

Head-courts, certain tribunals in Scotland, abolished by 20 Geo. II. c. 50.—Ersk. i. 4, 5.

Head-land, the upper part of land left for the turning of the plough, whence the head-way.—Paroch. Antiq. 587.

Head-pence, an exaction of a certain sum collected by the Sheriff of Northumberland from the inhabitants of that county, without any account thereof to be made to the Crown. Abolished by 23 Hen. VI. c. 7.

Head-silver, dues paid to lords of leets ; also a fine of 40*l.* which the Sheriff of Northumberland exacted of the inhabitants twice in seven years.

Heafodweard, one of the services to be rendered by a thane, but in what it consisted seems uncertain.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Healfang, or Halsfang [fr. hals, Sax., neck, and fang, to seize], the pillory ; also a pecuniary mulct, to commute for standing in the pillory.

Healgemote, a court-baron ; an ecclesiastical court.

Health. The principal offences against the public health are, those against the Quarantine, Adulteration, Vaccination, and Public Health Acts. See PUBLIC HEALTH.

Hearing, the trial of an action in the Chancery Division of the High Court by a judge without a jury ; an investigation of a controversy. See TRIAL.

Hearsay evidence. It is a general principle in the law of evidence, that if any fact is to be proved against any one, it ought to be proved in his presence by the testimony of a witness sworn to speak the truth : and the reason of the rule is, that the person who is to be affected by the evidence ought to have an opportunity of interrogating the witness as to his means of knowledge, and concerning all the particulars of his statement. Hearsay evidence (whether spoken or written) of a fact, therefore, is not admissible. And this rule is extended to affidavits, which, except on interlocutory motions, when statements as to belief with the grounds thereof are admissible, must be confined to facts which the deponent can prove of his own knowledge (Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. XXVII., r. 3).

The following cases, however, are clearly distinguishable from hearsay evidence :—

(1) The testimony of a deceased witness, who has been examined upon oath, on the trial of a former action between the same parties, and where the point at issue was the same, is admissible on the trial of the second action, and may be proved by one who heard him give evidence ; for such evidence on the former trial was not given in an extra-judicial manner, but upon oath ; the parties to the suit were the same, and an opportunity was given for cross-examination. The person called to prove what a deceased witness said must repeat his very words, and not merely swear to their effect.

(2) Hearsay is often admitted in evidence, as part of the res geste or transaction, which is the subject of inquiry ; the meaning seems to be, that where it is necessary in the course particular act, or the intention of the party who did the act, proof of what the person said at the time of doing it is admissible in evidence, for the purpose of showing its true character.

The exceptions to the general rule as to the inadmissibility of hearsay evidence are the following : (1) dying declarations ; (2) hearsay in questions of pedigree ; (3) hearsay on questions of public right, customs, boundaries, etc. ; (4) admissibility of old leases, rent-rolls, surveys, etc. ; (5) admissibility of declarations against interest ; (6) admissibility of rectors' and vicars' books.—Consult Roscoe and Taylor on Evid., s. 507 et seq.

Hearth-money, a tax levied by 14 Car. II. c. 10. It was productive of great discontent, and was abolished by 1 W. & M. st. 1, c. 10.

Hebbermen, were fishermen or poachers below London Bridge, who fished for whittings, flounders, smelts, etc., commonly at ebbing water. Punishable by 4 Hen. VII. c. 15.

Hebberthef, the privilege of claiming the goods and trial of a thief within a certain liberty.

Hebbing-wears, a device for catching fish in ebbing water.—23 Hen. VIII. c. 5.

Hebdomad, a week ; a space of seven days.

Hebdomadius, a week's man, canon, or prebendary in a cathedral church, who has the care of the choir and the officers belonging to it, for his own week.—Red. Epis. Hereford MSS.

Heccagium, rent paid to a lord of the fee for a liberty to use the engines called hecks.

Heck, an engine to take fish in the river Ouse.—23 Hen. VIII. c. 18.

Heda, a small haven, wharf, or landing-place.—Old Records.

Hedagium, toll or customary dues at the hithe or wharf, for landing goods, etc., from which exemption was granted by the Crown to some particular persons and societies.

Hedge-bote, materials to make hedges, which a lessee for years, etc., may of common right take from the land leased. See BOTE.

Hedge-priest, a vagabond priest in olden time.

Hegemony, the leadership of one among several independent confederate states.

Hegira, the epoch or account of time used by the Arabians and the Turks, who begun their computation from the day that Mahomet was compelled to escape from Mecca, which happened on Friday, July 16, A.D. 622, under the reign of the Emperor Heraclius. As the years of the Hegira consist of only 354 days, it is found by subtracting 622 from our year, and then multiplying by 365·52, and dividing by 354.

Heir [fr. heire, Old Fr. ; hæres, Lat.], a of a cause, to inquire into the nature of a person who succeeds by descent to an estate of inheritance. It is nomen collectivum, and extends to all heirs; and under heirs, the heirs of heirs are comprehended in infinitum.

The different kinds of heirs may be thus classed and defined:—

(a) Heir apparent. He whose right of inheritance is indefeasible, provided he outlive the ancestor: as the eldest son, who must by the course of the common law be heir to his father on his death.—3 Prest. Abst. 5.

(β) Heir by custom. He who is heir by a particular and local custom, as in borough-English lands, the youngest son succeeds his father, while in gavelkind lands, all the sons inherit as parceners, and make but one heir.—Co. Litt. 140.

(γ) Heir by devise, or hæres factus. He who is made, by will, the testator's heir or devisee, and has no other right or interest than the will gives him.

(δ) Heir general, or heir at law. He who, after his father or ancestor's death, has a right to inherit all his lands, tenements, and hereditaments.

(ε) Heir presumptive. He who, if the ancestor should die immediately, would be his heir, but whose right of inheritance may be defeated by the contingency of some nearer heir being born; as a brother or nephew, whose presumptive succession may be destroyed by the birth of a child; or a daughter, whose present hopes may be hereafter cut off by the birth of a son.

(ζ) Hæres sanguinis et hæreditatis. (Heir of the blood and inheritance.) A son who may be defeated of his inheritance by his father's displeasure.

(μ) Heir special. An heir who is not heir at common law, e.g., heir by the custom of gavelkind, borough-English, or heir-in-tail. See Co. Litt. 376 b, 386 b.

(θ) Ultimus hæres. He to whom lands come by escheat or forfeiture, for want of proper heirs, or on account of treason or felony. He is either the lord of the manor or the Crown. But escheat or forfeiture for treason or felony is now abolished by 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23.

In the Scotch law, heir has a more extended significance, comprehending not only those who succeed to lands, but successors to personal property also. See Erskine's Institutes, b. 3, tit. 8, s. 47 et seq.

Heirdom, succession by inheritance.

Heiress, a female heir. Where there are several, they are called co-heiresses.

Heirloom [fr. hæres, Lat., heir, and geloma, Sax., goods], personal chattels, such as charters, deeds, and evidences of title, which go to the heir, together with the inheritance.

The term 'heirlooms' is often applied in practice to the case where certain chattels—for example, pictures, plate, or furniture—are directed by will or settlement to follow the limitations thereby made of some family mansion or estate. But the word is not then employed in its strict and proper sense, nor is the disposition itself beyond a certain point effectual; for the articles will, in such case, belong absolutely to the first person who, under the limitations, would take a vested estate of inheritance in them supposing they had been real estate; and if he die intestate, will pass to his personal representative, and not to his heir.—Co. Litt. 18 b, 185 b.; and see 2 Steph. Com., bk. ii, pt. ii.

The 37th section of the Settled Land Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 38, provides that 'where personal chattels are settled on trust, so as to devolve with land until a tenant in tail by purchase is born or attains the age of 21 years, or so as otherwise to vest in some person becoming entitled to a freehold estate of inheritance in the land,' a tenant for life may, by order of the Chancery Division of the High Court, sell the chattels or any of them, the proceeds of the sale to be dealt with as 'capital trust money' under the act, or under the trusts of the settlement.

Heirship moveables, those things which the law withholds from the executors and next of kin, and gives to the heir, that he may not succeed to a house and lands completely dismantled. They consist of the best of everything; furniture, horses, cows, oxen, farming utensils, etc., but do not include fungibles.—Scotch Law.

Hell, a place under the Exchequer Chamber, where the king's debtors were confined.—Richard. Dict.

Helm, thatch or straw; a covering for the head in war; a coat of arms bearing a crest; the tiller or handle of the rudder of a ship.

Helowe-wall [fr. hælan, Sax., to cover], the end-wall covering and defending the rest of the building.—Paroch. Antiq. 573.

Helsing, a Saxon brass coin, of the value of a halfpenny.

Hemoldborh, or Helmelborch [fr. heimild, O. N.; hjemmel, Dan., just claim to a thing; and bohr], a title to possession. The admission of this old Norse term into the laws of the Conqueror is difficult to be accounted for; it is not found in any Anglo-Saxon law extant.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Henchman, a page; an attendant; a herald.

Henedpenny, a customary payment of money instead of hens at Christmas; a composition for eggs.—Cowel.

Henfare, a fine for flight on account of murder.—Domesday Book.

Hengen, a prison for persons condemned to hard labour.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Hengham (de), Radulph, author of a law-treatise composed in the reign of Edward I. It consists of two parts: one called Summa Magna, and the other Summa Parva. It seems to be a collection of notes relating to proceedings in actions.

Henghen, a prison; a house of correction.

Hengwite. See HANGWIT.

Heordfæte, or Hudefæst, a master of a family, keeping house, distinguished from a lower class of freemen—viz., folgeras (folgarii), who had no habitations of their own, but were house-retainers of their lords.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Heordpenny, Peter-pence.—Cowd.

Heordwerch, the service of herdsmen, done at the will of their lord.

Heptarchy [fr. ἑπτὰ, Gk., and ἀρχή], a government exercised by seven persons, or a nation divided into seven governments. In the year 560, seven different monarchies had been formed in England by the German tribes, namely, that of Kent by the Jutes; those of Sussex, Wessex, and Essex by the Saxons; and those of East Anglia, Bernicia, and Deira by the Angles. To these were added, about the year 586, an eighth, called the kingdom of Mercia, also founded by the Angles, and comprehending nearly the whole of the heart of the kingdom. These states formed what has been designated the Anglo-Saxon Octarchy, or more commonly, though not so correctly, the Anglo-Saxon Heptarchy, from the custom of speaking of Deira and Bernicia under the single appellation of the kingdom of Northumberland.

Herald [fr. here, Sax., an army, and heald, a champion; hérault, héraut, Fr.; herald, Ger.; araldo, Ital.; because it was part of his office to charge or challenge unto battle or combat], an officer who registers genealogies, adjusts ensigns armorial, regulates funerals, and carries messages between princes, and proclaims war and peace. Heraldry were anciently called dukes at arms, probably from the Latin ducere ad arma; because the conducting of affairs concerning peace and war devolved upon them, their office being to carry messages to the enemy, and to proclaim war or peace. Hence the persons of heralds were deemed sacred by the law of nations, and were received and protected by belligerent powers, as flags of truce are in the present day. The three chief heralds are called Kings of Arms; of whom (1) Garter is the principal, instituted by Henry V. His office is to attend the knights of the garter at their solemnities, and to marshal the funerals of the nobility. (2) Clarenceux, King of Arms, ordained by Edward IV., so called from the Duke of Clarence. He is to marshal and dispose the funerals of the inferior nobility on the south side of the Trent. (3) Norroy (North Roy), King of Arms, holds a similar department on the north side of the river Trent. These two last are denominated provincial heralds, because they divide the kingdom between them into provinces. Besides the kings of arms, there are six subordinate heralds, according to their original, as they were created to attend dukes and great lords in martial expeditions, i.e., York, Lancaster, Chester, Windsor, Richmond, and Somerset; the four former were instituted by Edward III., and the two latter by Edward IV. and Henry VIII. To these, upon the accession of George I. to the Crown, on account of his Hanoverian dominions, a new herald was added, called Hanover herald; and another styled Gloucester King of Arms.

To the superior and inferior heralds are added four others, called marshals or pursuivants of arms, who commonly succeed in the places of such heralds as die or are promoted; they are denominated blue-mantle, rouge-croix, rouge-dragon, and portcullis. See POURSUIVANT and HERALDS' COLLEGE.

Lord Lyon's Office in Scotland, and Ulster King of Arms in Ireland, are distinct and independent.—Encyc. Lond.

Heraldry: (1) The science of heralds, see last Title. (2) An old and obsolete abuse of buying and selling precedence in the paper of causes for hearing.—See North's Life of Lord-Keeper Guildford, vol. i., 435.

Heralds' College, an ancient royal corporation, first instituted by Richard III., in 1483, situated on St. Bennet's Hill, near St. Paul's, in the city of London. The above-named heralds, together with the earl marshal and a secretary, are the members of this corporation; in all thirteen persons. The heralds' books, compiled when progresses were solemnly and regularly made into every part of the kingdom, to inquire into the state of families, and to register such marriages and descents as were verified to them upon oath, are allowed to be good evidence of pedigrees.—3 Stark. Evid. 843. See HERALD.

The Herald's office is still empowered to make grants of arms and to permit change of names. See SURNAMES.

Herbagium anterius, the first crop of grass or hay, in opposition to after-math or second cutting.—Paroch. Antiq. 459.

Herbenger, or Harbinger, an officer in the royal house, who goes before, and allots the noblemen and those of the household their lodgings; also, an innkeeper.

Herbergagium, lodgings to receive guests in the way of hospitality.—Cowel.

Herbergare, to harbour; to entertain.

Herbergatus, spent in an inn.—Cowel.

Herbery, or Herbury, an inn.—Cowel.

Herce, Hercia, a harrow.—Fleta, 1, 2, c. lxxvii.

Herciare, to harrow.—4 Inst. 270.

Herdewich, or Herdewic, a grange or place for cattle or husbandry.—Mon. Angl. part 3.

Herdwerch, Heordwerch, herdsman's work, or customary labour, done by shepherds and inferior tenants, at the will of the lord.—Cowel.

Herbannum, a mulct for not going armed into the field when summoned.—Spelm.

Herbote, the royal edict, summoning the people to the field.—Cowel.

Hereditaments, every kind of property that can be inherited; i.e., not only property which a person has by descent from his ancestors, but also that which he has by purchase, because his heir can inherit it from him. The two kinds of hereditaments are corporeal, which are tangible (in fact, they mean the same thing as land), and incorporeal, which are not tangible, and are the rights and profits annexed to, or issuing out of land.

The enumeration of incorporeal hereditaments in Hale's Analysis (p. 48), is the following:—Rents, services, tithes, commons, and other profits in alieno solo, pensions, offices, franchises, liberties, villeins, dignities. But Blackstone enumerates ten principal kinds: advowsons, tithes, commons, ways, offices, dignities, franchises, corodies or pensions, annuities, and rents.—Com. i. 21.

Although the word 'hereditament' applies both to realty and personalty, yet it is in a different mode of relation. When applied to realty it generally denotes the subject of property, apart from its nature and extent; but when applied to personalty, it does not then denote the subject, but signifies some inheritable right, of which the subject is susceptible.

There is a third application of this word—it is used to denote inheritable rights, relating to land, or something issuing therefrom or exerciseable therein, or having some local connection or relation distinct from the enjoyment of the land itself. In this view of the description, hereditaments divide themselves into real, personal, and mixed, and therefore, as was said before, they are applicable to all the kinds of property.—Fearn's Reading on the Stat. of Involments.

Hereditary right to the Crown. The Crown of England, by the positive constitution—tion of the kingdom, has ever been descendible, and so continues, in a course peculiar to itself, yet subject to limitation by parliament; but, notwithstanding such limitation, the Crown retains its descendible quality, and becomes hereditary in the prince to whom it is limited.—1 Bl. Com., chap. iii.

Herefare, a military expedition; a going to war.—Cowel.

Heregeld, a tribute or tax levied for the maintenance of an army.—Cowel.

Herellus, certain little fish, probably minnows.—Cowel.

Heremitorium, a place of retirement for hermits.—Mon. Angl., tom. 3, p. 18.

Heremones, or Hereteams, followers of an army.—Lamb. Leges Inae, cap. 5.

Herenach, an archdeacon.—Cowel.

Hereslita, Heressa, Heressiz, a hired soldier who departs without license.—4 Inst. 128.

Heresy [fr. αἵρεσις, Gk.], according to Blackstone, 'consists not in a total denial of Christianity, but of some of its principal doctrines publicly and obstinately avowed.' The 1 Eliz. c. 1, repealed all former statutes relating to heresy, leaving the jurisdiction of heresy as it stood at common law; that is, it left the simple offence to be visited by spiritual punishment in the Ecclesiastical Courts. Heresy now consists only of such tenets as have been heretofore so declared;—(1) By the words of the canonical Scriptures; (2) by the first four General Councils, or such others as have only used the words of the Holy Scriptures; or (3) which shall hereafter be so declared by parliament, with the assent of the clergy in convocation. By 9 & 10 Wm. III. c. 32, if any person having been educated in, or made profession of Christianity, shall, by writing, printing, teaching, or advised speaking, maintain that there are more Gods than one, or deny the Christian religion to be true, or the Holy Scriptures to be of divine authority, and be thereof convicted by two witnesses, he shall, unless he recant, incur certain civil disabilities, and on a second conviction, shall also suffer imprisonment for three years.

Heretoch [fr. here, an army, and teohan, to draw or lead], a general, leader, or commander; also a baron of the realm.—Du Fresne.

Heretum, a court or yard.—Jacob.

Herge [fr. exercitus, Lat.], offenders who joined in a body of more than thirty-five to commit depredations.—Ang. Sax.

Herigalds, a sort of garment.—Cowel.

Heriot [supposed by some to be derived fr. here, Sax., an army, and geat, provision.—Willis, 194. Coke derives it fr. here, lord, and geat, beste, i.e., the lord's beste.—Co. Inst. 135 b.], originally a tribute to the lord of a manor of the horse or habiliments of the deceased tenant's, in order that the militie apparatus might continue to be used for the purpose of national defence by each succeeding tenant. On the decline of the military tenures, the heriot was commuted for a money payment, or for the tenant's best beast (averium) or dead chattel.

The extinction of heriots was first attempted by 4 & 5 Vict. c. 35, s. 13. By the 'Copyhold Act, 1852,' s. 16, and the 'Copyhold Act, 1858,' s. 27, more effectual provisions are made for this purpose.

Herischild, military service, or knight's fee.—Cowel.

Heriscindium, a division of household goods.—Blount.

Herislit, laying down of arms.—Blount.

Heristall, a castle.—Spelm.

Heritable bond, a bond for money, joined with a conveyance of land or heritage, to be held by a creditor as security for his debt.—Scotch term.

Heritable jurisdiction, grants of criminal jurisdiction, anciently bestowed on great families in Scotland, with a view to the more easy administration of justice. Abolished by 20 Geo. II. c. 43.

Heritable rights, all rights to land, or whatever is connected with land, as mills, fishings, tithes, etc.—Scotch phrase.

Heritable securities in Scotland. See 23 & 24 Vict. cc. 15, 80.

Heritor, a landholder in a parish.—Scotch term.

Hermaphrodite. See DOUBTFUL SEX.

Hermaphroditus tum masculo quam fœmine comparatur secundum prevalentiam sexus incalescentis. Co. Litt.—(An hermaphrodite is to be considered male or female, according to the predominancy of the prevailing sex.)

Hermeneutics, the art of interpretation and construction.

Hermer, a great lord.—Jacob.

Hermitorium, the chapel or place of prayer belonging to a hermitage.

Hermogenian Code. See CODEX HERMOGENIANUS.

Hernesius, a heron.—Cowel.

Hernesium, or Hernasium, household goods; implements of trade or husbandry.—Cowel.

Heroudes, heralds.—Du Cange.

Herring (British White) Fisheries Act. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 26, and acts mentioned in the recital to that act; and see also 31 & 32 Vict. c. 45; 37 & 38 Vict. c. 25.

Herring silver was a composition in money for the custom of supplying herrings for the provision of a religious house.

Hesia, an easement.—Du Cange.

Hesta, Hestha, a little loaf of bread.

Hestcorn, vowed or devoted corn.—Cowel.

Hetæarcha [fr. ἑταῖρος, Gk., friend, and ἀρχή, government], the head of a religious house; the head of a college; the warden of a corporation.

Heuvelborgh, a surety for debt.—Du Fresne.

Heybote. See HAYBOTE.

Heyloed, a customary burden laid upon inferior tenants for mending or repairing the heys or hedges.—Cowel.

Heymectus, a hay-net; a net for catching conies.—Cowel.

Hibernagium, season for sowing winter corn.—Cowel.

Hidage, an extraordinary tax formerly payable to the Crown for every hide of land. This taxation was levied, not in money, but provision of armour, etc.—Cowel.

Hide and gain, arable land.—Co. Litt. 856.

Hide of land, such a space as might be ploughed with one plough, or as much as would maintain a family or mansion-house. According to some it was sixty acres; others make it eighty; and others, again, a hundred. The quantity, probably, was always determined by local usage. See Co. Litt. 69 a, and Cowel.

Hidel, a place of protection or sanctuary.—Cowel.

Hidgild, or Hidegild [fr. hide, A. S., skin, and gild, A. S., a contribution], a sum of money paid by a villein or servant to save himself from a whipping.—Fleta, l. 1, c. 47, s. 20.

Hierarchy [fr. ἱερός, Gk., sacred, and ἀρχή, government], direction in religious concerns and things sacred.

Of whatever denomination may be the persons who take the lead in conducting religious rites, whether they be styled presbyters, elders, ministers, priests, or bishops, they virtually, and according to the true and real meaning of the term, constitute a hierarchy. Hierarchy subsists as much among the chief ministers in the Church of Geneva or of Scotland as in the Church of Rome or of England.—Encyc. Lond.

Hierloom. See HEIRLOOM.

High Commission Court, established by 1 Eliz. c. 1. It was instituted to vindicate the dignity and peace of the church, by reforming and correcting the ecclesiastical state and persons, and all manner of errors, heresies, schisms, abuses, offences, contempts, and enormities. The powers of this tribunal were directed to tyrannical and unconstitutional purposes; it was therefore abolished by 16 Car. I. c. 11.—5 Reeves, 215.

High Constable. See CONSTABLE.

High Constable of England, Lord. His office has been disused (except only upon great and solemn occasions, as the coronation, or the like) since the attainder of Stafford, Duke of Buckingham, in the reign of Henry VII. See CHIVALRY, COURT OF.

High Court of Chancery. See CHANCERY.

High Court of Justice. By the Judicature Act, 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 66), the former Superior Courts of Law and Equity have been abolished, and in their place has been established a Supreme Court of Judicature (see that title), consisting of the Court of Appeal and the High Court of Justice. The High Court of Justice is a Superior Court of Record, and has vested in it, by s. 16 of the Act, amended by ss. 9 and 33 of the Judicature Act, 1875, the jurisdiction formerly exercised by the following Courts, viz: '(1) The High Court of Chancery; (2) The Court of Queen's Bench; (3) The Court of Common Pleas at Westminster; (4) The Court of Exchequer; (5) The Court of Admiralty; (6) The Court of Probate; (7) The Court for Divorce and Matrimonial Causes; (8) The Court of Common Pleas at Lancaster; (9) The Court of Pleas at Durham; (10) The Courts created by Commissions of Assize, of Oyer and Terminer, and of Gaol Delivery, or any such Commissions.'

With regard to the procedure of the High Court of Justice, see the various titles relating thereto, e.g., EXECUTION, JUDGMENT, PLEADING, TRIAL. See also DIVISIONS OF THE HIGH COURT.

High Court of Parliament. See PARLIAMENT.

High Misdemeanours. See MISPRISON.

High Steward, Court of the Lord, a tribunal instituted for the trial of peers indicted for treason or felony, or for misprison of either, but not for any other offence. The office is very ancient, and was formerly hereditary, or held for life, or dum benè se gesserit; but it has been for many centuries granted pro hac vice only, and always to a lord of parliament. When, therefore, such an indictment is found by a grand jury of freeholders in the Queen's Bench, or at the assizes before a judge of oyer and terminer, it is removed by a writ of certiorari into the Court of the Lord High Steward, which alone has power to determine it. A peer may plead a pardon before the Queen's Bench, in order to prevent the trouble of appointing a high steward, merely to receive the plea, but he cannot plead any other plea, because it is possible that, in consequence of such plea, judgment of death might be pronounced upon him.

The Sovereign, in case a peer be indicted for treason, felony, or misprison, appoints a Lord High Steward pro hac vice, by commission under the Great Seal, which reciting the indictment so found, gives him power to receive and try it secundum legem et consuetudinem Angliæ. When the indictment is regularly removed by certiorari, the Lord High Steward addresses a precept to a serjeant-at-arms, to summon the lords to attend and try the indicted peer. All the peers who have a right to sit and vote are summoned, twenty days before such trial, and every lord appearing and taking the oaths may vote upon the trial. The decision is by the majority, but a majority cannot convict, unless it consist of twelve or more.

During a session of parliament, the trial is not properly in the Court of the Lord High Steward, but before the High Court of Parliament. A Lord High Steward is, however, always appointed to regulate the proceedings; but he is rather in the nature of a speaker or chairman than a judge, for the collective body of the peers are the judges, both of law and fact, and the High Steward has a vote with the rest, in right of his peerage. But in the Court of the Lord High Steward, which is held in the recess of parliament, he is the sole judge of matters of law, as the lords triers are in matters of fact, and he may vote upon the trial and regulate all the proceedings.

The method and regulation of proceeding differs little from trial by jury, except that no special verdict can be given, because the judges are sufficiently competent to deal with the law as it arises out of the facts.—4 Bl. Com. 261.

High Steward of the Royal Household, Lord, Court of, a tribunal long since fallen into disuse.—9 Geo. IV. c. 31; 4 Inst. 133.

High Steward of the Universities, Court of the Lord. By the charter of 7 June, 2 Hen. IV., confirmed by 13 Eliz. c. 29, consuance is granted to the University of Oxford, of all indictments of treasons, insurrections, felonies, and mayhem, which shall be found in any of the Queen's courts against a scholar or privileged person; they are to be tried before the Lord High Steward or his deputy, who is nominated by the Chancellor of the University, and approved of by the Lord High Chancellor of England. A special commission is given to him and others, to try the indictment then depending, according to the law of the land, and the privileges of the University. The indictment must first be found by a grand jury, and the cognizance claimed of it in the first instance, or at the first day.

When the cognizance is allowed, if the offence be a misdemeanour, it is tried in the Chancellor's Court by the ordinary judge. If it be for treason, felony, or mayhem, it is determined before the Lord High Steward, who issues one precept to the sheriff of the county, who returns a panel of eighteen freeholders, and another to the university bedels, who return a panel of eighteen matriculated laymen. The indictment is then tried by a jury de medietate, half of freeholders, and half of matriculated laymen, in the guildhall there. The sheriff must execute the university process, to which he is bound by an oath.—4 Bl. Com. 277; and 4 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 325. The University of Cambridge has also a similar jurisdiction. By 19 & 20 Vict. c. 17, s. 18, the jurisdiction of the University of Cambridge, in criminal as well as other proceedings, wherein any person not a member of the university shall be a party, is taken away. See CHANCELLOR OF THE TWO UNIVERSITIES.

High treason. Since petit treason was abolished by 9 Geo. IV. c. 31, s. 2, the correlative term high is not now usually retained, when speaking of this the highest civil crime. It is merely denominated treason. See TREASON.

Highland Roads and Bridges Act, 1862, 25 & 26 Vict. c. 105.

Highness, a title of honour given to princes. The kings of England, before the time of James I., were not usually saluted with the title of Majesty, but with that of Highness. The children of crowned heads generally receive the style of Highness.

High-water-mark, that part of the sea-shore to which the waters ordinarily reach when the tide is highest.

High-wood, timber.

Highway-rate, a tax for the maintenance and repair of highways, chargeable upon the same property that is liable to the poor-rate. The rate is to be made and signed by the surveyor, who keeps accounts, which may be inspected at all reasonable times by the rated inhabitants, without fee or reward. The yearly account is laid before the vestry, and examined and passed before justices of the peace, at the special sessions of the highways. See Chitty's Statutes, vol. iii., tit. 'Highways.'

The Highway Rate Assessment and Expenditure Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 27, enacts that an order of a parish vestry for rating owners of small tenements instead of occupiers to the poor rate shall extend to the highway rate; that the 'valuation list' shall be conclusive for the purposes of the highway rate; and that the expenses incurred by a highway authority in maintaining milestones and fences shall be a lawful charge on the highway rate.

Highway robbery. See ROBBERY, and 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96.

Highways, public roads, which every subject of the kingdom has a right to use. They exist either by prescription, by authority of local acts of parliament, or by dedication to the use of the public.

The liability to keep highways in repair (in whatever manner they may happen to have first originated) is of common right, incumbent generally upon the parishes in which they respectively lie; but in some cases it attaches (by prescription) to particular townships, or other divisions of parishes, and occasionally to private persons bound ratione tenuræ, or in right of their estates, to repair some particular highway.

Highways in general are regulated by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 50 (amended by 4 & 5 Vict. cc. 51, 59; 8 & 9 Vict. c. 71; 25 & 26 Vict. c. 61; 27 & 28 Vict. c. 101; and 41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), which has repealed all former enactments on the subject, and is applicable to all highways whatever, except turnpike roads, and roads, pavements, or bridges, falling under the provisions of local acts of parliament, a description which applies generally to the streets of towns.

The general plan of the act is to place highways under the care of surveyors to be appointed for the respective parishes, subject to a superintending power to be exercised by the justices of the peace, at special sessions to be holden for the highways. By the Public Health Act, 1875, s. 144 (coming in place of previous enactments to the like effect), the powers and duties of surveyors of highways, and vestries under the Act of Wm. IV. are vested in urban authorities. By the 35 & 36 Vict. c. 79, s. 36, the powers of the Secretary of State, under the Highway and Turnpike Acts are transferred to the Local Government Board. Consult Glen or Shelford or Spearman on Highways, and see Chitty's Statutes, vol. iii., tit. 'Highways.' As to the use of locomotives on highways, see LOCOMOTIVES.

Higler, a person who carries from door to door and sells, by retail, provisions, etc.

Hikenilde Street, one of the four Roman roads of Britain, leading from St. David's to Tynemouth, thus described by Trevisa:— 'The fourthe is called Heykenyldestrete, and stretcheth forth by Worcestre, by Wycombe, by Byrmyngeham, by Lichefeld, by Derby, by Chestrefeld, by Yorke, and forth unto Tynmouthe.'—Polychron., l. 1, c. xlv.

Hilary Term. This was one of the law terms. It began on the 11th and ended on the 31st January in each year. It was an issuable term (1 Wm. IV. c. 70, s. 6). It was so called from Hilary, Bishop of Poitiers in France, a great champion of the Catholic faith against the Arians in the fourth century. By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 26, 'the division of the legal year into terms is abolished, so far as relates to the administration of justice.' See SITTINGS.

Hindeni Homines, a society of men. The Saxons ranked men into three classes, and valued them, as to satisfaction for injuries, etc., according to their class. The highest class were valued at 1200s. and were called twelf hindmen; the middle class at 600s. and called sexhindmen; the lowest at 200s. called twyhindmen. Their wives were termed hindas.—Brompt. Leg. Alfred. c. xii.

Hinde Palmer's Act, 32 & 33 Vict. c. 46, which abolished the priority of specialty (see SPECIALTY) over simple contract debts in the administration of the estate of a person dying after January 1st, 1870.

Hine, or Hind, a husbandry servant.

Hine fare, the loss or departure of a servant from his master.—Domesday.

Hinegeld. See HIDGILD.

Hirciscunda, the division of an inheritance among heirs.—Cowel.

Fireman, a subject.—Du Cange.

Hiring [locatio, conductio, Lat.], a bailment for a reward or compensation. It is divisible into four sorts:—(1) The hiring of a thing for use (locatio rei). (2) The hiring of work and labour (locatio operis faciendi). (3) The hiring of care and services to be performed or bestowed on the thing delivered (locatio custodiæ). (4) The hiring of the carriage of goods (locatio operis mercium vehendarum), from one place to another. The three last are but subdivisions of the general head of hire of labour and services.

The rights, duties, and obligations of the parties resulting from the contract of bailment for hire may be thus stated—

(I.) Hire of things. The letting to hire implies an obligation to deliver the thing to the hirer; to refrain from every obstruction to the use of it by the hirer during the period of the bailment; to do no act that shall deprive the hirer of the thing; to warrant the title and right of possession to the hirer, in order to enable him to use the thing, or to perform the service; to keep the thing in suitable order and repair for the purposes of the bailment; and, finally, to warrant the thing free from any fault inconsistent with the proper use or enjoyment of it. It is the duty of the person letting to hire, according to the Roman law, to disclose the faults of the thing hired, and practice no artful concealment, to charge only a reasonable price therefore, and to indemnify the hirer for all expenses which are properly payable by the person letting. The rights of the hirer are that he acquires that right of possession only of the thing for the particular period or purpose stipulated (but he acquires no property in it); and that he also acquires the exclusive right to the use of the thing during the time of the bailment. His duties are to put the thing to no other use than that for which it is hired; to use it well; to take care of it; to restore it at the time appointed; to pay the price or hire; and, in general, to observe whatever is prescribed by contract, or by law, or by custom. The contract may be dissolved or extinguished in respect to future liabilities in various ways: (1) by the mere efflux of the time, or the accomplishment of the object, for which the thing is hired; (2) by the loss or destruction of the thing by any inevitable casualty; (3) by a voluntary dissolution of the contract by the parties; and (4) by operation of law, as where the hirer becomes proprietor by purchase or otherwise of the thing hired. How far those principles, which are derived altogether from the Roman and foreign laws, are to be deemed satisfactorily established in our jurisprudence, is a matter for consideration, since the common law does not furnish any direct recognition of them. But it may be safely affirmed, that they are so consonant with general justice, and with the nature of the contract, that in the absence of any controlling authority, they may be used as fit guides to assist our general reasoning.

(II.) Hire of labour and services, divisible into two branches:—(a) Locatio operis faciendi, and (b) locatio operis mercium vehendarum, mentioned as the 2nd and 4th divisions of the four sorts of hiring above set forth.

(a) The locatio operis faciendi may be subdivided into two kinds:—(a) The hire of labour and services, or locatio operis faciendi, strictly so called: such are the hire of tailors to make clothes, of jewellers to set gems, and of watchmakers to repair watches; (b) locatio custodiæ (the third division first above mentioned), or the receiving of goods on deposit for a reward for the custody thereof, which is properly the hire of care and attention about the goods, as by warehousemen, wharfingers, etc.

(a) In contracts for work it is of the essence of the contract:—(1) That there should be work to be done; (2) that it should be to be done for a price or reward; and (3) that there should be a lawful contract between parties capable and intending to contract. The obligations and duties on the part of the employer, as deduced in the foreign law, are principally these:—(1) To pay the price or compensation; (2) to pay for all proper, new, and accessorial materials; (3) to do everything on his part to enable the workman to execute his engagement; (4) to accept the thing when it is finished. If before the work is finished, the thing perishes by internal defect, by inevitable accident, or by irresistible force, without any default of the workman, then, (1) if the work is independent of any materials or property of the employer, the manufacturer has the risk, and the unfinished work is lost to him; (2) if he is employed in working up the materials, or adding his labour to the property of the employer, the risk is with the owner of the thing, with which the labour is incorporated; (3) if the work have been performed in such a way as to afford a defence to the employer against a demand for the price, if the accident had not happened (as if it were defectively or improperly done), the same defence will be equally available to him after the loss. The obligations or duties on the part of the workman or undertaker are thus summed up in the foreign law:—To do the work; to do it at the time agreed on; to do it well; to employ the materials furnished by the employer in a proper manner; and, lastly, to exercise a proper degree of care and diligence about the work.

(b) The hiring of care and attention. To this class belong agistors of cattle, warehousemen, forwarding merchants, and wharfingers. They are bound to use ordinary diligence, and of course are responsible for losses by ordinary negligence.

(β) The locatio operis mercium vehendarum, or the carriage of goods for hire. In respect to contracts of this sort entered into by private persons, who do not exercise the business of common carriers, there does not seem to be any material distinction, varying the rights, obligations, and duties of the parties from those of other bailees for hire. Every such private person is bound to ordinary diligence, and to a reasonable exercise of skill; and of course he is not responsible for any losses not occasioned by the ordinary negligence of himself or of his servants. The exceptions to this general rule are postmasters, innkeepers, and common carriers. These are under peculiar regulations consonant with public policy. See those titles respectively. —Story on Bailments, c. vi.; Addison on Chitty on Contracts.

Hirst, or Hurst, a wood,—Domesday; Co. Litt. 4 b.

His testibus (these being witnesses), a phrase anciently added in deeds, after in cujus rei testimonium. The deed was read in the presence of witnesses, and their names were then written down. The phrase is not now inserted.

Hold (v. a. or v. n.), of a Court or Judge, to enounce a legal opinion. In strictness, a court 'holds,' and a single judge 'rules.'

Hold, or Wold, a governor or chief officer.—Gibb. Camd.

Holder, a payee or indorsee in possession of a bill of exchange or a promissory note.

Holder in due course, is 'a holder who has taken a bill of exchange [cheque or note] complete and regular on the face of it, under the following conditions: namely,

(a) That he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonoured, if such was the fact.

(b) That he took the bill [cheque or note] in good faith and for value, and that at the time it was negotiated to him he had no notice of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it.—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, 45 & 46 Vict. c. 61, s. 29.

Holding, a term used in the Agricultural Holdings Act to signify a farm; also in Scotch law to signify the tenure or nature of the right given by the superior to the vassal.—Bell's Dict.

Holding over, keeping possession of land by a lessee after the expiration of his term, whereby he usually becomes, if he pays subsequent rent, tenant from new year on the terms of the expired lease.—Hyatt v. Griffiths, 17 Q. B. 505.

A tenant wrongfully holding over premises of which the value does not exceed 50*l.* a year may be ejected by proceedings in the County Court under 19 & 20 Vict. c. 108, s. 50, or if the term do not exceed 7 years, or the rent 20*l.* a year, by proceedings before justices of the peace under 1 & 2 Vict. c. 74. See also DOUBLE RENT, DOUBLE VALUE.

Holiday, or Holyday, an anniversary feast; a time of festivity. Also called a red letter day. State holidays are either appointed by act of parliament or founded on ancient usage. Fast and thanksgiving days are occasionally appointed by royal proclamation.

By the Judicature Act, 1875, Ord. LXI., r. 4, it is provided that the several offices of the Supreme Court shall be open on every day of the year except Sundays, Good Friday, Monday and Tuesday in Easter week, Whit-Monday, Christmas-day, and the next following working day, and all days appointed by proclamation to be observed as days of general fast, humiliation, or thanksgiving. As to the former law on this subject, see 3 & 4 Wm. IV. c. 42, s. 43; Reg. Gen., H. T. 1853, r. 173, and Con. Ord. 1860, Ord. v., Rules 1—3. See also VACATION.

The Bank Holidays Act, 1871, 34 & 35 Vict. c. 17, provides that Easter Monday, the Monday in Whitsun-week, the first Monday in August, and the 26th day of December, if a week-day, shall be kept as close bank holidays in England and Ireland, and New-Year's day, Christmas-day (or, if either be a Sunday, the following day), Good Friday, the first Monday of May, and the first Monday of August, in Scotland; and also that bills of exchange and promissory notes due on bank holidays shall be payable on the following day. And this is further extended to docks, custom houses, Inland Revenue offices, and bonding warehouses, in England and Ireland, by 38 Vict. c. 13; which Act also, when the 26th of December is a Sunday, makes the 27th a holiday.

Holm [fr. hulmus, Sax.; insula umica,

Lat.], an isle, or fenny ground; a river island; also a hill or cliff.—Co. Litt. 5 a.

Holograph [fr. ὅλος, Gk., all, and γράφω, to write], a deed or writing, written entirely by the grantor himself, which on account of the difficulty with which the forgery of such a document can be accomplished, is held by the Scotch law valid without witnesses. See Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Holt, a wood.—Co. Litt. 4 b.

Holy orders. These are, in the English Church, the orders of bishops (including arch-bishops), priests, and deacons. See CLERGY.

Homage [fr. homo, Lat., a man], the most honourable service of reverence that a free tenant might do to his lord. When a tenant performed it, he was ungirt, and his head uncovered, the lord sitting; the tenant then knelt before him, and held his hands extended and joined between the hands of his lord, and said thus:—‘I become your man from this day forward, of life, and limb, and earthly honour, and to you will be faithful and loyal, and bear you faith, for the tene-ments that I claim to hold of you (saving the faith that I owe unto our sovereign lord the king): so help me God.’ The lord then kissed him. Homage could only be done to the lord himself, but fealty might to his steward or bailiff.—Litt. 85. See COPYHOLD.

Homage ancestral, where a tenant holds lands of his lord by homage; and the same tenant and his ancestors have holden the same land of the same lord, and of his ancestors, immemorially, and have done to them homage.—1 Inst. 100.

Homage jury, a jury in a court-baron, consisting of tenants that do homage, who are to inquire and make presentments of the death of tenants, surrenders, admittances, and the like.

Homager, one who does or is bound to do homage.—Cowel.

Homagio respectuando (respecting of homage), a writ to the escheator commanding him to deliver seisin of lands to the heir of the king's tenant, notwithstanding his homage not done.—F. N. B. 269.

Homagium reddere (to renounce homage), when a vassal made a solemn declaration of disowning his lord; for which there was a set form and method prescribed by the feudal laws.—Brac. l. 2, c. xxxv., s. 35.

Homagium, non per procuratores nec per literas fieri potuit, sed in propria personā tam domini quam tenentis capi debet et fieri. Co. Litt. 68.—(Homage cannot be done by proxy, nor by letters, but must be paid and received in the proper person, as well of lord as the tenant.)

Home Office, the department of state through which the sovereign administers most of the internal affairs of the kingdom, especially the police and communications with the judicial functionaries.

Homesoken, Homsoken. See HAMESOKEN.

Homestall, a mansion-house.

Homicide, destroying the life of a human being. In its several stages of guilt, arising from the particular circumstances of mitigation or aggravation which attend it, it is either justifiable, excusable, or felonious.

I. Justifiable, of three kinds :—

(a) Where the proper officer executes a criminal in strict conformity with his sentence.

(β) Where an officer of justice, or other person acting in his aid, in the legal exercise of a particular duty, kills a person who resists or prevents him from executing it.

(γ) Where it is committed in prevention of a forcible and atrocious crime.—1 Hale, 488.

II. Excusable, of two kinds :—

(a) Per infortunium, or by misadventure, as where a man doing a lawful act, without any intention of hurt, by accident kills another.

(β) Se defendendo, as where a man kills another upon a sudden rencounter in his own defence, or in defence of his wife, child, parent, or servant, and not from any vindictive feeling.

III. Felonious, of two kinds :—

(a) Killing one's self.

(β) Killing another, which is either—

(1) Murder ; or

(2) Manslaughter ; and this is either—

(a) Voluntary, where a man doing an unlawful act, not amounting to felony, by accident kills another ; or

(β) Involuntary, where, upon a sudden quarrel, two persons fight, and one of them kills the other ; or where a man greatly provokes another, by some personal violence, etc., and the other immediately kills him. Consult Russell on Crimes.

Hominatio, the mustering of men ; the doing of homage.

Homine capto in withernamium, a writ to take him that had taken any bondman or woman, and led him or her out of the country, so that he or she could not be replevied according to law.—Reg. Orig. 79.

Homine eligendo ad custodiendam peciam sigillii pro mercatoribus editi, a writ directed to a corporation for the choice of a man to keep one part of the seal appointed for statutes-merchant, when a former is dead, according to the Statute of Acton Burnell.—Reg. Orig. 178.

Homine replegiando, a writ to bail a man out of prison.—Reg. Orig. 77. All these writs are totally disused.

Homines, feudatory tenants who claimed a privilege of having their causes, etc., tried only in their lord's court.—Paroch. Antiq. 15.

Homiplagium, the maiming of a man.—Du Cange.

Homologation, the express or implied ratification of an act that formerly was null or voidable, or in some way defective.—Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Horn with Horn, or Horn under Horn, the promiscuous feeding of bulls and cows, or all horned beasts that are allowed to run together, upon the same common.—Spelm.

Horning, Letters of, warrant for charging persons in Scotland to pay or perform certain debts and duties; so called because they were originally proclaimed by horn or trumpet.—Bell's Scotch Law Dict.

Hors de son fee (out of the fee), where land is without the compass of a person's fee.—9 Rep. 30; 2 Mod. 104.

Horse Guards, the directing power of the military forces of the kingdom. The commander-in-chief, or general commanding the forces is at the head of this department; it is subordinate to the War Office, but the relations between them are complicated.

Hors-wealth, the wealth, or Briton who had the care of the king's horses.

Hors-weard, a service or corvée, consisting in watching the horses of the lord.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Horse-racing, a lawful pastime. By 13 Geo. II. c. 19, no plates or matches at horse-races, under 50*l.* value, could be run, under penalty of 200*l.* to be paid by the owner of the horse or horses, and 100*l.* by the advertiser of the plate. This was repealed by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 5. Formerly wagers of not more than 10*l.* on a legal horse-race could be recovered by action, but now all wagers are void. See 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109, s. 5.

Horses. The buying of stolen horses is attempted to be checked by 2 & 3 P. & M. c. 7, and 31 Eliz. c. 12, which require a record of sales at markets; see, as to these acts, Pitt v. Moran, 42 L. J. Q. B. 47. As to the limitation of the liability of railway and canal companies for the carriage of horses, see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 31. As to larceny of horses, see 24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, ss. 10, 11. Consult Oliphant on the Law of Horses. The Contagious Diseases Animals Act, 1878, 41 & 42 Vict. c. 74 (see CATTLE PLAGUE), does not apply to horses, but may be applied to 'horses, asses, and mules, and to glanders and farcy,' by order of the Privy Council, under s. 32 of that act.

The administration of poisonous drugs to horses is punishable on summary conviction by fine or imprisonment, under the Drugging of Animals Act, 1875, 39 Vict. c. 13.

The license duties on horses, mules, and horse-dealers have now been abolished by 37 Vict. c. 16, s. 11, repealing 32 & 33 Vict. c. 14, so far as relates to those duties.

Hospes generalis, a great chamberlain.

Hospitallers, the knights of a religious order, so called because they built an hospital at Jerusalem, wherein pilgrims were received. All their lands and goods in England were given to the Sovereign, by 32 Hen. VIII. c. 24.

Hospitals, eleemosynary corporations. They are either aggregate, in which the master or warden and his brethren have the estate of inheritance, or sole, in which the master, etc., only has the estate in him, and the brethren or sisters, having college and common seal in them, must consent, or the master alone has the estate, not having college or common seal. They are either eligible, donative, or presentative. Any person seised of an estate in fee-simple may, by deed enrolled in Chancery, erect and found an hospital for the sustenance and relief of the poor, to continue for ever, and place such heads, etc., therein as he shall think fit; and such hospital shall be incorporated and subject to such visitors, etc., as the founder shall nominate; also such corporations have power to take and purchase lands, not exceeding 200*l.* per annum, so as the same be not holden of the Crown, and to make leases for twenty-one years, retaining the accustomed rent. No hospital is to be erected, unless endowed with lands or hereditaments of the yearly value of 20*l.*, 39 Eliz. c. 5, perpetuated by 21 Jac. I. c. 1, s. 1.

As to the power of local authorities to provide hospitals for their districts, see 38 & 39 Vict. c. 55, s. 131.

Hostels, the Inns of Court. See that title.

Hostes sunt qui nobis vel quibus nos bellum, decernimus; ceteri proditores vel praedones sunt. 7 Co. 24.—(Enemies are those with whom we declare war, or who declare it against us; all others are traitors or pirates.)

Hostiæ, host-bread, or consecrated wafers in the Holy Eucharist.

Hostilaria, Hospitalaria, a place or room in religious houses used for the reception of guests and strangers.

Hostilarius, an hospitaller.

Hostile witness, a witness who so conducts himself under examination in chief, that the party who has called him, or his representative, is allowed to cross-examine him under the 17 & 18 Vict. c. 128, s. 22, i.e., to treat him as though he had been called by the opposite party. As to discrediting a witness in criminal cases, see 28 & 29 Vict. c. 18, s. 3.

Hostricus, a goshawk.—Paroch. Antiq. 569.

Hot-water ordeal. This was a test, in cases of accusation, by hot water; the party accused and suspected being appointed by the judge to put his arms up to the elbows in seething hot water, which, after sundry prayers and invocations, he did, and was, by the effect which followed, judged faulty or faultless.—Verst. Rest. Dec. Intel. 66.

Hotchpot [fr. haché en poche, Fr., a confused mingling of divers things], a blending or mixing of lands and chattels, answering in some respects to the collatio bonorum of the civil law.

As to lands, it only applies to such as are given in frank-marriage, thus: if one daughter have an estate given with her in frank-marriage by her ancestor, then, if lands descend from the same ancestor to her and her sister in fee-simple (not in fee-tail), she or her heirs shall have no share in them unless they will agree to divide the lands so given in frank-marriage, in equal proportions with the rest of the lands descending, i.e., bringing her lands so given into hotchpot.

As to personalty. The Statute of Distribution intended children to take equal shares of the goods and chattels of their intestate ancestor, and it considers that there may be some of the children who have previously received a portion or advancement, but not so much as to make up their full share; in that case, such child so advanced but in part, is allowed so much more out of the intestate's personal estate as will suffice to make his share equal to that of the other children.

The act takes nothing away that has been given to any of the children, however unequal that may have been. How much soever that may exceed the remainder of the personal estate left by the intestate at his death, the child may, if he please, keep it all; if he be not content, but would have more, then he must bring into hotchpot what he has before received. This principle is based upon the equitable doctrine of equality, for it is perfectly coincident with that conduct which a good and just parent would pursue towards all his children.

Hotel-keeper. See INNKEEPER.

Houseage, a fee paid for housing goods by a carrier, or at a wharf, etc.

House, means prima facie a dwelling-house.—14 M. & W. 185; but see 7 M. & G. 122. As to what will pass under a grant of a 'house,' see 1 Crabb's Real Property, 68, 87. See also Lloyd on Compensation, ch. 2. Malicious injuries to houses by tenants, or by means of explosive substances, are punishable by 24 & 25 Vict. c. 97, ss. 9 and 13.

Housebote, estovers, or an allowance of necessary timber out of the lord's wood for the repairing or support of a house.

House-breaking. See BURGLARY.

House-burning. See ARSON.

House of Commons, one of the constituent parts of parliament, being the assembly of knights of shires, or the representatives of counties; citizens, or the representatives of cities; and burgesses, or the representatives of boroughs.

The following is a statement of the entire representation of the three kingdoms, composing the House of Commons, since the Representation of the People Act, 1867:—

ENGLAND AND WALES.
	187 county members.
	306 borough members.
Total, 493

The property qualification of members of parliament is abolished by 21 & 22 Vict. c. 26. Members of the Universities of Oxford Cambridge, and Trinity College, Dublin, eldest sons or heirs apparent of peers or of persons qualified to be knights of the shire, never required a qualification. In Scotland, no qualification was ever necessary.

Aliens are not eligible as members, neither are minors, lunatics, English or Scotch peers; but Irish peers, unless representative, may sit for any place in Great Britain. The English, Scotch, and Irish Judges are disqualified. Also the holders of various offices particularized by statute, Government contractors, clergymen, and bankrupts. See 'Chitty's Statutes,' vol. iv., tit. 'Parliament.'

House of Correction, a species of gaol which does not fall under the sheriff's charge, but is governed by a keeper, wholly independent of that office.

Houses of Correction, first established in the reign of Elizabeth, were originally designed for the penal confinement (after conviction) of paupers and vagrants refusing to work; but by 5 & 6 Wm. IV. c. 38, ss. 3, 4, reciting that great inconvenience and expense had been found to result from the practice of committing to the common gaol where it happens to be remote from the place of trial, it is enacted that a justice of the peace, or coroner, may commit for safe custody to any house of correction situate near the place where the assizes or sessions are to be held; and that offenders sentenced in those courts may be committed, in execution of such sentence, to any house of correction for the county.—3 Steph. Com., 7th ed., 122. See 14 & 15 Vict. c. 91; and 14 & 15 Vict. c. 55, ss. 20, 21.

House-duty, a tax on inhabited houses imposed by 14 & 15 Vict. c. 36, in lieu of window-duty, which is abolished. See 37 Vict. c. 16, ss. 8—10, providing for the stating of a case.

House of Lords, a constituent part of parliament, being composed of the lords spiritual and temporal.

The lords temporal are divided into dukes, marquesses, earls, viscounts, and barons. The number of British peerages of different ranks has been greatly augmented from time to time, and there is no limitation to the power of the Crown to add to it by fresh creation. The following table will show pretty correctly the present number of each class:

Lords Spiritual:

- 2 English archbishops.
- 24 English bishops (the Bishop of Sodor and Man and the junior bishop do not sit. See 10 & 11 Vict. c. 108, s. 2).

Total, 26.

Lords Temporal: 491 (including 16 Scottish representative peers elected each parliament, and 28 Irish representative peers elected for life).

Total of the House of Lords... 517.

Since the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 42, for the disestablishment of the Church in Ireland, the Irish bishops have ceased to be represented in the House of Lords.

The House of Lords has been for a considerable time—at least since the time of Henry the Fourth—the Court of the final appeal, having no original jurisdiction over causes, but only upon appeals and proceedings in error to rectify any injustice or mistake of the law, committed by the courts below.—3 Hallam's Constit. Hist.; consult Macqueen's Practice of the House of Lords; and see D. P. or Dom. Proc., the abbreviation in text books and reports, stands for Domus Procerum, the House of Lords.

By the Judicature Act, 1873, s. 20, the jurisdiction of the House of Lords as the final Court of Appeal was taken away; but the operation of this section was suspended by the Judicature Act, 1875, s. 2, until the 1st of November, 1876, and by the Appellate Jurisdiction Act, 1876, the appellate jurisdiction was restored. See APPELLATE JURISDICTION.

Householder [paterfamilias, Lat.], an occupier of a house; a master of a family.

House-tax. See HOUSE-DUTY.

Howe, a hill.—Co. Litt. 5 b.

Howgh, a valley.—Ibid.

Hredige, readily, quickly.—Leg. Athelstan. c. 16.

Hudgeld. See HINGELD.

Hue and Cry [fr. huer, Fr., to shout; crier, to cry aloud; hutesium et clamor, Lat.], the old common law process of pursuing with horn and voice felons and such as have dangerously wounded another. It may be raised by constables, or private persons, or both. If the constable or peace officer concur in the pursuit, he has the same powers, etc., as if acting under a magistrate's warrant. All who join in a hue and cry, whether a constable be present or not, are justified in the apprehension of the person pursued, though it turn out that he is innocent; and where he takes refuge in a house, may break open the door, if admittance be refused. But if a man wantonly or maliciously raise a hue and cry, he is liable to fine and imprisonment, and to an action at the suit of the party injured. The 7 Geo. IV. c. 64, s. 28, provides for compensation and expenses in such cases, in order to encourage the apprehension of felons.—4 Bl. Com. 293, and 4 Steph. Com. As to the mode of raising the hue and cry, see Havk. l. 2, c. xii., s. 6. The term is also applied to a paper circulated by order of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, announcing the perpetration of offences.)

Huisserium, a ship used to transport horses. Also termed uffer.

Huissier, an usher of a court.—Cowel.

Hulka, a hulk, or small vessel.—Cowel.

Hullus, a hill.—Cowel.

Humagium, a moist place.—Mon. Angl.

Hundred, a subdivision of the county, the nature of which is not known with certainty. In the Dialogus de Scaccario, it is said that a hundred 'ex hydarum aliquot centenariis, sed non determinatis constat; quidam enim ex pluribus, quidam ex paucioribus constat.' Some accounts make it consist of precisely a hundred hides; others, of a hundred tithings, or of a hundred free families. Certain it is, that whatever may have been its original organization, the hundred, at the period when it became known to us, differed greatly as to extent in the several parts of England. This division is ascribed to King Alfred, and he may possibly have introduced it into England, though in Germany it dates from a very remote period, where it was established among the Franks in the sixth century. In the capitularies of Charlemagne we meet with it in the form known among us.—Capit. l. 3, c. x. See HUNDREDORS.

Hundred Court, a larger court-baron, being held for all the inhabitants of a particular hundred, instead of a manor. The free suitors are here also the judges, and the steward the registrar, as in the case of a court-baron. It is not a court of record; it resembles a court-baron in all points, except that in point of territory it is of a greater jurisdiction. It was denominated hæreda in the Gothic constitution. Causes are removed by the same writ as from a court-baron, and its proceedings may be reviewed by writ of false judgment. The court is become obsolete.—3 Steph. Com. By 30 & 31 Vict. c. 142, s. 28, 'no action capable of being brought in a county court shall hereafter be brought or maintained in any hundred or other inferior court not being a court of record.'

Hundred-fecta, the performance of suit and service at the hundred court.

Hundred-fetena, dwellers or inhabitants of a hundred.

Hundred-lagh, or Hundred-law, a hundred court.

Hundred-penny, the hundredfeh, or tax collected by the sheriff or lord of a hundred.

Hundredes earldor, Hundredes man [alder mannus hundreti], the presiding officer in the hundred-court.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Hundredors, men of a hundred; persons serving on juries, or fit to be empaneled thereon for trials, dwelling within the hundred where the cause of action arose.

The statute now in force, by which hundredors are liable for damages done by rioters, is 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 31. The 7 & 8 Geo. IV. c. 27 repeals all the prior statutes relative to such liability. Hundredors are now no longer liable in cases of robbery, arson, killing or maiming cattle, cutting down or destroying trees, destroying turnpikes or works on navigable rivers, cutting hop bines, destroying corn to prevent it being exported, destroying corn going to market, or injuring horses or carriages so conveying it, and wounding revenue officers; they are, in short, only now liable for damage done by rioters acting feloniously. A plaintiff cannot proceed by action, if his loss do not exceed 30*l*.; his remedy in that case is by summary proceedings before justices at special petty sessions.

As to damage to threshing machines, see 2 & 3 Wm. IV. c. 72. As to compensation by hundredors for the plunder, etc., of wrecks, see 17 & 18 Vict. c. 104, s. 477.

Hurdereferst, a domestic; one of a family.

Hurdle, a sledge used to draw traitors to execution, disused by operation of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 23, s. 31.

Hurst, Hyrst, Herst, Hirst, a wood or grove of trees.—Co. Litt. 4 b.

Hurtardus, Hurtus, a ram, or wether.

Husband of a Ship. See SHIP'S HUSBAND.

Husband, or Husbond [fr. hus, A. S., a house, and bindan, A. S., to bind], a married man; the good man of the house. See next title.

Husband and Wife. The common law treated them, for most purposes, as one person, giving, with exceptions comparatively unimportant, the whole of a woman's property to her husband for his absolute use, and a husband could not make a grant to his wife at the common law, though he might do so: (1) under the Statute of Uses, by granting an estate to another person for her use; (2) by creating a trust in her favour; (3) by the custom of particular places; (4) by surrendering copyholds to her use; and (5) by will.

Equity, however, from very early times, by the doctrines of 'separate use,' 'trusts,' and 'equity to a settlement,' very largely modified the common law in favour of the wife; and the statute law, first in 1870 and afterwards in 1882, has, by the 'Married Women's Property Acts,' almost completely abolished the property distinction between an unmarried and a married woman. See MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY.

The custody of the wife's person belongs of right to her husband; but if he, by ill-usage or threat, place her life or person in danger, she may obtain sureties to keep the peace either from a justice of the peace, the Sessions, the Queen's Bench Division of the High Court of Justice, or the Lord Chancellor, by articles of the peace and supplicavit. She may obtain a habeas corpus, at her own instance if under improper restraint, though not at the instance of others, to enable her to make a will or an appointment of her property. If a wife be taken away or harboured, she may be retaken, or the husband may issue a habeas corpus, or bring an action for her detention. He may justify the defence of his wife by force; and when her life or person is endangered, he may even kill the assailant. If he were to detect any one in criminal intercourse with her, flagrante delicto, his instant killing him would, at most, but constitute manslaughter.

The general rule is that a husband is not bound by his wife's contracts, unless made by his authority, express or implied. If any articles are supplied to the wife which are not necessities, the legal presumption is, that the husband did not assent to his wife's contract. In the case of necessities, where a husband neither does nor assents to any act to show that he has held out his wife as his agent to pledge his credit for goods supplied on her order, the question whether she bought the necessities as his agent is one of fact, and the mere fact of cohabitation does not raise a presumption of agency. So held by the House of Lords in Debenham v. Mellon, 6 App. Cas. 24. Where a separation has ensued in consequence of the wife's adultery, whether it be by a decree of judicial separation, or by the voluntary elopement of his wife, or by expulsion from her husband's house, he is certainly not responsible for necessities furnished to her, although he has been guilty of adultery himself and was the first offender. So if a wife, though not guilty of adultery, elope from her husband without sufficient cause.—Consult Macqueen on Husband and Wife.

Ante-nuptial debts are provided for by sections 13—15 of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, which enact that a wife is to continue liable for such debts to the extent of her separate property, but that a husband is liable for them to the extent of property acquired by him from his wife, and that the husband and wife may be jointly sued in respect of any such debts.

Proceedings against each other in connection with the rights of marriage are regulated by the Matrimonial Causes Acts. See MATRIMONIAL CAUSES. Proceedings of husband and wife against each other in respect of property are regulated by the 12th, 16th, and 17th sections of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882. The 12th section enacts that 'every married woman shall have against all persons, including her husband, the same civil and (unless they be living together or the act complained of took place when they were living together) criminal remedies for the protection of her separate property, as if she were unmarried,' but that, 'except as aforesaid, no husband or wife shall be entitled to sue the other for a tort'; the 16th section, that 'a wife doing any act with respect to the property of her husband, which, if done by the husband with respect to the property of the wife, would make the husband liable to criminal proceedings by the wife, shall in like manner be liable to criminal proceedings by her husband'; and the 17th section that questions arising between husband and wife as to property may be decided in a summary way (privately, if either party so require) by a judge of the High Court, or (at the option of the applicant irrespectively of the amount in dispute) by the judge of the county court of the district in which either party resides.

The custody of children belongs to the husband at common law (see Andrews in re L. R. 8 Q. B. 153 and 8 Ch. 622), but by application to the Chancery Division of the High Court, the wife may obtain such custody until the children are sixteen years old (36 Vict. c. 12), and see Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, 20 & 21 Vict. c. 85, s. 35.

As to criminal law, if a wife commit a felony in her husband's presence, the law presumes that she acted under his coercion, and excuses her, which presumption may be rebutted by evidence; if in the absence of her husband she commit an offence—even by his order—her coverture is no excuse. Such protection is not allowed in crimes which are mala in se, prohibited by the law of nature, nor in such as are heinous, or dangerous; and, if a married woman be guilty of treason, murder, or homicide, in company with her husband, she is punishable. A wife may, generally, be found guilty with her husband in all misdemeanours. But husband and wife cannot alone be found guilty of a conspiracy, because they are one person, and presumed to have one will. If a wife incite her husband to the commission of a felony, she is an accessory before the fact; but she cannot be treated as an accessory for receiving her husband, knowing that he has committed a felony.—1 Hale, 45; 1 Hawk. c. i., ss. 9, 10, 11, 12.

As to maintenance of the wife by the husband under the poor law, by 5 Geo. I. c. 8, a husband running away and leaving wife or children chargeable to a parish is liable to have his goods seized and sold to pay for their maintenance; and by the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1868, 31 & 32 Vict. c. 122, s. 33, when a married woman requires relief from the poor rates without her husband, an order may be made upon the husband by Justices in Petty Sessions to maintain his wife by paying towards the cost of her relief such sum weekly or otherwise, in such manner and to such persons as shall appear to the justices to be proper. The maintenance of the husband by the wife out of her separate property is provided for by the 20th section of the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, which incorporates mutatis mutandis the 33rd section of the Poor Law Act, 1868, above mentioned.

The law of Evidence on this subject may be thus epitomised:—

The husbands and wives of the parties, and of the persons in whose behalf any suit, or action, is brought or defended, are competent and compellable to give evidence, according to the practice of the Court, on behalf of either or any of the parties.—16 & 17 Vict. c. 83, s. 1.

No husband is competent or compellable to give evidence for or against his wife, nor any wife to give evidence for or against her husband, in any criminal proceeding (s. 2).

No husband is compellable to disclose any communication made to him by his wife during the marriage, and no wife to disclose any communication made to her by her husband during the marriage (s. 3).

The following are exceptions in criminal proceedings:—

(1) If a woman be taken away by force and married, she may be a witness against her husband, for she is not a wife de jure, a contract obtained by force having no obligation in law.

(2) On an indictment for a second marriage during the continuance of a former marriage, though the first wife or husband cannot be a witness, yet the second wife or husband may, after the proof of the first marriage, because she is no wife.

(3) A wife may be a witness against her husband for an offence committed against her person.

(4) In criminal proceedings for the protection of the wife's separate property under the Married Women's Property Act, 1882, s. 12 (supra), husband and wife are competent to give evidence against each other.

By the Bankruptcy Act, 1869, the Court may summon the wife of any bankrupt known or suspected to have in her possession any of the estate or effects of the bankrupt.

By 22 & 23 Vict. c. 61, s. 6, on a wife's petition to the Divorce Court for dissolution of marriage, on the ground of adultery and cruelty, or of adultery and desertion, husband and wife are competent and compellable to give evidence of or relating to cruelty or desertion. And by the 32 & 33 Vict. c. 68, s. 3, the parties to any proceeding instituted in consequence of adultery, and the husbands and wives of such parties are competent witnesses, but are not compellable to answer any question tending to show that he or she has been guilty of adultery, unless such witness shall have already given evidence in the same proceeding in disproof of his or her alleged adultery. As to Scotland, see 37 & 38 Vict. c. 64.

As to dissolution of marriage, judicial separation, nullity of marriage, protecting order, see the respective titles, MARRIAGE, and MATRIMONIAL CAUSES.

Husbandry, farming.

Husbreece, burglary.—Blount.

Huscans, buskins.—4 Ed. IV. c. 7.

Huscarle, a menial servant.—Domesday.

Husfastne, he who holds house and land.—Bract. 1. 3, t. 2, c. 10.

Husgale, house rent or tax.—Mon. Angl. iii. 254.

Hush-money, a bribe to hinder information; pay to secure silence.

Husting [fr. hus-thing, A.-S.], council, court, tribunal; apparently so called from being held within a building, at a time when other courts were held in the open air. It was a local court. The county court in the city of London bore this name. There were hustings at York, Winchester, Lincoln, and in other places, similar to the London hustings.—Madox, Hist. Excheq. c. xx. Also the raised place from which candidates for seats in parliament, prior to the Ballot Act, 1872, addressed the constituency on the occasion of their public oral nomination, and from which a show of hands was taken by the returning officer.

Hutesium et clamor (hue and cry). See HUE AND CRY.

Hutilan, taxes.—Mon. Angl. i. 586.

Hwata, Hwatung, augury, divination.—Anc. Inst. Eng.

Hybernagium, the season for sowing winter corn between Michaelmas and Christmas. See IBERNAGIUM.

Hybrid, a mongrel or mule—an animal formed of the union of different species, or different genera; also (metaphorically) a human being born of the union of persons of different races.

Hyd, hide, skin. See HIDE-GILD.

Hyd, a measure of land, containing, according to some, a hundred acres, which quantity is also assigned to it in the Dialogus de Scaccario. It seems, however, that the hide varied in different parts of the kingdom. See HIDE OF LAND.

Hydage. See HIDAGE.

Hynden, an association of ten men, first mentioned in In. 54, where it signifies the person from among whom the consecramentals were to be chosen in the case of deadly feud. From Ath. V. iii. it appears that the members of the 'firth-guilds' (congildones) were formed into associations of ten, the enactment running thus: 'That we count ten men together, and let the senior direct the nine in all these things that are to be done; and then let them count their hyndens together, with one hynden-man, who shall admonish the ten (i.e., the ten hyndens) for our common benefit.' Hence it would seem that the eleven who are to hold the money consisted of the senior of each hynden, together with the hynden-man who presided over the hynden of the hyndens, i.e., ten hyndens. The number XII. mentioned in Ath. V. viii. 1, is apparently an error for XI. —Anc. Inst. Eng.

Hypobolium, a legacy to a wife above her dower.—Civ. Law.

Hypothecation [fr. hypotheca, Civ. Law, a species of pledge in which the pledger retained possession of the thing pledged, as distinguished from pignus, where the possession was transferred to the pledgee. See Sand. Just., 5th ed., li., 326, 428; Smith's Dict. of Antiq., tit. 'Pignus'], the act of pledging a thing as security for a debt or demand without parting with the possession. There are few cases, if any in our law, where an hypothecation, in the strict sense of the Roman law, exists. The nearest approaches, perhaps, are the cases of holders of bottomry bonds, and of seamen to whom wages are due in the merchant service, who have a claim against the ship in rem. But these are rather cases of liens or privileges than strict hypothecations. There are also cases where mortgages of chattels are held valid, without any actual possession by the mortgagee, but they stand upon very peculiar grounds, and may be deemed exceptions to the general rule.

Hypothec, in the law of Scotland, is a security established by law in favour of a creditor over the property of his debtor; in the case of a landlord to whom rent is owing, it is restricted as to right to agricultural produce by 30 & 31 Vict. c. 42, and abolished as to the rent of land exceeding two acres in extent, let for agriculture or pasture, not being due, or to become due under any lease, writing, or bargain current on the 11th

November, 1881, by the Hypothec Abolition (Scotland) Act, 1880, 43 Vict. c. 12.

Hypothèque, the right acquired by the creditor over the immoveable property which has been assigned to him by his debtor as security for his debt, although he be not placed in possession of it.—Fr. Law.

Hyrnes [parochia, Lat.], parish.

Hysterotomy [fr. ιστέρα, Gk., the womb, and τόμος, a section], the Cæsarian operation.

Hythe, a port or little haven at which to lade or unlade wares.

I.

Ibernagium [fr. hibernagium, Lat.], the season for sowing winter corn.—Cart. Antiq. MSS.

Ibidem, Ibid., Id. [Lat.] (in the same place or case).

Iceni, the ancient name for the people of Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridgeshire, and Huntingdonshire.

Icona, a figure or representation of a thing.—Du Cange.

I-ctus, an abbreviation of jurisconsultus, a lawyer.

Ictus orbis, a maim, bruise, or swelling; a hurt without cutting the skin.—Cowel.

Id certum est quod certum reddi potest; sed id magis certum est quod de semet ipso est certum. 9 Co. 47.—(That is certain which can be reduced to a certainty, but that is more certain which is certain on the face of it.)

Idem est facere, et non prohibere cum possis; et qui non prohibet, cum prohibere possit, in culpâ est (aut jubet). 3 Inst. 158.—(To commit, and not to prohibit when in your power, is the same thing; and he who does not prohibit when he can prohibit, is in fault, or does the same as ordering it to be done.)

Idem est non esse et non apparere. Jenk. Cent. 207.—(Not to be and not to appear are the same.)

Idem semper antecedenti proximo refertur. Co. Litt. 685.—('The same' is always referred to its next antecedent.)

Idem sonans (sounding alike). The Courts will not set aside proceedings on account of the misspelling of names, provided the variance is so trifling as not to mislead, or the name as spelt be idem sonans, as Lawrance instead of Lawrence, Reynell for Reynolds, Beneditto for Benedetto.—1 Crompt. and M. 806; 6 Price, 2; 2 Taunt. 401.

Idem per idem, an illustration of a kind that really adds no additional element to the consideration of the question.

Identitas vera colligitur ex multitudine signorum. Bacon.—(True identity is collected from a multitude of signs.)

Identitate, or Idemptitate nominis, an ancient and obsolete writ that lay for one taken and arrested in any personal action, and committed to prison for another man of the same name.—F. N. B. 267.

Identity. The being the same person or thing as represented or believed to be. See PERSONATION.

Ides [fr. idurare, obs. Lat., to divide], a division of time among the Romans. In March, May, July, and October, the Ides were on the 15th of the month, in the remaining months on the 13th.—Ken. Antiq.; Smi. Clas. Antiq. This method of reckoning is still retained in the Chancery of Rome, and in the calendar of the Breviary. See NONES.

Idiots and Lunatics. An idiot is a person born without a mind; a lunatic is a person who has lost it. The administration of the estates of idiots and lunatics is, in virtue of personal authority, given by the Crown, viz., a special commission under a warrant of the Queen's sign-manual, counter-signed by the Lords of the Treasury, not directed to the Court of Chancery, but to a certain great officer of the Crown, not of necessity the person who has the custody of the great seal, though it is generally given to him by a warrant from the Crown, in consideration of its being his duty as Chancellor to issue the commissions on which the inquiry as to the facts of idiocy or lunacy is to be obtained. It is said that the warrant confers no jurisdiction, but only a power of administration. This power has been exercised by the Lord Chancellor and the two Lords Justices of Appeal by virtue of the royal sign-manual; and is continued to the former by Jud. Act, 1873, s. 17 (3), and to the latter, so long as they remain judges of the Court of Appeal, and are so intrusted by the Crown; but in the future the jurisdiction now vested in the Lords Justices, is to be exercised by such judge or judges of the High Court of Justice, or Court of Appeal, as may be intrusted with such jurisdiction by sign-manual of the Crown (Jud. Act, 1875, s. 7).

The rules of Equity and Law are the same as to what amounts to insanity.

In the case of a lunatic, the Crown is but a trustee of his estate, but in the case of an idiot the Crown is absolutely entitled to the profits, subject to the idiot's maintenance; but persons are seldom found idiots, but only non compotes mentis; and, even when they are, the Crown rarely claims its right in their property.

A lunatic is never considered in law to be incurable.

Idiots and lunatics are not answerable criminally for their acts. They are, however, liable on contracts for necessities, as infants are.

When the question is whether an act was done lucido intervallo, which may be either by remission or intermission of the disease, it is not enough to show that the act was actus sapienti conveniens, for that may happen many ways; but it must be proved to be actus sapientis, and to proceed from judgment and deliberation, otherwise the presumption continues. See LUCID INTERVALS.

The practice in lunacy is regulated by 16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, amended by 18 Vict. c. 13, and by 'The Lunacy Regulation Act, 1862,' 25 & 26 Vict. c. 86, and the General Orders, Nov. 7, 1853. As to Ireland, see 34 & 35 Vict. c. 22.

In lieu of a Special Commission, a General Commission is issued to the two Masters in Lunacy, to inquire as to the Lunacy of all persons whose cases shall be referred to them by the Lord Chancellor, under a separate order in each case (16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, s. 39), obtainable upon petition. The mode of inquiry without a jury as to lunatics in confinement, heretofore authorized by the Act 8 & 9 Vict. c. 100, s. 95 (commonly known as Lord Ashley's Act), is discontinued, and the inquiry as to insanity is, in future, to be conducted in the same manner, whether the alleged lunatic be in confinement or not (ss. 53, 54). The inquiry takes place before a jury if the alleged lunatic, orally by himself, his counsel, or solicitor, or by petition to the Lord Chancellor, demands a jury, and the Lord Chancellor, after a personal examination of the alleged lunatic, is satisfied that he is mentally competent to form and express a wish for an inquiry before a jury; or if the Lord Chancellor, or master, is of opinion that it is expedient (16 & 17 Vict. c. 70, ss. 41, 42, 43, and Gen. Ord. 7—10, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 86, s. 6). The inquiry is to be confined to the question, whether the person who is the subject of it is, at the time of such inquiry, of unsound mind and incapable of managing himself or his affairs, and no evidence as to anything done or said by such person, or as to his demeanour or state of mind more than two years before the time of the inquiry, shall be receivable in proof of insanity, or on the trial of any traverse of an inquisition, unless the judge or master shall otherwise direct (25 & 26 Vict. c. 86, s. 3), but inquiries as to previous dealings with the lunatic's property, may, after inquisition, be gone into (Ord. 12).

As to the service of writs of summons on such persons, see Jud. Act, 1875, Ord. IX., r. 5. By Ord. XVIII. of the same Act, it is provided that in all cases in which lunatics and persons of unsound mind not so found by inquisition might respectively before the passing of the Act have sued or would have been liable to be sued, they may respectively sue by their committee or next friend, and defend by their committees or guardians appointed for that purpose. And by Ord. XIII., r. 1, provision is made for the appointment of a guardian ad litem in default of appearance by a defendant who is lunatic or of unsound mind. See generally Chitty's Statutes, vol. iv., tit. 'Lunatics.'

Idle and Disorderly Person. See 5 Geo. IV. c. 85, and VAGRANT.

Idoneum se facere ; idoneare se, to purge one's self by oath of a crime of which one is accused.

Idoneus homo (a proper man). He is legally said to be idoneus homo who has honesty, knowledge, and ability.

Id possumus quod de jure possumus. Lane, 116.—(We may do only that which by law we are allowed to do.)

Id, quod nostrum est, sine facto nostro ad alium transferri non potest. D. 50, 17, 11.—(That which is ours cannot be transferred to another without our act.)

Ignis judicium, the old judicial trial by fire.—Blount.

Ignitegium [fr. ignis, Lat., fire, and tego, to cover], the curfew.—Encyc. Lond.

Ignoramus (we are ignorant). The word formerly written on a bill of indictment by a grand jury when they rejected it; the phrase now used is 'not a true bill,' or 'not found'; or the jury are said to 'ignore' the bill.

Ignorantia eorum quæ quis scire tenetur non excusat. Hale's Pl. Cr. 42.—(Ignorance of those things which one is bound to know, excuses not.)

Ignorantia facti excusat, ignorantia juris non excusat. 1 Co. 177.—(Ignorance of the fact excuses; ignorance of the law excuses not.) Therefore, 1st, money paid with full knowledge of the facts, but through ignorance of the law, is not recoverable, if there be nothing against conscience in retaining it; and 2ndly, money paid in ignorance of the facts is recoverable, provided there have been no laches in the party paying it. In criminal cases this maxim applies, as where a man thinks he has a right to kill a person excommunicated or outlawed wherever he meets him and does so, this is murder. But a mistake of fact is an excuse, as where a man intending to kill a thief or housebreaker in his own house by mistake kills one of his own family, this is no criminal action.—4 Bl. Com. 27.

Ignorantia juris, quod quisque scire tenetur, neminem excusat. 2 Rep. 3 b.—(Ignorance of the law, which every one is held to be cognizant of, excuses no one.) See supra.

Ignoratio elenchi, an overlooking of the adversary's counterposition in an argument.

Ignoratis terminis ignoratur et ars. Co. Litt. 2.—(The terms being unknown, the art also is unknown.)

Ignore, to throw out a bill of indictment.
